BUT the Commotions did not end here; another much more dangerous was discover'd in Amalphis. Duke Roger trusting too much to the Longobards, out of the Regard he had for his Mother Sigelgaita, who was of that Nation, and Sister to the last Prince of Salerno, had without any Scruple committed the Government of his fortified Places to the very Longobards, from whom his Father and himself had taken them; among the rest he had given the Government of Amalphis to some chief Officers of the Longobards, who, resolving to take Advantage of the Disorders that had a little before happen'd in Cosenza; for the Duke and the Count his Uncle were employ'd in suppressing the Rebellion of the Cosentines; drove all the Duke's Partisans out of Amalphis, openly revolted, and refus'd to receive himself. The Duke being highly provok'd at such Treachery, in order to reduce the City, resolv'd to gain his Brother Boemondus by kind Usage, begging his Assistance, which he gave with all the Forces he could draw together from Puglia and Calabria; the Duke likewise invited Roger Count of Sicily to his Assistance; who this Year 1096 came with Twenty thousand Saracens, and an infinite Number of other Nations, to lay Siege to Amalphis ⁵. The Place was invested by these three Princes with all their Forces, and the Siege was so close, that had it not been thwarted by a very odd Conjunction, Amalphis had certainly surrender'd.

WHAT oblig'd them to raise the Siege, was a new Expedition that offer'd to Boemondus and his Soldiers, who remembering the Engagement they were under, in an instant left the Siege. This was the Publication of the first Crusade, the Contrivance of which is owing to Urban II. as first Author of it ⁶. Urban in the Year 1095, having assembled a Council in France, in the City of Clermont, excited all the Princes of Europe to undertake an Expedition to the Holy-Land; and so great was the Zeal of those Princes, who were likewise animated by Peter the Hermit, that in making Preparation for so glorious an Undertaking, they put all Europe in Confusion; but of all the Nations of Europe, the Italians and French manifested their Zeal most to take the Cross, and arm themselves for this Expedition. The Great Hugo, Brother of Philip I. King of France, Robert Duke of Normandy, Godfrey of Boulogne, Duke of Lorraine, and the Counts of Flanders and Toulouse, took Arms. But of all our Norman Princes, Boemondus, with his Nephew Tancred the Son of Duke Roger and Alberada his first Wife, according to Pirri and Summontes (for Ordericus Vitalis¹, and the Abbot of Noce² make Tancred to be the Son of a Sister of Boemondus) were the most forward. Boemondus, whether out of real Zeal, or Grief for his not being enough distinguish'd in Italy; or with a Design to go on in the Conquests which his Father and he had begun in the East, immediately left the Siege of Amalphis, put on a red Cross, got some purple Mantles, and with great Ceremony cut them into small Pieces, to provide his Soldiers with the like Crosses. His Example, and the great Pains he was at in promoting this his Devotion, made a great Number of People flock to him and Tancred, in order to follow them in this Expedition. But especially they were join'd by a great many Puglians, Calabrians, Sicilians, and those of other Provinces of Italy, so that they soon made up a great Army, and they all took an Oath in the Field, together with himself, that they should make no War against Christians, before they should have conquer'd the Country of the Infidels. Duke Roger seeing himself thus abandon'd before Amalphis, and that the new Crusade had robb'd him of the Flower of his Troops, was oblig'd to raise the Siege, notwithstanding it was so far advanc'd, which he pretended to do out of Zeal for the Christian Religion, though swell'd with Indignation and Resentment against Boemondus, who by no means could be persuaded to give him any further Assistance. Count Roger seeing himself likewise deserted by his Men, thinking it not proper to retard so specious an Expedition, had Patience, and return'd to Sicily very much vex'd³. On the other hand, Boemondus and Tancred having put themselves at the Head of their Puglians and Calabrians, and an infinite Number of other Nations, and embark'd at Bari, began their Voyage towards the East. Our incomparable Torquatus, by a Poetical Licence, makes Tancred Captain of Eight hundred Horsemen, which he supposes him to have brought with him out of Campania Felix near Naples; but at this Time this Province belong'd neither to Boemondus nor Tancred, so that he could not raise them there. Campania Felix at this Time was for the most Part subject to the Dukedom of Naples, and was govern'd by Sergius Duke and Consul under the Emperor Alexius Comnenus. Aversa, a new City, was in Possession of the Normans, who were of another Family, not of the Race of Tancred Count of Hauteville, of whom Boemondus and Roger were descended. And Capua had at this Time revolted from the Norman Princes; for tho' Prince Giordanus, who died in Piperno in the Year 1090, had left Richard his Son, an Infant, as Successor in the Principality⁴; yet the Capuan Longobards, as soon as they were appriz'd of the Death of Giordanus, enter'd into a Conspiracy against Richard and the Princess his Mother, and having taken Possession of the Forts of the City, drove all the Normans out of it; so that Richard and his Mother were forc'd to go to Aversa for Shelter, where they remain'd till they were assisted and restor'd to Capua, by the Duke of Puglia, and Roger Count of Sicily.

THIS famous Hero after he had rais'd the Siege of Amalphis, and return'd to Sicily, minded nothing but the firm Establishment of his Dominions in his own Family by illustrious Alliances. The greatest Princes of Christendom courted his Friendship and Alliance. Philip I. King of France, in the Year 1094 had sought his eldest Daughter, and the Year following the Second had been married to Conrade the Son of the Emperor Henry III. This Prince on account of the Jars betwixt Henry his Father and the Popes, had been persuaded by them to desert his Father; and he not only join'd the opposite Party, but carried Matters so far, that he did not scruple to take Arms against his Father; and being abetted by the Pope, he march'd to Italy, took Possession of many Places that depended on the Empire, and withdrew them from their Allegiance. Pope Urban, and the Countess Matilda finding no better way to support him, procur'd a Marriage betwixt him and a Daughter of the Count of Sicily, who was able to defend him against the Power of Henry⁵.

THE King of Hungary envying him on account of this Alliance, two Years after sent Ambassadors to demand another Daughter in Marriage for his Son Alexandrus. Roger accepted of the Match, and with great Pomp and Solemnity in the Year 1096 the Princess was conducted to her Husband. This extraordinary good Fortune of Roger's Family, got him the Surname of Great Count, which he now began to assume among his other Titles.

AUGUSTINUS INVEGES, besides these Reasons, relates, that Roger was mov'd to call himself Grand Count, because he had created his Son Simon Count of Butera; and the Use of Fiefs and Counties being already introduc'd into Sicily, and the Sons, Nephews, and the Count's Vassals being likewise adorn'd with these Titles; in order to distinguish himself from these, he began to subscribe himself with this new Title, Magnus Comes Calabriae & Siciliae.

BUT what most of all made the Power of Roger the Great Count of Sicily conspicuous, was the Expedition of Capua. Richard the Son of Giordanus having been expell'd Capua, had retir'd to Aversa, and not able of himself to recover Capua, begg'd his Assistance and Protection, promising him, as an Acknowledgment for such important Aid, to become his Liege-man, and do him Homage for his Dominions¹.

AND Malaterra adds², that besides the Promise of doing him Homage, he had likewise offer'd him Naples as a Reward, which City was yet to be conquer'd. And Inveges, very much to the Purpose, observes, that it was not known how Richard came by this Right thus to dispose of Naples, which at this Time was govern'd by its own Dukes in the Form of a Republick. The Count overjoy'd at these Offers, immediately assembled an Army, and march'd towards Capua, where the Duke of Puglia his Nephew, and Richard had already join'd to besiege it: Before he began the Siege, he caus'd all the neighbouring Campania to be ravag'd; afterwards he invest'd the City, and threaten'd to ruin the Inhabitants if they did not surrender³. Urban II. having heard of the Danger the Capuans were in, came to the Camp where these Princes were, in order to make Peace, and prevent the Ruin of that City. These Princes receiv'd him magnificently, and consented to refer their Interests to him, provided the Rebels would do the same, but these would not agree to it. Nevertheless Urban still thinking to bring them to reason, enter'd the City, but tho' they promis'd to comply, yet when it came to the Push, they absolutely refus'd to surrender. The Pope, sorry that he had stirr'd in their Behalf, return'd, and was indifferent whether they were ruin'd or not. Whereupon the Place was more closely besieg'd, and at this Time God Almighty shew'd himself signally propitious to the Count of Sicily; for the Countess Adelaide his Spouse, who had follow'd him in this Expedition, prov'd with Child. She was deliver'd of a Son in Melito, a City of Calabria, in the Month of December in the Year 1097, or as others relate, in February of the following Year: he was baptized by St. Bruno the Founder of the Order of the Carthusians, with whom, because of his great Sanctity, the Count was in strict Friendship; and it was he, who first establish'd that rising Order in Calabria, of which he continu'd always to be the Protector.

THE Child was nam'd Roger, and by his famous Atchievements was the first King of Sicily. Fazellus tells us that this Hero was born in Salerno; and Pirri, by anticipating his Birth two Years, says that he was born in Sicily in the Year 1095. The second Favour which Heaven bestow'd on Roger by the Intercession of St. Bruno, was his being deliver'd from a Conspiracy, which a Greek, nam'd Sergius, had hatch'd against him; for the Count having suppress'd this Conspiracy by the Death of the Conspirators, so terrified the Besieg'd, that the Place was immediately surrender'd, and restor'd to Prince Richard; who, by the Advice of the Count treated them with great Clemency, insomuch that he chose to reside in one of the Towers that was higher than the Citadel, into which he enter'd in Triumph; and being thus re-establish'd in the Principality of Capua, and owing this important Conquest to the two Roger's, in Token of his Gratitude, he did them all Honour, and as their Liege-man paid them Homage.

THESE two Princes having finish'd this Expedition, return'd together to Salerno, where they remain'd for some Time. The Duke of Puglia had a mind to make Choice of Salerno for his Royal Seat, before any other City in his Italian Dominions; as Robert Guiscard, when he conquer'd it, had resolv'd to make it a Metropolis City, in Imitation of Pope John XIII. who had made it such with regard to the Ecclesiastical Polity, therefore he made his longest stay in Salerno, whose Example his Successors afterwards follow'd. Here he entertain'd his Uncle with the Countess and their young Son, who succeeded him in his Dominions.

Urban II. makes Count Roger his Legate, whence the Monarchy of Sicily had its Rise.

URBAN II. came to Salerno to congratulate these Princes on the good Success of the Expedition to Capua; and being willing to shew his Gratitude for the many Services they had perform'd to the Apostolick See, he made Roger his Legate in Sicily. This Year 1098, and at this Congress, that Bull was made, the like of which is not recorded to have been granted to any other Prince of Christendom, by which Sicily boasts of her Monarchy, and pretends, that the Successors of Count Roger the Great, are Sovereigns in their Dominions, as well in Spiritual as Temporal Matters.

THERE was a Custom introduc'd by the Roman Pontiffs of sending their Apostolical Legates into diverse Provinces of the Christian World; and they were of different Sorts. Some of them who were most eminent, and to whom more ample and special Privileges were granted, were call'd Legates a Latere, because they were chosen out of the Consistory and College of Cardinals, who sat at the Pope's Side; and therefore Ivo Carnutensis in a Letter which he wrote to Paschal II., calls them Laterales. Others were Bishops, or Deacons of the Church of Rome, and were sent by the Popes as their Legates to Emperors or Kings, who had no other Charge, but to manage the Affairs of the Apostolick See, and to take care of its Interest at the Courts of those Princes, and these by the Ancients were call'd Apocrisarii, or Responsales. But afterwards there was another Sort of Legates introduc'd, who were call'd Provinciales. These for the most Part were Bishops or Archbishops, to whom as Legates of the Apostolick See, there was great Authority and Jurisdiction given over the Provinces where their Sees were seated, and various Privileges granted which they could make use of with regard to their Provincials; and the Legation was often given to the See, and not to the Person. Thus the Archbishop of Arles was Primate and Legate of the Gallia, by Virtue of a most ancient Privilege granted to that See, and confirm'd afterwards by Hormisdas, and Gregory I. and the other Roman Pontiffs². Thus likewise the Archbishop of Canterbury was Primate and Legate of all England, by a Privilege granted to Theobald Archbishop of that City, and his Successors, by Innocent II.; so that in England they were call'd Legati nati, as Polydore Virgil witnesseth ¹, because such a Privilege was granted to the See, and not to the Person. In like manner the Bishop of Pisa, and his Successors, were declar'd Legates of the Holy See in the Island of Corfica, by Gregory VII.

THESE Legantine Powers were given in some Provinces of Christendom to the Persons, and not to the Sees, by the Pope's appointing certain Persons as Legates in different Places. Thus Leo the Great, appointed Anastasius Bishop of Thessalonica, Vicar of the Apostolick See over the East and in the Regions of Africa. Gelasius I. set Acacius over Egypt. Hormisdas appointed Salustius Bishop of Sevil over Bætica, and Lusitania; and the same Pope constituted Remigius of Reims, his Vicar over the Gallia, without derogating from the Privilege of the Archbishop of Arles: The same Hormisdas chose John a Bishop, his Legate, for all Spain. Vigilius made the Bishop of Locrida for Illyricum, as Gregory I. had also done. Martin I. appointed John Bishop of Philadelphia, his Legate in the East against the Monothelites. And above all the other Countries, France had most of these Legates in the Times of Charles Martel, and Charles the Bald, and more in the Time we are now treating of, under Gregory VII. and Urban II. insomuch that by the Frequency of these Legantine Powers, the Rights and Privileges of Legate and Primate, belonging to the Archbishop of Arles, were in a great measure extinct; and the Popes not only sent thither Legates for taking care of all Gallia, but likewise sent particular Legates to certain Provinces of it, such as Aquitania, of which Alteferra ² gives us a great many.

LONG Experience hath shewn, that these Legates were an insupportable Grievance and Damage to the Provinces to which they were sent ³, for besides that they lessen'd the Authority and Jurisdiction of the Bishops and Metropolitans, by drawing all Causes to themselves, and frequently inquiring into, and taking Cognizance of the Causes of the very Prelates, they by their Avarice and Pride, so oppress'd the Bishops and the whole Ecclesiastical State, that the People, unable to bear them, had recourse to their Kings for Redress. For which Cause the Princes of Europe resolv'd to receive none, but whom they thought fit. There was an Agreement made betwixt Urban II. and William King of England, by which it was stipulated, that no Legate should be receiv'd into that Kingdom, but such as pleas'd the King ⁴. In France, they were so great a Grievance, that at last the Bishops resolv'd to supplicate the Pope, that he would be pleas'd to abolish them altogether for the Good of their Diocesses; and they actually obtain'd, that there should be no more sent, by which the Power of the Metropolitans and Primates of that Kingdom was restor'd, and Tranquillity establish'd. The Emperor Frederick, by an Edict, order'd, that they should not be received into Germany at any rate. In Scotland, there was a Law made in the Year 1188, which was approv'd of by the Popes Clement III. Innocent III. and Honorius III. prohibiting any Person whatever, to exercise the Legantine Power within that Kingdom, except Scotsmen; and we read of the like in Spain.

IN the Island of Sicily, the Popes were likewise wont to appoint these Legates, and we read ⁵, that Pope Gregory I. made Maximinianus Bishop of Syracuse, Legate of Sicily, by granting that Power to his Person, and not to the See ⁶. Neither were these our Provinces exempted, tho' so near to Rome; for we read in the Chronicle of Leo Ostiensis ⁷, that Nicholas II. after having made Desiderius, the famous Abbot of Cassino, a Cardinal, he likewise made him his Legate in all Campania, the Principato, Puglia and Calabria, though his Authority was restricted with regard to all the Monasteries and Monks of these Provinces, as is clear from the Words of the Privilege, recorded by the Abbot of Noce.

BUT Urban II. being desirous at this time to renew the Custom of making a Legate in Sicily, as his Predecessors had formerly done, nam'd the Bishop of Traina.

The Sicilians took this in ill part, and Count Roger was much more offended at it, who having greatly distinguish'd himself by the many signal Services he had done the Holy See, in having expell'd the Infidel Saracens out of that Island, withdrawn all the Churches from the See of Constantinople, and restor'd them to that of Rome, and assisted the Church in her greatest Afflictions, thought he did not deserve such a Return. In a Congress held in Salerno, he complain'd of it to the Pope, and gave him to understand very plainly, how much he was dissatisfied, and that he was resolv'd not to bear it.

URBAN, who was sensible of the great Obligations he lay under to this Prince, from whom he expected greater Advantage to the Apostolick See, looking upon him to be his greatest Support against the Emperor of the West, did not slip so fair an Opportunity of obliging him. He not only gave him all Satisfaction as to this Point, by annulling the Legantine Power, which he had given the Bishop of Traina; but likewise conferr'd on the Great Count himself, all that Authority, which he had given to that Bishop as his Legate, by creating him, and his lawful Heirs and Successors, Legati Nati of the Apostolick See in that Island, promising never to appoint another against his Will, and that whatever he had to do by a Legate, should be perform'd by him, and his Successors, a Thing without any Precedent; and immediately the Privilege was drawn up in Salerno by John, Deacon of the Church of Rome, dated in the Month of July, the Seventh of the Indiction, and Eleventh Year of the Pontificate of Pope Urban II.

MALATERRA, a grave Writer of these Times, relates this Event, and gives us Urban's Bull, and here ends the four Books of his Latin History, of whom *Odericus Vitalis*¹, an antient Writer of Norman Affairs, writes thus; De quorum (id est Ducis Roberti Guiscardi & Comitis Rogerii) probis actibus, & Strenuis eventibus Gotifredus Monachus cognomento Malaterra, hortatu Rogerii Comitis Siciliae elegantem libellum nuper edidit.

THIS so notable a Writ, deserv'd to have been related at full Length; but seeing it regards the Polity of that Kingdom, and not of ours, we have contented ourselves with having given a succinct Account of what it contains, the rather, because there are not wanting Writers², who give it us intire, and it may be seen in the very Annals of Baronius.

THIS is the Foundation of the renown'd Kingdom of Sicily, by which the Successors of Roger, and especially the Kings of Arragon, to whom that Kingdom was subject for many Years, have kept Possession of so noble and eminent a Prerogative, in spite of all the Efforts and Disputes that have happen'd in process of Time concerning that Point. It was not thought an improper or strange Thing, to grant Legantine Powers to Princes, seeing the Popes themselves deem'd their Persons Sacred, because they were anointed with Holy Oyl, and reputed not simple Laicks; but also Sharers in the Priesthood; and if it was not thought incompatible with their Characters, to make them Canons of St. Peter, by admitting them into the Quire with Holy Vestments, and making them Partners in the other sacred Functions and Ceremonies; it ought not to seem strange, that they were vested with Prerogatives relating to Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and not to Orders.

ACCORDING to the Maxims of the Canon Law, and the Practice of the Court of Rome, we find in many Instances, that the Power of Jurisdiction is distinct from that of Orders; that this last is annex'd to the Priestly Office, and cannot be communicated to any who have not that Character. The Power of Ordination cannot be given to a Priest, nor that of Consecration or Absolution to a Deacon, because the Power of Ordination is inseparable from the episcopal Character, and that of Consecration, and Absolution from the Presbyterial; but as for the Power of Jurisdiction, it may be conferr'd on Persons who are not in Orders, and exercis'd over those who are in higher Orders than they to whom such Jurisdiction is granted. The Popes have not scrupled to practise this on many Occasions, by appointing simple Deacons to be their Legates and Judges in Matters of Faith, and Causes of Bishops; and likewise to represent them in Councils, and by giving Power to Abbots and Monks to exercise episcopal Jurisdiction; and, what is more surprising, Abbeſſes send dimissorial Letters, have their Archdeacons, and other Officers, and exercise whatever belongs to episcopal Jurisdiction; and in this our Kingdom we see at this very Time, that the Abbess of the Monastery of Conversano exerciseth Jurisdiction over her Priests, and hath the Privilege of wearing the Mitre and Crozier, as the Bishops do. And Charles II. of Anjou, had his Place in the Quire of the Church of St. Nicholas in Bari, above all the other Canons, and was reckon'd one of their Body, and had Jurisdiction over all the Priests, as we shall relate in its Place.

'T IS not to our Purpose to enter into those Disputes that have arisen since, concerning this Point, nor into what hath been written by the Spaniards, and many other Authors, as Matters foreign to our Design. But I cannot forbear to say, that Cardinal Baronius, with much straining and little Argument, has the Assurance to impugn it in later Times, after that Kingdom had been in Possession of it for so many Ages. In the beginning of the Year 1605, he caus'd to be printed his XIth Tome of the Ecclesiastical Annals, and when he comes to relate this Fact, he inserts in his History, a very long Discourse against the Monarchy of Sicily, wherein with strain'd, and invidious Arguments, he leaves no Stone unturn'd, in order to overthrow it. But he is unpardonable, for having stuff'd his Discourse with so much Obloquy and Bitterness against many Kings of Arragon of glorious Memory, and especially Ferdinand the Catholick, counting them Tyrants, and who, under this Name of Monarchy, had resolv'd to introduce Tyranny into that Kingdom, which Book being brought to Naples and Milan, was suppress'd by the King's Ministers, and forbid to be sold, or kept, out of respect to Philip III. then reigning, whose Progenitors had been so unworthily treated by that Cardinal.

BUT Baronius resented this Prohibition of his Book so much, that being appriz'd of it, when, by the Death of Clement VIII. the See had become vacant, he immediately caus'd the College of Cardinals to be conven'd, and got them to make an Invective against those Ministers, and not content to have thus offended that Prince, would touch him in another no less tender Point, with respect to his Royal Jurisdiction; for in that Invective, those Ministers are plainly found fault with, as if by prohibiting his Book, they had incroach'd upon the Ecclesiastical Authority, as if it had not been lawful to Princes, for the Quiet of their Dominions, to prohibit such Writings. And after Paul V. had been elected Pope, on the 13th of June of the same Year, he caus'd a long Letter to be written to King Philip, full of heavy Complaints, that in Contempt of Ecclesiastical Authority, the King's Ministers in Italy had suppress'd his Book, which was a Privilege that solely belong'd to the Pope. Nevertheless, the Wisdom of that King was such, as to judge it better to answer with Facts, and allow the Prohibition publish'd by his Ministers to be in Force.

BUT the Cardinal could not forbear to insert in his XIIth Tome, which he caus'd to be printed in the Year 1607. a Discourse very little to the Purpose on the same Subject, inveighing with much Bitterness and Malice against Princes that took upon them to prohibit Books, not scrupling to say likewise, that they did it because the Books found fault with their Injustice. The Council of Spain, with their wonted Slowness and Irresolution, proceeded in this Affair leisurely; and were as little mov'd at this third Offence; but suffer'd other Three Years to go on, and in the Year 1610, the King made an Edict, condemning and prohibiting that Book in so severe a Manner, that it struck at Baronius as smartly, as he had struck at the Kings Progenitors. And in order to give it more Force and Credit, the Edict was publish'd in Sicily, with the Decree and Subscription of Cardinal Doria, and dispers'd Abroad in the World in Print. The Edict was sent to Count Lemos, at that Time Vice-Roy of Naples, who, on the 28th of February of the following Year, caus'd the Edict by which the Book was condemn'd, to be publish'd with great Solemnity. The Court of Rome was as much surpriz'd at this Edict, as at the Execution of it by the Cardinal, and the Proclamation with Sound of Trumpet in Naples. Nevertheless, they never minded that in Spain, and the Edict is in Force to this Day.

T HIS Dispute was renewed very lately, in a much more violent Manner; for Pope Clement XI. seeing the Kingdom of Sicily fallen into the Hands of the Duke of Savoy, thought it a fit Opportunity to take Advantage of the Weakness of that Prince; and carried the Matter to such Extremity, that in the Year 1715, he did not stick to publish a Bull, by which he abolish'd the Monarchy, and by another, establish'd a new Ecclesiastical Hierarchy in that Kingdom; but all these Efforts came to nothing, for the Bulls took no Effect, neither was there any Change or Novelty Novelty introduc'd into that Island ; and much less when afterwards that Kingdom return'd to the most August Austrian Family.

ON this new Occasion, the celebrated Divine of Paris, Lewis Ellies Dupin, wrote in Defence of that Monarchy, wherein he not only shews the Inconsistency of what Baronius writes against it, but also that of the Pope's Bull. This Book was publish'd in the Year 1716, wherein he gives an exact Account of the Origine and Progress of this Dispute, and the Issue of this Quarrel, with so much Exactness and Learning, that I must give the Reader an account of what he has wrote on this Subject.

URBAN's Bull was directed to Count Roger, and his Successors, and comprehended only the Dominions which he possess'd at that Time, to wit, Sicily, and some Places he had in Calabria, whence he took the Title of M. Comes Calabriae, & Siciliae.

BUT Duke Roger had done as signal Service to the Apostolick See as the Count, so that it behov'd Urban to bestow his Favours on the Duke, who was present, whence we ought to believe, that at this Time, that Privilege, of which the ancient Canonical Gloss, and many of the most ancient Writers make mention, concerning the Collation of the Benefices of the Kingdom was granted.

THERE were frequent Councils conven'd at this Time, in order to deprive Secular Princes of the Power of Investiture, and at last in the Roman Council, celebrated by Urban in the Year 1099, a little before he died, all Abbots, Prelates and other Ecclesiasticks, were forbidden, under terrible Anathemas, to receive Benefices from Laick Hands. Notwithstanding which, the Princes still pretended, that they ought not to be reckon'd purely Laicks, nor could they be depriv'd of those Privileges, of which they had been for a long Time in Possession. That it was very reasonable, seeing they had founded and endow'd Churches out of their Patrimonies, they should have the Investiture of them ; that as formerly the People had a Share in the Election of the Ministers of the Church, it ought not to seem strange, if Princes, to whom all Power was transferr'd, could do it of themselves. That by so doing, they conferr'd no spiritual Power, their Grant being confin'd to the Temporality, though they follow'd the common Custom of using the Ring and Staff, when they granted Investitures ; which our Dukes of Puglia, with more Reason pretended to, who had erected many Churches in these Provinces from the Foundation, and out of Love for the Christian Worship, had endow'd them with great Riches. And besides, they had vanquish'd the Infidel Saracens, and restor'd all the Churches to the See of Rome, which formerly had been usurp'd by the Patriarch of Constantinople.

THE Popes, to avoid having any Dispute about this Point, with those Princes who were their Friends and Well-wishers, whom they had a mind to gratify, without doing themselves Prejudice, were often wont to grant them, by way of Privilege, what in Justice they claim'd ; and the Princes, minding only the present, and looking no further, accepted it. On the other hand, the Popes minded hereby to establish their Right, and according as Occasion should offer, to dispute or revoke these Privileges. The ancient Kings of Sicily gave Investiture of Ecclesiastical Benefices in all the Churches of the Kingdom of Puglia, as the antient Canonical Gloss¹ clearly witnesseth, which tho' it observes, that the Duke of Puglia gave Investiture of Benefices contrary to the Canon establish'd in many Councils, says, they did it by virtue of the Pope's Privilege, which he could bestow on Laicks ; and all our most antient Writers likewise, such as Marinus Caramanicus, Andrea d' Ifernina, and others², vouch the same. And Frederick II. defended himself by this Privilege, when he was blam'd for giving Investiture of the Churches of these Provinces at his Pleasure³ ; and complain'd that the Popes, notwithstanding this Privilege, attempted to diminish the Right which the Kings of Sicily had of electing Prelates, which could not be lessen'd by what Innocent III. had done, when Constantia govern'd, during his Infancy. But we shall have a more fit Opportunity to speak of this, when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity.

Urban holds a Council in Bari; his Death, and soon after that of Count Roger, and other Princes.

IN the mean time Urban, after a Conference with these Princes in Salerno, went to Bari, where he had summon'd a Council of Greek and Latin Fathers, in order to determine the Point concerning the Proceſſion of the Holy Ghost, from the Father and the Son, in which the Greeks did not agree with the Latin Church¹. There were present in this Council 185 Bishops; and St. Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury being then in Italy about the Affairs of his Church, likewise assisted in it. There were great Debates between the Greek and Latin Fathers about this Point; but St. Anselm convinc'd the Greeks, and it was determin'd according to the Belief of the Latin Church: Notwithstanding which the Schism did not end, but being maintain'd with great Heat by both Parties, the Division continu'd for a long Time between these two Churches, that it was not in the Power of Man to re-unite them.

URBAN having put an End to this Council went to Rome, and a few Months after the Roman Council lately mention'd, died there the same Year 1099. This Pope deserv'd to be reckon'd amongst the greatest that ever the Church of Rome had; he having held this See little less than twelve Years, did many noble Actions, and made himself famous over all the World by the Expedition to the Holy Land, of which he was the first Promoter. He of all the Popes had our Norman Princes in greatest Esteem, neither had he any Cause to complain of them, so that he lov'd them as a Father does his Children, and as much as in him lay stood up for their Interest. By his Death the Abbot Rainerius of Tuscany was elected Pope, who took the Name of Paschal II. and the same Year Jerusalem was taken, and the renown'd Godfrey of Boulogne elected King of it, and after his Death his Brother Baldwin succeeded him; in the mean time Boemondus having taken Antioch, made himself Prince thereof, which he transmitted to his Posterity.

THE Death of Urban was soon follow'd by that of the Great Count Roger, he being much advanc'd in Years, made the City of Melito in Calabria famous by his Death, which fell out in that City in the Month of July, in the Year 1101². He was much lamented by his Subjects, and a Monument was erected to him in the great Church of that City, which he had built, where his Bones are preserv'd to this Day. He liv'd Seventy Years, and reign'd Sixteen after the Death of his Brother Guiscard. He had many Wives, by whom he had had many Children, but only three Sons surviv'd him, which he had by his last Wife Adelasia, who with Robert of Burgundy, her Son-in-law, immediately took upon her the Government of the Dominions after her Husband's Death³. These three Sons were Simon, who dying soon after his Father, had not the good Fortune to succeed him in the County of *Sicily*⁴. Godfrey, surnam'd of Ragusa, of whom History makes no mention: Some⁵ believe him to be the Son of the first Wife Erimberga, and both he and his Brother Giordanus died before their Father. Roger II. was he to whom he left his Dominions in so flourishing and happy a Condition, who shortly after possess'd them with the Title of King, and whom Fortune so much favour'd as to unite the two Crowns of Puglia and Sicily, and put them both on his Head, and who likewise with Royal Title govern'd these our Provinces, as shall shortly be related. Count Roger also left two Daughters, Matilda and Emma; Matilda was married to Raimulphus Count of Avellino. For which Cause, during the Jars which afterwards fell out between Roger, the Emperor Lothaire II. and Pope Innocent II. Raimulphus was made Duke of Puglia, in Opposition to Roger his Brother-in-law by Innocent in the Year 1137. It was this Matilda that persuaded Alexander Abbot of Teles to write the History of her Brother Roger, which he declares in the first Book of it. Emma the other Daughter, was married to Rodolphus Maccabeus, Count of *Montescaglioso*¹; these Princes in those Days did not scruple to marry their Daughters or Sisters to their Barons, who for the most part were of the illustrious Norman or Longobard Blood, and were Masters of large Territories and rich Lordships. Those who make Constantia the Wife of the Emperor Henry to be the Daughter of this Roger, are greatly mistaken; she was Grandchild, and not Daughter of the Great Count Roger, being the Daughter of King Roger his Son, as shall be related.

THE Beginning of this twelfth Century, where we now are, was most lamentable, not only for the Death of the Great Count Roger, but of many other Princes that follow'd. Soon after, in the Month of January in the Year 1106, Richard II. Prince of Capua died, who leaving no Issue, Robert his Brother succeeded him in the Principality, and held it till the Year 1120, in which he died². In the Year 1016, in the Month of August, the Emperor Henry III. likewise died, to whom Henry IV. his Son succeeded, who being as great an Enemy to the Popes as his Father had been, dealt more harshly by Paschal II. and his Successors, than his Father had done by Gregory VII. He having a Mind more vigorously to maintain the Rights of Investiture, threaten'd to march into Italy with a powerful Army against Paschal. This Pope, to prevent so great Danger, came to Capua to solicit Prince Robert and Duke Roger to assist him against Henry; but Henry with a mighty Army being come into Italy, and arriv'd at Rome, whither the Pope was return'd, and with the Clergy and People of Rome had gone to meet him, caus'd the Pope and all his Company to be carried Prisoners to his Quarters, where he extorted the Rights of Investiture by Force, and besides oblig'd him to crown him Emperor with the wonted Rites and Ceremonies³. But as soon as Henry had left Italy, Paschal, in a Council held in the Lateran, annul'd and rescinded all these Acts, and had beforehand solicited the Duke of Calabria, the Prince of Capua, with other Normans, and even Boemondus, to join their Forces to assist the Church of Rome against the Persecution, which, he said, she suffer'd by Henry.

BUT the Death of these two Princes Boemondus and Roger, which happen'd on the Back of one another defeated all his Designs. Boemondus died this Year 1110 in Antioch, and his Body being brought to Italy, was buried in the Church of St. Sabinus in Canosa. He left a Son likewise nam'd Boemondus, who succeeded him in the Principality of Antioch, and his other Dominions. He also left a Daughter, and recommended them both to Tancred his Nephew.

BUT the Death of the renown'd Duke *Roger*⁴ was yet more deplorable to these our Provinces, which fell out in the Month of February of the Year 1111 in Salerno. He was much lamented, and buried with great Pomp in the great Church of Salerno, which his Father Duke Guiscard had built: He left no other Issue-Male but William, by the Dutches Ala his second Wife, who succeeded him in the Dukedom of Puglia, and his other Dominions.

DUKE William continu'd the same Friendship and Correspondence with the Pope, that his Father had done, neither did he fail to assist him in the Quarrels with Henry, which were carried on with greater Heat than ever. These Quarrels were become so imbitter'd, at this Time, that the Emperor Alexius Comnenus thinking to take Advantage of them, wrote to Paschal II. that if he would acknowledge him for Emperor of the West, he would send him powerful Assistance against *Henry*⁵. And in the mean while William having put his Dominions in a better Form, did not fail to require the Confirmation of the Investiture of the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, as his Predecessors had receiv'd it. Neither was Paschal slack in granting it, which he did in the Year 1114, while he was celebrating a Council in Cepperano, whither William went to receive it⁶. But while this Pope was altogether bent on crushing the Power of Henry, being oppress'd with weighty and troublesome Cares, he fell sick, and on the 12th of January this Year 1118 ended his Days⁷.

ALEXIUS Emperor of the East likewise died in the Month of August the same Year, to whom Joannes Porphyrogenitus his Son succeeded in the Empire. We shall be soon freed from the Trouble of taking notice of the Emperors of the East ; for having lost all they possess'd in these our Provinces, with little Hopes of ever recovering it, they had no more occasion to mind or concern themselves in the Affairs of these Countries. They had nothing left but the Shadow of Sovereignty over the small Dukedom of Naples, which also will soon be subject to the renown'd Roger I. King of Sicily and Puglia. This Dukedom was as yet govern'd by its Dukes and Consuls in the Form of a Republick, and at this Time John was Duke, who dying not long after, while Porphyrogenitus reign'd in the East, was succeeded by Sergius the last Duke of Naples. For Naples being afterwards subjected by Roger, tho' he did not alter the Form of its Government, nevertheless he made the Dukes as he thought fit, which Character he bestow'd on Anfusus one of his own Sons, as shall be related in a more proper Place.

Quarrels between the Emperor Henry IV. and Pope Gelasius II. Investitures given by this Pope to our Norman Princes ; and a Schism between Callistus II. and Gregory VIII.

IN the mean time, after the Death of Paschal, the Clergy and People of Rome elected Joannes Gaetanus, a Monk of Cassino, his Successor, who took the Name of Gelasius II. ¹. As soon as the Emperor Henry heard of the Election, he march'd into Italy ; mean while he sent Ambassadors to Gelasius, with a Message, that if he was dispos'd to grant him what Paschal had done before, concerning the Investitures, he was ready to acknowledge him for Pope, otherwise he would chuse another. But Gelasius being obstinate, and seeing that the Emperor was advancing towards Rome with a strong Army, left this City, and accompanied with many Bishops and Cardinals, the Prefect of Rome, and many Roman Nobles, went to Gaeta, the Place of his Birth ; being as yet but Deacon, he was there ordain'd Priest, and by these Bishops and Cardinals that he had with him, and by the Archbishops of Capua, Benevento, Salerno, and Naples, in the Presence of many Princes and Abbots, he was consecrated Pope.

OUR Norman Princes, and especially William Duke of Puglia, Robert Prince of Capua, Richard of Aquila, and many other Barons of these Provinces, went all to Gaeta, and offer'd him their Assistance ². William and the Prince of Capua took the Oath of Fealty as Vassals of the Apostolick See, and got Confirmation of the Investitures in the same Manner their Predecessors had receiv'd them from other Popes. And 'tis to be observ'd, that the Princes of Capua paid Homage to the Pope in these Times, tho' they were Vassals to the Duke of Puglia.

BUT we must likewise observe, that William, not content with having had Investiture from Paschal, would also have it from Gelasius, from whom he could obtain no other but a Confirmation, still restricted to the Dukedoms of Puglia and

Calabria, the Pope carefully avoiding to extend it to the Principalities of Salerno and Amalphi, and all those other Dominions that had been subjected by the Dukes of Puglia. Thus we read it in the Copy of the Investiture, related by the Abbot of *Noce*¹, which Gelasius gave to William: Quemadmodum Gregorius Papa tradidit illam Roberto Guiscardo Avo tuo; Et sicut Urbanus Papa eam Rogerio Patri tuo prius, Et postea tibi tradidit; sic Et ego trado tibi eandem terram cum honore Ducatus per illud idem donum, Et consensum. But the Error that we find in this Copy, and the want of the Name, Paschalis, after the Word postea, deserve to be taken Notice of; for William never receiv'd Investiture from Urban, who died before his Father Roger, and William succeeded his Father in the Pontificate of Paschal, from whom he receiv'd it, and not from Urban, as Petrus Diaconus relates.

IN the mean time the Quarrels between the Pope and the Emperor became more irreconcilable; as soon as Henry understood that Gelasius was gone from Rome, he made Mauritius Archbishop of Prague to be elected Pope, who call'd himself Gregory VIII. On the other hand, Gelasius, as he came to Capua, excommunicated the Emperor, the Antipope, and all their Accomplices; and got Robert Prince of Capua to assemble his Troops in order to oppose Henry, and conduct him back to Rome. Robert having gather'd together a considerable Army, marches towards the Monastery of Cassino, with a Design to go from thence to Rome with the Pope, as he had promis'd him; but hearing that the Emperor with a superior Force was not far off, he would not leave Cassino, where having receiv'd Henry's Ambassadors, who advis'd him to retire, he gave over the Expedition, and return'd to Capua. So that Gelasius, after various Turns of Fortune, being abandon'd by the Normans, and unable to resist such a superior Force, resolv'd, with some Bishops and Cardinals, to go to France; and being arriv'd at the Monastery of Clugny, at last, wearied with so many carking Cares, and the Incommodities he had suffer'd in so troublesome a Journey, fell sick, and died there the 29th of January in the Year 1119, after having held that See, with so many Difficulties and Sufferings, only a Year and five Days.

THE Cardinals being depriv'd of so great a Pope, and not in a Condition to oppose Gregory, if they did not immediately provide a Successor, in that very Monastery elected Guido Cardinal Archbishop of Vienne, of Royal Race, being the Son of the Count of Burgundy, and near of Kin to the Kings of France, who took the Name of Callistus II. and went presently to Rome, where, with great Marks of Esteem, he was receiv'd by the Clergy, the Senate, and People of Rome. The Antipope Gregory and his Adherents left Rome, and fortified themselves in Sutrio, a Castle of great Strength by reason of its Situation.

IN the mean time Callistus, in order to eradicate this Schism, thought he had no other Remedy but to have recourse to the Norman Princes for Assistance, therefore he came to Benevento, where he was visited by Duke William, Robert, and all the Barons of the Neighbourhood, who all offer'd their Troops to lay close Siege to Sutrio. Soon after this Castle was so closely besieg'd, that it was forc'd to surrender: Mauritius thus falling into the Hands of Pope Callistus, he confin'd him close Prisoner in a strong Fort. Thus ended this Schism, and the Church began to enjoy some Peace.

BUT in the Year 1120, the Death of Robert Prince of Capua, from whom Callistus had receiv'd signal Service, put a Damp upon this Peace. This Prince left only one Son nam'd Richard III. who succeeded him in the Principality, and govern'd it a few Days only; for he had scarcely been consecrated according to the Custom of the Norman Princes of Capua, who us'd to be anointed with Holy Oyl by the Hands of the Archbishop, when he ended his Days in Capua, and leaving no Issue, he was succeeded by Giordanus II. his Uncle, Brother of his Father *Robert*².

GIORDANUS govern'd the Principality of Capua seven Years without Disturbance, to the Year 1127 in which he died. His Wife Gaitelgrima was Daughter of Sergius Lord of Sorrento, she had been married to him ever since the Year 1111, and had brought him Nocera, and many Places in the Neighbourhood subject to it, as her Portion. By this Wife he had Robert II. who succeeded him, and was the last Prince of Capua of the Race of Ascettilinus; for being expell'd his Principality by Roger I. King of Sicily, he had the Misfortune to see his Family lose that Grandeur, which his Forefathers with fo much Prudence and Valour had maintain'd in it, as fhall be related when we come to the Reign of Roger.

IN the mean time Pope Calliftus, having in fome meafure quieted the Difcords, apply'd himfelf to put the Affairs of his See into the beft Order he could ; and above all, he endeavour'd to keep up the fame Correspondence and Friendfhip with William Duke of Puglia, that his Predeceffor had done. William fhew'd the fame Inclinations, for he defir'd to have the Investiture of the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria from Calliftus, as his Predeceffors had had it from Gelaftus and Pafchal, by making himfelf a Vaffal of the Apoftolick See, and receiving the Investiture with the Standard ; and Calliftus being come to Troja, he receiv'd him in that City with all Marks of Esteem and Refpect ¹ ; and in the Year 1121, when he came to Salerno, where Roger Count of Sicily likewise was, he was entertain'd by thefe Princes with all the Honour and Refpect imaginable ².

AFTERWARDS, in the Year 1123, he held a Council in the Lateran in order to redrefs many Diforders which had crept into his Church during the Quarrels with Henry, with whom he made Peace ; and after having with much Prudence fettled the Affairs of the Apoftolick See, at laft in the Year following 1124, he ended his Days in Rome ³, where he was much lamented ; and it was foon found what great Lofs the Church of Rome had in him ; for he was no fooner dead, than the Cardinals, divided into Factions, elected two Popes : Some of them chofe Lambertus Bifhop of Oftia, who took the Name of Honorius II. Others, Theobaldus Cardinal of St. Anaftafia, who was call'd Celeftine II. But this Schifm, which was fear'd might for a long Time give Difurbance to the Church, was furprizingly extinguish'd in an instant ; for Celeftine's Party, as the Weakeft, yielding to that of Honorius, join'd with him ; fo that the Diforders being at an End, Honorius was acknowledg'd and ador'd as true Pope.

Lothaire Duke of Saxony, by the Death of Henry, fucceeds in the Empire of the Weft. The Union of all thefe our Provinces in the Perfon of Roger Great Count of Sicily, by the Death of William Duke of Puglia.

THE Quarrels, which in the Year 1125, fell out in Germany on the Death of Henry IV. gave great Difurbance to the State of the Affairs of Italy : This Prince having left no Male-Issue, there arofe great Diffentions amongst the Princes of Germany about chufing a Succelfor ; two efpecially, with great Application aspir'd to the Empire ; Conrade the Nephew of Henry, and Lothaire Duke of Saxony ¹. The Princes of the Empire being conven'd in order to prevent the Confufions that might happen, were resolv'd to compromise this Election by the Arbitrement of the Archbishop of Mentz, declaring, that the Person whom he should judge worthy of the Roman Empire, should certainly be elected. The Archbishop, who bore an implacable Hatred, not only against Henry, but against all his Family, without much deliberating, immediately excluded Courade, and proposing Lothaire as a most consummate Captain, pious and prudent, judg'd him the most worthy and fit that could be rais'd to the Imperial Throne; the Election was approv'd of, and Lothaire was proclaim'd Emperor. Thus by the Means and Cunning of this Prelate, the Empire went from the Germans, who had held it so many Years, to the Saxons, in the Person of Lothaire, whom some call'd III. others, with more Truth, II.

CONRADE, impatient of this Rebuff, and not able to bear that any other but himself had succeeded his Uncle, having drawn many Princes of Germany to his Party, got himself to be crown'd King of Germany. Thus did the Quarrels between these Princes begin, which at the long Run occasion'd many Disorders, and great Confusion in the Empire; but Lothaire, as being elected by the Majority, and, what was most material, consecrated by the Pope, was acknowledg'd for Emperor all over the West.

BUT whilst Honorius govern'd the Apostolical See, and Lothaire the Empire; whilst by the Death of Jordanus, Capua was govern'd by Robert his Son, and whilst Sergius the last Duke govern'd the Dukedom of Naples, the Death of William Duke of Puglia happen'd in Salerno this Year 1127¹; he had govern'd these Provinces, after the Death of his Father, the Space of sixteen Years².

THE Death of this Prince occasion'd at last all these our Provinces to be united into the Form of a Kingdom in one Person, and consequently a new Polity, and a more stable and perfect Form of Government to be introduc'd. For this Prince having left no Children, the Progeny of Robert Guiscard was extinguish'd³. There was none other that could succeed to his Dominions, but Roger Count of Sicily his Uncle, who was the Son and Heir of Roger the Brother of Guiscard. Neither could there be found at this Time, any other Prince so powerful, and so near of Kin, so expert in War, courteous and prudent, as the Great Count of Sicily; and Fortune presenting so considerable an Inheritance, he eagerly embrac'd the Opportunity. That he might not be prevented by others, Roger lost no Time in claiming the Possession of so great an Inheritance. Having immediately embark'd in a Fleet at Messina, he arriv'd unexpectedly at Salerno, where, according to the Custom and wonted Ceremonies, he got himself to be consecrated Prince of *Salerno*⁴, by the Archbishop of Capua. He went immediately to Reggio, where he was proclaim'd Duke of Puglia and Calabria; and made a Progress through these Provinces, and was receiv'd with Acclamations in all the Cities as their Sovereign.

AS soon as Pope Honorius understood that Roger, in so great haste, without his Knowledge, or so much as having sought Investiture from him, had taken Possession not only of Puglia and Calabria, but likewise of the Principality of Salerno, Amalaphis, and all the other Dominions, he was highly offended; and fearing that by so many Dominions being added to that of Sicily, the overgrown Power of Roger might at last come to oppress the Church of Rome, he began to withdraw his Affection from him, and to think of Means by which he might put a Stop to the Career of so great Prosperity. Whence his Successors, as we shall shew anon, finding that Roger had gloriously united the Crowns of Puglia and Sicily in his own Person, which the Dukes of Puglia his Predecessors could not accomplish, were always jealous of his Power, and turn'd over a new Leaf with him, and began to abhor him, and to put a thousand Rubs in his Way, in order to prevent his growing more powerful. But this Prince, by his Valour and Prudence, surmounted all Obstacles, and accomplish'd his Designs prosperously; for tho' the Princes of Capua were Vassals of the Dukes of Puglia, nevertheless that Principality was govern'd by Robert II. with full Liberty and Power. Roger, after having been invested with it by Anacletus, in the Year 1135, expell'd Robert, who was the last Prince, and usurp'd the Property of that great Principality to himself. The Dukedom of Naples, which was the last in being subdu'd, and that for so many Ages had maintain'd its Liberty against the Power of the Longobards and Normans, at last in the Year 1139, was subjected to his Dominion: So that there remain'd nothing in these our Provinces that was not subject to Roger. And in this manner, having united all these Provinces in his own Person, and being arriv'd to such a Pitch of Greatness, he disdain'd the Titles of Count and Duke, and took that of King; and seeing he had appointed Palermo to be the chief City of Sicily, he fix'd his Royal Seat there. And having under his Dominion the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria (those Places also that had been left to Prince Boemondus) the Principalities of Salerno and Capua, the Dukedoms of Amalphis, Naples, and Gaeta, and the Principality of Bari, therefore in his publick Writs he took the following Titles: Rex Siciliae, Ducatus Apuliae, & Principatus Capuae. Which Titles were long made use of by his Successors, comprehending all these our Provinces, under the Title of King of Puglia, or of Italy.

BUT the famous Achievements of Roger I. King of Puglia and Sicily; how by his Prudence and Valour he surmounted the many Obstacles, which the Popes, and the Emperor Lothaire threw in his Way, in order to stop his growing Greatness; how with new Laws and Statutes he establish'd this Realm, and gave it a more perfect Form, shall be treated of at large in the following Book: In the mean time, it will be proper to premise a short Account of the Form and Disposition in which Roger found these our Provinces when he came to inherit them, not only with respect to the Number of their Barons, and the Ecclesiastical Polity; but especially with respect to the Laws and Learning which in this Age flourish'd in them.

C H A P. XI.

*The Longobard and Feudal Laws retain'd by the Normans.
Learning restor'd in their Kingdom by the Monks of Cassino;
and by the Arabs in Salerno:*

THE Normans, altho' by Right of Conquest, after they had subdu'd these our Provinces, they had it in their Power to impose what Laws and Form of Government on the conquer'd People and Places they thought fit; nevertheless allow'd the People to be govern'd by the same Laws and Institutes they formerly had; and even hitherto the Normans had imposed no new Laws upon them, as the Longobards did, but being well satisfied with the Longobard and Roman Laws, they not only allow'd their Subjects to retain their own Laws, but likewise conform'd themselves to them. The first who introduc'd new Laws, was King Roger I. as shall be shewn in the following Book.

THE Feudal Laws, which for the most part had their Rise from those of the Longobards, remain'd likewise intire as they were before, and the Laws of the Emperors which hitherto had been establish'd, were by the Normans no less regarded, and order'd to be observ'd. And the Greeks and Saracens, who knew nothing of Fiefs, having been expell'd Puglia, Calabria, and Sicily, the Normans introduc'd them into these Provinces, and that Island, as they had been in the rest of the Provinces that had continu'd longer under the Dominion of the Longobards. Whence the Number of Barons increas'd, and besides those that were in the Principalities of Benevento, Salerno, and Capua, the Counts of Conversano, Trani, Lecce, *Lecce, Monopoli, Andria*¹, and many others, likewise started up in Puglia, and in Calabria, those of Catauzaro, Sinopoli, Squilace, Cosenza, Tarsia, Bisignano, Girace, Melito, Policastro, and many others.

AND these two Provinces retaken by the Greeks from the Longobards, though for a long Time they had had Experience of the Greek Government; nevertheless when conquer'd by the Normans, had the Longobard Laws immediately introduc'd into them, and all their Cities were govern'd according to their Usages; and even Bari, that was the chief Seat, first of the Deputies, and afterwards of the Catapani, was more observant of the Longobard Laws than all the other Cities, and the Customs of this City, are deriv'd from none other but these Laws; for which Cause Roger I. King of Sicily, after he had taken this City, being about to establish good Laws in it, was requested by the Baresians, to allow them to retain their own Customs, and particular Constitutions, which were taken from the Longobard Laws, their City having been long under the Longobards, such as Ajo, Melus, Meraldizus, Grimoaldus, and other Princes of Longobard Extraction; and Roger having read and commended them, ordain'd them to be observ'd, and even to our Time, they are in Force².

THE Normans, for very near a whole Century, from the Time they conquer'd Puglia to King Roger I. had so great a Regard for the Longobard Laws, and prefer'd them to all others, that they pass'd in these Provinces for the common Laws; and our Professors apply'd themselves to the Study of none other, for they had all Authority and Force in the Tribunals, and by them alone Causes were decided.

THE Roman Laws, as we have often observ'd, were only retain'd by way of Tradition; and they had remain'd amongst the common People (who are always last in laying aside the antient Usages) as old Customs, and not as written Laws. The Roman Jurisprudence, and the Books of Justinian, in which it was contain'd (like all other Learning) had been forgot, and were very little known in these Times, and these Parts; so far were they from being read.

BUT in this Place, we ought not to rob the Monks of Cassino of their deserved Praise, who were the first that endeavour'd to recover all sorts of Learning out of the Darkness wherein it had so long lain. The Care of the famous Abbot Desiderius, who being advanc'd to the Papacy, was nam'd Victor III. pav'd the Way to the Knowledge of some of Justinian's Books, and of others of different Professions. This renown'd Abbot, after having enlarg'd that Monastery with sumptuous Buildings, applied himself to find out many Books, in order to provide it with a well-stock'd Library; and the Art of Printing not being as yet brought into Italy, he with great Care, and much Expence, made a Collection, and caus'd them to be transcrib'd in a handsome Manner. Among other Books, there were Justinian's Institutions, and his *Novellæ*³: For these Books being very rare at this Time, were not in every Body's Hands, as now a Days, but, as Things very precious, were kept in some famous Library. The Church of Rome made most use of them, and also the Emperors of the East, sometimes, in making some of their Constitutions, referr'd to them. Although some Copies of this Emperor's Code, were to be found in France in these Times (which is clear from the Letters of Ivo of Chartres) and likewise in Italy, which is manifest from some Laws of the Emperors of the West, particularly of *Henry II.*⁴, and from the Decretals of some Popes, where some Laws of it are quoted; nevertheless few made use of it; even the very Professors neglected it, because it had not that Force and Authority in the Courts of Judicature, that it afterwards acquir'd.

THE Pandects had not as yet been discover'd in Amalphis, so that our Professors could have no Knowledge of them. Yet there were some Copies of them in France, which is clear from Ivo's Letters, in which some Laws of the Digests are frequently quoted⁵, for by reason of their famous Libraries, the Ignorance of these Books was not so great in France; and many Copies of the Theodosian Code, and its Compend, were likewise to be found there.

WITH us, the Institutions, and Novellæ of Justinian, were to be found only in the Library of Cassino, so that the Use of them in these Times, was not so frequent in the Tribunals of the Cities of these our Provinces, as it is now.

THE Longobard were the only prevailing Laws, and each Tribunal decided its Causes according to them, and Successions, Wills, Contracts, the Punishment of Crimes, Confiscations, and all other Judgments were regulated by them. We have yet remaining amongst our antient Records, some Vestiges, that the Judges in their Sentences, laid great Stress on these Laws; and Leo Ostiensis ¹ relates, that the Process which began in the Year 1017. betwixt the Monastery of M. Cassino, and the Duke of Gaeta, and the Count of Trajetto, was decided both by the Roman and Longobard Laws. Camillus Pellegrinus ² quotes a Writ of Richard II. Prince of Capua, by which a Donation was made to the Church of St. Michael the Archangel in Formis of many Estates, and among others, of some that had fallen to his Grandfather by Confiscation, secundum Longobardorum Legem. And the same Writer ³ cites two Sentences, pronounc'd after these Times, the one in the Year 1149, in the Reign of King Roger, and the other in the Year 1171, in that of King William, which two Causes we see were decided by the Longobard Laws.

THE Judges in these Times, did not use so much Pomp and Ceremony in deciding Causes, as are observ'd now-a-days. Every City had its own Tribunal and Judges; and Processes were decided quickly, without much Noise: When there happen'd any Controversy concerning Marches, they went to the very Spot, and there decided the Cause immediately; the Parties were not allow'd to make Appeals to remote Tribunals, but to have their Controversies determin'd in their own Cities, and by their own Judges.

The first Collections of the Longobard Laws; and their Glossators.

THE Longobard Laws having acquir'd so much Authority in these Times, particularly in these Provinces, all our Professors apply'd themselves to the Study of them; but no Person hitherto having collected into one Volume, both the Laws of the Longobards, and those that had been to this Time publish'd by the Emperors of the West, as Kings of Italy, for the Use of the Courts of Justice, and the greater Ease and Conveniency, both of Advocates and Judges; at last about this Time, all these Laws were collected into one Volume.

THE first Collection that we can find of these Laws, is that which is yet preserv'd in the Archives of the Monastery of the Trinity of the Cave, where in one Parchment Volume written in Longobard Letters, are inserted all the Edicts of the Kings of Italy, beginning from Rotaris, who was the first that gave written Laws to the Longobards. After Rotaris's Edict, that of Grimoaldus follows; the Laws of Luitprandus follow next; then those of Rachis, and lastly those of Astolphus, who was the last Longobard King that made Laws; for, as we have said, Desiderius his Successor, and the last of the Longobard Kings, being engag'd in continual Wars, had not Time to think of Laws. But, notwithstanding that Charles the Great had expell'd Desiderius, and the Kingdom of Italy had been translated from the Longobards to the French, nevertheless, the Dominion of the Longobards continu'd in these our Provinces, in the Princes of Benevento, who, after the Example of the Longobard Kings, establish'd many Laws, which, for a long Time, were observ'd in the Principality of Benevento, which in these Times comprehended almost all the now Kingdom of Naples; therefore the foresaid Compiler, who undertook this Labour for the Benefit of our Countrymen, inserted likewise in this Volume the Capitularia of Arechis, first Prince of Benevento, and those of Adelchis his Successor; and after having inserted some small Pieces of his own, he adds a short Exposition of some of the Laws, for the Use of the Beneventans, but more especially for the Capuans, Capuans, for whom he declares he had undergone that Trouble; so that on that account, and some other Conjectures, *Camillus Pellegrinus*¹ suspects the Author to have been a Capuan. In this Collection he likewise adds some small Law Treatises of his own, under these barbarous Titles. Quantas causas debet esse Judicata sine Sacramentum. Item quantas causas fieri debet per pugna Judicata. Memoratorium pro quibus causis filii ab hereditate Patris exheredati fieri debet. The Capitularia of Charles the Great, Pepin, Lewis, and of the other Emperors, who were Kings of Italy, after the Longobards were expell'd by Charles the Great, conclude the Book.

T H I S is the most ancient Collection of the Longobard Laws that we have; made by a Capuan, whose Name we are ignorant of, which never being printed, is preserv'd in the Archives of the Monastery of the Cave. Pellegrinus supposes it to have been made in the Beginning of this eleventh Century, about the Year 1001, or soon after; for the Author inserts in it a List of the Dukes and Princes of Benevento, and of the Counts of Capua, and brings it down to the said Year, to Adimarus Prince of Capua. Besides he discovers that he knew Pandolphus Capodiferro Prince of Capua, who died in the Year 981. And this is both the first and most ancient Author that we can discover to have written Treatises on the Law adapted to these Times, in which all the Care and Study of our Professors were employ'd about the Longobard Laws.

T H E R E are different Sentiments concerning the Author of that other common Compilation divided into three Books, and distinguish'd into many Titles, which is now inserted in the authentick Volume. The Feudal Books, where many Longobard Laws contain'd in it are quoted, evince that it is ancient². Some³ believe it to have been made in the Time of the Emperor Lothaire III. or II. by Petrus Diaconus a Monk of Cassino, altho' for his own private Study, yet it was by the Persuasion of the same Emperor Lothaire; for 'tis evident, that Petrus Diaconus was his Lieutenant in Italy, and appointed Keeper of his Register, and Almoner of the Empire⁴. They infer it, from not seeing any Constitutions of the succeeding Emperors in this Compilation; for tho' in the last Editions of Lindenbrogius and the Vulgar, we read a Constitution of Charles IV. yet 'tis evident that was added afterwards, because it is not to be found in the Collection of Melchior Goldastus, which is more ancient than the Edition of Lindenbrogius; neither does that Constitution regard Italy in the least. *Struvius*⁵ adds another Conjecture, from seeing that some Copies bear the Name of Petrus Diaconus.

O T H E R S by opposite Arguments make it doubtful who the Author was. They think Petrus Diaconus was not, because in the Chronicle of the Monastery of *Cassino*⁶ he gives a particular Account of all the Works he had compil'd after he became Monk, and makes such an exact Catalogue of them, that he sets down the Proems he had made to some Books that were not of his own composing, and relates two Hymns he had made to St. Justa, and some Sermons, and other small Pieces; but makes no mention of this Compilation; whereas if he had been Author of it, he would not have fail'd to tell it with great Ostentation, seeing, when he had occasion to mention his own Works, tho' of little Moment, he did it with a great deal of Complacency. Add to this, that Carlo di Tocco, our most ancient Civilian, in the Proem he made to the Glosses of these Books, speaking of the Compilers, says, that they were so ancient, that he had not been able to learn their Names; and he flourish'd very near the Time of Lothaire, for he was alive in the Reign of William King of Sicily, and would have known if Petrus Diaconus had been Author of this Compilation.

H O W E V E R that may be, 'tis certain, that this second Collection divided into three Books, tho' poorly done, without Order of Time, and very confusedly, had better Fortune than the first, that was more Methodical, and in which, according to the Order of Time, all the Edicts of the Longobard Kings, and the Capitularia of the Emperors, who were Kings of Italy, were collected. This never having been printed, lies yet, buried in the Archives of the Monastery of the Cave: On the contrary, that of which Petrus Diaconus is said to be the Author, has been often printed, sometimes separately, and sometimes with the Authentick Volume; and Basilus Joannes Eriold caus'd them to be re-printed in Basil in the Year 1557, with the Salick, German, Saxon, and British Laws, and likewise those of other Nations. Melchior Goldastus caus'd another Edition to be printed; and Frederick Lindenbrogius made it to be re-printed anew, and added it to the Code of the ancient Laws.

THE Credit and Authority which our Forefathers gave to these Books, were such, that all Law Suits were decided in the Tribunals according to them; therefore our most ancient Professors employ'd themselves in commenting and making Notes upon them. Carlo di Tocco, was the first, who with very long Glosses illustrated these Books. He was born in the Village of Tocco, near Benevento, from which, according to the Custom of those Times, he took his Surname; and following the Example of his Forefathers, and being the Son, as he says, of a Doctor of Law, when a Youth he went to Bologna to learn the Civil Law; and he had the good Fortune to have *Placentius*¹, *Joannes*², *Otho Papiensis*³, and *Bagarotto*⁴ for Masters, who had been Disciples of the famous Irnerius. Being return'd to the Kingdom, he was made a Judge in *Salerno*⁵; and while he was yet young, in the Year 1162, in the Reign of William I. was made Judge of the High-Court⁶. He was reputed the most famous Lawyer in his Time, and his Memory has been celebrated by his Successors.

THIS Lawyer had the same Reason to illustrate the Longobards Laws, as Hermogenianus and Gregorius had to compile their Codes. These two Lawyers perceiving, that the ancient Jurisprudence of the Heathen Romans was falling into Contempt by the new Laws of Christian Princes, resolv'd by their Codes to prevent this, and at least to preserve the Roman Law in Writings. So in the Reign of William, when the Pandects being already found in Amalphis, were begun to be taught in the Academies of Italy, the Lawyers of these Times, charm'd with the Elegancy of their Style, were induc'd to study them, and by that means they began to look upon the Longobard Laws as barbarous and unpolite, so that the Study of them was neglected. Irnerius, Bulgarus, Martinus, Jacobus, Hugo, Pilcus, Rogerus, and others had commented in their own Times on the whole Body of the Civil Law; and after their Example, all the rest left off the Study of the Longobard Laws. Wherefore Carlo di Tocco, to preserve the Longobard Laws from falling into Contempt, and to encourage the Study of them, after he had made himself Master of the Pandects, he made it his Business to explain and confirm the Longobard by the Roman Laws in his Glosses, which for the most part contain nothing but Quotations from the Roman Laws, in order to encourage the Professors to study them, and plead them with greater Advantage in the Courts of Justice, where the Pandects in his Time were of no Authority, as we shall shew in a more fit Place. This his Labour was so useful, and so much commended by Posterity, that it acquir'd Force and Authority little inferior to the Laws themselves; and Andrea d' Isernia, speaking of Tocco's Glosses on the Longobard Laws, says, *Plurimum in Regno approbatur*⁷. Luca di Penna, Matteo d' Afflitto, and others give them the same Commendation.

FOR the same Reason, in the Time of the Emperor Frederick II. when the Roman Law was in such Request as to engage all Professors to study it, who to their own Detriment, had forgot the Longobard Laws, by which alone they could carry a Point in the Courts of Justice: Andrea Bonello da Barletta wrote his Commentaries upon the Longobard Laws; where he takes Notice of all the Differences betwixt the two Laws, that for the future the Advocates might have no occasion to mistake, by minding only the Roman, and neglecting the Longobard Laws; for in pleading the Roman only, they had been often oblig'd to submit, and quit the Field to Professors of inferior Degree and Learning. Thus he says it happen'd once to a great Advocate, who with a great many Flourishes in defending a Cause, had cited many Roman Laws for his Client; and after he had harangu'd himself out of Breath, there started up a Pettifogger on the other Side, with the Longobard Laws under his Gown, which he produc'd in Court; and reading those that made for his Purpose, obtain'd a Decree, to the great Shame of his Antagonist, who sneak'd off in Confusion.

ANDREA was Attorney-General under the Emperor Frederick II. and in great Esteem with this Prince, who by his Advice instituted the Court of Capua. He was a Lawyer of great Fame in his Time, and had in great Reputation by his Successors. *Andrea de Ifernia*¹ calls him an able Doctor; *Matteo d' Afflitto*², a *great Professor of the Law*³; and others mention him with great Encomiums. Besides this most useful and necessary Work, for the Knowledge of the Difference betwixt the two Laws, he compos'd other Commentaries upon the Roman Laws, often quoted by Napodanus and Afflitto; for, excepting these Authors, we do not find them quoted by any other, which makes us believe they have been mix'd with the Works of others, as his Comments on our Constitutions, by the Carelessness of the Transcribers were confounded with those of Marino di Caramanico, so as they can be but ill distinguish'd at this Time.

BIASE DA MARCONE, who liv'd in the Time of King Robert, and was his Counsellor and Favourite, likewise wrote Commentaries on the Longobard Laws⁴. He compos'd a large Volume, and Marino Freccia, as he says in his Book of Sub-Fiefs, had the Manuscript. *Francesco Vivio*⁵ calls him a Man of great Authority in the Kingdom, and especially for his Treatise of the Difference between the Roman and Longobard Laws; he was Contemporary with, and a Friend of Luca di Penna, and a Disciple of Benevenuto di Milo Bishop of Caserta, to whom he ow'd great Obligations for bringing him from Nothing to the Condition he was in. Niccolo Boerio likewise employ'd his Labour on these Laws. And in later Times, under the Emperor Charles V. Giambattista Nenna di Bari, a famous Lawyer of his Age, compos'd a Book upon these Laws, with an Alphabetical Explication of the abstruse Longobard Words, which he caus'd to be printed in Venice in the Year 1537. But in process of Time, the Force and Authority of these Laws declining, at last they came to be disus'd, so that our Professors minded them no more, and now they are quite laid aside.

Learning reviv'd amongst us by the Means of the Monks of Cassinò.

IN the Beginning of this Century Mens Spirits being rouz'd from the Lethargy in which they had been in the preceding; apply'd themselves to Learning; and the Differences between the Emperors of the West and the Popes, and between the Greeks and the Latins, incited Men to apply their Minds to study, and gave occasion to those who were attach'd to one of the Parties, and who had any Capacity, to employ their Pens, and to shew their Parts. The Schism, which at this Time divided the Greek and Latin Churches, and particularly the Dispute about the Opinion concerning the Procession of the Holy Ghost, likewise excited Men of Learning to a more than ordinary Study, both of the Scriptures and Theological Writings. Some imitated the Ancients very near both in Style and Manner of Writing; but for the most part being ignorant of Languages and History, they favour'd of the Barbarism and Harshness of the preceding Century; and some fell into the dry and barren Dialectick Way. The Study of Divinity and other Sciences, which had been neglected in the foregoing Century, was reviv'd among us by the Monks, but especially by those of Monte Cassino. At the first every one was satisfied to follow the ancient Method, and to quote the Explication of the Fathers upon the Holy Scriptures; and did not treat of Points of Doctrine but slightly and casually. But towards the latter End of this Century, Lectures of Divinity on Points of Religion came in use; and sundry mysterious Questions were propos'd, and solv'd by way of Reasoning, in a Logical manner. The Books of Aristotle began to be known among the Arabs, who brought them to us; and our Divines thought they would be useful in in the Disputes against the Jews, and the Arabs themselves, therefore they adapted them to our Religion, the Doctrine and Morals of which they explain'd according to the Principles of this Philosopher, and treated of the Doctrine of the Scriptures and Fathers after the Order and Rules of Logick and Metaphysics taken from his Writings. This was the Rise of Scholastic Divinity, which soon after became the Principal, and almost the only Study of our Monks and Schools.

THE Monks of Cassino distinguish'd themselves in this Age among us above all others; they applied themselves to these Studies, and with great Care kept up the Scholæ Sacræ amongst us, wherein the Catechism was carefully explain'd by able Divines, of which in these Times there was a great Number. Besides the famous Abbot Desiderius so remarkable in History, there was Alfano, who from Monk of Cassino, was afterwards made Bishop of Salerno, and compos'd many Works, of which Petrus Diaconus, and Giovanna Baptista Maro give us the Catalogue¹. There was Alberico di Settefrati, a Village situated in the Dukedom of Alvito, a Monk of Cassino, who likewise signaliz'd himself both by his Piety, and many Works which he wrote². Orderisio descended of the Counts of Marfi, whose Works Petrus Diaconus and Maro relate. Pandulfo Capuano, who flourish'd in Cassino under the Abbot Desiderius in the Year 1060, and who distinguish'd himself above the rest both in Sacred and Prophane Learning, as may be seen by the Catalogue of his Works, which Petrus Diaconus has left us³. The Monk Amato, Giovanni Abbot of Capua, of whom Diaconus and Maro discourse at large. Petrus Diaconus himself, and many others, who by their Works have left shining Monuments of their Worth.

THE Monks of Cassino not only signaliz'd themselves in these Studies, which in a manner was peculiar to them, but likewise distinguish'd themselves by good Literature; for the little Share of it that was amongst us in these Times, was confin'd to them, and whatever Knowledge there was of it in our Provinces was owing to them. For we observe in the Chronicle⁴ of that Monastery, that Alberico compos'd a Book of Musick, and another of Logic. Pandulfo Capuano wrote de Calculatione, & de Luna; and others upon the like Subjects, as may be seen in *Petrus Diaconus*⁵, and by the Catalogues of their Works which he compos'd; and others employ'd their Labour in seeking after Books of various Erudition and Sciences, and in transcribing them, as Desiderius did, who besides the Books belonging to Sacred and Ecclesiastical Affairs, caus'd to be transcrib'd, the History of the Romans and the Goths, written by Jornandes; the History of the Longobards, Goths and Vandals; the History of Gregory of Tours; that of Josephus the Jew de Bello Judaico; that of Cornelius Tacitus, and Homer. The History of Erchempertus Cresconius de Bellis Lybicis, Cicero de Natura Deorum, Terence and Horace. Ovid's Fasti, Seneca, Virgil, with the Eclogues of Theocritus, Donatus, and other Authors. Neither was the Care and Diligence of P. Diaconus less afterwards, who, besides his own Works, collected the Astronomy of the most ancient Books. He gave us a Compend of Vitruvius de Architectura; a Book de generibus Lapidum præciosorum, and many others, of which he made a long Catalogue.

Of the Schola Salerni, famous in these Times for the Study of Philosophy and Physic brought hither by the Arabs.

WE are not to think that the Arabs have always profess'd Ignorance, as is commonly believ'd, because they were Mahometans; there were amongst them Men of notable Knowledge, whose Writings would fill the greatest Libraries. More than Three hundred Years before this eleventh Century, they studied with great Application; and their Application was never greater than in these Times, when Learning was at the lowest Ebb with us, to wit, in the ninth and tenth Centuries.

Centuries. In whatever Country, by their so many Conquests they establish'd themselves, they cultivated the Study of two Things ; the one peculiar to them, regarded their Religion, or the Alcoran, and the Traditions which they ascribe to Mahomet, and to his first Disciples and Interpreters, from whom sprung the four Sects mention'd in the sixth Book of this History ; the other regarded that Learning which they had taken from the Greeks, which was but new, with respect to that of the Mussulmans, which was as old as their Religion.

THIS People, as we have related elsewhere, having subdu'd many Countries of the Roman Empire, and ravag'd many Provinces of Asia, amongst the Spoils and Booty they had made in Greece, by chance found some Books, and apply'd themselves with extraordinary Eagerness to the Study of Learning ; and they were so keen, that about the Year 820, they made the Calif Almanon demand of the Emperor of Constantinople, the best Greek Books, which when they had got, they caus'd them all to be translated into Arabick. But they made no use of the Poetical Works that were amongst those Books, because besides that they were written in a foreign Language, and of a quite different Taste from theirs, they had such Regard for their own Religion, as made them abhor Idolatry, and reckon it unlawful to read them, and defile themselves with so many Names of false Gods, and so many Fables, with which they were stuff'd. The same Superstition made them detest the Books of History, because they despis'd what was more antient than their Prophet Mahomet. As for Political Books, they certainly could have no use for them, because the Form of their Government was quite different from that of more free Nations : They liv'd under an Empire altogether Despotick, where they had no occasion to open their Mouths, but in order to flatter their Prince ; and could pretend to nothing, but to obey their Sovereign.

THEREFORE they found no other Books fit for their Use, but those that treated of Mathematicks, Physick, and Philosophy. But as they were neither seeking Politicks nor Eloquence ; so Plato's Lessons were of no Use to them ; because in order to understand him well, the Knowledge of the Poets, who treat of the Religion and History of the Greeks was necessary. Therefore having found the Works of Aristotle, Hippocrates and Galen, they studied them with great Application. Aristotle's Logicks and Metaphysicks pleas'd them wonderfully, which they studied with great Ardour and incredible Assiduity. They likewise apply'd themselves to his Natural Philosophy, particularly the Eight Books, which contain it only in general, whereas the special Physicks, which requir'd Experience and Observations, they did not reckon so necessary.

THEY had a particular Regard for Physick, and studied the Books of Hippocrates and Galen ; but they founded it chiefly on general Discourses on the four Qualities of the Temperature of the four Humours, and on traditional Remedies, without examining nicely into them, but mixing them with an infinite Number of Superstitions ; and no ways improv'd the Anatomy, imperfect as it was, which they had receiv'd from the Greeks. But as for Chymistry, if they were not the Inventors, at least they were the Improvers of it ; but they blended it with so many Extravagancies, that to this Day it has been no easy Matter to purge it ; they stuff'd it with so many vain Pretensions, idle Discourses, and superstitious Operations, as afterwards produc'd Quacks and Mountebanks. From the Study of Chymistry, they were easily led to that of Magick, and all Sorts of Divination, to which Men are naturally addicted, when they are ignorant of Natural Philosophy, History and true Religion. What much promoted these Delusions, was Astrology, which was their chief Aim in studying Mathematicks. In a Word, they cultivated this pretended Science under the Empire of the Mussulmans, with so much Eagerness, that it has always been the Delight of their Princes, who build their greatest Enterprizes on this weak Foundation. The same Calif Almanon, took in hand to calculate the famous Astronomical Tables, and it must be confess'd, that by his Observations, and the other useful Parts of Mathematicks, such as Geometry and Arithmetick, they are become very serviceable. Algebra, and the numerical Figures, are owing to them ; whereby Arithmetick is since become so easy. As for Astronomy, they had the same Encouragement, that induc'd the antient Egyptians and Chaldeans to apply themselves to it, because they inhabited the same Countries, and besides, had all the Observations of the Antients, together with those of the Greeks.

These People, making Incurfions into the Provinces of Europe, in the most barbarous and unciviliz'd Times, when Ignorance and Stupidity were at their Height; either by the Names of the famous Masters, under whom they had studied, or on account of the long Voyages they had made, or for the Singularity of their Opinions, gain'd great Credit and Respect in the Countries they came to; they made it their Business to distinguish themselves by some new Logical or Metaphysical Subtleties, and dwelt only on what was marvellous, rare and difficult, and neglected what was pleasant, convenient and useful. Therefore they were admir'd in Europe, and their learn'd Men had in great Esteem. The Books of Mesues, Avicenna and Averroes, the great Commentator Rafis, and many others, were in great Esteem and Reputation among us. And Charles the Great caus'd their Arabick Books to be translated into Latin, as also some Greek Authors, that had been translated by them into Arabick, in order to diffuse their Learning through all the Provinces of his Empire. Whence the French and other Latin Christians, learn'd from the Arabs, what the Arabs themselves had learn'd from the Greeks, to wit, Aristotle's Philosophy, Physick and the Mathematicks, but slighted their Language, History and Poetry, as the Arabs had slighted those of the Greeks. And we receiv'd this kind of Learning, thus corrupted by the Arabs: Their Philosophy was empty and useless, because widely different from true Natural Philosophy, which requir'd Experience and Observations: Their Astrology full of Delusion, and foolish Divinations; but above all, their Physick was stuff'd with Impertinence and Superstition.

THE first Books then on these Subjects, that were read and studied, were those of the Arabs, and on Physick, among others, those of Mesues and Avicenna; and the first that studied them, were the Clergy and Monks, for Learning was confin'd to them; and in these Times, they were the only Philosophers and Physicians. Whence we read, that in France, Fulbert, Bishop of Chartres, and the Magister Sententiarum, were Physicians: Obizus, a Religious of St. Victor, was Physician to Lewis the Great; Richard, a Monk of St. Denis, who wrote the Life of Philip Augustus, was likewise one. And in these our Provinces, the greatest Prelates, and the most famous Monks of Cassino, were the best Physicians, as we shall see; and this Profession was so ingross'd by the Ecclesiastical Order, that a Council held in the Lateran in the Year 1139, under Innocent II. look'd upon it as an inveterate Grievance, that the Monks and regular Canons, in order to enrich themselves, were profess'd Advocates and Physicians; and because the Council took only Notice of those religious Orders, Physick continu'd to be practis'd by the Clergy, for the Space of Three-hundred Years more.

IN the preceding Books of this History, we have shewn how many Occasions the Inhabitants of our Provinces had of corresponding with these Arabs, whereby they had Opportunities of learning these Sciences, especially when the Saracens were settled in Garigliano, Puglia, Monte Gargano, Bari, Salerno, Pozzuolo, and many other Places; so that in our common Language, there are many of their Words which continue to this Day, as was observ'd elsewhere; and there are yet preserv'd in Pozzuolo, four Marbles with Inscriptions in Relievo, of Oriental Saracenic Letters. Besides in these Times, there was great Communication with the Arabs, who were in Possession of more than the Half of Spain; and we had continual Intercourse with them by our frequent Voyages in these Times to the East, on account of the Crusades.

BUT as their Learning, and especially their Physick, took so deep Root in the City of Salerno, that this City above all others of our Provinces, was renown'd for the famous School founded there, yet, for any thing I know, none of our Writers has hitherto clear'd that Part of our History. Those, who believe the Schola Salerni to have been instituted, together with that of Paris and Bologna, by Charles the Great, are widely mistaken; for it has been demonstrated in this History, that Charles could not found an Academy in this City, because it was never subject to him: And when the Schools of Paris and Bologna are said to have been founded by Charles the Great, there were such obstinate Wars between him and Prince Arechis, that it was not possible to put an End to them, and Arechis had so well fortified Salerno, that it was look'd upon as the most secure Retreat of the Longobard Princes against the Power of Charles and his Sons.

THEREFORE this School must be of a later Date, nor was it at first authorized by the Laws of any Prince, nor had it the Name of an Academy, College or University, but that of a simple School. It began to be establish'd in Salerno, because the Oriental and African People had frequent Occasions of landing in this Maritime City. The Saracens visited it often in the Time of the last Longobard Princes, so that the Arabs had occasion to make long and frequent Stays in it. We have shewn in the preceding Book, that sometimes from Africa, and often from the neighbouring Sicily, they came on the Coast, and terrified the Salernitans, who, to prevent the Ruin of their City, their Fields and neighbouring Castles, not having Force of their own sufficient to repel them, often purchased their Peace with Sums of Money. And while the Officers appointed by the Prince collected the Contributions among his Vassals, the Saracens landed and convers'd familiarly with the Salernitans. Hence the Salernitans had an Opportunity to learn their Philosophy, but they apply'd themselves mostly to the Study of Physick, in which they became eminent; and it was not till the Time of Guaimarus the Elder, that the Salernitans were, by the gallant Normans, freed from being thus plagu'd by the Saracens.

BUT among others that made the Schola Salerni famous, Constantinus Africanus was one. He was born in Carthage, and by his Travels in many Parts of Asia and Africa, had learn'd amongst these Nations various Sciences; but above all, had applied himself to Physick and Philosophy. He had travel'd to Babylon, where he learn'd Grammar, Logick, Geometry, Arithmetick, Mathematicks, Astronomy, and the Physick of the Chaldeans, Arabs, Persians, Saracens, Egyptians and Indians; and after 39 Years Study in those Parts, he return'd to Africa. But the Africans, who could not bear to be eclips'd by his great Learning, resolv'd to murder him; of which Constantine being appriz'd, he embark'd in the Night-time, and arriv'd in Salerno, where he remain'd privately in the Disguise of a Beggar¹.

THE City of Salerno, as we have said elsewhere, being frequented by People of all these Nations, the King of Babylon's Brother, much about this Time, arriv'd in it; perhaps led by Curiosity to see this City, which Robert Guiscard had made a Metropolis, and the Seat of his Residence, and now, by the continual Traffick and Resort of all Nations to its Ports, it had become the Mart of the West. Constantine was discover'd by this Prince, who so extoll'd his excellent Endowments, that Duke Robert receiv'd him with all Respect imaginable, and did him all the Honour which was due to his Merit. Therefore he staid long in Salerno, where he had Leisure to promote the Study of Philosophy, and especially that of Physick, which was more cultivated there than any other Science: After having remain'd many Years in Salerno, he retir'd to M. Cassino, where he became Monk; and spent all the Time he was in that Monastery, in translating Books from different Languages, and composing many Treatises of Physick, of which *Petrus Diaconus*² gives us a Catalogue.

THUS the Reputation of the Schola Salerni increas'd, which in a great measure was owing to the Monks of Cassino, who much improv'd the Study of Physick. These Monks had apply'd themselves to this Study, from the Time of Pope John VIII. and Bassacio their Abbot, a most knowing Physician, compos'd some Books³, wherein he treats of the Qualities and Use of many Medicines, for it was not look'd upon in these Times, as unbecoming the Clergy and Monks to profess Physick: And in the City of Salerno, and elsewhere, the most remarkable and noble Personages were not asham'd to profess it. *Leo Ostiensis*⁴ relates, that Alfano Archbishop of Salerno was most expert in Physick, and that he made it his chief Business to cure the Sick. Romualdus Guarva, likewise Archbishop of that City, did not think it below him to profess it, as all the Noble Salernitans reckon'd it their greatest Honour to be learn'd in it, and to practise it, and this Custom continu'd in Salerno for many Years after; but some of a modern Taste, and unacquainted with the Customs of elder Times, think that the noble Salernitan Giovanni di Procida, the famous Promoter of the Sicilian Vespers, was not Giovanni the celebrated Physician, because forsooth, in their Opinion, it derogates from Nobility to profess Physick.

THUS

THUS the Schola Salerni was of greater Reputation than any School in Europe; recourse was had to the Physicians thereof, and Persons of greatest Distinction when taken ill, were carried thither to be cur'd; as was the celebrated Abbot Desiderius, as Leo Ostiensis relates, to be cur'd of an Infirmary occasion'd by much Watching and Abstinence. And 'tis likewise said, that some time after, William the Wicked, having fallen sick in Palermo, and the Disease still increasing, sent for Romualdus Guérva, Archbishop of Salerno, very knowing in Physick, to cure him; and tho' he order'd him very good Remedies proper for the Disease, yet he made use of none of them, but what he thought fit; for which cause his Death soon follow'd. We likewise read that the best Drugs were prepar'd in Salerno; and 'tis said, that Sigelgaita sent to Salerno for the Poison to poison her Son-in-Law, and Robert her Husband.

BUT what crown'd the Reputation of this School, was a Performance of Giovanni di Milano, a famous Salernitan Physician, which was approv'd of by the whole Salernitan School, and in their Name dedicated to the King of England, about the Time we are now treating of. Some perhaps may wonder why the Salernitan Physicians should be at the Pains to collect the Rules of Health in Leonine Verse, and dedicate the Work to a King at so great a Distance, and with whom they had no Communication.

BUT they will cease wondering when they recollect what has been related in the preceding Book of this History, concerning the Coming of the Normans, and the Sons of Tancred into these our Provinces, who were all descended of Robert Duke of Normandy; and consider, that when our Normans conquer'd Puglia and Calabria, and afterwards the Principality of Salerno, the other Normans, who had remain'd in Neustria, invaded England under William Duke of Normandy, and after a great many Victories about the Year 1070 subjected that Kingdom to the said William, who was therefore surnam'd the Conqueror. Thus Princes of the same Blood, and all of them descended of Rollo first Duke of Neustria, reigning in Salerno and England, it was very natural that there should be a Friendship and good Correspondence, both betwixt them and their Subjects.

HERE it will be proper to shew, to what King of England, and on what Occasion, the Physicians of Salerno in these Times, dedicated that Book. William Duke of Normandy, after having conquer'd the Kingdom of England, left three Sons, William Rufus, Robert and Henry. To William the Eldest*, he left the Kingdom of England; but he died without Children, when Godfrey of Boulogne and Robert were in the Holy Land. Robert whom the Father had appointed Duke of Normandy, after having given the Kingdom of England to William Rufus, resolving to accompany Godfrey in this Expedition, on his way to Palestine, came into Puglia in the boisterous Winter Season, and pass'd all that Winter of the Year 1096, with the Norman Princes of Puglia and Calabria, his Kinsmen, by whom he was entertain'd and caress'd with all Marks of Affection. The Spring coming on, he embark'd with the famous Godfrey for the Holy Land. Jerusalem was at last taken, but the Joy of this Victory was much abated by the sad News Robert had of the Death of his Brother William, without Children, to whom he ought to succeed. The Kingdom of Jerusalem was offer'd to him, but he refus'd it, resolving to return to England, to take Possession of that Kingdom, of which he was nearest Heir. In his Return he took these Provinces in his Way, and was receiv'd in Salerno by the Prince his Kinsman, with great Honour and Respect. And seeing he had receiv'd a Wound in his Right Arm at the Siege of Jerusalem, which by being ill cured, had turn'd to a Fistula, he consulted the Physicians of Salerno about the Cure of it. The Physicians observing that the Wound had been made by a poison'd Arrow, told him, that there was no other way to cure it, but by having the Poison suck'd out of it†. The pious Prince would not consent to that for fear of endangering the Person that should suck it; but the Princess his Wife, by a rare Instance of Love, did not scruple to expose herself to that Danger, and while Robert was asleep, suck'd out the Poison, and cur'd him. Robert afterwards would have these Physicians to prescribe him a Rule and a Diet for preserving the Health they had restor'd him; and for this End the Book was compos'd, which, tho' one of the Physicians was the sole Author, bears the Name of the whole School in the Title Page, as the Philosophical Works of the Schola Conimbricensis are attributed to that School. It was dedicated to Robert, whom they call King of England; not that this Prince was ever King of that Kingdom, but that in his Return from Palestine, in order to take Possession of it, as his Right, they made no Difficulty to call him King thereof. But his Brother Henry being in England when William Rufus died, took Advantage of Robert's Absence, invaded the Kingdom, and took Possession of it; and tho' Robert went thither with a great Army in order to recover it, yet he was defeated by Henry, and lost the Kingdom. In order to make this Book the more agreeable to that Prince, and that he might the more easily commit the Precepts of it to his Memory, it was compos'd in Leontine Verse, which was the best sort of Poetry of that Age; and besides, the Norman Princes took so much Delight in the Clink of such Verse, that all their memorable Actions were celebrated in that Rhime. All the Encomiums, Marbles, and Epitaphs that were made on these Princes were in this kind of Rhime; the Epitaph of their first Duke Rollo was such; as also all the others made on our Norman Princes. This famous Work was publish'd in the Year 1100, which being spread over all Europe, gain'd incredible Glory and Reputation to the Physicians of Salerno. It had many Commentators, and the most ancient was Arnaldo di Villanova, the famous Physician of Charles II. of Anjou. The two James's Curius and Crellius bestow'd likewise their Labours on it; and last of all Renatus Moreau, and Zacharias Silvius, explain'd it with their Notes. So that for many Ages, the Schola Salerni above all others was the most famous in the West.

† Here again the Author is mistaken as to the Person, Time, and the Place. V. the Eng. Hist.

THUS the first School, that after the Decay of the Roman Empire, and the Declension of the Academy of Rome, was instituted in these our Provinces, was that of Salerno; but with this Difference, that as in the Academy of Rome Physick was not much regarded, so in the Schola Salerni, by the Ignorance of the Age, all other Professions being neglected, Physick, which cannot be separated from Philosophy, was the principal Study; for those who first introduc'd it here, had no Taste for other Sciences, so that Physick and Philosophy were their chief Study. And because they learn'd it from the Arabs, who had the Books of Hippocrates, Aristotle, and Galen, in high Esteem; Galen for Physick was preferr'd to all others; and Aristotle for Philosophy, who with us for many Ages was reputed the Prince of Philosophers.

BUT in these Times this was only a plain School, because it was not founded by any Prince, neither for a long Time did the Princes make any Laws, that could intitle it to be an Academy, College, or University. The first that gave it Laws, was Roger I. King of Sicily, who among others made one *, by which he forbid any Person to practise Physick, until first examined and approved of by the Magistrates and Judges. But this School was more favour'd by Frederick II. who ordain'd, that none should presume to take the Title of Physician, or dare to profess Physick, before he was approved of by the Physicians of Salerno or Naples, and had obtain'd their Licence. And in later Times, the other Kings Successors of Frederick, and particularly King Robert, Queen Joan I. King Ladislaus, Joan II. and King Ferdinand I. conferr'd other Honours and Privileges on this School, and at last it was rais'd to be an Academy, and had the Privilege of conferring the Degree of Doctor, particularly that of Physick, in which it was most eminent, tho' afterwards other Sciences were taught there.

C H A P. XII.

Of the Ecclesiastical Polity of these our Provinces during the whole eleventh Century, to the Reign of Roger I. King of Sicily.

THE Popes in this Century made a greater Figure than ever, and their Power, both in Temporal and Spiritual Things was come to a prodigious Height; they were no less dreaded by the People, than suspected by the Princes. The Deposition of the Emperor Henry, the Excommunications of Crown'd Heads, the Expeditions to the Holy Land, the Crusades, and the Disputes with Secular Princes about Investitures, made them more rich and powerful than the greatest Kings of the Earth; for by extending their Spiritual Authority over all the Churches of the West, their Power was almost become absolute in these Times, particularly during the Pontificate of Gregory VII. They sent Legates a Latere into all the Provinces of Europe, they sent Vicars from Rome, and call'd Bishops to Rome in order to give account of their Conduct; they confirm'd or disapprov'd their Elections; receiv'd Appeals from their Sentences, and Complaints from their Diocesans; and either decided them in Rome, or appointed Judges on the Spot. In short, they enter'd into the Detail of whatever pass'd in their Diocesses. They either drew all Causes to Rome, or appointed Delegates in the Places, who acted by their Authority.

THEY found means to introduce new Maxims and Notions of the Papacy, and to establish it as an Article of Faith, that the Pope had it in his Power to depose Kings and Princes from their Kingdoms and Dominions, and to absolve their Vassals from their Allegiance, if they (the Princes) did not obey their Commands; that the Pope was no less Prince and Monarch in Temporals than in Spirituals; and that all the Ecclesiastical State was intirely exempted from all Power and Jurisdiction of Secular Princes, as well in Temporal as Spiritual Things, and that not by Human, but Divine Right. And seeing in these Times, the Ecclesiasticks and Monks alone, and especially those of the Order of St. Benedict, ingross'd all the Learning to themselves, and the People were in profound Ignorance, therefore whatever the Monks and Priests put into their Heads, was receiv'd as an Oracle; so that, as John Gerson relates, the Pope was reputed a God, who had all Power in Heaven and Earth.

THE Greek Church, which did not agree in this with the Latin, and look'd upon the Pope, not as a Bishop, but an Emperor, proceeded to a more open Rupture, by separating herself altogether from the Latin; but because all our Churches, that had formerly been subject to the See of Constantinople, were by the Normans restor'd to that of Rome, that Church had no more Concern in our Affairs. Therefore henceforth we shall have no more occasion to mention the Patriarch of Constantinople, whose Authority, as well as the Greek Empire, was daily dwindling away. Our gallant Normans having expell'd the Greeks altogether out of Sicily, and these our Provinces, restor'd all the Churches to the Pope; and to make it evident what our Princes had done for the Church of Rome, Nilus Doxopatrius, who was then Archimandrite in Sicily, wrote a Treatise of the five Patriarchal Sees, and dedicated it to Roger I. King of Sicily, wherein, as we have related in the sixth Book of this this History, he reckons up the Churches, that had been taken from the See of Constantinople, and restor'd to that of Rome by the Normans.

FOR these Reasons, and other signal Services done by the Normans to the Church of Rome, besides the Monarchy of Sicily, the Rights of Investiture were preserv'd intire in the Kingdom of Puglia to our Princes; and no Prelate, tho' elected by the Clergy and People, could be ordain'd without their Assent. Whence the Canonical Gloss says ¹, that this was practis'd in the Kingdom of Puglia, by a Power, which the Kings had from the Apostolick See. Whether it was for this Reason, or for many others related by us elsewhere on other Occasions, 'tis clear, that during the Reign of the Normans, in the Ordination of all Bishops and Prelates of these our Provinces, the Consent of the King was look'd upon as necessary, and without which all Elections were void. So we have seen, that Duke Roger, when he took the Church of Rossano from the See of Constantinople, and restor'd it to that of Rome, nam'd the Bishop that was to succeed to the Deceas'd; but because this Bishop was of the Latin Church, the People of Rossano, who were of the Greek, refus'd to submit to the Duke, if he did not give them a Bishop of their own Church, which he agreed to. And in the Election of Elias Archbishop of Bari, which was in the Year 1089, this same Prince gave his Consent, after which he was consecrated in Bari by Pope Urban II. ², which was likewise practis'd in the Election of the Bishop of Avellino in the Time of King Roger, when Robert, Great Chancellor of Sicily, consented to it in the Name of the King ³. And there are some ⁴ who have written, that among other Reasons which King Roger had to be disgusted at Pope Innocent II. and adhere to Anaclet, one was, that Innocent had been offended with him, because he made an ill use of that Share which he had in the Elections of Bishops and Abbots, by incroaching upon the Freedom of them; and Cardinal Baronius ⁵ likewise gives an account of the bad Use that Roger made of this Power; and that at one and the same Time he had given the Church of Avellino for Money, to three different Persons, according as they offer'd for it, and afterwards gave it to a fourth, who did not pretend to it; but Baronius was not well inform'd of this Fact, because it was not the King, but Robert his Great Chancellor, that excluded the three as guilty of Simony; for resolving to expose their Villainy, he made an Agreement with all the Three separately, and after he had receiv'd the Money, fairly bit them, and caus'd a poor Monk, of a good and holy Life, and who was not in the least seeking after it, to be chosen Bishop, as John of Salisbury Bishop of Chartres ⁶ relates. Not only our Norman Kings, but likewise the Suevi kept up this Privilege; whence, while Frederick II. was under the Guardianship of Innocent III. this Pope gave his Consent in all Elections, but it was Vice Regia, and as Guardian of the young Prince; as we shall shew in the following Books.

OUR Norman Princes likewise kept Possession of the Regalia in our Churches, in the same manner as they did in France; for after the Death of a Bishop, until a Successor was elected, all the Churches of the Kingdom, and particularly those that wanted Pastors, being in the King's Power, he dispos'd of their Revenues; and therefore it became a Custom, that as soon as the Bishop died, the King's Bailiffs took the Charge and Management of the Rents till the Church was provided, as the same King Roger I. declares in one of his Constitutions ⁷.

Monks and Temporalities.

OUR Norman Princes extended their Authority and Protection, not only to the Churches, but likewise to the Monasteries, which were daily erected under new Rules and Reforms. For seeing the Monastick Order had been greatly increas'd and enrich'd by the Piety of these Princes, it was reasonable that they should continue under their Care and Protection. The vast Riches and Privileges of the Order of St. Benedict, occasion'd a great Looseness of Manners among the Monks; the Reputation of their Sanctity was sunk, their Discipline intirely lost, and their Rules utterly neglected; for they intermeddled in the Affairs of State and War, frequented Courts, and concern'd themselves very much in all the Enterprizes of the Popes against Princes. Such Remissness stirr'd up many to imbrace a more austere Life, whence sprung the Establishment of new Orders, all which made Profession of following the Rule of St. Benedict, tho' they had some particular Customs and Usages.

IN the beginning of this Century, in Italy, Romualdo being resolv'd to lead a solitary Life, retir'd to the Solitudes of Arezzo, where he liv'd in the House of a certain Man, nam'd Maldo, and instituted a Congregation of Monks, who, from the first Place they liv'd in, were call'd *Camaldolese*¹. The Monasteries of this Order increas'd to a great Number all over Italy, and likewise got footing in these our Provinces. Peter Damian likewise instituted a Congregation of the like Kind; and Giovan Gualberto of Florence, having left his Monastery, in order to lead a more austere and regular Life, retir'd to Vallombrosa, and there laid the Foundation of a new Society.

BUT the Carthusians, instituted by St. Bruno in the Year 1086, made the greatest Progress among us. Bruno was a Native of Cologne, who while a Canon of Rheims, retir'd with Six of his Companions to the Solitude of Chartouse, which Hugo Bishop of Grenoble assign'd them. In the Year 1090, Urban II. invited him to come into Italy, where he retir'd to a Solitude in Calabria, call'd la Torre. The great Fame of his Sanctity, mov'd Roger great Count of Sicily, to contract a strict Friendship with him; and the Countess Adelaide his Wife, being deliver'd of a Son in Melito, he caus'd Bruno to baptize him: By his Intercession, Roger receiv'd signal Favours from Heaven, especially Deliverance from a Conspiracy, which Sergius the Greek had contriv'd; whereupon this Order was first establish'd among us in Calabria, and the Norman Princes bestow'd great Privileges and Riches upon them. The Kings of the House of Anjou, afterwards enrich'd a Monastery of theirs, founded on the Mount of St. Anselm in Naples, under the Name of St. Martin, from a little Church, which stood formerly there, dedicated to this Saint; and in process of Time, they arriv'd at the Height we now see them.

IN these Times, there were other Reforms under different Rules made in France, whence they afterwards reach'd us. Two Gentlemen of Vienne, Gaston and Gironde, who had dedicated their Persons and Estates for the Relief of those that were troubled with St. Anthony's Fire, and resorted thither to implore the Intercession of St. Anthony, gave Rise to the Order of St. Anthony, at first compos'd of some Laicks, and afterwards of Religious, who profess'd the Rule of St. Augustin. In the Year 1098, Robert Abbot of Molesme, retir'd to Cistelle in the Diocess of Chalon on the Saone, with some Religious, to the Number of Twenty-one; and founded a Monastery there, and left some Religious in it, when he return'd to Molesme. This Reform was approv'd of by the Pope in the Year 1100; and Stephen Harding, in the same Year 1100, was the first that brought this Order to perfection, and it became most flourishing.

BUT with us in the beginning of the following Century, about the Year 1134, under Roger I. King of Sicily, a new and a more remarkable Reform of the Benedictins began, the Author of which was Gulielmo de Vercelli, who was likewise the Founder of the Order of the Friars of Monte Virgine, and for the Fame of his holy Life, was much belov'd by King Roger, and George of Antioch his High Admiral, and was esteem'd a Saint by many at Court, whither he frequently resorted about the Affairs of his Monks. Roger much favour'd his Order, and greatly enrich'd the Monastery newly founded by him in Monte Virgine, not far from Naples. Giovanni di Nusco, a Monk of his Order, who liv'd in his Time, and wrote this Saint's Life, which, as *Francisco Capecelatro*¹ testifies, is written on Parchment, and preserv'd in the Archives of the Monastery of Monte Virgine, got a special Grant from King Roger, engross'd in Palermo the 8th of December, in the Year 1140, in which the King, for the Welfare of the Souls of Count Roger his Father, of Queen Adelaida his Mother, and Albiria his Wife, gives to the Monks of Monte Virgine, the Church St. Maria di Buffiana, and likewise confirms by the same Writ, all the Possessions and Revenues which they possess'd at that Time, and all those, that for the Time to come should be granted them; which Grant is subscrib'd by Prince William, in the Name of his Father. In process of Time, the Order increas'd, and in the City of Naples, in the Street of the Seggio di Nilo, there was a new Monastery and a Church erected, which was afterwards enlarg'd by the famous Lawyer Bartolomeo di Capua, and where the Bones of Matteo degli Afflicti, another of our renown'd Lawyers, lie.

BUT 'tis worthy of Observation, that these Reforms of the Order of St. Benedict, sprung from the Looseness of Discipline and Manners, occasion'd by so great Riches, which corrupted all good Customs. But who would have believ'd that these very Reforms, chiefly founded on the Contempt of worldly Riches, would have been the Occasion of acquiring greater temporal Possessions to the Monastick State? Their credulous Votaries, edified by the austere Lives of the first Founders, and taken with their Sanctity, and the miraculous Stories they told them, did not fail very quickly, to heap Riches upon them, by making large Donations to the Churches, and new Monasteries that were daily erected; insomuch that in process of Time, they became as rich as those before the Reform; so that the Reforms wanted to be reform'd; for besides their old, they were still making new Acquisitions. And in the following Ages, it was astonishing to see new Orders start up, founded so much on the Contempt of worldly Riches, that on this very Account, they took the Name of Mendicants, and to the three Vows, added a Fourth, of living by Begging and Alms; but they no sooner found that the People, mov'd by the Austerity of their Lives, were inclin'd to enrich them, than Ways and Means were found to reconcile the Inclinations of the People with their Vows; so that in process of Time, the Mendicant Orders grew so Rich, as occasion'd Remissness, and new Reforms were thought on. But to what Purpose? The reform'd Dominicans kept to it for some Time; but afterwards they return'd to their former Ways. Among the Carmelites in the later Centuries, there was a more austere Reform made of Bare-footed Carmelites, who, at their first Institution, professed nothing but Poverty, and a total Abhorrence of worldly Riches; but afterwards, Means were contriv'd to make them capable of Succession, Inheritances, and all manner of Purchase, insomuch that among us, their Riches have amounted to what we now see. But what passes all Belief is, that in the Time of Pope Paul IV. there started up a new Order of regular Clergy, now call'd Theatins, who, by their Institution, were bound, not only to live a poor and mendicant Life, but to exceed all the other Mendicants in Austerity, by being forbidden, even to go about to ask Alms: And as the Lillies of the Field, and the Birds of the Air are cloath'd and fed, without Spinning, or any kind of Labour, so were they to rely on divine Providence; yet all that has avail'd nothing; because some have been so taken with them, as, in spite of their Teeth, to heap Riches upon them by large Donations and Inheritances; but they bore those Outrages patiently, and refus'd nothing; and there have likewise been Ways fallen upon, to make them capable of Legacies and Successions, and their Riches are increas'd to such a Pitch, that among us, they have rear'd up so magnificent and surprizing Edifices, as look more like Palaces than Monasteries, and surpass the stateliest Buildings of the most famous Cities in the World.

THESE were in this and the following Century, many other Opportunities, whereby the Ecclesiastical State made great Acquisitions. The chief was the Holy War; it was a surprizing thing to see, how passionately the Minds, not only of Princes, but of the common People, were bent on these Expeditions: The Devotion they had for those holy Places, but especially for Jerusalem, was so great, that, overlooking all Hardships, they expos'd themselves to the Dangers of very long Voyages, to Ambuscades and Robbers; the Inclemency and Rigour of the Seasons, Hunger and Thirst, and the want of all the Necessaries of Life, with Pleasure and Satisfaction; we are told¹, that Fulk Count of Anjou, went to Jerusalem, to be there lash'd by two of his Servants, with a Rope about his Neck, before the Sepulchre of our Saviour. From this we may easily imagine, how intent they were on going thither, and contributing to rescue those holy Places, out of the Hands of the Infidels. They did not value their Estates, Wives or Children; but Husbands and Fathers forsook every thing, sold what they had, enlisted themselves in this War, and cross'd the Seas; among us those of Puglia and Calabria distinguish'd themselves above all others, and who quitting their Houses, follow'd Boemondus and Tancred; even the very Women, without regard to their Children, sold what Goods were left them, for carrying on this War. The Popes and Bishops, by their Briefs, took under their Protection the Houses and Affairs of those, who, as Soldiers of Christ, had mark'd themselves with the Cross, and this brought that Increase of Riches to their Churches, which commonly attends Tutors and Guardians of Widows, Orphans and Minors; the secular Magistrates durst not pretend to protect any of them, for fear of Excommunications, which in these Days were fulminated unmercifully. Add to this, that Eugenius III. ordain'd, that any Person for this holy Expedition, had also Power to alienate Fiefs; and if the Lord of the Manor would not consent, the Churches, even in spite of him, could accept of them, which open'd a Door to vast Acquisitions.

THE Popes likewise made use of the Forces rais'd for the Holy Land, to whatever Purpose they pleas'd, whereby they much increas'd the temporal Power of the Church of Rome; and even the Pope's Legates, and the Bishops of the Places where such Armies rendezvous'd, employ'd them for augmenting the Temporalities of their Churches. But what enrich'd them most, was a Custom then introduc'd, that whoever could not go in Person to the Holy War, pay'd the Expences of the Voyage, for which he was not only absolv'd from the Vow, but likewise obtain'd Indulgences, and other Privileges, and this was look'd upon to be as good as if he had gone in Person. The Offerings and Contributions which were made by the Faithful, and especially Ladies, and others, that were unfit to serve in Person, came to a vast Sum. All this Money was not expended on the War; without doubt each Chieftain had his Share, and a considerable Part of it stuck to the Fingers of the Prelates, which much increas'd the Ecclesiastical Riches.

HENCE started up a new Sort of regular Orders, call'd Military Orders; these, though instituted for the Effusion of Blood, were so mightily encourag'd, that their Numbers, as well as their Wealth, became very great in a short Time. The first was that of St. John of Jerusalem, or Hospitalers, appointed for the Entertainment of Pilgrims, that travell'd to that City. The second was that of the Templars, instituted in the Year 1118; their Business was to provide for the Security of Pilgrims, and to fight those that offer'd to molest them. The last was the Teutonic Order, who profess'd to perform both these Offices: What immense Riches these Orders amass'd, especially the Hospitalers and the Teutonicks, is notorious to every Body.

IN imitation of these, those of St. James, and of Calatrava started up, which were instituted in Spain for the Benefit of those who went in Pilgrimage to St. James in Galicia; and for the like Reasons, other Orders were instituted in other Countries. This so fervent Zeal for these upstart Holy Places, very much cool'd the Devotion, which formerly was so very great, for those of Monte Cassino, and Monte Gargano; but inflam'd that for St. Nicholas of Bari, which was more frequented than any other, because of its Novelty.

IN these Times there were likewise other Means fallen upon, that very much contributed to the Increase of the Ecclesiastical Riches. The looking narrowly into the Matter of Tythes; the establishing the First-fruits, and the Privilege of Sepulture; and accepting every thing from every Body. The Tythes from voluntary, became now obligatory, and if they were not pay'd, they were exacted with great Severity, by the means of Censures; and it was establish'd, that not only the Predial should be pay'd out of the Fruits of the Earth, but likewise the Mixt of the Fruits of living Creatures; and also Personal of Man's Industry and Labour. And in process of Time, Pope Alexander III. about the Year 1170, determin'd, that Excommunication should be made use of for getting compleat Payment of the Tythes of Mills, Fishings, Hay, Wool and Bees; and that the Tythes should be paid before the Charges of gathering in the Fruits were deducted; and Pope Celestine III. in the Year 1195, appointed, that the Tythes not only of Wine, Grain, the Fruits of Trees, Sheep, Gardens and Merchandize; but likewise those of Soldiers Pay, Game and Wind-Mills, should be paid under Pain of Excommunication; for this, see the Decretals of the Popes. But all this did not serve the Canonists, they carried the Matter further, and taught, that the Poor were oblig'd to pay the Tythes of what they got by Begging; that Whores were bound to pay the Tythe of what they earn'd by Whoring, and other such Things that were impossible to be put in Practice.

TO the Tythes, were added the First-fruits, which were first instituted by Alexander II. in imitation of the Mosaical Law, by which they were impos'd on the Israelites: Moses did not appoint the Quantity, but left it to the Discretion of the Offerer. The Rabbins afterwards, as St. Hierom testifies, determin'd that it should not be less than the Sixtieth Part, nor more than the Fortieth; which has been well imitated by our Clergy in the most advantageous Manner, who having appointed the Fortieth Part, call'd it afterwards the Fourth Part.

The Emoluments accruing from burying the Dead, and other holy Offices, were very great: Formerly Tythes were settled on the Curates for administering the Sacraments, burying the Dead, and other Functions, and nothing else was paid for these Offices; but when afterwards some pious, rich Persons, thought fit to give something for burying their Friends, at last the Courtesy was turn'd into a Custom, and the Quantum was settled. Afterwards, when this came to be disputed, and the Laicks refus'd to pay any thing, because the Tythes were pay'd on that Account, the Clergy deny'd to perform the Functions, if they got not what was used to be paid. Innocent III. afterwards in the Year 1200, appointed that the Ecclesiasticks should perform the Functions, but the Laicks should be forc'd by Censures, to observe the laudable Custom of paying what was wont to be paid.

T H E R E was also another Novelty brought in, contrary to the antient Canons, which was of great Service in acquiring more Riches: It was forbid by the Canons, to receive any thing by way of Donation, or Testament from publick Sinners, sacrilegious Persons, those who were at Variance with their Brethren, Whores, and other such Persons; all these Impediments were remov'd, and every thing was accepted of from every Person, and even the greatest and most frequent Legacies and Donations, were left to the Churches by Whores, and Persons that bore their Relations a Grudge. In such manner did the Popes fall upon all Means to augment and preserve their Acquisitions; and the Clergy, for their own Interest, not only consented to this, but promoted it both by their Pens and Preachings.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XI.

ROGER, whom we shall shortly call I. King of Sicily and Puglia, having with so much speed, and without requiring Investiture from the Pope, taken Possession of these our Provinces, to which, by the Death of William without Children, he had succeeded, exasperated Pope Honorius in such a Manner, that it was not possible to pacify him, either by Embassies, or the Offer he made him of the City of Troja ; neither in fine, was the Fear of losing Benevento, able to move him. He excommunicated Roger Thrice¹ ; but finding these Thunder-bolts were thrown in vain, he had recourse to temporal Arms ; and in order to hasten the Expedition which he intended against this Prince, immediately went to Benevento, where he encourag'd many to take Arms and revenge the Affront, which he reckon'd he had receiv'd ; and when he got some Forces together, he march'd with all possible haste towards Puglia, where Roger with his Army was incamp'd. But this cunning Prince considering, that the Pope's Army compos'd of Troops, which some rebellious Barons had furnish'd him, could not continue long together, thought fit to forbear Hostilities, and let the Summer pass without coming to an Engagement. On the Approach of Winter, the Army dispers'd, and the

Pope was left without Troops; so that giving over the Enterprize, he return'd to Benevento. Roger unwilling to keep up the Quarrel, apply'd anew to him for Peace, and both meeting upon a Bridge made on purpose over the River Calor, in the Year 1128¹; they agreed on these Conditions, that Roger, as his Predecessors had done, should swear Fealty to the Pope, and promise to pay the usual Quit-Rent; and on the other hand, that Honorius should give the Investiture of the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, in the same manner as formerly; all which were perform'd². This Peace was of such Advantage to the Church of Rome, that soon after the Beneventans rebelling, Roger, who was then in Puglia with a good Army, march'd thither immediately, and reduc'd that City to the Obedience of the Church.

THIS Prince having settled the Affairs of these Provinces so much to his own Glory, and gain'd Pope Honorius's Friendship, retir'd to Palermo; and by his great Prosperity seeing himself Master of so many Provinces, he look'd upon the Titles of Great Count of Sicily and Duke of Puglia, as too low, and that he ought to assume that of a King, to which his Mother Adelaida push'd him most, who having been Wife of Baldwin King of Jerusalem, tho' afterwards repudiated, retain'd the Royal Title, and instigated her Son Roger to undertake the Conquest of that Kingdom; add to this likewise, his considering that those who anciently had govern'd Sicily, had the Title of Kings³, therefore he resolv'd to take this Title; and having made Palermo the Metropolis of the Kingdom, he would be call'd King of Sicily, of the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, and the Principality of Capua; and in this manner he was proclaim'd King by his Subjects: In his Charters and publick Writs, these were the Titles he took, Rex Siciliae, Ducatus apuliae, Principatus Capuae. And seeing it was the Custom at this Time, for Kings to be crown'd and anointed by their Archbishops, he made himself to be crown'd King of Sicily and of Puglia by four Archbishops, to wit, those of Palermo, Benevento, Capua, and Salerno, in presence of the Chief Barons, many Bishops and Abbots, and all the Nobility and People; which Ceremony could not be perform'd more lawfully, prudently, and with greater Pomp; for Roger was become so great a Prince, that he could lawfully take the Title of King. Besides he had the good Will and Inclination of the People, which before the Custom of Kings being anointed by Bishops was brought in, was thought sufficient. And we have elsewhere observ'd, that Theodorick the Ostrogoth was thus proclaim'd King of Italy, and the Longobard Kings in the same manner. The Rites and Ceremonies were always different, as were the Nations, some us'd to raise the Elected upon a Shield, others made use of a Spear, and others had different manners of performing it⁴.

BUT it being the Custom at this Time, that this Solemnity was to be perform'd by Bishops, who put the Crown on the Head of the Elected, and anointed him with sacred Oyl, Roger did not fail to have it thus done; for having been proclaim'd King, not only of Sicily, but also of the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, and of the Principalities of Capua and Salerno, which comprehended these our Provinces, he would have the four Archbishops, to whom by ancient Custom, it belong'd to anoint and crown their Princes, to perform the Ceremony; they by the Provinces, of which they were Metropolitans, representing Sicily, and all Italy on this Side of the Tyber, crown'd him in a manner with four Crowns at the same Time, to wit, the Archbishop of Palermo for Sicily, and our three Archbishops for all these Provinces, which anciently were comprehended in the Principalities of Benevento, Capua, and Salerno; which was not without a Precedent, for they could observe, that other Kings were wont to be crown'd with as many Crowns as they had Kingdoms; therefore they were not crown'd by one single Bishop, but by more, as Hincmare Bishop of Rheims writes of the Coronation of Charles the Bald, which was perform'd in Metz in the Year 869.

THEREFOR E the Coronation of Roger could not be more legally perform'd, neither had any Person cause to complain, that he thought this enough. But the Popes, as we have observ'd elsewhere, among their other bold Attempts, by which they sought to enlarge their Authority, had begun to pretend, that no

Christian Prince could take upon him the Title of King without their Grant and Permission. And they were so much the more obstinate in this Claim, as they arrogated to themselves the very same Authority in the Election of the Emperors of the West, pretending, that without their Consent none could be rais'd to that Dignity; and they did not blush to say that the Empire, as well as all other Kingdoms, depended upon them, as Clement V. and Adrian believ'd. Yea, one of them writing to the Emperor Frederick himself, did not stick to say, that the Empire was a Gift (Beneficium) of the Popes, which Frederick resented in the manner that every Body knows, by obliging that Pope, in order to make him recant his Insolence, like a Pedant to explain the Word Beneficium, and in what Sense he had taken it. The Popes claim'd this Power as Vicars of Him per quem Reges regnant; and Princes even believ'd it, and persuaded themselves, that as the Kings of Israel were with great Solemnity anointed by the Prophets, so they ought to be anointed and crown'd by the Popes. Whence many Princes of Christendom did not scruple to pay Tribute, and become Feudatories to the Church of Rome. Thus Ethelwulf King of England, in the Year 846 went to Rome, and got his Title of King confirm'd by Pope Leo IV. and made his Kingdom Tributary to the Apostolick See, by paying a Penny Sterling yearly for each Family; and this Tribute, which was call'd St. Peter's Pence, continu'd to be paid until the Time of Henry VIII. And in succeeding Times, when Ignorance and Stupidity were at a greater height, other Princes follow'd this Example, and paid Tribute. In the Year 1178, Alphonfus Duke of Portugal, having got the Title of King from Alexander III. for his gallant Atchievements against the Moors of Spain, promis'd to pay Tribute. Stephen Duke of Hungary, the Dukes of Poland, Aragon, and other Princes did the same; infomuch that Bodinus himself¹ did not scruple to say, that the Kings of Jerusalem, England, Ireland, Naples, Sicily, Aragon, Sardinia, Corfica, Granada, Hungary, and the Canary Islands, were all Feudatories of the Church of Rome. And the cunning Popes, to preserve this Sovereignty over these Princes, tho' they were real Kings, and own'd as such by the People, and recogniz'd by the other Princes of Europe, when they found that they were indifferent whether they gave them these Titles or not, very easily bestow'd them, and they as easily accepted of them, without diving into the Secret that was hid under this Generosity; thus in later Times our Neapolitan Pope Paul IV. took it in his Head to erect Ireland into a Kingdom, and tho' Henry VIII. had made it one before, and the Title had been continu'd in Edward, Mary and her Husband, nevertheless the Pope, dissembling his Knowledge of what Henry had done, would have it to be thought that he had erected that Island into a Kingdom, that so the World might believe, that the Popes alone had Power to make and unmake Kingdoms; and that the Queen's Title was purely owing to the Pope, and not deriv'd from her Father. Our Forefathers saw the same practis'd with respect to the Duke of Tuscany, who got the Title of Great Duke from the Pope. And were this Power claim'd by the Popes only, perhaps it might be born with, but even the Archbishops of Milan assum'd the Authority of making the Kings of Italy, as we have shewn in the preceding Books of this History.

BUT on the other hand, it was no less strange to see the Emperors of the West set up their Claim, that they only had Power to make Kings, and erect States into Kingdoms; their Claim was founded on the Empire of the West's being restor'd in the Person of Charles the Great, and that they as Successors of this renown'd Emperor, had a Right to all the West; for if the Roman Senate took upon them in the popular State to make Kings, they thought they could much more do so. Above all others the Emperor Frederick I. had this Notion; he sent the Sword and the Royal Crown to Peter King of Denmark, giving him the Name of King as a Title of Honour only, reserving expressly (as *Trithemius*² relates it) the Sovereignty of his Country to the Empire, which was detrimental to the Empire itself; for on that account the Kings of Denmark took occasion by Degrees to withdraw themselves from their Obedience to the Empire, and in consequence of the Title of Kings, have made themselves absolute Sovereigns. The same Emperor gave the Title of King to the Duke of Austria; but his Fate was quite the Reverse of that of the King of Denmark, for he no sooner got this Title, with the same Reservation of Sovereignty, than he set up for himself, refus'd all Obedience to his Sovereign, and twelve Years after was depriv'd of the Title of King, and forc'd to call himself only Archduke. This same Emperor likewise gave the Title of King to the Duke of Bohemia, with the like Reserve of Sovereignty ; in which there has been no Alteration since, as well by reason of the Smallness of the Kingdom in the Neighbourhood of the Imperial Seat, as because this King is an Elector.

WE have elsewhere observ'd, that Cujacius ¹ and some others believ'd, that England once acknowledg'd itself Feudatory to the Emperor, but that France never did. But the English give him the Lye ; and Arthur Duck ² says, that Cujacius wrote this without any Ground, for in the same Century that France shook off the Yoke of the Empire, England did the same, and the Britons are as independant of the Empire as the French.

THUS both the Pope and the Emperor claiming a Power to make Kings, and pretending that all Dominion depended on them, there arose an obstinate Dispute amongst our Doctors, according to their different Factions, some maintain'd the Opinions of Clement and Adrian, that the Empire, and all Kingdoms depended on the Pope ; others sided with the Emperor ; and Bartolus ³ a Stickler for the Rights of the Empire, was so stiff in his Opinion, and run into such Excess, that he did not scruple to pronounce him to be a Heretick, that would not own the Emperor for Lord of all the World ; for which he was check'd by Covarruvias ⁴, and other Writers, who look'd upon such a Proposition with Scorn.

BUT amidst this Variety of Opinions, while some maintain'd the one, and some the other Side of the Question ; they all agreed that the Sovereignty of the Christian World, depended either on the Pope or the Emperor. A Proposition as false, as repugnant to good Sense, and to what we observe in other Kingdoms and Monarchies ; for Sovereignty proceeds from nothing else, but either from Conquest, or the Submission of the People ; neither has the Pope, as may be observ'd in many Places of this History, as Successor to St. Peter, or as Vicar of Christ, any Right to pretend to it ; for the Power given to St. Peter, by him who declar'd that his Kingdom was not of this World, had no relation to an Earthly and Temporal, but to a Spiritual and Eternal Kingdom in Heaven, as we have fully demonstrated in the first Book, when we had occasion to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity. And tho' now a-Days we see him Lord of so many States, and in Possession of many notable Prerogatives in the Dominions of other Princes, yet all is owing either to the Concession and Toleration of Princes, or to Custom, which by length of Time, and their exquisite Management and Cunning, has taken such deep Root, that in many Countries 'tis not possible to eradicate it, whereof our Kingdom is a very flagrant Instance, which became a Fief of the Church, by the voluntary Concession and Connivance of its Princes, who permitted the Popes to make many Incroachments, as we shall see in the Course of this History.

MUCH less can the Emperors of Germany pretend to this Power ; for the Kingdoms not conquer'd by Charles the Great, such as Spain, and many others, certainly continu'd real Monarchies, and independent of the Empire. Neither can the Empire of the West's being restor'd in the Person of this Prince, import any thing else, but that partly by Succession, and partly by Conquest, he made himself Master of so many Kingdoms and Provinces, that he could justly take the Title of Emperor ; and afterwards the many Kingdoms and Provinces, such as France, &c. which were lost by his Successors, return'd to the State they had been in before Charles the Great assum'd that Title ; and either by Conquest, or the Submission of the People, came under the Dominion of other Princes, and these, as real Monarchs and Kings, possess'd them independently ; but the French pretend, that France was so far from being a part of the Empire, that the Empire was rather a part of the French Monarchy.

THUS Roger, with respect to Sicily, which had never been conquer'd by Charles the Great, nor ever subjected to the Empire of the West, but rather to that of the East, had no occasion to have recourse to the Empire of the West, when he resolv'd to erect it into a Kingdom, as it anciently had been. And tho' the Emperors of the West were Sovereigns of the Provinces comprehended in the Dukedom of Benevento, when it was at its greatest Height, and were acknowledg'd as such by the Longobard Princes; yet the Normans afterwards lop'd off that Dukedom from the Empire of the West, as they did Puglia and Calabria, from that of the East, and govern'd them as independent of both these Empires. And tho' at first they had receiv'd the Investiture of Puglia from the Emperors of the East, yet, as we have seen, that was not regarded, because the Normans afterwards chose rather to be Feudatories of the Apostolick See, than of the Empire: Neither did the Emperors of the East mind it much. However, 'tis true, that both Lothaire and his Successors, when Occasions offer'd, did not fail to keep up their Pretensions to Sovereignty: Thus Lothaire, when Rainulphus wanted to be invested with the Dukedom of Puglia and Calabria, in Opposition to our Roger, pretended to invest him; and on the other hand, Pope Innocent II. pretended it belong'd to him to give the Investiture: In order to prevent Quarrels betwixt them, of which Roger the common Enemy would have taken Advantage; it was agreed that both should give Investiture, which they both perform'd with the Standard. And there was a Dispute betwixt Innocent II. and the same Lothaire, about the Principalities of Salerno and Amalphis, of which the Popes had not as yet given any Investiture; Lothaire pretended to give it, which the Popes strenuously oppos'd, upon which arose those Disputes, which our Roger made the best of to his own Advantage¹. And on account of the same Pretensions, in Times less remote from us, Henry VII. the first Emperor of the House of Luxemburg, summon'd Robert King of Naples, and Count of Provence, before his Tribunal at Pisa, because he pretended that the Kingdom of Naples was a Fief of the Empire; and having put him under the Ban of the Empire, and depos'd him, he invested Frederick King of Sicily with the Kingdom, who came into Calabria in order to conquer it, and took Reggio and many other Cities on that Coast. But Henry died soon after, so that the Expedition turn'd to no account, and Frederick being thus disappointed, return'd to Sicily.

BUT the Empire being now confin'd to Germany, the Emperors are look'd upon at this Time as simple Princes, who cannot so much as pretend to be Sovereigns even there, the Sovereignty being lodg'd in the Empire, as Bodinus has clearly prov'd; and other Princes being establish'd in their Kingdoms and Dominions, by a long Tract of Years, and altogether independent on the Empire, on good Grounds boast, that their States are true Monarchies, as doth our Kingdom of Naples, notwithstanding the Investiture which our Princes receive from the Popes, which Investitures do not in the least derogate from the Independency, Sovereignty, and Supreme Royalties, with which they are adorn'd, and by which they are reputed, as they really are, true Monarchs, as we shall shew in the Course of this History.

BUT let us return to the Coronation of our Roger: Tho' in those Times the Emperors of the West pretended to the Sovereignty of these our Provinces; yet the Popes had actually excluded them, and they had nothing left them but the bare Claim. The Norman Princes therefore did not think fit to take Investiture from them; neither had they any Thoughts about it. But on the contrary, the Authority of the Popes was so great in these Times, that Princes did not think they could assume the Royal, nor any other Title, without their Consent; the Norman Princes, especially Roger, seem'd to be persuaded of this.

AND there even are not wanting good Authors, who write, that Roger never took it upon him to be crown'd King, and to assume that Title, without the Permission and good liking of the Popes; and that he was not twice crown'd, first by his own Authority, in the Year 1129, and next by Anaclet, in the Year 1130; for which we desire no better Voucher than the most accurate *Pellegrinus*², who, from the Authority of Falcon of Benevento, and the Abbot of Telesse, maintains, that Roger made himself to be crown'd only once, and that by the Authority of Anaclet; for, by the Death of Honorius, which fell out in February in the Year 1130, a Schism having arisen betwixt Innocent II. and Anaclet II. both of them being elected Popes the same Day by opposite Factions; Roger was pleas'd to side with Anaclet, who, looking upon it as the most lucky Thing that could have happen'd to him, because being supported by so powerful a Prince, he should be able to withstand Innocent's Faction, deny'd him nothing that he could demand; so that Anaclet came to Avellino in the Month of October of the same Year; and appointed the Time and Place of the Coronation, and the same Month return'd to Benevento, where he caus'd the Bull to be drawn up, as we read it in Baronius; and sent one of his Cardinals to Sicily, in order to crown him, which was accordingly perform'd in Palermo, in the Month of December of the same Year on a Sunday, being the Nativity of our Saviour, with great Solemnity and Pomp, which is describ'd by the Abbot of Telese, a contemporary Writer, and Eye-witness, and one of Roger's Favourites. Falcon of Benevento, *Petrus Diaconus*¹, all the Antients, and especially the Abbot of *Telese*², mention this as the only Coronation of Roger, without taking Notice of any other. And to tell the Truth, if there had been any, surely the Abbot of Telese, who wrote the Actions of this Prince so particularly, and those wherein Anaclet was concern'd, with so much Exactness, had no Motives to pass over the first in Silence, and conceal it out of favour to Roger. Neither would he have neglected to give an Account of the great Solemnity and Pomp, and the Consent of so many eminent Prelates and Lords, which are said to have been present at this first Coronation, celebrated at a Time, when there was no Schism in the Church; but when Honorius, by the Peace made with Roger, was in the most strict Friendship with him.

THE first we find that mentions this Coronation, so solemnly perform'd by four Archbishops, is *Pazzellus*³, from whom 'tis probable Sigonius had it. But these jumble many Things together with so little Coherence, that they deserve as little Credit. Others, in order to get this Story to be believ'd, alledge a Chronicle⁴ not as yet printed, of a certain Maraldo, a Carthusian Monk; but they don't tell how old it is; and Maraldo mentions only one Coronation. By these Arguments, and because all the Antients are silent, and make not the least mention of it, Pellegrinus is of Opinion, that Roger was only once crown'd, and that by the Authority of Pope Anaclet, whom, during that Schism, not only he and his Kingdoms look'd upon as true Pope; but a great Part of Italy, and the Romans themselves, as having been elected by the Majority of the Cardinals, tho' Innocent had been elected before him, but by the Minority. I know that Inveges, not satisfied with these Arguments of Pellegrinus, is of the contrary Opinion; he says, that Roger having been crown'd by his own Authority, as soon as Innocent was elected, he intreated him to confirm this Coronation by his Bull; but not being able to persuade Innocent to confirm it, he deserted Innocent, and had recourse to Anaclet, who gladly complied with his Request. However that may be, whether this was the first or second Coronation of Roger, 'tis certain, that this Prince thought he could neither securely nor lawfully assume that Title, nor erect his Dominions into Kingdoms, without the Permission or Confirmation of Anaclet, whom he look'd upon as true Pope, to whom he had made his Dominions Tributary, and from whom his Predecessors had receiv'd Investiture.

The Investiture given by Pope Anaclet to Roger I. King of Sicily.

NOW when Anaclet had so great need of the Alliance and Friendship of Roger, he not only made him King, and order'd all the Bishops and Abbots of his Dominions to acknowledge him as such, and to take the Oath of Fidelity to him, but granted him a more ample Investiture, than ever his Predecessors Dukes of Puglia had been able to obtain; for besides investing him with Sicily, Puglia and Calabria, he likewise gave him the Investiture of the Principality of Capua, and which will appear strange, of the Dukedom of Naples also, as the Words of the Bull bear, and as Petrus Diaconus likewise relates them ¹.

THOUGH it was even very strange to see Anaclet give the Investiture of the Principality of Capua to Roger, when Robert its own Prince was in peaceable Possession of it; yet he could justify it, and it was excusable, because the Princes of Capua his Predecessors, had receiv'd the Investiture of that Principality from the Popes, and were reckon'd Feudatories of the Apostolick See, in the same Manner as the Dukes of Puglia and Calabria were, and seeing Prince Robert adher'd to Innocent his Enemy, he might well colour the Fact with such a specious Pretence. But as for the Dukedom of Naples, which depended on the Empire of the East, and was govern'd by its own Duke Sergius, in the Form of a Republick, under what Pretence Anaclet could do it, cannot truly be conceiv'd; and if even the Neapolitans, as is alledg'd, did side with Innocent, that gave him no Title to dispose of that Dukedom, to which he had not the least Claim. But the Popes in these Times got easily over these Considerations, when their Grandeur was at Stake; they were already accusom'd to give Investiture of other People's Countries, to which they had no Right, as they did of Sicily, and these our Provinces.

IT was not Roger's Business to examine narrowly into such Rights; he wanted but the Shadow of a Pretence, to conquer with his Arms, what the Pope gave him by Word and Writ; which he thought was sufficient to justify his Conquests, and which soon after he put in Practice; for he drove Robert out of that Principality, and made War upon the Neapolitans, and thus made himself Master of both these Dominions.

BUT perhaps it may be thought strange why Roger on this Occasion, was not likewise invested with the Principality of Salerno. The Reason was, because the Popes pretended that that Principality belong'd intirely to the Church of Rome, though it was not known by what particular Right. For which Cause Gregory VII. and all his Successors, always excepted it in the Investitures, as we have observ'd. And when Lothaire took it from Roger, and was resolv'd to appropriate it to himself, Innocent was offended, and complain'd sadly, that he should offer to claim as his own, what belong'd to the Church of Rome, which occasion'd Quarrels betwixt the Pope and Lothaire, as Petrus Diaconus relates ². The Investiture was given to Roger, his Children and their Heirs, jure perpetuo. And the Quit-rent agreed upon, was Six hundred Schifati yearly ³.

Pope Innocent II. in Confederacy with the Emperor Lothaire, makes War upon King Roger. The Prince of Capua, and the Duke of Naples joyn Lothaire, and are defeated, and Roger takes Possession of their Dominions.

IN the mean Time Innocent, seeing that Anaclet's Faction, which Roger had joyn'd, was the most powerful, and that as he was the Son of Petrus Leo, a rich and potent Roman Citizen, he could not dispute the See with him in Rome, had privately, with some Cardinals that had elected him Pope, retir'd from Rome to Pisa, where he was receiv'd by the Pisans, with all the Marks of Esteem and Veneration as true Pope. Pisa in these Times was remarkable amongst all the Cities of Italy, for the Wealth and Bravery of its Citizens, and much more for its Power at Sea; here Innocent soon after imbarc'd in their Gallies, and went to France, in order to persuade King Lewis to take him under his Protection, against the Power of his Rival. Being arriv'd in France, he call'd a Council in Reims, where he excommunicated Anaclet, and all his Faction; but perceiving that the King of France could not give him that Assistance, which he then stood in need of, he got the Emperor Lothaire to espouse his Interest, in whom he found a greater Disposition and Readiness, than in Lewis. Lothaire had a mind to recover these Provinces, which he thought Roger had usurp'd from him; and laid hold of this Opportunity to induce the Pope to grant him the so much contraverted Investitures. And which, as *Petrus Diaconus*¹, a contemporary Author writes, he immediately got. Baronius gives this Writer the Lye, and says, That Lothaire did pretend to them, but was oppos'd by the Abbot of Charavalle, who advis'd Innocent not to give his Consent, and accordingly Innocent did refuse to give the Investitures, and Baronius's Voucher is the Writer of the Life of this Saint, which was Barnardus de Bonavalle, a much later Author.

HOWEVER that may be, Innocent got the Emperor to come presently into Italy with him, where they found Anaclet in Possession of St. Peter's Church; Innocent went to lodge in the Lateran Palace, and the Emperor with his Soldiers, took up his Quarters in the Church of St. Paul. In the mean time many Barons of Puglia that were disgusted at Roger, joyn'd Innocent's Faction. The most remarkable amongst them, were Rainulphus Count of Airola and Avellino; Robert Prince of Capua, and Sergius Duke of Naples. Rainulphus, though he was the King's Brother-in-Law, by having married Mafhilda his Sister, yet bore him a Grudge, because when he us'd his Sister ill, King Roger took her back, and sent her to Sicily, together with her Son Robert; at the same time he declar'd War against the Count, took Avellino and Mercogliano, and besides, Richard the Brother of Rainulphus, who had spoken indiscreetly of him, falling into his Hands, he order'd his Eyes to be put out, and his Nose to be cut off. To Rainulphus, Robert Prince of Capua joyn'd, as not well pleas'd with the King's Proceedings, who avowedly resolv'd to take his

Principality from him, of which he got Anaclet to give him the Investiture, though Robert was in Possession of it. Sergius Duke of Naples, for the same Reasons, entertain'd the same Jealousy, who, though while the King was in Salerno, after the Victory he had obtain'd over the Amalphytans (if we can give Credit to the Abbot of Telesè, for the Archbishop Romualdus, and Falcon of Benevento, mention no such thing at this Time) terrified at his Power, and great Bravery, came and subjected the City of Naples to his Dominion; nevertheless this Submission, if there was any such, took no Effect, for afterwards he resolv'd with all his Might, to maintain the Freedom of his City, and was a bitter Enemy to Roger, and associated himself with Robert and Rainulphus in the Interest of Innocent; and these Three, not content with having entered into this League, likewise stirr'd up many Cities of Puglia to revolt, and drew in with them many Barons, who took up Arms against their own Sovereign, and put every thing in Confusion on this side of the Fare. And the Boldness of these Conspirators increas'd, when they understood that Lothaire and Innocent this Year 1133, had enter'd Italy and were come to Rome, upon which they made ready for a new, and more vigorous Expedition against Roger; and to facilitate the Undertaking, Prince Robert, Count Rainulphus, and many other Barons of these Provinces, and a Multitude of other People went to Rome to drive Roger quite out of Puglia.

LOTHAIRE was crown'd at Rome by Innocent, in the Month of June in the Year 1133, with great Pomp, at which Solemnity many Dukes, Marquisses and other Barons of Italy were present, at whose Desire Lothaire, as his Predecessors were wont to do in Roncaglia, establish'd some Feudal Laws, and after Conrad the Salick, was the second that publish'd written Laws concerning Fiefs; and at this Time he confirm'd the famous Law of Conrad, about the Succession of Nephews and Brothers, of which we have made mention in the preceding Books, and exactly as we see it registred in the second Book of Fiefs¹, which was falsely attributed to Lothaire I. by Molineus and Pelligrinus, and what gave occasion to the Mistake, was the Carelessness of the Printers, who in place of Innocent's Name, had put that of Eugen, which the wise Cujacius observ'd. The most accurate Pellegrinus ought not to have question'd, that this Constitution was Lothaire's, for the Inscription is thus read; Constitutiones Feudales Domini Lotarii Imperatoris, quas ante Januam B. Petri in Civitate Romana condidit; as if Lothaire could not have establish'd this Law ante januam B. Petri, because *Otho Frisingensis*² writes, that the Palace of St. Peter was then in the Possession of Anaclet; for, either the Inscription may have been vitiated, and the Word Eugen put for Innocent, or even 'tis not improbable, that Anaclet may have permitted Lothaire to do it, since it was a Matter indifferent; and the rather, that we read in grave Writers³, that Lothaire was no sooner come to Rome, than he sent some prudent and religious Men to treat with Anaclet, in order to remove so grievous a Schism, during which Time he might well perform this Solemnity before the Gate of St. Peter's Palace.

ANDREA D'ISERNIA was no less mistaken in this Matter, who, on good Grounds, finding that these Constitutions could not bind these our Provinces, which had been intirely dismember'd from the Empire by Roger, could not imagine that among the Deputies of the other Cities of Italy, such as of Milan, Pavia, Cremona, Mantua, Verona, Triviggi, Padua, Vicenza, Parma, Lucca and Pisa, those also of the City of Siponto were present, as we read in that Constitution; for that City was then subject to Roger; so that he conjectur'd, either that the Place had been vitiated, and instead of Syponti, it ought to be read Senarum, or (which ought to be pardon'd in that rude Age in which he wrote) that there was another City in Lombardy or Tuscany nam'd Siponto. For it was no strange Thing for the Deputies of Siponto to be present, though this Meeting was held after these Provinces were separated from the Empire by Roger, who being now forc'd by the Rebellion of his Barons, to abandon Puglia, and retire to Sicily, in order to assemble his Troops, and suppress the Rebellion; could not hinder the Sipontines, who were Rebels among the rest, from going to Rome, especially when they heard Lothaire was on his Way to joyn them: Neither is it any Reproach to Roger, that his Vassals were forc'd to submit to a Constitution of his Enemy, as shall be related on another Occasion.

³ Capec. Latr. lib. 1. p. 14.

BUT all these warlike Preparations, and so many Enemies of Roger's joyn'd together, were not able to daunt this invincible Prince in the least; for returning from Sicily with a powerful Army, after alternate Fortune, sometimes losing, sometimes gaining, at last he dispers'd his Enemies: forc'd Lothaire to return to Germany without Success, oblig'd Innocent to retire, anew, to Pisa, where he celebrated another Council; crush'd the Pride of Rainulphus and Robert, suppress'd the Rebellion of the Barons of Puglia, and made the Province to submit: And all this Kingdom was now under his Dominion, except Naples, Benevento and Capua, and the Dominions of Count Rainulphus; he stay'd a little in Salerno, resolving to conquer these Cities, especially Naples and Capua, in order to which he return'd to Sicily to recruit his Army.

PRINCE Robert, who foresaw the Mischief that threaten'd him, left no Stone unturn'd to prevent it; he went to Pisa, and made a League with the Pisans, from whom he got a powerful Supply of Ships and Soldiers¹. He likewise brought over the Genoese and Venetians to joyn the Pisans; thence he return'd to the Principality of Capua, and from thence to Naples, where he was cheerfully receiv'd by Sergius, and Count Rainulphus, who had retir'd to this City. He laid before them the League, which he had newly concluded at Pisa, in the Presence of Innocent, with the Pisans, Genoese and Venetians, by which he had oblig'd himself to pay the Pisans Three thousand Pounds of Silver. This News was so very acceptable to Sergius and his Confederates, that immediately without delay, they took the very Plate out of the Churches of Naples and Capua, made up the Sum, and sent it presently to the Pisans.

BUT while they were thus strengthening their Confederacy, Roger with Sixty Gallies, return'd from Sicily, landed at Salerno, and immediately laid Siege to Naples; but this City defending itself with the utmost Bravery, he rais'd the Siege, and march'd towards Capua; and having taking Nocera, and many Castles in that Neighbourhood, he attack'd Capua, which immediately surrender'd². The King enter'd the City, and was honourably receiv'd, and with little Opposition, having conquer'd the other Places of that Principality, he return'd anew, and laid close Siege to Naples.

THUS in this Year 1135, Roger, after various Turns of Fortune, to his other Dominions, added the Principality of Capua, of which he had already got the Investiture from Anaclet. He soon after invested his Son Anphusius with it, by giving him the Standard with his own Hand, which was then the Ceremony us'd in giving Investiture, therefore the Capuans proclaim'd Anphusius their Prince, and swore Fealty to him. But 'tis well worthy of Observation, that the Capuans swore Fealty to Anphusius, Salva tamen Regis, & filii ejus Rogerii (Ducis Apuliæ) fidelitate, qui ei in Regnum successurus erat, as the Abbot of Telesse relates; for Roger having united the Principality of Capua to his Kingdom, though he had invested Anphusius with it, yet he would not suffer him to govern it independently of the Crown, himself, and his Son Roger Duke of Puglia, who had been declar'd his Successor in the Kingdom.

ROGER, by his first Wife Alberia, Daughter of Alphonfus King of Spain, had five Sons. The first, who was to succeed in the Kingdom, and whom therefore his Father had made Duke of Puglia, was nam'd Roger³; but he dying before his Father in the Year 1148, made room for his younger Brothers. 'Tis said that Tancred, who succeeded in the Kingdom of Sicily, was the Bastard Son of this Roger, as shall be told hereafter. The second was Tancred, to whom the Father had assign'd the Principality of Bari, or rather Taranto, because he had not then acquir'd the Principality of Capua, and he also died before his Father, or any of his Brothers in 1144.

THE third was this Anphusius, or as others call him Alphusius, whence Hieronymus Zurita supposes, he was call'd so from the Name of Alphonfus King of Spain, his Grandfather by his Mother; but *Wolfgangus Latius*⁴ is of Opinion, that 'tis a Gothic Name, deriv'd from Idelfonsus, and this from Hildedrunzus a Gothic Word, a favore scilicet & amore fæderis. This Anphusius was created Prince of Capua by Roger this Year 1135, who soon after, in 1139, having got Naples added to his Dominion, likewise made him Duke of Naples, according to Pellegrinus; but he had the same Fate with his other Brothers, for in the Year 1144 he died likewise before his Father.

THE fourth was William I. who, after the Death of Anphus, was by his Father created Prince of Capua, and Duke of Naples; and his other Brother Roger dying afterwards, he was made Duke of Puglia in his Place; at last in the Year 1151, his Father made him his Colleague in the Kingdom, and he was crown'd and declar'd Successor; and accordingly on his Father's Death he succeeded, and for many Years held the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia; for Henry another Brother died young in his Father's Life-time, before Roger his elder Brother.

ROGER had other Wives, Sibylla a Sister of the Duke of Burgundy, by whom he had no Children, that can be found in the best Writers; Beatrix, by whom he had Constantia, who being design'd for great Things, after various Turns of Fortune became Wife of the Emperor Henry IV. and brought him the famous Frederick II. whose Achievements shall be the Subject of a part of this History. And there are some who to these three Wives of Roger add a fourth, who they say was N. Sister of Anaclet, of the Family of Pier Lione; and likewise a fifth nam'd Ariolda, a Daughter of the Count of Marfi.

BUT whilst Roger kept Naples besieg'd, and attack'd it by Sea, perceiving by the extraordinary Bravery of the Citizens, that it would not easily surrender, he left the Care of the Siege to his Captains, and return'd to Salerno, where he embark'd in his Fleet, and went to Sicily, in order to return the following Spring to attack it with a greater Army, as Alexander Abbot of St. Salvatore della Valle Telesia relates, who here ends the four Books of his Norman Latin History.

IN the mean time Robert Prince of Capua had gone to Pisa for Assistance; but he was too late, for at his Return he found Capua was already taken, and all his Efforts to regain it afterwards were in vain; so that seeing himself in a desperate Condition, he return'd anew to Pisa. Sergius Duke of Naples, likewise seeing his City in such Distress, and afraid he should be undone if he got not immediate Relief, embark'd also for Pisa, in order to get Assistance; but not able to obtain any, return'd to Naples much afflicted.

BUT Prince Robert having found Pope Innocent in Pisa, was spurr'd on by him to go into Germany, in his own and the Pope's Name to beg Assistance of the Emperor Lothaire. Being arriv'd in Germany, he was courteously receiv'd by the Emperor, who sent him presently back to Pisa, and assur'd him that he would come into Italy the Year following, to rid the Church of Rome of the Schism, and to restore Robert to his Principality. In these Times Bernard Abbot of Claravalle, both on account of his Learning and good Life, had acquir'd a great Fame of Sanctity over all Europe; so that he was in no less Esteem with the Emperor, than with Pope Innocent, and his Advice was of great Weight; and Innocent during this Schism had taken care to get him on his Side against Anaclet: 'Tis not to be doubted but he was one of the most powerful and effectual Instruments in favour of Innocent, and who taking his Part with Ardour, did him great Service. He did not fail in these Conjunctions to write moving and pressing Letters to the Emperor Lothaire, that both as Defender and Advocate of the Church, he would go into Italy to crush the Pride of the Schismatics, and take Revenge of Roger. And his Zeal carried him so far, that in one Letter which he wrote to Lothaire, he did not stick to call Roger an Usurper, and that he had unjustly usurp'd the Crown of Sicily, as Anaclet had the See of St. Peter: Cæsaris est, said he to Lothaire, propriam vindicare Coram ab Usurpatore Siculo. Ut etiam constat Judaicam sobolem sedem Petri in Christi occupasse injuriam; sic procul dubio omnis, qui in Sicilia Regem se facit, contradicit Cæsari; as if Roger had taken Sicily from the Empire of the West, and Lothaire was to look upon himself as another Octavianus Augustus, with regard to all the Provinces of the World.

HOWEVER these Invitations were so powerful, that at last Lothaire was persuaded to go a second time into Italy with a greater Army, resolving to suppress the Schism, and drive Roger out of these Provinces; therefore he wrote to Innocent, that on the Festival of St. James this Year 1136, he would leave *Germany*². Pope Innocent sent this News immediately to Sergius Duke of Naples; and Prince Robert with five Ships loaded with Provisions went to relieve Naples, which was suffering a dreadful Famine, being so closely block'd up, that Provisions could not enter at any part by Land. Prince Robert having assur'd Sergius and the Neapolitans of the Emperor's coming, return'd immediately to Pisa, and from thence he went to meet Lothaire, whom he found already on this Side of the Alps, on his way to Cremona.

S E C T. I.

Lothaire comes a second Time into Italy, and defeats Roger's Army.

IT was in the Month of November of this Year 1136, that the Emperor came to Roncaglia (which as we have formerly said, is situated upon the Po, not far from Placentia ¹) and according to the Custom of his Predecessors, call'd an Assembly of all the States, as well the Ecclesiastick, such as Archbishops and Bishops, as that of the Nobles, such as Dukes, Marquises, Counts, and other Barons, and likewise the Magistrates of the Cities of Italy; where at their Request, by a Constitution, he establish'd some other Feodal Laws, which chiefly regard the Prohibition of alienating Fiefs. We have this Constitution in the second Book of Fiefs ²; and also in the third Book of the Longobard Laws ³. Neither can Pellegrinus ⁴ himself deny it to be this Lothaire's, which is a convincing Argument, that the Compiler of the Longobard Laws, join'd thereto the Constitutions of the Emperors as Kings of Italy, beginning from Charles the Great, down to this last Lothaire (for that of Charles IV. was added a long time after this Compilation) because the other Emperors who held the Empire of the West after Lothaire, and who frequently came into Italy, establish'd other Laws at Roncaglia concerning Fiefs; the Compilers of the Feodal Customs in the Time of Frederick I. did not add them to the Longobard Laws, but to the Body of Feodal Customs, whence arose a new Body of Laws call'd Feodal, which at last was by Cujacius divided into five Books, as we shall shew in its proper Place.

ROGER had never been so furiously attack'd as now when Lothaire came the second Time into Italy; in the twinkling of an Eye he lost the finest Provinces of his Kingdom, such as those on this Side of the Fare; at the coming of Lothaire the Hopes of his Enemies increas'd, and the Malecontents grew bolder, and broke out into open Rebellion; for at first Lothaire being appriz'd of the Straits to which the City of Naples was reduc'd, and that the Citizens were dying in their Houses and in the Streets of Famine, did not fail to send Letters and Ambassadors to Sergius and the Neapolitans, encouraging them to continue to defend themselves for a short time, and that he would come to their Relief. And indeed it was not long before he march'd towards Puglia, and being come to the River Pescara, he pass'd it, and subdu'd Termoli, with many Places of that Province; and being arriv'd in Puglia, took the City of Siponto, and so terrified the People of Puglia, and put them into such a Consternation, that all the Cities as far as Bari, where-ever Lothaire went, submitted to him.

IN the mean time Innocent had now left Pisa, and gone to Viterbo to meet the Emperor, who, hearing of the Pope's being in that City, immediately sent Henry his Son-in-Law, with three thousand Soldiers, to bid him endeavour to conquer the Strong-holds of Campagna di Romana, and to restore the Principality of Capua to Robert, because he was to march another way, in order to conquer the other Provinces of Puglia from Roger; whereupon Innocent with another Army came to St. Germano, which immediately yielded to him. From thence having march'd to Capua, and there being none to resist him, he presently made himself Master of that City, and restor'd both it and the Principality to Robert ⁵. And afterwards he march'd to Benevento, where, after a short Dispute, the Beneventans surrender'd to him. From thence he went into Puglia in quest of Lothaire, who had already taken Bari, and only wanted to take its strong Castle, which Roger had built, and provided with a strong and brave Garrison; but at last it being taken, the Emperor and Innocent march'd against Melphis of Puglia, and having besieg'd it for some Time, at last they became Masters of it.

IT was this Year 1137, that Lothaire, after taking Puglia from Roger, had a mind to create a new Duke of it, and for that end caus'd a Parliament to be conven'd in Melphis, to which he invited all the Barons of that Province, wherein he propos'd the Creation of this new Duke; and in the mean time sent his Armies to besiege Salerno. On this Occasion there arose terrible Disputes about this Creation¹; Innocent pretended, that as his Predecessors had invested the Normans with the Dukedom of Puglia, so now when it was taken from them, he had a Right to invest others². On the other hand, Lothaire pretended that these Provinces depending on the Empire of the West, the Emperor had a Right to give the Investiture of them³, as the Emperor Henry had actually invested the Normans with them. The Dispute came to such a height, that had it not been for fear that Roger the common Enemy should take Advantage of it, it would have ended in an open War. Therefore Expedients were fallen upon, whereby neither the Rights of the Empire, nor those of the Church were to suffer any Prejudice; and it was agreed betwixt them that the new Duke should be invested by them both⁴. Rainulphus Count of Avellino, a Norman by Nation, and not a German, as Sigonius believ'd⁵, a Kinsman of the King's, and Son of Count Robert, who was descended from the old Count Rainulphus, Brother German of Richard I. Prince of Capua, was elected.

RAINULPHUS then was created Duke of Puglia, and receiv'd the Standard, as a Symbol of the Investiture, from the Hands both of the Pope and Emperor. And Falcon of Benevento adds, that on the fifth of September, the same Pope Innocent anointed Rainulphus as Duke of Puglia in the Cathedral Church of Benevento, at which were present the Patriarch of Aquileja, many Archbishops, Bishops and Abbots. Thus did Roger's two most bitter Enemies, who had distinguish'd themselves in Favour of Lothaire and the Pope, receive the Rewards of their Zeal and Labours; Robert was restor'd to the Principality of Capua, and Rainulphus was advanc'd to a higher Dignity. Sergius with his Neapolitans still stood out the Siege of their City with unheard-of Constancy, in the Midst of terrible Calamities and Want; therefore Lothaire and Innocent resolv'd to march towards Naples with all their Forces, but their Armies being about Salerno, they had a Mind first to take that City, and thereafter to raise the Siege of Naples; and in the mean time they might expect the long-look'd for Succours from Pisa, without which that City could get no Relief by Sea, and without which they were not able to reduce Amalphis, and the other maritime Places in the Neighbourhood. In the Interim the Pisans with a hundred arm'd Vessels, as they had promis'd, arriv'd most opportunely at Naples, and having landed a Reinforcement and Provisions, which put this City out of Danger of being forc'd to surrender, the Emperor order'd them to sail immediately for Amalphis, to reduce that City with the neighbouring Places, and accordingly they set sail with forty Gallies, and took Amalphis, Scala, and Ravello, where they got a great Booty, and reduc'd them to the Emperor's Obedience.

C H A P. II.

The Pandects found in Amalphis. The Roman Jurisprudence, and the Books of Justinian reviv'd in the Academies of Italy.

IT was upon this Occasion, that the City of Amalphis, tho' it had been taken by Force, became more renown'd in the succeeding Ages, than all the other Cities of Europe; for a Citizen of Amalphis had found out the Mariner's Compass, and now on this Occasion this same City had the additional Glory of the Emperor Justinian's Pandects being found in it, which some believ'd, was the very same Copy that this Emperor had caus'd to be compil'd. The Copies of this Volume were in a manner lost, because of the many Collections of the Basilica, and for many other Reasons which we have mention'd in the seventh Book of this History; only in France, as we have observ'd elsewhere, there were still some Copies handed about; for we see that Ivo of Chartres, who flourish'd in the Time of Paschal II. about the Year 1099, in his Letters often quotes the Laws of the Pandects¹. But all Memory of them had been lost in Italy; only, as we have said, his Code, Institutions and Novellæ were known, which was owing more to the Care of the Popes and Monks, who were then the only learn'd Men, than to any thing else.

I N D E E D we see many Laws of the Code quoted in the Decretals of the Popes, such as those of Gregory III. and other Popes²; the Institutions and Novellæ were better known, for we have seen, that the famous Abbot Desiderius preserv'd the Copies of them in the Library of the Monastery of Monte Cassino; but the Pandects, which was the finest Part, and contain'd the Beauty and Politeness of the Roman Laws, were little known among us. 'Tis as yet a Question whether part of them was not preserv'd in Ravenna. *Guido Pancirolus*³ relates the Opinion of some, who believ'd that the Pandects were found in an ancient Library in Ravenna, and which being offer'd to Lothaire, he found them to be the genuine Work of the Emperor Justinian, and order'd that they should be publickly explain'd in the Schools. But the same Pancirolus look'd upon the Opinion of those to be better grounded, who write, that Justinian's Code was found in Ravenna, and not the Pandects, which this Year 1130, on the abovemention'd Occasion were found in Amalphis. This Glory then is owing to Amalphis not far from Naples, not to Melpbis in Puglia, as some on the other Side of the Alps have written, who were not well acquainted with the particular Places and Cities of these our Provinces, therefore have often mistaken and confounded the one City with the other; as on the other hand, they have said, that the Council celebrated in Melpbis in Puglia, in the Year 1059, was held in Amalphis. Some others, perhaps out of Love to their native Country, have not stuck to say, that the Pisans found them when they reliev'd Naples; and having taken them from the Neapolitans, carried them to Pisa: 'Tis strange that Summontes should give into this Conceit, repugnant to all History; and Franciscus hath inserted it among other Dreams with which he stuff'd his History. And a Modern Writer of Puglia likewise dream'd, that the Pandects were neither found in Amalphis nor Naples, but in Molfetta, for no other Reason but the Similitude of the Name, and that Molfetta was the Place of the Writer's Nativity: Thus to this very Time (as the native Countries of Homer and Tasso are contended for) many Cities dispute the Glory of this Invention.

N O T to mention the ancient Annals, those who have seen in the Course of this History how famous the Amalpbians were for Navigation, and their great Commerce with the Eastern Parts and Greece, which those Cities that aspir'd to this Glory had not, will think it very reasonable, that among other Things which the Amalpbians brought to their City from the East, they may likewise have brought the Pandects, so rare a Book, and in which the Beauty of the Roman Laws was contain'd; and 'tis commonly said¹, that an Amalpbian Merchant in a Voyage to the East bought them there, and at his Return made a Present of them to his native Country. Neither is it question'd, but that the Pisans, among the other Booty which they got in Amalphis, found the Pandects, and that as a Reward for the Trouble they had been at in this Expedition, they only begg'd this of the Emperor Lothaire, who willingly granted their Request; so that being carried by them to Pisa, they got the Name of Pandectæ Pisanæ, which Name they had little less than three Centuries, till the Year 1416, when the War broke out betwixt the Pisans and Florentines: Guido Caponio, a Florentine Captain, having besieg'd and taken Pisa, and found the Pandects, as a great Part of his Triumph carried them to Florence, where, with great Veneration, and as a Thing of vast Value, they are now preserv'd in the Library of the Medici, divided into two Tomes; so that tho' formerly they were call'd Pisanæ, they are since call'd Florentinæ. Plotius Grifus, and Rainerus Grachaia a Pisan, and a most ancient Historian, who wrote de Bello Tusco, more than 300 Years ago, confirm the same; and Plotius tells us, that he had in his Custody an ancient Instrument of this Donation which Lothaire made of the Amalpbian Pandects to the Pisans. See *Sigonius*², Raphael Volteranus, *Angelus Politianus*³, *Antonio Gatto*⁴, *Francesco Taurello*⁵, *Arthurus Duck*⁶, and all other Writers, down to *Burcardus Struvius*⁷, who is the last of the Moderns that confirms it.

T H O' Lothaire had yielded a Thing of so great Value to the Pisans, yet being a learn'd Prince, and especially a prudent Law-giver, he did not fail to look into the Pandects, and perceiving that the Beauty of the Roman Laws was contain'd in them, resolv'd that they should no longer remain in Darkness, but be brought to light for the Benefit of Mankind. There is a great Dispute betwixt those of Bologna and other Writers, whether Lothaire establish'd by an Edict, that the Pandects should be publicly read in Bologna, or that they should be taught there with the other Books of Justinian, by Irnerius for private Use. The Doctors of Bologna say, that Lothaire order'd Irnerius, who read Philosophy in Bologna, to explain them publicly, which he began to do in the Year 1128, but then the Pandects had not been found in Amalphis. Conradus Uspersensis after having related the History of Lothaire, says, that Irnerius explain'd them at the Desire of the Countess Mathilda; and in the Arguments of the History of Bologna, which are attributed to Carolus Sigonius, we read, that the Countess Mathilda had order'd Irnerius in the Year 1102, to explain the Pandects, and that he there made the first Glosses on them. But *Burcardus Struvius*⁸ looks upon what Conrade relates of the Countess Mathilda's having impos'd this Task on Irnerius, in the Reign of Lothaire, as fabulous; for 'tis certain, that Mathilda died in the Year 1115, before Lothaire was Emperor; and the same Sigonius likewise confutes what Conrade says, for the same Reason⁹. Whence Struvius believes, that those Arguments which we read at the End of the History of Bologna, could never be the Work of Sigonius, who in his History of the Kingdom of Italy, plainly asserts the contrary, and checks Conrade who wrote it.

T H E R E F O R E the most grave Authors condemn these Accounts as fabulous, and tell us, that Irnerius never explain'd the Books of Justinian in the School of Bologna, neither by the Authority of the Countess Mathilda, nor the Command of Lothaire, but for his private Study, and to please his own Ambition.

IRNERIUS in these Times, when the Jurisprudence and other Learning began to revive, was look'd upon as one of the best Lawyers. Germany, Milan and Florence, all lay claim to him as their Country-man ; he first apply'd himself to the Study of Philosophy and Humanity, such as they were in these Times, and 'tis thought he made a Voyage to the Levant, and studied in Constantinople ; from thence he return'd to Ravenna, where he taught and acquir'd the Reputation of a Man of great Learning. But afterwards he left Ravenna, and was invited to Bologna, where he taught Philosophy. There had been a School establish'd in Bologna, in which the Jurisprudence was taught, whereof Pepo was a Professor ; and there having arisen a Dispute among the Professors about the Word As, signifying Twelve Ounces, Irnerius thereupon apply'd himself to the Study of Justinian's Books, and became so famous a Professor of Law, that he eclips'd the Fame of Pepo. He studied Justinian's Code, Institutions and Novellæ, and these last he adapted to the Laws of the Code, in order to shew wherein the latter differ'd from the former ; he likewise made his first Glosses on these Books ; and he was the first, who in the Year 1128, commented on the Roman Laws. Those who write that in this Year there had been another Copy of the Digests found in Ravenna, besides that, which was handed about in France, say, that Irnerius before the Pandects were found in Amalphis (which *Angelus Politianus*¹ believ'd to be Justinian's own Copy, notwithstanding the Dissent of *Andreas Alciatus*², and *Antonius Augustinus*³, though 'tis certain that all other Copies are taken from it, as being the most antient⁴) employ'd his Labour likewise on the Digests, and taught them in Bologna with the other Books of Justinian, where he made his first Comments. But others, who deny that, and say, that the first Copies of the Pandects that appear'd in Italy, were taken from those of Amalphis, maintain, that Irnerius explain'd the Digests in that Academy after they had been found in Amalphis, but not by the Command of the Emperor Lothaire, but for his own private Study, as he had before explain'd the other Books of Justinian, and other Learning, without the Emperor's Order. Neither had that Academy been instituted in these Times by Lothaire, nor do we read, that he commanded the Books of Justinian to be explain'd and taught there, as Fredericus Lindenbrogius affirms⁵ ; and *Hermanus Conringius*⁶ subjoyns, that if Lothaire had commanded such a Thing, and had had the School of Bologna so much at Heart, when the Pandects were found in Amalphis, he would have made a Present of them to the Professors of Bologna, and not to the Pisans.

BUT though we read no particular Edict of Lothaire concerning this Matter, yet 'tis not to be doubted, but that this Prince favour'd those Studies, and that the School of Bologna flourish'd more in his Time than formerly, for Irnerius had made a prodigious Progress in the Roman Laws ; so that those Studies came to be cultivated and promoted, and many applied themselves to them, insomuch, that the School of Irnerius produc'd able Doctors, who either by their Pleading, or their written Comments, illustrated the Laws of Justinian, and excited not only the Academy of Bologna, but also all the other Academies of Italy to study them. Whence arose Martinus of Cremona : Bulgarus, who in the Time of Frederick Barbarossa was so famous in Bologna : Hugo and Jacobus Uginus, Roger, Otho, and Placentius, who were so renown'd in the Academy of Montpelier in France ; a Disciple of Bulgarus, nam'd Pileus, who was famous in Bologna and Modena, for his Quæstiones Sabbathinæ ; Albericus of Ravenna, and his Disciple Azon, who was the chief Lawyer of his Age, and Master of our Roffredo Beneventano, Balduino, and many others.

'TIS generally believ'd that from the Books of Justinian being thus revived in the Academies of Italy, and from the School of Irnerius, the Solemnities practis'd afterwards in creating of Doctors had their Rise, which are attributed to Irnerius, who, by the Authority of Lothaire, bestow'd the Degree of Doctor on the Professors, and 'tis said, that he was the first who declar'd Bulgarus, Uginus, Martinus and *Pileus*⁷ Doctors. And *Acerbus Morena*⁸ relates, that Irnerius being on his Death-bed, his Scholars accosted him, and ask'd, whom he would recommend to be their Master after his Death, to whom he nam'd Bulgarus, Martinus, and Hugo, but they chose Jacobus, and made him their Doctor. But Itterius ¹, and Conringius ² reckon, that the Solemnity of conferring the Degree of Doctor in Academies, took its Rise from the French, from whom the Italians had it.

SIGONIUS ³, Arthur Duck ⁴, and others believ'd, that Lothaire, besides having commanded the Books of Justinian to be read in the publick Academies, order'd them to be pleaded in the Tribunals, and the Judges to neglect the Longobard Laws, and give Judgment according to them. But their Opinion has no Foundation in History, for we read of no Edict of Lothaire's commanding it, which would have been necessary, and there is not a Contemporary Historian that mentions it; so that the gravest Writers ⁵, and Lindebrogius ⁶ at large, confute their Error. What clearly convinceth us of the contrary, is, that the Longobard Laws were kept up in Italy, and especially in these our Provinces long afterwards; and according to them, Law Pleas were decided in the Tribunals, only the Roman Law was by Tradition observ'd amongst the Country People; neither in those Times were the Books of Justinian quoted, for they had not as yet acquir'd any Authority in the Courts, as by degrees they afterwards did, rather by Custom and the Dint of Reason, than by the Law of any Prince.

BUT if there ever had been a Law for that Purpose, 'tis sure, it could have been of no Force in our Provinces, that were under the Dominion of Roger, Lothaire's Enemy. Roger, as we shall see anon, soon recover'd all these Provinces which Lothaire had invaded, and overcame all his Enemies, and re-united the Provinces to his Kingdom of Sicily, and establish'd it in the Form of a true Monarchy, which obey'd no other Laws but those of the Longobards, and what others he made afterwards. And this was not only during the Empire of Lothaire, and his own Reign, but likewise continu'd in the Times of the Norman Kings his Successors, who being still at War with Conrade, and Frederick I. who succeeded Lothaire, never allow'd their Laws to be observ'd in these Provinces; and in Fact, as shall be seen by and by, Law Pleas were not decided by the Roman Laws contain'd in those Books, but by the Longobard, and the Roman Laws, which by way of Tradition, were retain'd by these People. Neither was there with us any Opportunity of reading these Books in our publick Schools, for till the Time of Frederick II. a great Favourer of Learning, and who introduc'd it into Naples, we had no Academies, and it was not till later Times, we being the last in following the Example of the other Cities of Italy, that the Study of those Books began in these Provinces, and they were quoted in the Courts more through Strength of Reason, than as Laws, as will be seen in the Course of this History.

C H A P. III.

King Roger prosecutes the War against Innocent. Anaclet dies ; and soon after the Emperor Lothaire, and Rainulphus Duke of Puglia likewise dye. Roger recovers the Cities which he had lost ; and all these Provinces with the Dukedom of Naples, submit to his Dominion. Innocent is made Prisoner, and Peace concluded betwixt him and King Roger, to whom he grants the Investiture of the Kingdom.

MALP.HIS and the neighbouring Places being taken by the Pisans, Lothaire order'd them to sail to Salerno, and call'd Duke Sergius from Naples, and Prince Robert from Capua, to go on the same Expedition, and sent Duke Rainulphus with a Thousand Germans ; all which being join'd, they laid close Siege to Salerno.

THIS City was defended by Robert, King Roger's Chancellor, without any other Troops but only Four hundred Soldiers, with some Barons of the neighbouring Castles ; but the Fidelity and the Love of the Salernitans to Roger, supplied the want of a strong Garrison ; these People who had been long under the Dominion of this King, were most faithful to him. To this was added, their Gratitude for the many Favours which they had receiv'd from this Prince, who lov'd and valu'd them above all his other Subjects, and amongst all the other Cities of this Kingdom, he had chosen Salerno for the Residence of his Court ; and as in Sicily he had fix'd his Abode in Palermo, so when his Affairs call'd him into these Provinces, he kept his Court in Salerno. Therefore they defended themselves against the Besiegers with much Bravery, insomuch that the Pisans having Proof of their Courage, in order to get the better of their Resolution, caus'd a Machine to be made for making a Breach in the Walls of the City, which so terrified the Salernitans, that they began to despair of being able to defend it any longer ; and when the Pope and Emperor came to the Siege, they sent Messengers to the Emperor, and submitted to him, on Condition, that the foreign Soldiers should have leave to go whither they thought fit, whereupon some went away, and others with the Barons and Captains, retir'd into the Castle of the City, and maintain'd it gallantly for their Master. The Pisans understanding that the Salernitans had surrender'd to the Emperor, and had been receiv'd by him without communicating the Matter to them, highly incens'd at such a Contempt, immediately burnt the Machines, which they had made for taking Salerno, and made ready their Vessels in order to return to Pisa ; and they would actually have been gone, had it not been for the Pope, who much valu'd their Alliance, and who with Intreaties and large Promises, stopp'd them ; but this Discord prevented the taking of the Castle, which therefore continu'd to be at Roger's Devotion.

THE taking of Salerno occasion'd greater Discord betwixt the Emperor and Innocent, who pretended that this City belong'd to the Church of Rome, and though hitherto it was not known by what particular Right, nevertheless it was known that Gregory VII. would on no account invest Roger, nor any of his Successors with it, because of the Claim Claim of the Apostolick See to this City; but Lothaire strongly opposing such a Claim, made Innocent to yield ¹, for this cunning Pope was unwilling to break with him, lest Roger should take advantage of it. However Innocent was highly offended, and the Bond of Friendship which had united them hitherto, began to slacken.

AT last (thinking their Expedition was over) Innocent and Lothaire left these our Provinces, and the Emperor leaving Rainulphus his General, with many other Officers, to oppose Roger, and maintain the Conquests he had made, went with the Pope to Rome, and from thence by the way of Tuscany march'd straight for Germany ². But Roger, who all this Time had given way to the Fury of so many Storms, was waiting an Opportunity to recover all he had lost, and as soon as he heard that Lothaire had left Campagna, he assembled a great Army in Sicily; and hearing that he was in Rome on his way to Germany, in all haste sail'd for Salerno, where he landed his Army ³. This City presently surrender'd to its old Master, and from thence he went to Nocera, which with all the Towns in the Neighbourhood belonging to Rainulphus, immediately submitted to him. He afterwards march'd to Capua, and being furiously inrag'd at Prince Robert, who had been the chief Instrument of Lothaire's coming into Italy, he took it by Force, and it suffer'd a terrible Pillage. From thence with his victorious Army he march'd to Avellino, and after taking this City with all the Places round it, he advanc'd to Benevento. The Beneventans being terrified at Roger's Success, likewise submitted to him, and quitting the Party of Innocent, to whom they had sworn Fealty a little before, in order to please the King, they sided with Anaclet. Roger from Benevento, march'd to Monte Sarchio, which presently yielded; from thence entering into Puglia, with much Bravery he subjected many Cities of it. Duke Rainulphus hearing that Roger was come into Puglia, assembled 1500 gallant Soldiers which he drew out of Bari, Trani, Melphis and Troja, with whom he march'd against Roger, being resolv'd rather to die with his Sword in his Hand, than basely to submit to his Enemy.

IN the mean time Innocent was appriz'd of Roger's Progress, and the Emperor being at a Distance, he knew there was no great stress to be laid on Duke Rainulphus, nor the Emperor's Officers, therefore he resolv'd to send Bernard Abbot of Clavalle, to the King, with a Commission to treat of Peace, and reconcile the King and the Duke; but Bernard, who in these Times was in great Esteem, both for his Learning and holy Life, not succeeding, the King and the Duke came to a Battle, which was gallantly fought, and Roger came off with Loss; but not minding this Defeat, he retir'd to Salerno, where he recruited his Army, in order to invade Puglia anew. However the Abbot of Clavalle continued to treat with the King about a Peace betwixt him and the Pope, and at last he obtain'd, that Innocent should send three Cardinals, and Anaclet as many, to lay both their Claims before him, and then he would determine what he should think most equitable. Accordingly Innocent sent Cardinal Aimerico Chancellor of the holy Church, and Cardinal Gherardo, both of them Men of great Reputation, and the Abbot Bernard; and Anaclet likewise sent three of his Cardinals, to wit, Matteo his Chancellor, Gregorio, and Pietro Pisano, a Man in these Times look'd upon to be very eloquent, learn'd and well skill'd in the Holy Scriptures ⁴. When they came to Salerno, the King heard them for several Days, and then conven'd all the Salernitan Clergy, and a good Number of his own People, with the Archbishop William, and the Abbots of the Monasteries, and took the Matter into Deliberation, and after canvassing it thoroughly, Roger fell on Means to prolong, and, according to Falcon of Benevento, spin out the Time of the Meeting, in order to amuse Innocent, and Duke Rainulphus by this Treaty, that in the mean Time he might make up the Losses he had sustain'd, and draw together a new Army. The Abbot of Bonavalle, and Cardinal Baronius relate the Fact otherwise than Falcon, who was a Contemporary Author. They say that Bernard and Pietro Pisano only treated about this Accommodation with Roger, and though Pietro was convinc'd by Bernard's Reasons, yet the King obstinately refus'd to agree with Innocent, insomuch that he oblig'd the Abbot of Claravalle to leave Salerno, and return to Rome. However that may be, Roger without coming to any Conclusion, departed, and imbarc'd in his Fleet for Sicily, in order to return into Puglia with a greater Army.

BUT while he was in Sicily, Anaclet very opportunely died in Rome the seventh Day of January this Year 1138, whose Death put an end to this Schism that had disturb'd the Church for eight Years. The Sons of Peter Leo, and the other Adherents of Anaclet, inform'd the King of the Death of their Pope, and ask'd his Advice whether it was proper to chuse a Successor. Roger, whose Business was to keep up the Faction, in order to suppress Innocent's Party, order'd a Successor to be immediately chosen; and accordingly Anaclet's Party join'd together, and elected Gregorio Romano Cardinal of the Holy Apostles, to whom they gave the Name of Victor IV. But such was the Diligence of the Abbot Bernard, that by his Persuasion, both Victor and the Cardinals that had elected him, submitted to Innocent; and Victor having stripp'd himself of the Papal Ornaments, laid them at his Feet, which put an end to the Schism: Whereupon the Romans were so well pleas'd with Bernard, that to do him Honour, they gave him the Name of Father of their Country; but he was so Self-denying, and had such an Aversion for the Honours of this World, that he left Rome, and return'd to his Monastery of Claravalle in France. *Petrus Diaconus*², who here ends his Addition to the Chronicle of Leo Ostiensis, relates the Story otherwise; he says, that Innocent brib'd the Sons of Peter Leo and their Adherents, and brought them over to his Party; so that the Cardinals that had elected Victor, destitute of all Assistance, out of cruel Necessity submitted to Innocent. Even taking this for granted, there are some who free him of the Crime of Simony, such as the Abbot de Nuce, by alledging some other the like Examples.

INNOCENT seeing the Affairs of Rome thus settled, and all Discord at an end, bent all his Thoughts on the War of Puglia against Roger; for which end he went to Albano, and assembled a great Army to join Duke Rainulphus: On the other hand the King having likewise assembled his Troops, pass'd over from Sicily to Puglia, in order to subject the rest of the Cities of that Province to his Dominion. Duke Rainulphus did not fail to oppose him, but in vain, so that the King was fully resolv'd to besiege Melphis, but it was so well defended, that he could not take it, but all the Castles in the Neighbourhood submitted to him, after which he return'd to Salerno, and from thence went anew to Sicily.

THIS same Year 1138, the Emperor Lothaire died in the Valle di Trento; a Prince, who besides his military Qualifications, and many Virtues, was a great Encourager of Learning and Justice, and deserves to be extoll'd above all others, for having in his Time restor'd the Splendor of the Roman Laws in Italy, and allow'd them to be taught in the publick Academies there. Which was the Cause that in process of Time they afterwards recover'd so much Authority, and became so resplendent, that they eclips'd all the Laws of other Nations, and deservedly have the first Rank in all Academies, and by them the most knowing Part of the World is guided. And above all other Princes he deserves immortal Praise from all Lovers of the Civil Law.

THESE arose terrible Disputes amongst the Electors of the Empire about the Election of a Successor. Conrade Duke of Suevia, Lothaire's Nephew, and Henry Duke of Bavaria, his Son-in-Law, set up for it; but at last Henry being excluded, Conrade was rais'd to that sublime Dignity, and was acknowledg'd as Emperor by the Dukes, Princes, Marquises, and all the Great Men of the Empire; for the Right of electing was not as yet confin'd to Seven only, as it was afterwards³.

ON the other hand Innocent, who had nothing so much at Heart, as to suppress Roger's Party, in the Beginning of the Year 1139 conven'd a Council in Rome, and excommunicated Roger, and all those who had been of Anaclet's Faction⁴. But not long after Innocent receiv'd a terrible Blow; for on the last Day of April the Count of Avellino and Duke of Puglia, who had harra's'd the King his Brother-in-Law with a cruel and continual War, was taken ill and died in Troja, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of that City, and much lamented by the Bishop William and the Citizens.

THE welcome News of the Count's Death coming to King Roger, he look'd upon the War as at an end ; so that having immediately assembled his Army, he cross'd over to *Salerno*¹, conven'd all the Barons that were in his Interest, and went to Benevento, from whence he march'd and took many Places belonging to the Count of Ariano, who fled to Troja, and thereafter he subjected all the Cities and Castles of the Capitanata. The King, as we have said, had several Sons by his first Wife Alberia, of which Roger was the Eldest, therefore he created him Duke of Puglia ; he striving to imitate the Bravery of his Father, who had gone to the Siege of Troja, subdu'd all the other Places of Puglia, both Inland and Maritime² ; only Bari, which was gallantly defended by the Prince Giaquinto, held out ; so that despairing to force it to surrender, he resolv'd to go and join his Father, who was encamp'd round the City of Troja. This City was defended by the Count of Ariano, who had gone thither with a good Body of Troops, and defended it so obstinately, that the King was oblig'd to raise the Siege, and join'd his Son, and march'd to Ariano, where he prepar'd many Machines in order to take it.

IN the mean time Pope Innocent hearing the sad News of the Death of Duke Rainulphus, and the prosperous Success of the King in Puglia, unwilling to leave these Places without Troops, conven'd his Army, and putting himself at the Head of it, left Rome, and march'd to St. Germano. Roger, by this Expedition of Innocent's, being diverted in the Midst of his good Fortune, endeavour'd, rather than to come to a Battle with him, to soften him by Proposals of Peace, for which end he sent Ambassadors, offering to be at his Devotion. The Ambassadors were courteously receiv'd by Innocent, who sent two Cardinals to Roger, inviting him to come to St. Germano in order to conclude a solid Peace. The King had then return'd to the Siege of Troja, and having receiv'd the Cardinals with much Respect, rais'd the Siege, and with the Duke his Son went immediately to St. Germano ; they continu'd to treat about this Affair for the Space of eight Days³ ; but Innocent being obstinately resolv'd to have the Principality of Capua restor'd to Prince Robert, to which the King by no means would consent, the Treaty was broke off, and the King left St. Germano. The Pope hearing of his Departure, march'd with his Army to Castello di Galluccio, and laid close Siege to it, which the King presently getting Notice of, return'd in all haste, and on a sudden arriv'd at St. Germano ; the Pope, and Prince Robert, who was with him, being catch'd napping, were so terrified, that without any Delay, they rais'd the Siege of Castello di Galluccio, in order to shelter themselves in some secure Place ; but the King immediately sent his Son the Duke of Puglia, with a thousand brave Soldiers, to lie in wait and attack the Pope on his March. Which Project succeeded so well, that the Pope's Army was defeated and put to flight, and Innocent himself, to his great Reproach and Shame, with his Chancellor Almerico, many Cardinals, and other Men of Note, were carried Prisoners to the King, only Robert Prince of Capua made his Escape ; the victorious Soldiers plunder'd the Pope's rich Baggage, and found a great Sum of Money.

IN this unlucky manner have all the Expeditions of the Popes against our Princes terminated, and such has always been the Fruits of their laying aside their own Character, and taking upon them that of Secular Princes, by marching at the Head of Armies, with a Helmet in the Place of the Tiara *, and a Cuirass instead of a Stole and Dalmatick.

* Triple Crown.

THIS remarkable Event fell out on the Twenty-first of July in the Year 1139⁴, as the most exact *Pellegrinus*⁵ well proves, contrary to what Baronius and D. Francisco Capecelatro have written, who, not understanding this Place in Falcon, writes that Innocent was made Prisoner on the tenth of this Month. Neither must we omit in this Place to say, with the same Capecelatro, who is the most exact Writer of the History of the Norman Kings, of all the Moderns, that those who write that Innocent's Defeat and Imprisonment happen'd in the Beginning of his Reign, and was the Cause of the Schism, are grossly mistaken ; for the Contemporary Authors, and those who shortly after have transmitted these Facts to Posterity, place them in this Year, and in the manner we have related, such as the Chronicle of Falcon, a most ancient Writer of Benevento; the Anonymous Cassinensis, the Histories of Archbishop Romualdo, and of Otho Frisingensis, and the many Letters written on this Subject by St. Bernard Abbot of Clarevalle; from the Authority of such grave and ancient Writers, Cardinal Baronius, the said Capetelatro, and the incomparable Critick in our Affairs Caullus Pellegrinus, place them in this Year.

BUT the Affection of the Normans for the Apostolick See, was as flagrant in this Imprisonment of Innocent, as in that of Leo; tho' Roger according to the Laws of War could have treated Innocent in the same manner as he could have done any other Secular Prince that was his Prisoner; yet being ignorant of the Distinction of two Persons in one Pope, he paid him all the Honours and Respect which are due to the Vicar of Jesus Christ; he sent Ambassadors to beg him Pardon, and intreat him to be reconcil'd with him. Innocent more overcome by this piece of Generosity and Greatness of Soul in Roger, than by his Arms, willingly consented to his Request; and four Days after¹, on the Feast of St. James, the Peace was concluded in Benevento. The Pope for his Part, absolv'd Roger and all his Adherents from the Excommunications he had thunder'd out against them; upon which the King with his Son Roger went and threw themselves at his Feet, and acknowledg'd him lawful Pope, and swore Fealty upon the Evangelists, both to him and all the Popes his Successors, lawfully elected, and became their Vassals, by promising to pay the usual Quit-Rent of 600 Schifati yearly, and to restore Benevento. On the other hand the Pope deliver'd him the Standard, as the Custom was then, invested him with the Kingdom of Sicily, the Dukedom of Puglia, and the Principality of Capua, and acknowledg'd him King, and confirm'd him in all those Honours and Dignities belonging to a King.

THIS Investiture was transcrib'd from the Registers of the Library of St. Peter in Rome by Cardinal Baronius, and is inserted in his Annals; in which there are many Things worthy of Observation. First Innocent says, that he, following the Footsteps of his Predecessors, and having before his Eyes the Merits of Robert Guiscard, and Roger his Father, who with so much Toil and Labour had extirpated the Saracens, implacable Enemies of the Christian Name, out of Sicily, reckon'd them worthy of immortal Glory; therefore he confirm'd to Roger the Kingdom of Sicily, with which his Predecessor Honorius had invested him, with the Prerogative of King, and all other Honours and Royal Dignities; and subjoins the Reason why Roger, the Possessor of that Island, ought to be advanc'd to the Title of King, and Sicily made a Kingdom, because that Island formerly had the Prerogatives of a Kingdom, and its own Kings to govern it, according to the Abbot of Telese; these are the Pope's Words, Regnum Siciliae quod utique, prout in antiquis refertur historiis, Regnum fuisse, non dubium est, tibi ab eodem Antecessore nostro concessum cum integritate honoris Regii, & dignitate Regibus pertinente, Excellentiae tuae concedimus, & Apostolica auctoritate firmamus; by which we may see, that the Popes, among their other Prerogatives, look'd upon that of erecting or re-establishing Kingdoms and Kings, to be one, and especially Sicily, with which Roger's Predecessors had been invested by the Apostolick See.

INNOCENT confirm'd the Investiture of the Dukedom of Puglia, which had been given Roger by his Predecessor Honorius; and that of the Principality of Capua, tho' Prince Robert was still alive, who was divested of it; and tho' formerly this Pope had so vigorously endeavour'd to have it restor'd to him, yet now he gives the Investiture of it to Roger, adding: Et insuper Principatum Capuanum integre nihilominus nostri favoris robore communimus, tibi que concedimus: Ut ad amorem, atque obsequium B. Petri Apostolorum Principis, & nostrum ac successorum nostrorum vehementer adstringaris; and thus he pretended to justify Roger's Title to this Principality, acquir'd only jure Belli; and for no other end, but that Roger and his Successors might be the more Subservient and Obsequious to the Apostolick See, just so as Gregory VII. declar'd in his Investiture.

S E C T. I.

The Dukedom of Naples, Bari, Brindisi, and all the other Cities of the Kingdom submit to Roger.

IT is well worth our Observation, that in this Investiture there is no mention made of the Principality of Salerno; for the Popes, tho' 'tis not known by Virtue of what Title, have always pretended that this Principality belong'd to the Apostolick Sec, as well as that of Benevento. Neither is the Dukedom of Naples mention'd in it; so that they were much mistaken, who wrote that Innocent likewise invested Roger with Naples: We cannot but wonder when we read in the History of Naples at last publish'd by P. Giannetasio ¹, that from this Time, Naples, from being a free Republick, became subject to the Dominion of Roger; and the Author, as it were, lamenting the Fate of his Country, by the Concern he shews for its having lost its Liberty, accuses Innocent for allowing of it, seeing that City belong'd to the Empire of the East; as if, supposing the Fact true, it had been a new Thing for the Popes to give Investiture of Dominions that did not belong to them; and this appear'd to be a Novelty to him, tho' he was not surpriz'd to see the Popes give the Investiture of Puglia and Calabria to the Normans, which Provinces they had taken from the Greeks, and to which they had no better Title than to the Dukedom of Naples. This Dukedom was acquir'd by the Normans, not by the Investiture given them by the Popes, but by the Right of Conquest, and the Submission of the Neapolitans, as shall be related by-and-by. Only in Anaclet's Bull, after the Investiture of the Principality of Capua, there is added, Honorem quoque Neapolis, ejusque pertinentiarum; which meant nothing but the Honour of Dukes of Naples, by leaving the City in its former State and Polity; and 'tis Petrus Diaconus ² alone, who writes, that Anaclet, besides the Principality of Capua, invested Roger with the Dukedom of Naples; but after Roger had made Peace with Innocent, he no longer minded what Anaclet had done; so that he pretended no other Right to the Dukedom of Naples but that of Conquest, and the Submission of the People, in the same manner as he did to Amalphis, Gaeta, the Principalities of Taranto and Salerno.

BUT let us return to where we left off: Roger, after having made this Peace, freely left the City of Benevento to the Pope; but while he was in that City, the Neapolitans, terrified at Roger's Success, came and subjected their City to his Dominion, as their Duke Sergius had formerly done. This Duke, if we may give credit to Alexander Abbot of Telesse, had subjected the City of Naples to Roger many Years before; but afterwards repenting of what he had done, join'd with Prince Robert and Count Rainulphus, Roger's Enemies, and carried on a long War with him; afterwards he sided with Roger, and while he was fighting under his Banner, in the Battle which Roger lost near Salerno, he, together with many Barons belonging to Rainulphus, was kill'd.

THIS Year 1139, the Neapolitans having experienc'd Roger's Valour, subjected themselves intirely to his Dominion; and by the Death of Sergius, being left without a Duke, with the King's Consent they elected his Son Roger ³. Inveges proves Roger to have been elected Duke, and not Anfusius; Pellegrinus will have it to be Anfusius. However that may be, altho' this Dukedom was subjected to Roger, nevertheless he would not allow of any Alteration in the Form of its Government and Polity; the same Magistrates, and the same Laws were continu'd, and he confirm'd all those Prerogatives and Privileges which it enjoy'd when, under the last Dukes, it intirely renounc'd all Allegiance to the Empire of the East, and took the Form of a Republick; therefore we observe, that even after Roger, to the Year 1190, according to Capaccio ⁴, or whoever may be the Author of the Latin History of Naples, there have been other Dukes, such as Sergius, and a certain Aliernus, in whose Time, that Privilege related by Marinus Freccia, and which is likewise mention'd in the said Latin History, was granted to the Merchants of Amalphis who liv'd in Naples. However Roger did not leave Naples at full Liberty, like a free and independent State, as some have believ'd. They founded their Belief on what Falcon of Benevento relates, to wit, that Roger, after having taken Troja and Bari, the Year following 1140, return'd to Naples, where he was receiv'd with Acclamations, and with so great Pomp and Solemnity by the Neapolitans, that never any King nor Emperor had ever been treated there with so much Honour; that the next Day he rode through the City, and afterwards went in a Boat to Castel di S. Salvatore, situated in a little Island in the Sea, close by Naples, which is now call'd Castel dell' Uovo, on account of its Shape; and while he was there, he sent for the Citizens of Naples, with whom De libertate Civitatis, & utilitate tractavit, which are Falcon's Words; by which being deceiv'd, they believ'd that the Neapolitans treated there with Roger about the Freedom of their City; whereas the King, as the most accurate Pellegrinus demonstrates¹, treated of nothing else but the Immunities and Franchises which the Neapolitans pretended to, and which Roger presently granted them; and Capaccio might have shunn'd this Error by the very Privilege which he quotes, where the Neapolitans granting Liberty to the Merchants of the Dukedom of Amalphis, who liv'd in Naples, meant nothing by Liberty, but a certain Sort of Franchise and Immunity, such as these Words import: Ut sicut ista Civitas Neapolis Privilegio libertatis præfulget, ita & vos Negotiatores, Campsores, sive Apothecarii in perpetuum gaudeatis; but what Liberty does the Privilege mean? ut nulla conditio, de personis, vel rebus vestris, sive hæredum, & successorum vestrorum negotiatorum in Neapoli habitantium requiratur; sicut non requiritur de Civibus Neapolitanis.

THEREFORE Roger did not leave the Dukedom of Naples altogether free and independent; tho' he continu'd the same Laws and Magistrates, and the same Form of a Republick, which imported nothing else but the Community, and not the chief Power, as was observ'd in the first Book of this History, exactly in the same manner that Theodorick left it, when he ordain'd that it should enjoy the very same Privileges it had; by which 'tis clear, that Roger left to the Nobility and People, who were design'd by the Title of Ordines, Electi, or Decuriones, the Jurisdiction with regard to the Annona; but as for the Administration of Justice, the King imitated Theodorick in sending Comites to take Charge thereof, as was done in all the other Cities and Castles of the Kingdom.

HOWEVER Roger did not use any other City of his Kingdom so mildly and favourable as he did Naples; for besides leaving their Privileges intire, he gave to each Cavalier five Moggia * of Land, with five Husbandmen; he likewise promis'd them greater Rewards, if they continu'd faithful according to the Oath they had sworn to him, and kept the City in Peace and Tranquility under his Government². 'Tis surprizing to find that *Fazzellus*³, not content with having confounded the Things, Times, and Persons concerning these Facts, likewise adds out of his own Brain, that after this Peace had been concluded betwixt Innocent and Roger, he, Roger, made his Entry into Naples with great Acclamations, and that Day created a hundred and fifty Knights, and continu'd there for two Months feasting and diverting himself, not only contrary to all History, but also to what Falcon of Benevento hath related concerning these Facts.

ROGER likewise shew'd his Affection for the Neapolitans in another particular; for in order to know the Largeness of the City, he caus'd the Circumference of the Walls to be measur'd in the Night-time, which he found to be 2363 Paces; and the Day following he assembled the Inhabitants, and in a kind manner ask'd them, If they knew what was the Circumference of their Walls? and they answering No, the King told them: At which they were both surpriz'd and convinc'd of his Affection⁴.

SUCH is the Vicissitude of worldly Things, that this City, which, with respect to other Cities of these Provinces in Roger's Time, was of so small Compass, at this Day surpasses all the rest, and is not only become the Metropolis and Head of so large a Kingdom, but is one of the most famous and remarkable Cities in the World.

BUT before Roger made his second Entry into Naples, amidst so much Acclamation and Rejoycing, he had recover'd all the Province of Capitanata to his Dominion ; he had taken Troja the Head of it, into which City he never would enter, though William the Bishop, and the Citizens by their Messengers, had begg'd of him to come ; but he answer'd, that whilst the Traitor Rainulphus continu'd amongst them, he would not see them : The Trojans, afraid of the King's Displeasure, immediately caus'd the Sepulchre of Rainulphus to be open'd, his Body taken out, and dragg'd through the Streets of the City with a Rope about his Neck, and afterwards thrown into a dirty Puddle ; this sad Catastrophe coming to the Knowledge of his Son the Duke of Puglia and Naples, he went in quest of his Father's Corps, and manag'd Matters so, that Rainulphus was again buried¹.

AFTER this Expedition he had likewise taken Bari, and put Prince Giaquinto to death ; and returning afterwards to Salerno, had possess'd himself of the Estates of all those who had been his Enemies, and banish'd them out of his Dominions ; he sent Roger Count of Ariano, with his Wife, Prisoners to Sicily. He intirely drove out Tancred Count of Conversano, took Brindisi, and all his other Towns, so that he was forc'd to fly to Jrusalem. And thus with so sudden and surprizing good Fortune, having recover'd all these Provinces to his Dominion, he went over to Sicily, from whence he sent Judges and Governors to each Province, that the subjected People might enjoy a settled Peace, and besides he establish'd new Laws for the Good of the Realm, of which Laws we shall shortly discourse. And in the beginning of the Year 1140, having assembled a new Army, he sent it under the Command of his Son Prince Anfusus, to subject that Part of Abruzzo situated on the other side of the River Pescara, which belong'd to the Principality of Capua ; where the Prince on his arrival, took many Places, and destroy'd all that made Resistance. Into which Province the King soon after likewise sent Duke Roger with a good Body of Troops, who having join'd his Brother, they intirely subjected all those Parts to the very Borders of the State of the Church, and assur'd the Pope, who was in Pain, that they had no Design to disturb his Dominions in the least. In the mean time the King with his Army had return'd to Salerno, and from thence to Capua, and, in order to make the Pope easy, he recall'd his Sons, and afterwards march'd to Ariano, where he call'd an Assembly, which was the first that this King held in Puglia, where the two States, viz. the Barons, and Bishops and Prelates met, for putting the Affairs of that Province in a better Condition. Thereafter he caus'd new Silver Money mix'd with a great deal of Copper, to be coin'd, which was call'd Ducats ; and another lesser, call'd Follare, altogether of Copper, which he order'd to pass for the third Part of a Romasino, which was worth Twelve Grains and a Half of the common Copper-money, current at this Time ; and Eight Romasini made one Ducat of his Coin, and under severe Penalty he forbad the Currency of the antient Money in his Dominions, though much better than his own, to the great Detriment of his Subjects, and of all Italy. Afterwards he march'd to Naples, where he treated the Neapolitans with that Generosity and Kindness, we have lately mention'd ; and from thence he return'd to Salerno, and imbarc'd in his Fleet, and directed his Course for Palermo, leaving the Government of Puglia to Duke Roger, and that of Capua to Prince Anfusus, according to Falcon of Benevento, who here puts an End to his History, as Alexander Abbot of Telese had done a little before.

THUS Roger, after having by his Valour and Conduct overcome so many, and such powerful Enemies, firmly united all these Provinces under the Dominion of one single Person. They were now in no Danger of being any more attack'd by foreign Enemies, or disturb'd by intestine Commotions, for by his Valour he settled a most firm and lasting Peace ; so that the Wars being at an End, he had Leisure to establish his Kingdom in a better Form, and to provide it with new Laws, and wholesom Regulations, that it might vie with all the other Kingdoms in the West.

C H A P. IV.

The Kingdom is establish'd, and modell'd with new Laws and Officers.

THUS was the Kingdom establish'd, and these Provinces, to wit, the Dukedoms of Puglia and Calabria, the Principalities of Taranto, Capua and Salerno; the Dukedoms of Bari, Naples, Sorrento, Amalphis and Gaeta, the two Abruzzi, and in fine, all the Countries on this Side of the Tyber to the Sicilian Streights, formerly divided into many Dynasties, and subject to several Princes, are now united in one large and noble Monarchy, under the Dominion of one single Person.

BUT the Sicilians on good Grounds pretend, that as yet these our Provinces were not united in the Form of a Kingdom by it self, and independent of their Kingdom of Sicily. They affirm, that they still depended on Sicily, and particularly on Palermo the Metropolis, where the Royal Palace was, and the chief Officers of the Crown, who had the Government of these Provinces resided.

AND truly, if the first Rise of this Kingdom, and Anaclet's Bull, which was the first Foundation of it, be consider'd, 'tis clear, that one only Kingdom was establish'd, which comprehended Sicily, as the Head, and Calabria, Puglia and the other Provinces on this side of the Phare, as Members; these are the Words of the Bull; Et Siciliam Caput Regni constituimus. Whence we likewise see, that Roger's first Titles were King of Sicily, of the Dukedom of Puglia, and Principality of Capua; as if all had been but one Kingdom, comprehending both that Island, and the other Provinces on this Side of the Phare. This is evident from the Constitutions of Frederick II. compil'd by Pietro delle Vigne, where he not only means the Island, but all the other Provinces on this side of the Phare; and yet more evident from the Constitution *Occupatis*¹, where Frederick assigning to each City of the Kingdom of Sicily, one single Lord Chief Justice, and one Judge, he excepts three Cities only, to wit, Naples, Capua and Messina, to each of which, by reason of their Bigness, he sent more, and calls Naples and Capua, Cities of the Kingdom of Sicily. And Andrea da Barletta, who was Contemporary with Frederick II. says, that by ancient Custom, in Regno isto Siciliae, the Laws of the Longobards, derogated from those of the Romans, and calls the Kingdom of Sicily, what is now the Kingdom of Naples, which cannot be understood to be the Island of Sicily, where the Longobards never had footing, and where their Laws were never observ'd. Whence we are convinc'd, that the Popes did not introduce a Novelty, by taking the Kingdom of Sicily not only for that Island, but for all the other Provinces on this Side of the Phare, of which it was compos'd; but what explains best how much this Kingdom of Sicily comprehended, are the Investitures given afterwards to the Princes of Anjou in these Words, Regnum Siciliae citra, & ultra Pbarum; and the first who made use of this Formula, was Clement IV. who in the Year 1265, investing Charles of Anjou with the Kingdom of Naples and Sicily, call'd it Regnum Siciliae citra, & ultra Pbarum, and he was the first Pope, who, for the greater clearness, made use of this Distinction, not but that before him, both the one and the other Realm were understood by Regnum Siciliae; whence *Fazzellus*¹, *Arniseus*², and others, unjustly make the Popes Authors of this Formula, as if, contrary to the antient Description of Italy, and all the old Historians, and Geographers, of which Fazzellus gives us a long Catalogue, who by Sicily understood the Island only, they had resolv'd to transfer this Title to the other Provinces on this Side of the Phare likewise.

THE same Stile was us'd by the subsequent Popes: and Gregory XI. not content with that, in the Year 1363, having made Peace betwixt Joan Queen of Naples, and Frederick III. King of Sicily, in his Diploma, calls Naples the Kingdom of Sicily, and Sicily Trinacria. And Martin King of Sicily, likewise in his Diploma, calls the Kingdom of Naples, Siciliam citra Pharum, and Sicily, Siciliam ultra Pharum; and at last these two Kingdoms being united in the Person of Alphonfus I. he was the first, who made use of the Title of Rex utriusque Siciliae; which Title his Successors, who possess'd both these Kingdoms, retain'd.

THE Sicilians, who pretend that these Provinces under Roger, were dependent on the Kingdom of Sicily, make use of this Argument, that when Roger made Palermo his Royal Seat, all the chief Officers of the Crown, on whom the lesser ones, both of the Island and these our Provinces depended, likewise resided there. And 'tis matter of Fact, that after this glorious Prince, in Imitation of France, from which he had his Origine, introduc'd into his own Kingdom the High Constables, High Chancellors, Lords Chief Justices, High Admirals, Lords High Chamberlains, Great Protonotaries, and Lords High Stewards: These Supreme Officers of the Crown attended his Royal Person in Palermo, and particular Justices, Chamberlains, Constables and Chancellors were sent into these our Provinces, and each of them govern'd a Province³, and were all subordinate to those Seven who remain'd at Court, and therefore were first call'd Masters Justices⁴, or Masters Chancellors, and afterwards High Justices, High Admirals, and High Chancellors; and therefore in *Sicilia Sacra*⁵, we find a Writ dated in the Year 1142, likewise recorded by *Camillo Tutini*⁶, wherein the famous George of Antioch, Roger's High Admiral, calls himself Georgius Admiratorum Admiratus; and the so much renown'd Majone di Bari, King William's High Admiral, in a Letter of this King's to Pope Adrian IV. is call'd Majo Magnus Admiratus Admiratorum; and he himself in his Writings sign'd *Majo Magnus Admiratus Admiratorum*⁷, as we shall relate more fully, when we come to treat of these Officers.

BUT the Arguments on the other Side, which prove that these Provinces remain'd a distinct Kingdom, and independent of that of Sicily under Roger, are no less strong and convincing. As soon as Roger had made Peace with Innocent, he little regarded what Anaclet had done by his Bull; 'tis certain that the Dukedom of Puglia, under which Name, in the Time of the Normans, all Italy on this Side of the Tyber was comprehended, and the County of Sicily, were both erected into Kingdoms, the one independant upon the other; and as by the Writers of this Twelfth and subsequent Centuries, the one was call'd the Kingdom of Puglia, or of Italy, so the other was call'd the Kingdom of Sicily; and their Kings took the Title of Puglia, or Italy, as well as that of Sicily. And the Royal Seat in these Provinces, in those Times, was in Salerno; and likewise the City of Bari was once reckon'd the Metropolis, Regiam Sedem, & totius Regionis Principem, as Marinus Freccia terms it⁸. Whence came the Fable, that the Kings of Puglia were wont to be crown'd in Bari with the Iron Crown, so that Bergeus in his Siriade of Bari, says⁹;

————— Primi unde insignia Regni
Sceptraque, purpureosque habitus, Sacramque Tiaram, Sumere tum Reges, Siculique, Italique solebant.

WHAT is allowable in a Poet, who, perhaps, meant the ancient Tarantine Kings, or a feign'd Story, is not pardonable in Historians', who tell us, that the Norman and Suevian Kings of Puglia were crown'd in Bari with a Crown of Iron: That the Emperor Henry and Constantia his Wife, and Manfred likewise were crown'd there. Which are all fabulous Stories; for, as shall be shewn in the Course of this History, and which *Inveges*² proves, these Princes were crown'd in Palermo, and not in Bari. And *Marinus Freccia*³ (whom Beatillus ought to believe, and not differ from him without Reason) says, that not having read in any Writer, that the Kings of Puglia had been crown'd in Bari, in the Year 1551 he went to that City, and inquir'd concerning this Coronation at the People of Bari, who were surpriz'd at the Question, as a new Thing, they never having had any Tradition that ever such a Solemnity had been perform'd in former Ages in their City.

BUT tho' those Kings were not crown'd in Bari the Metropolis of Puglia, nor in Salerno the Royal Seat of the Normans, but in Palermo, yet they valu'd themselves as much upon the Title of Kings of Puglia or Italy, as upon that of Sicily. Amongst the Monuments of our Antiquity, we have as yet many Charters, in which King Roger, and William his Son, are so intitled. In the third Tome of Sicilia Sacra, there is one in which Roger takes this Title: Rogerus Rex Apuliæ, &c. And in others related by Ugbellus we read the same; and *Augustinus Inveges*⁴, who look'd upon these Provinces as Members of the Kingdom of Sicily, by the many Charters which he himself relates, wherein the like Titles are found, might have given up the Question; and in the Archives of the Monastery of the Trinity of the Cave, we have seen a Diploma of King Roger's dated in the Year 1130, the first Year of his Reign, which has the golden Seal appended to it, wherein Roger thus intitles himself: Rogerus Dei Gratia Siciliae, Apuliæ, & Calabriae Rex, Adjutor Christianorum, & Clypeus: Filius, & hæres Rogerii magni Comitis; whence, in the Decretals of the Popes⁵ our Kings were call'd Kings of Puglia.

BUT a Diploma related by Falcon of Benevento deserves more Consideration, wherein this Title is given to Roger; Rogerus Dei Gratia Siciliae & Italiae Rex, Christianorum Adjutor & Clypeus. Here, in order to avoid the Mistakes into which many have fallen, 'tis worthy of Observation, that Puglia, which was always understood to be that Part of Italy on this Side of Rome, which is wash'd by the Adriatick Sea, and which in the Description of Italy comprehended only the tenth Province of it, was afterwards, according to the usual Vanity of the Greeks, by them call'd Italy absolutely; for they being formerly possessed of all Italy, and having afterwards very near lost all the other Provinces of it, except Puglia, they gave it the Name of Italy, that at least by retaining the Name, they might have the Vain-glory to call themselves Masters of Italy. Thus we have seen, when they had lost the ancient Calabria, and possess'd only Abruzzo, and a part of Lucania, that they might not diminish their Titles, they continu'd still to appoint Governors of Calabria, and sent them to reside in Reggio, where they govern'd Abruzzo, and that Part of Lucania which was left them, and call'd those Countries Calabria, which Name they retain to this Day. For this reason Lupus Protospata calls Argirus Prince and Duke of Italy, surely not meaning Italy according to its largest Extent, surrounded by both the Seas and the Alps, but only Puglia, of which Bari was then the Head. The same Writer likewise in the Year 1033, calls *Constantinus Protospata, Catapanus Italiae*⁶.

THIS is further prov'd by a Greek Diploma, which in the Year 1253, in the Time of the Emperor Courade, King of Sicily, was translated into Latin, and may be seen in Ugbellus, in which (these Provinces not being as yet erected into a Kingdom, when this Instrument was drawn up) Count Roger is thus intitled: — Hoc est Sigillum factum a Rogerio Duce Italiae, Calabriae, & Siciliae; where we clearly see, that by Italy the Greeks meant only Puglia. And in the Life of St. Nilus, which was translated from the Greek into Latin by Cariophilus, we read, that Nicephorus regebat utramque Provinciam, Italianam, & Calabriam nostram, meaning nothing else by Italy, but only Puglia, which was then possess'd by the Greeks; and in like manner Charles of Anjou, by the Greek Writers, and particularly Nicephorus Gregora, is always call'd Rex Italiae, but by the Latins Rex Apuliæ. Yet this Greek Idiotism of calling Puglia, Italy, was not only us'd by the Writers of that Nation, but likewise by our Latin Authors, as may be seen in Falcon of Benevento, who, speaking of the taking of the Castle of Bari by the Emperor Lothaire, says, De tali tantaque Victoria tota Italia & Calabria, Siciliaque intonuit ¹.

THUS while Puglia was in the Possession of the Greeks, it got the Name of Italy, by which was only meant that single Province; but afterwards, when Puglia, under the Normans, eclips'd all the other neighbouring Provinces, they all came under its Denomination. The Reason was, because the Normans first conquer'd Puglia, and made the Name of it resound through all the West; so that the Names of the other Provinces being in a manner forgot, especially by Foreigners, the Name of Puglia came to denote all Italy on this Side of the Tyber, and all those Provinces which now make up the Kingdom of Naples; as the Eastern People of Asia, because of the glorious Actions of the French there, call all the Western People Franks, which Glory is not new to that Nation; for in the Time of Otho Frisingensis, by reason of the frequent Expeditions to the Holy Land, where the French made themselves most famous, we read in this Author, that the Eastern People, and especially the Greeks, call'd all the People of the West Franks ². Therefore Roger's taking the Title of Rex Apuliæ, ought not to be understood of Puglia taken in a strict Sense, but of all that now makes up our Kingdom, in which Sense many Writers take it, as may be seen in Petrus Bibliothecarius in the Life of Paschal, and in many others ³. This is the Reason why our Writers call it the Kingdom of Puglia, before the Popes gave it the Name of Sicily on this Side of the Phare, or that in latter Times it got that of Naples.

THEREFORE, as the Greeks had given the Name of Italy to Puglia, which then comprehended only one Province, it was more reasonable to give that Title to all the other Provinces on this Side of the Tyber, which now went under the Name of Puglia; and it was a more plausible Thing for Roger to call himself King of Italy, than of Puglia, both because it was a more lofty and specious Title with which the Kings of the Goths and Longobards had been adorn'd; and because there is no Instance of any King of Puglia, without going back to the most ancient Kings of the Dauni, Lucani, and Taranto, of whom Freccia treats at large, but to very little Purpose. Roger therefore thought fit to take the Title not only of King of Sicily, but likewise of Italy, meaning by Italy only, that Part of it on this Side of the Tyber; and the Authors of these Times meant the same, exactly in the same manner, as when by the Provinces of Italy these only were denoted, which were under the Government of the Prefect of Italy, and not those which were under the Prefect of the City of Rome, altho' they were comprehended in the Description of Italy taken in its largest Extent.

BY which 'tis evident, that by Roger's taking not only the Title of King of Sicily, but likewise that of Italy or Puglia, two Kingdoms were establish'd independent of one another, and not one only, and these our Provinces were not reckon'd a Part of the Kingdom of Sicily.

THIS is likewise evident from their peculiar Laws; for these our Provinces, even after they were erected into a Kingdom, own'd no other Laws but the Longobard, which Laws were of no Authority nor Use in Sicily, which had never been in the Possession of the Longobards, because that Nation never had any Naval Forces, so that their Power never reach'd beyond the Phare. Thus each Kingdom had its peculiar Laws, according to which it was govern'd, independent of the other; and each of these Provinces had its Lord Chief Justice, with his Tribunals; nor were the Causes which were decided therein, carried by Appeals to Palermo, as to a Tribunal superior to all others, but were determin'd there as the last resort, as we shall shortly relate in a particular Manner, when we come to treat of the Officers of the Crown.

AND if we do not find amongst our ancient Records, that Roger, or any of his Norman Successors, were wont to send any Viceroy to the Kingdom of Puglia, to take the Government of all the Realm, as was practis'd afterwards in later Times by the Princes of other Nations; no other Reason can be given for it, but that Roger, and the two Williams his Successors were wont to come often and reside in Salerno, and likewise, because their Custom was to create their Sons either Dukes of Puglia, or Princes of Capua or Taranto, and to intrust them with the Government of these Dukedoms or Principalities, in the same manner as Roger did, who having retir'd to Palermo, left the Government of these Provinces to his two Sons, Roger Duke of Puglia, and Anfusus Prince of Capua.

AND as 'tis true, that the Kingdom of Puglia was independent of that of Sicily, and had its particular Laws and Magistrates, so likewise it cannot be denied, that the Laws which Roger made at this Time, and the supreme Officers of the Crown, which he introduc'd after the manner of France, were common to both; and 'tis evident, that the Officers of the Crown were appointed as well for the one as the other Kingdom; which was observ'd until the Island of Sicily revolted from the Kings of the Family of Anjou, and submitted to the Kings of Arragon, as we shall see in the Course of this History.

CHAP. V.

Of the Laws of Roger I. King of Sicily.

ROGER, by his surprizing good Fortune, having in this manner become so great and powerful a King, overcome his Enemies, and reduc'd the rebellious Provinces under his Obedience, resolv'd, by the Means of many useful and provident Laws, to bring them into a State of Tranquillity, in which, by reason of so many and continual Wars, they had not been for a very long Time.

THESE Provinces, as has been often said, had been govern'd by the ancient Roman Laws, now in a manner abolish'd, and rather preserv'd by Tradition, as old Customs, than as written Laws. The Longobard were the prevailing Laws, which continu'd amongst the Normans in full Force, and were religiously observ'd; and tho' the Pandects had been found in Amalphis, and were begun to be read in some Academies of Italy, and particularly in Bologna, by the Industry of Irnerius, and Justinian's Code and Novellæ were pretty well known; nevertheless Roger would not suffer these Books to be of any Authority in his Dominions; but the Longobard Laws were in full Force, and they alone prevail'd in the Courts of Justice, and by them all Causes were decided; of which we have a flagrant Instance, for at this very Time, in the Year 1149, there having arisen a Suit at Law, betwixt the Monastery of S. Michael the Archangel ad Formam, near Capua, and Pietro Girardi of Madaloni, the Monks of that Monastery pretending, that the said Pietro had taken Possession of some Lands within their Bounds, and which, they said, belong'd to the Monastery; the Cause was first tried by Richard and Leo Judges of Madaloni, and was afterwards decided by them and the Judges of Capua, as Ebolo the King's Chamberlain had appointed; and after having view'd the contraverted Lands, produc'd the Writings, and examin'd some Witnesses, the Sentence was pronounc'd in Favour of the Monastery. The Process was carried on and decided according to the Longobard Laws, and the Instrument of that Decree drawn up ad futuram rei memoriam, after the Custom of that Time, may be read in Pellegrinus, in his History of the Longobard Princes^{*}.

BUT this prudent Prince now perceiving that his Kingdom, by reason of the many Disturbances and Revolutions that had happen'd, stood in need of new Laws for repairing the many Disorders which so many and continual Wars had occasion'd; resolv'd to establish them; and tho' before his Time Robert Guiscard, and Count Roger his Grandfather, had introduc'd some commendable Customs, of which we have no other Record left us, but what we read in *Hugo Falcandus*¹; yet he was the first, who, in imitation of Rotaris King of the Longobards, establish'd Laws, which he publish'd by an Edict in the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, that those Laws might be observ'd as well in the one as the other, and be common to both Kingdoms. These are the first Laws of the Kingdom that were commonly call'd Constitutions; and these, together with those of Frederick II. his Grandchild, and of the other Kings his Predecessors, were collected into one Volume by Pietro delle Vigne, as shall be seen at large when we come to treat of this Collection. Roger took the same Method to establish them as the Longobard Kings had done; to wit, in the publick Assemblies of the States of Barons, Officers, Bishops, and other Prelates. *Augustinus Inveges*² is of Opinion, that Roger, when in the Year 1140, before he went a second Time to Naples, having stopp'd at Ariano, held the first Assembly of Barons, Bishops, and other Ecclesiastical Prelates there, and made those Constitutions which we have amongst those of Frederick II. which were common to all his Dominions, contrary to the Opinion of *Ramondetta*³, who, through Mistake, thought that they were not made for the Island of Sicily. And Falcon of *Benevento*⁴ relates, that in this Assembly he likewise publish'd an Edict, by which he forbid the Currency of a certain Roman Money call'd Romasina; in place of which he caus'd another new Money to be coin'd, and to which, as is said, he gave the Name of Ducato, and one of them was worth eight Romasinas, and had more Copper than Silver in it; he likewise caus'd the Follari to be coin'd, so that not only the Tarini of Amalphis, but these new Pieces were current in the Kingdom.

OF the Laws of this Prince, we have only Thirty-nine scatter'd up and down in the Volume of Constitutions, compil'd by Pietro delle Vigne, by the Command of Frederick II. and the first is that which we find in the first Book, under the fourth Title De Sacrilegio Regum. By which it was reckon'd Sacrilege to censure the Actions, Councils, and Deliberations of the King; which Roger, retaining almost the same Words, took from the Law of the Code under the Title De Crimine Sacrilegii, wherein the Emperors Gratianus, Valens, and Theodosius establish'd the same; Roger instead of the Name of Emperor, put only that of King. Where 'tis worthy of Observation, that the Laws of Justinian's Code were of no Force or Authority in the Dominions of Roger in his Time; but he would have the Laws which he took out of that Code, to be observ'd as his own, and not as the Laws of a foreign Prince, in the same manner as the Gothish Kings of Spain, altho' they had taken many Laws from Justinian's Code; yet they would have their own Code, and not that of Justinian to be of Authority in their Dominions.

WE have that other Law of this Prince under the following Title De arbitrio Regis, wherein he order'd the Judges at their Pleasure to moderate those Laws which punish'd sacrilegious Persons so severely, provided that they had not pull'd down Churches, or violently broke them open, or in the Night-time had stole the sacred Vessels, and other Ornaments of the Churches, in which Cases capital Punishment was to be inflicted.

SUMMONTES will have it, that the third Law of Roger was the following, under the Title De Usurariis, and so likewise will his Translator; but 'tis a manifest Mistake, for it's not Roger's, but William II's. his Nephew; for it's ordain'd by this Law, that Processes concerning Usury brought before his Courts of Justice, should be decided according to the last Decree publish'd by the Pope in the Court of Rome, which cannot be understood but of the Decree made by Pope Alexander III. in the Lateran Council, which was held in the Time of William II. and not of Roger, as shall be more fully explain'd, when we come to treat of the Laws of that Prince; whence in the correct Editions, this Constitution begins with Gulielmus, and not Rogerius.

THE Third is that which we read under the Title De raptu, & violentia monialibus illata, by which the Ravishers of Virgins consecrated to God, tho' not veil'd, even under Promise of Marriage, were to be punish'd capitally: This was likewise taken from Justinian's Code ¹, where that Emperor establish'd the same.

WE read two other Laws under the Title De Officialibus Reip.; by the first it was ordain'd, that Officers, who, during the Time of their Administration, should imbezzle the Publick Money, were to be punish'd capitally. By the Second it was ordain'd, that Officers, who by their Negligence should occasion the Loss or Diminution of the Publick Treasure, were to be imprison'd, and oblig'd to make up the Damage out of their own Estates, the King, out of his Royal Goodness, remitting what other Punishment they deserv'd.

WE have the Sixth under the Title De Officio Magistrorum, Camerariorum, & Bajulorum, whereby the Justices, Chamberlains, Castellans, and Bailiffs, are order'd to be careful in assisting the Officers of the Customs, and Receivers of the Publick Revenues, and to give them their Advice, and be aiding to them as often as they shall be requir'd; which in the same Words was renew'd by William under the Title De Officio Secreti.

THE Seventh is plac'd under the Title De Restitutione Mulierum, in the second Book; for that which we read in the first Book, under the Title De Advocatis Ordinandis, tho' it bears the Name of Roger, nevertheless it's Frederick II's, as is clear by the Style and the Matters it treats of; whence in some correct Editions, we read not Rex Rogerius, but Idem, denoting Frederick Author of the preceding Law. By this Law Roger orders his Officers, upon urgent and proper Occasions to relieve Women in great Distress; which being very general and obscure, Frederick II. explain'd the Cases in which they were to assist Women, so that this Emperor publish'd another Constitution, which we read under the Title De integrum restitutione Mulierum: In the second Book, he says, Obscuritatem legis Divi Regis Rogerii Avī nostri de restituendis Mulieribus editam declarantes, &c.

THE Eighth and Ninth plac'd under the Title De Pœna Judicis, qui male judicavit: In the former he condemns the Judges to be branded with a Mark of Infamy, and their Goods to be confiscated, and to lose their Office, if they shall judge wrongfully and deceitfully against the Laws; and if ignorantly, the Punishment is left at the King's Pleasure. In the latter, if for Money they shall condemn any Person to Death, they are to be punish'd capitally.

THE Tenth, which we have under the first Title De Juribus rerum Regalium, of the first Book, deserves more Consideration than all the rest, for it's the first Feodal Law establish'd in the Kingdom by our Norman Princes. The first who publish'd a written Law concerning Fiefs and their Succession, was, as we have said, the Emperor Conrade the Salick. The Emperor Lothaire publish'd some others, and one amongst the rest, much to the same Purpose with this of Roger's, De Feudo non alienando; but tho' Roger suffer'd the Laws of the Emperors of the West, down to Lothaire, as also all the Longobard Laws continu'd in that Volume, to be observ'd in his Dominions, even after they were withdrawn from, and independent of the Empire, yet he would never suffer the Laws of Lothaire, his Enemy, to be of any Authority in his Kingdom; therefore, tho' Lothaire in the Year 1136, had publish'd a Law at Roncaglia, by which Feudatories were forbid to alienate their Fiefs, which being of no Force in the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, Roger, in order to take Care of his Royal Rights, was oblig'd to establish a particular Law, by which he strictly prohibited not only all the Counts, Barons, Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, and all others whoever, that held Fiefs or Royalties, how great or small soever they might be, to alienate, give, sell, either in whole or in part, or in the least to diminish them; and he likewise extended this Prohibition to the Princes, who were then his own Sons, to wit, Roger Duke of Puglia, Ansfusus Prince of Capua, and Tancred Prince of Taranto; for at this Time, as Hugo Falcandus ² relates, none could aspire to the Title of Prince or Duke, excepting the King's Sons; and therefore Roger, in this Constitution calls them Principes nostros. And this is that Constitution so much commended by Frederick, and which he afterwards extended to all other Contracts, Alienations, Transactions, Arbitrations, and Excambions, giving Power to those, who, without his Consent and Liberty, should make Alienations, to revoke them proprio jure, which still continues to be practis'd at this Day, and is quoted by our Barristers, who have a great Regard for this Constitution of Frederick's ¹, it begins, Constitutionem Divæ memoriæ Regis Rogerii Aui nostri super prohibita diminutione Feudorum, & rerum Feudalium ampli-antes, &c.

THE Eleventh, which we read under the third Title of the same third Book; deserves no less Consideration; for by it we see that it has always been lawful for Princes to restrain, and hinder their Subjects from taking any Orders, when it was a Detriment to the Commonwealth, or the King's Royalties. So we see that Constantine the Great prohibited those that were Rich to do so; and the Emperor Mauritius hinder'd his Soldiers from turning Monks, of which Gregory the Great so much complain'd, though he did not look upon it as a Thing not in the Emperor's Power to command; but that it was of pernicious Consequence, out of worldly Respects, thus to put a Restraint on the godly Motions of the Soul. Roger by this Law, moderating another of his Constitutions, by which all Plebeians in general, without the Permission of their Masters, were forbid to take Orders; establish'd, that only those Plebeians could not take Orders, who were tied to personal Service, such as the Ascriptitii, Ploughmen, and such like; but those that were oblig'd to serve on account of their Holding, or Estate, wherewith they had been invested, could do so even without the Leave of their Superiors; but in such Case, they were first to resign their Estate, and then take Orders.

ROGER's twelfth Law, under the Title de dotario constituendo, likewise relates to Fiefs, and is the Second that this Prince publish'd about them. In this, Barons and other Feudatories, notwithstanding the Prohibition of Alienating, are allowed to settle a Dowry on their Wives, answerable to the Fiefs they possess, and according to their Number and Quality. Counts and Barons, who hold several Castles, are allow'd to assign one of them for a Dowry to their Wives, provided it be not that Castle, from which the Barony or County takes its Name. Thus it shall not be lawful for the Count of Caserta to give Caserta for a Dowry; but another Castle of his County; whence our Authors ² have learnt, that the giving a simple Assent, never extends to the Head of the Barony or County.

THE Thirteenth, which we have under the Title de Matrimoniis contrahendis ³ likewise deserves Consideration. By it we see plainly, that in Roger's Time it was not look'd upon as an improper Thing for Princes, to establish Laws concerning Matrimony; of which Giovanni Launojo has taken Notice in his Treatise; Regia in Matrimonium potestas ⁴; neither has he neglected that of Frederick II. which begins, Honorem nostri Diadematis, agreeable to this of Roger's. The Popes had not as yet assum'd to themselves this Authority, which afterwards by Innocent III. ⁵, and more by some of his Successors was look'd upon as peculiar to them, and which they usurp'd from the secular Princes. The Theodosian and Justinian Codes are full of those Laws, and till the Times of Theodorick and Luitprand, Kings of Italy, we read, that secular Princes not only made Laws concerning the Manner and Form of contracting Marriages, but likewise regulated the Degrees, in which they were forbidden, and it was the Prerogative of Princes to dispense with them; and Cassiodore in his Books, has left us the Form of such Dispensations. Roger in this Law order'd, that Marriages, after Betrothing, and the Priest's Blessing, should be solemnly and publickly celebrated, and altogether prohibited clandestine Marriages, insomuch that the Sons born of such Marriages, were not to be reputed lawful, nor could they succeed to their Fathers, neither by Testament nor ab intestato; and the Daughters were to lose their Portions, as if neither Portion nor Marriage could proceed from Contracts enter'd into against his Law. Nevertheless he did not subject Widows to the Rigour of this Law; neither did it take place with regard to Marriages contracted before the Publication of it. Frederick II. afterwards put another Restraint upon the Counts, Barons, and all the other Feudatories, that they could not marry without his Consent; and Women being allow'd to succeed to Fiefs, the Barons were forbidden to give their Daughters, Grandchildren or Sisters in marriage without his Approbation, that the Fiefs might not be transmitted to strange Families, of whose Fidelity it concern'd the Prince to be well satisfied, as he order'd it in the Constitution Honorem nostri Diadematis, under the Title de Uxore non ducenda sine permissione Regis.

ANDREA D'ISERNIA, who was a Guelf, and therefore a Detrafter of Frederick's Actions, writing under the Kings of the Family of Anjou, in an Age wherein other Maxims prevail'd, and blaming Frederick, to the Words Honorem nostri Diadematis, adds, imo destructionem animæ istius Frederici Imperatoris prohibentis per obliquum matrimonia instituta a Deo in Paradiso. As if it had not belong'd to the Oeconomy of the Prince to make Laws concerning Matrimony, and more especially that of his own Barons¹, and often to put a Stop to it, when it was evident that it would prove prejudicial to the State, occasion'd intestine Broils betwixt noble Families, and bred Factions; of which our Authors, and among the rest *Francesco Ramos*², have treated at large. And besides 'tis certain, that Frederick was not the first, who establish'd this Law, he found it in his Kingdom, and its first Author was William surnam'd the Wicked. The Barons did not complain of the Law, but of the bad Use that William made of it, for this Prince, that the Fiefs might devolve to himself, either never gave his Consent to the Marriage of their Daughters, or delay'd it till they were old and past Child-bearing, of which, according to *Hugo Falcando*³, the Grandees of Sicily not only complain'd, but on that very account rais'd a Rebellion against William. This Law was observ'd in Sicily till the Reign of King James, who in a Parliament held there, caus'd it to be abolish'd⁴. And with us it continued to the Reign of Charles II. of Anjou, who in one of his *Capitula*⁵, establish'd in the Plain of St. Martin, reform'd it.

NEITHER is Roger's fourteenth Law less remarkable, under the Title de Administrationibus rerum Ecclesiasticarum post mortem Prælatorum; for we find in it many considerable Matters. First, what Roger says is well worth our Notice, that all the Churches of his Kingdom, and particularly those that want Pastors, were under his Protection. Secondly, that seeing according to an uninterrupted and never contraverted Custom, after a Prelate's Death, the King's Officers took the Care and the Administration of the Revenues, until the Church was provided; if these Officers did not perform their Duty according to the Directions given them; he thought fit to make a Law, by which he order'd, that after the Death of Prelates, the Officers were no more to have the Administration and Care of Churches; but that they should be committed to three of the best, most faithful and discreet Persons of the Church, who were to have the Charge and Direction of them till they should be provided; in the mean time they were to distribute the Incomes, one Part to those that serv'd the Cure, and the other for the Fabrick, or other Necessaries of the Church; and when the Pastor was elected, the Remainder was to go to him, or he was to have an Account how it was laid out. The Spolia, introduc'd since by the Court of Rome, were not known then, and would have been look'd upon as tending not only to the Ruin of Ecclesiastical Discipline, but of the good Government of Kingdoms; all belong'd to the Church, and was laid out for the Use thereof, and the Remainder was reserv'd for the Successor. There were no Nuncios, nor Collectors, nor Commissaries, to plunder the Prelate's House before his Breath was well out⁶. Whence our Kings, as well as those of France boast of their Regalia, which among others, King Conrad claim'd⁷; and have always taken care that the Revenues of Churches should not be put to wrong Uses, and have often order'd them to be sequestrated for the Repair of the Fabricks, and therefore made many useful and wholesome Laws to that Effect, witness Ferdinand I. of Arragon, King Frederick, the great Captain, the Duke of Alcala, and others, as may be seen in *Chioccarello*⁸.

NEITHER ought we to neglect that which *Andreas d'Isernia*¹ observ'd upon this Constitution of Roger, which he erroneously believ'd to be William's, saying, that when it was establish'd, it appear'd to be just and regular, because the Volume of the Decretals was not then compil'd; and that tho' Roger made this wholesome Law, yet afterwards, the Canonists would not receive these Laws of secular Princes, etiam si pro eis condantur, quia nolunt, ut ponant falcem in messum alienam. But before the Volumes of the Decretals came forth, it was not preposterous in Princes to establish such Laws, and particularly our Princes, who having founded almost all the Churches in the Kingdom out of their own Patrimony, it was but just, that they should be under their Power and Protection.

WE have Roger's fifteenth Constitution in the third Book, under the Title de Prohibita in terra Demanii constructione Castrorum. Whereby he forbids any Person whatsoever, to build Castles or Forts, under Colour of better Defence, within the King's Demains; but that those of the King, or his Royal Protection, were to be their Security. The Sixteenth, is under the Title de injuriis curialibus personis irrogatis, by which, in punishing Offences, the Judges are order'd to have a special Regard to the Persons against whom they are committed, by whom, in what Place, and at what Time; and if they are done against his Officers, he declares the Offence not only as done them, but likewise his Royal Dignity to be offended.

THE seventeenth Law, which is under the Title de probabili experientia Medicorum, is the first that was establish'd among us, in order, as much as possible, to prevent those Mischiefs, occasion'd by the Ignorance of Physicians. Formerly the most prudent Romans look'd upon the Choice and Approbation of Physicians, as not belonging to the Præsides of the Provinces, but to the Decuriones of the Cities, for the Reason which *Ulpianus*² elegantly expresseth in these Words; Ut certi de probitate morum, & peritia artis, eligant ipsi, quibus se, liberosque suos in ægritudine corporum committant. By this Law Roger ordain'd, that none should practise Physick, but those who shall first present themselves before his Officers and Judges, in order to be examin'd, and declar'd qualified for that Employment, and if any should be so bold as to practise Physick without this Examination, they are to be imprison'd, and to have their Goods confiscated. Frederick II. explain'd this Law of his Grandfather more at large, and establish'd many other Laws concerning Physicians, by which the Schola Salerni, was erected into an Academy, as also that of Naples, where this Prince was pleas'd to found another more famous and renown'd, as shall be related when we come to treat of the Actions of this glorious Emperor.

We likewise read under the Title de nova militia, another Constitution of Roger's, which is the Eighteenth, by which he forbid the inrolling of any Persons in the Army, if they were not of military Extract; and likewise allow'd none to be Judges, or Notaries, but those whose Fathers had been of the same Profession. Frederick confirm'd this Law by the following Constitution, and also added, that no Person of mean Extract could exercise these Offices, nor serve in the Army, if by the Father's Side he was not descended of Soldiers. However 'tis true, what Bartholomew of Capua attests, that in his Time these Constitutions were not observ'd in the Kingdom of Sicily, though he had heard that such was the Practice in France, which Roger would imitate. And Summontes very appositely observes, that this Constitution was Frederick's and not Roger's, as the Inscription in the vulgar Edition bears, by which it's evident, that by this, Frederick confirms that of his Grandfather Roger, for the preceding is mention'd in these Words, contra prohibitionem divæ memoriæ avi nostri. Besides, this is confirm'd by what Ricardo da S. Germano relates in his Chronicle, wherein he says, that amongst the other Constitutions which Frederick made in the Parliament held at St. Germano in the Month of February, of the Year 1232, that de Militibus was one; as Tutini dell' Origine de' Seggi also observes³.

THE Nineteenth, is that which we have under the Title de Falsariis, by which those who should counterfeit or alter the King's Writs, or Seal, are to be punish'd capitally. The Twentieth is under this Title, de eudentibus monctam adulterinam, whereby not only the Coiners of false Money were to be punish'd with Death, but likewise those who should knowingly receive it, or in any Manner consent to so great a Crime. The Twenty-first is under the Title de razione monetæ, by which those are likewise punish'd with Death, and their Goods confiscated, who shall be so bold as to clip, or in any manner diminish the Gold or Silver Coin.

WE afterwards read Seven other Laws dispos'd under as many different Titles, by which Forgers are condemn'd to various Punishments. The first excuses those who ignorantly shall make use of false Writs. The second punishes with pœna falsi those who shall imploy false Witnesses. The third condemns to the same Punishment, those who conceal, raze or cancel publick Deeds. The Fourth, deprives those of their paternal Inheritance, who cancel or conceal their Father's Wills, in order to succeed them ab intestato. The Fifth declares, that the Quality of the Person aggravates, or lessens the pœna falsi. The Sixth inflicts capital Punishment on those who shall have or sell Poison, or hurtful Medicines, to distemper one's Senses; and the Seventh declares, that they shall not go unpunish'd, who shall give Love-potions, or hurtful Food, altho' no Harm should follow; which Constitutions were afterwards approv'd of by Frederick, and more fully explain'd in the following Titles.

By the following Laws of this Prince, we clearly see among his other Virtues, how much he had at Heart the Chastity and Honour of Women. By the Twenty-ninth, which we have under the Title de pœna Adulterii, Husbands cannot pursue their Wives before a Judge for Adultery, if they shall allow them, in their own Presence, to commit lascivious and lewd Actions with their Gallants; and in the Thirtieth, which follows under the Title de probibita quæstione fœminæ, not only Infamy, but severe Punishment is to be inflicted on Husbands that shall suffer their Wives to commit Adultery.

THE other Six that follow are no less to be commended; by the first he prohibits modest Women to converse with Prostitutes; to whom nevertheless no Violence is to be offered. By the Second, de repudiis concedendis, the Husband is allow'd to demand a Bill of Divorce against his Wife, provided he has just Cause to accuse her of Adultery. By the Third, de Lenis, Bawds and Pimps, are to be punish'd in the same Manner as Adulterers. The Fourth, confirm'd afterwards by Frederick, is terrible against Mothers, who prostitute their Virgin Daughters; for, besides their being punish'd as Bawds, their Noses are to be cut off; it ends with these serious Words; Castitatem enim suorum viscerum vendere, inhumanum est, & crudele: But if any Daughter shall have prostituted herself, and the Mother only give her Consent, the Punishment is left to the Discretion of the Judge. By the Fifth, under the Title de pœna Uxoris in adulterio deprehensæ, the Husband is allow'd to kill both the Wife and the Adulterer, provided he find them in the Act, and do it without delay; and by the Sixth, under the Title de pœna Mariti ubi Adulter causæ fugit, it is enacted, that if the Husband suffer the Adulterer to escape, and shall keep the Wife, he is to be punish'd as a Pimp, unless he could not prevent his Escape.

ROGER having thus by these Laws secur'd Womens Virtue, was no less careful of the Security of Men; for which End we read other Three of his Laws, which are the last we have of this Prince, and compleat the Number of Thirty-nine. By the first, under the Title de venditione liberi hominis, he who shall knowingly sell a free Man, is condemn'd to Slavery. By the Second, under the Title de incendiariis, those, who maliciously shall set Fire to another Man's House, are to suffer capital Punishment. And by the last, the same Punishment is inflicted on any Person, who, by coming down a steep Place, shall loosen and tumble down a Stone, or a Branch, by which a Man is killed, and does not cry out, or give Advertisment; the Rigor of which was afterwards moderated by Frederick in one of his Constitutions.

THUS did Roger, by these provident and useful Laws, settle and re-establish his Kingdom. And tho' some of these Laws concern'd Marriage, Divorce, Church Government and the Clergy, yet Princes were not thought to exceed the Bounds of their secular Authority, when they made them. Those Complaints were not as yet heard of, which the Popes made afterwards concerning the Breach of their Ecclesiastick Immunities, and that it was mittere falcem in alienam messem, for Princes to make such Laws. But it was not long before they put in their Claim, which was done by Piece-meal, till Gregory IX. put the last Hand to it, by reducing into one Body all the Rescripts which made for the Roman Grandeur, and wresting to general Use, those that were intended for a particular Place, and perhaps for one single Case only, and publish'd the Decretal, which laid the first Foundation of the Roman Monarchy. Thus in our Kingdom, to the antient Roman Laws, retain'd rather as Customs, than written Laws, and to the Longobard Laws, Roger added his Constitutions, which, without respect to the Roman and Longobard, were reputed particular Laws; whereas the former were common and general ones.

S E C T. I.

Of the particular Feodal Laws of this Kingdom.

BUT, as we have said elsewhere, Baronies and Fiefs being multiplied in these Provinces, as they were likewise over all Italy, a new Law call'd the Feodal also started up. This was at first introduc'd into the Cities of Italy by the Customs of the Longobards, which were various and different, according to the several Usages of each City; so that the Feodal Law at first, could only be said to be the unwritten Longobard Law, whence some have wittily call'd it the Child of Time, introduc'd into Italy by the Longobards, not by Writ, but Custom; it prevail'd afterwards to that Degree, that Conrad the Salick first thought fit to add it to the written Laws; as the other Emperors his Successors, after his Example did; so that the common Feodal Law was made up of the Feodal Customs introduc'd by the Longobards, and the written Laws of the Emperors; and when other Countries came to adopt it, it was first receiv'd in Italy, and afterwards over all Europe. And for this Reason, with respect to Fiefs, there was no Difference betwixt those who liv'd under the Longobard Laws, and those who were govern'd by the Roman; for the Romans knew not what Fiefs were, and when a Roman was invested with a Fief, he was oblig'd to observe the Longobard Law, by which Fiefs were regulated, seeing nothing could be gather'd from the Roman.

AS this Jus commune Feudale, was equally observ'd over all Italy before Roger's Time, so it had Force and Authority in these our Provinces. But now that Roger had form'd them into a Kingdom, and withdrawn them from the Empire, as this prudent Prince had added his own Laws, particularly adapted to his own Dominions, to the common Roman and Longobard Laws, so likewise he would add to the common Feodal Law, some particular Feodal Laws of his own, which were to be observ'd in his Kingdom, and among his Constitutions which are yet extant, there are Two concerning Fiefs. The two Williams his Successors, following his Example, added other Feodal Laws; and lastly, Frederick II. establish'd many more, which we read in the Volume of Constitutions; whence in our Kingdom the jus commune Feudale, contain'd in the Feodal Books, is not the same with our particular Feodal Law, which began by Roger, and afterwards enlarg'd with many Constitutions, Pragmaticks, &c. by William and Frederick, and other Kings, came to be what we now see it, as we shall shew in a more fit Place. But we are to observe, that Frederick II. being both Emperor and King of Sicily, those Constitutions of his, which we find in the Feodal Books, belong to the jus commune Feudale; and those which are in the Volume of our Constitutions, to the jus Feudale particulare of the Kingdom of Sicily.

ROGER then, as he was the first, who added new Laws to the Roman and Longobard, so he was likewise the first, who, to the common Feodal Law, added new particular Feodal Laws in his Kingdom, by which a new Method of succeeding to Fiefs contrary to the Longobard Laws, was introduc'd; and it was on this Account, that the new jus Francorum was brought in, whence with us, that Distinction of Fiefs, de jure Longobardorum, & Francorum, became so famous.

AMONG the other good Qualities of this Prince, that Custom of informing himself of the Laws and Usages of other Nations, is much applauded by Writers, and what he thought commendable, he introduc'd into his Kingdom; but he lov'd no Nation so much as the French, from which he was descended; therefore he chose to introduce all those Usages, and Customs which he observ'd in that most flourishing Realm, into his own new Kingdom; for the same Reason, as we shall shew anon, he brought into it the Seven Officers of the Crown as they were in France; but being too great a Lover of the French, he gave Jealousy and Uneasiness to his Subjects of Sicily and Puglia, who saw themselves neglected and Foreigners preferr'd¹.

HENCE, as we have said, the Fiefs juris Francorum had their Rise in our Kingdom, for Roger often sending to France for Captains and French Soldiers, and that Nation being look'd upon as superior to all others for military Valour, he made use of them in all his difficult Expeditions; and Hugo Falcandus says, Transalpinos maxime cum ab Normannis Originem duceret, sciretque Francorum gentem belli gloria cæteris anteferri, plurimum diligendos elegerat, & propemodum honorandos. And this Custom was also kept up afterwards by the Two Williams his Successors; but in the beginning of the Reign of William II. the French were in so great Favour at his Court, that he did not stick to make a Frenchman his High Chancellor, whence that Nation grew so numerous in his Court, that it gave great Offence to the Natives².

THUS it happen'd, that those Captains fighting gallantly under the Banners of Roger, and the two Williams, were by them invested with many Fiefs, so that they forsook France, and settled their Families in these Provinces; but did not relinquish their own Customs which they had brought from Home; and till the Time of Frederick II. they were allow'd to have their Causes tried in the Courts of Justice, according to the Laws and Customs of their own Country, among which the most considerable was, that the eldest Son succeeded to the Fiefs, exclusive of all the other younger Brothers, contrary to what was very imprudently practis'd by the Longobards, who divided their Fiefs amongst all their Sons, to the Decay both of their Families and Fiefs; and was the chief Cause of their Ruin in these Provinces, as we have formerly observ'd. Over all France, as Otho Frisingensis and Cujacius witness³, it was wisely ordain'd, that the eldest Sons only should succeed to Fiefs, as the sure way to preserve the Grandeur of their Families. Accordingly all those French Captains and Soldiers, that were invested with Fiefs in these Provinces, kept up that Custom; and Roger and the two Williams, not only allow'd of it, but likewise of all their other Laws; insomuch that Frederick II. in order to avoid the Confusion which those so different Laws occasion'd in this Kingdom, was forc'd to establish a special Constitution, under the Title de jure Franc. in judic. Subl. by which he revok'd that Privilege of using their own Customs; and by that his other famous Constitution Monomachiam, he abolish'd that barbarous Custom of Duelling, which they practis'd.

HOWEVER he did not forbid, but approv'd of as very commendable, their Custom, whereby the eldest Son succeeded to the Fiefs; whence it came to pass, that with us all Feudatories were distinguish'd by Franks, and Longobards by Franks, meaning those who succeeded to Fiefs jure Francorum, and by Longobards, those who according to the antient Usage, admitted all their Sons to succeed to their Fiefs. The jus Francorum therefore, was look'd upon as a special Law, with respect to the jus Longobardorum, which was the common Law, insomuch that *Andrea d'Isernia*⁴ writes, that he who call'd himself a Frank, and therefore not oblig'd to divide with his Brothers, but alledg'd a special Law for it, was bound to prove it, because it was commonly presum'd, that every Man was to be govern'd according to the jus commune of the Longobards, which appointed Fiefs to be divided amongst Brothers.

THIS special Law then of succeeding to Fiefs after the Manner of the French, was introduc'd into the Kingdom by Roger, who not content with having establish'd so wholesome Laws in his Kingdom, and having introduc'd new Customs and Usages from France; he would likewise bring in the Chief Officers of the Crown according to their Usage, and other new Dignities, to make his Kingdom the more Majestick.

Of the Officers of the Crown.

AFTER the sublime Dignity of Maire of the Palace was sunk in France, in the Line of Hugh Capet, it was thought both convenient and necessary to suppress and extinguish it intirely, it having been most pernicious to the Princes, as may be seen in the Reign of Chilperick. The Suppression of this high Dignity gave Rise to four other great Offices, which had formerly been swallow'd up in that of the Maire of the Palace, who was therefore call'd Chief of Chiefs, and Duke of Dukes; and very justly liken'd to the Præfectus Prætorio under the last Roman Emperors. All Causes relating to War, Peace, Justice, the Finances, and the King's Household were brought before him: In fine, he was Superintendent-General of all the Officers of the Kingdom, without Exception.

THEY who executed these four Offices were call'd Officers of the Crown, they were dignified with the Title of High, and acknowledg'd no other for their Head and Superior, but the King himself; but the High Constable was Intendant-General of War, and had the Command of the Armies in the Field. The High Admiral was Head of the Naval Forces, who in War and in Peace had the Command at Sea. The High Chancellor was the Chief Minister of Justice, and Head of all the Officers of Peace, and the Magistrate of Magistrates, on whom depended all the Judges and Protonotaries, and all the other inferior Chancellors. The High Treasurer, or Chamberlain, was Head of the Chamber of Accounts, and supreme Officer of the Finances; and the High Steward was Judge of the King's Household, and had the Government thereof.

ALL these were call'd Officers of the Crown, or Kingdom, because they did not concern themselves with the Service of the King's Person, but with that of the Kingdom; and Roger, as soon as he had establish'd his Kingdom, introduc'd these Officers, together with the lesser subordinate Ones. Formerly these our Provinces had no such Officers, but the Offices were perform'd by different Persons under other Titles; and tho' the Goths had some Knowledge of them, as may be seen in Cassiodore, from whom 'tis thought the French took them; yet these having been driven out by the Greeks, and the Greeks by the Longobards, we find that neither of them made use of such Officers, while they govern'd these Provinces'. The Greeks govern'd them by Stratici, and Catapani; whence there is yet some Vestige among us of these Officers. In Salerno the Title of Stratico is still kept up, as also in Messina. In Puglia the Catapani were very famous, whence a Province of this Kingdom retains the Name of Capitanata from the Title of this Magistrate. The Greeks had other Officers, such as the Masters of the Horse, by whom the Dukedom of Naples was long govern'd. They had Patricians; the Protospata, and many others; but never those abovemention'd. Only there are some who say, that the Office of Protonotary was originally Greek, but of that we shall speak in its Place.

THE Longobards certainly had no such Officers, they divided their Governments first into Castaldati, over each of which they put a Castaldo, to whom belong'd both the Affairs of War and Justice. Afterwards they created Counts, who at first were only Officers, and not Lords; each having the Government of a County committed to him, till in process of Time that began to be alter'd, and from Offices they were converted into Fiefs and Lordships, as we have observ'd elsewhere.

THEREFORE it was the Normans, and especially the renown'd Roger, who, after he had united his Dominions into a large and potent Kingdom, thought fit to introduce those Offices, which in other Kingdoms, and particularly in France, were look'd upon as peculiar to the Royal Crown, and as so many Lights made it shine the brighter.

S E C T. I.

Of the High Constable.

THE High Constable, according to the general Opinion of Writers, and justly, was exalted above all the rest, and held the first Place. At the first Institution, he was call'd by the French, the King's Great Master of the Horse; and therefore by *Aimon*¹ he is call'd Regalium Præpositus Equorum, as his Title in Latin Comes Stabuli likewise imports, and which we frequently meet with in ancient Books. *Caronda*² quotes many Passages; *Loyseau*³ is of the same Opinion, contrary to that of some Moderns, and especially *Cujacius*⁴.

HE has two great Prerogatives; the one as Keeper of the King's Sword, for at his Promotion to this high Dignity, the King delivers him his naked Sword into his Hands, upon which at that Instant he swears Fealty, and does Homage, just so as is related of the Emperor Trajan, who giving his naked Sword to Sura Licinius, Præfectus Prætorio, said these remarkable Words to him: Accipe hunc ensen, ut si quidem recte Reip. imperavero pro me, sin autem secus, in me utaris. Therefore the Badge of this Dignity is a naked Sword, as our Torquato Tasso has well express'd it in the Person of the High Constable of Egypt, whom he places in that Assembly on the King's Right-Hand, as having the first Place above all the other Officers of the Crown, and gives him the naked Sword for his Badge.

A Sword was put into the Worthiest's Hand Naked, an Emblem of austere Command.

THE other Prerogative is, that in the Armies he has the Command over all Persons, even the Princes of the Blood; appoints the Quarters, Disciplines the Troops, distributes the Centinels; the Marshals, and all other inferior Officers take their Orders from him: In fine, he has the supreme Command of the Armies while they are in the Field.

BUT he exercises all this Authority and high Command in the Army only when they are in the Field, not when in Garrison, nor does it extend to the Governors of Provinces; so that they are in the Wrong, who make the High Constable's Power the same with that of our present Viceroys, who not only have the Command of the Armies in the Field, but likewise in Garrison; and all Governors of Provinces, and other Officers of the Crown, as well at Land as at Sea, are subject to them: But 'tis evident, that the Prerogatives of the High Constable are lodg'd in the Viceroys; for all Things relating to War belong to them, and they dispose of the Armies in the Field, and all the Generals and Marshals obey them; but when the Viceroy is out of the Kingdom, and none other deputed by the King, the High Constable, on sudden Emergencies, and when Necessity requires it, may take his Authority upon him, and exercise his ancient Jurisdiction, according to *Marinus Freccia*⁵.

THE first Constable that we find amongst the ancient Records in the Reign of Roger, was Roberto di Bassavilla, Count of *Conversano*⁶. He was the Son of another Robert, likewise Count of Conversano, and of Judith Sister to Roger; he was employ'd by Roger in all his difficult Undertakings, and on account of his great Skill in military Discipline, deserv'd to be rais'd by this Prince to that high Dignity. In the Reign of William I. he made himself more renown'd, and by this Prince was invest'd with the County of Loritello; but afterwards, he joining in Rebellion with some other Barons, put the Kingdom all in Confusion, whereupon William stripp'd him of this Dignity, and gave it to Simon Count of Policastro, his Cousin, who was the second Constable, of whom we shall have occasion to discourse more at large in the Reign of William; and in the Time of William II. Robert Count of Caserta was Constable¹.

IT IS worthy of Observation, that these Constables (as also all the other supreme Officers) who were at first call'd Maestri Contestabili, and afterwards Magni Contestabili, were common both to these our Provinces, and to Sicily, till that Island was taken by the Kings of Arragon from those of Anjou; and tho' our Barons were frequently rais'd to this Dignity, because of their large Counties, and their Relation to the Princes themselves, who at this Time did not think it below them to marry into their Families, and the great Figure they made above all the Barons of Sicily, yet they resided on their own Estates; but when the Norman Kings fix'd their Royal Seat in Palermo, they regularly resided at Court with the King, who employ'd them in the most important Affairs of State. Therefore there's no occasion to confound them with the lesser Constables, who were sent to a particular Province, to whom either the Government of some City was committed, or the Command of some Regiments of Horse or Foot was given; for tho' these were likewise call'd Constables, yet their Office was very different from and much inferior to that of the Great Constables, who were call'd Regni Comestabuli. Thus in the Chronicle of Not. Riccardo di S. Germano, written in the Time of Frederick II. we read, that Philippo di Citero, erat Comestabulus Capuæ. And in later Times we find many Charters recorded by *Tutini*², in which the Constableship was restricted to the Government of one City only, and to one particular Duty; so we frequently find in the Writs of the Royal Archives of Zecca, Henricus Comestabulus Foggiaë; and in some Instruments of the same Archives, we also read; Franciscus Garis Comestabulus Viginti quatuor Balestrarum; and elsewhere, Franciscus de Diano Comestabulus Peditum.

SO likewise the King's Masters of the Horse are call'd Comestabuli Regii Hospitii. And in like manner the Captains of the Soldiers that were in each Province of the Kingdom, whom we now call Captains of Batallions, got the Title of Constables. Therefore we find Pietro della Marra Constable of Terra di Lavoro; Guglielmo Ponticciaco Constable of Basilicata; Mattia Gesualdo Constable of Principato; Gualtieri del Ponte Constable of Capitanata; Adamo Morerio Constable of Terra d'Otranto; and Gentile di Sangro Constable of Apruzzi.

DURING the Reign of the Family of Anjou this Office lost nothing of its ancient Splendor; on the contrary, according to Marino Freccia, Charles I. of Anjou was wont to give it with the same Prerogatives, and in the same manner that it was given in France, and ordain'd it to be just so exercis'd in his Kingdom of Sicily. And Charles II. his Successor establish'd many Statutes, recorded by Tutini, concerning the Great Constables, to whom he subjected all the Marshals of his Kingdom. But now this Office, for Reasons which shall be related in the Progress of this History, is no more than a bare Title of Honour, its Authority for the most Part being lodg'd in the Person of the Viceroy; the Great Constables have only the Precedency in Parliament, and other solemn Occasions, with some other Marks of Distinction, such as to be cloath'd with Purple and Ermine, and to wear a little Cap; but tho' they enjoy these Honours, yet they have lost the Salary formerly annex'd to them.

Of the High Admiral.

AMONGST the Offices of the Crown that of High Chancellor ought to have the second Place, as it hath in France, or as that of Lord Chief Justice hath now with us; but two Reasons induce me to treat of the High Admiral next to the High Constable; the first, because of the great Resemblance of the two Offices; for both of them having the Direction of War, the one at Sea, and the other at Land, I am inclin'd to treat of the High Admiral before I proceed to the Officers of Peace and Justice; the other more prevalent Reason is, because in the Time of these Norman Kings, the Dignity of High Admiral was esteem'd superior to that of High Chancellor, or any other Civil Officer; for these Kings were so powerful at Sea, that they came to be renown'd and dreaded over all the East, and carried their victorious Flags to the very Gates of Constantinople, and made surprizing Conquests in Africa, insomuch that their Empire over the Seas was greater and more considerable than over the Land; whence it came to pass, that in the Time of Roger, and the two William's his Successors, the High Admiral of Sicily was the highest Post that any could be rais'd to. So that we find the famous Majone di Bari, who in Roger's Time was High Chancellor, was afterwards made High Admiral by King William, who had a great Esteem for his Person; and Hugo Falcandus relating the State of the Court in the Beginning of the Reign of William II. when l'Eletto di Siracusa was High Chancellor, and Riccardo Mandra High Chamberlain of the Household, says, that Matthæus Notarius cum sciret Admiratum se non posse fieri, ob multam ejus nominis invidiam, Cancellariatum totis visibus appetebat.

IF we consider the Business and Duty of this Office, there's no doubt of its being very ancient, for it was known amongst the Romans, and more among the Eastern People bordering on the Sea; and in ancient Gaul, in Cæsar's Time we frequently read of the Præfetti Maris, amongst whom Bibulus was eminent. But indeed we do not find the Title of Admiral among the Romans; and I agree with those, who take this not to be a Word of Provence, as *Alunno*¹ believ'd, but a Saracen Word, as *Fazzellus*², *Pietro Vincenti*³, and *Tutini*⁴, from many Passages in History very well prove; for the Saracens were very powerful at Sea, whence we frequently meet with this Title of Admiral in their Histories; and when they infested the Sea-Coast of the East, and a great Part of the West, such as Spain, Africa, and Sicily, they had many Sea Generals, whom they call'd Admirals.

THE Greeks likewise had such an Office, and the last Emperors of the East, in order to oppose the Power of the Saracens, were also necessitated to have Naval Forces; and 'tis very probable, that it was the Greeks who first introduc'd them into these our Provinces, for in the latter Times there being nothing left them, but many Cities on the Sea-Coast, such as those of Calabria, and part of Lucania, Amalphis, Naples, and Gaeta, they were oblig'd to have Naval Forces to defend them against the Saracens, who had taken Sicily from them; and these Cities on this Side of the Fare were likewise in Danger of having the same Fate. And 'tis certain the Amalphitans became very powerful at Sea, and most expert in Maritime Affairs, insomuch that they were a strong Bulwark to the Greeks, who put their greatest Confidence in them as to Sea Affairs; and as we have already observ'd, they improv'd the Art of Navigation to that Pitch, that besides their frequent Voyages over all the Eastern Parts, they were look'd upon as Umpires of all Maritime Controversies; and as in the Time of the Romans, the Rhodians exceeded all other Nations in Naval Affairs, insomuch that the Rhodian Laws were a Rule to all the Nations of the Empire, by which all Disputes about Sea Matters were decided; so with us, all Quarrels and Debates concerning Navigation were determin'd by the Laws and Customs of the Amalphitans; and *Marinus Freccia*⁵ witnesseth, that even in his Time, all such Processes were decided by the Amalbitan Laws. Whence it came to pass, that the Amalbitans being wholly bent on Navigation, and expert in Naval Affairs, at last Flavio Gisia, an Amalbitan, and a Man of great Knowledge, in the Reign of Charles II. of Anjou, found out the Mariner's Compass, so necessary in Navigation.

BUT now that the Normans had expell'd the Saracens out of Sicily, and the Greeks out of these our Provinces, in order to defend themselves against the Invasion both of the one and the other, they were likewise oblig'd to have a Naval Force. And what Progress the Normans made therein, especially in the Time of the renown'd Roger, and the two Williams, is very evident from the History of their Reigns. Therefore the Office of High Admiral in these Times was look'd upon as most honourable and illustrious; whence the Number of their Fleets being very great, it was thought fit to have many Admirals, and the first and chief of all was call'd Ammiraglio degli Ammiragli, the Admiral of Admirals.

HE therefore had the most eminent Privileges as to his Command at Sea, that could be imagin'd; he commanded at Sea both in Time of Peace and War; it was his Business to have the Inspection of the Building of the King's Ships and Vessels, and to see them repair'd, and dispos'd of for the Good of Commerce; to keep the Harbours over all the Kingdom in good Repair, and the Sea-Coast obedient to the King; and all the other Admirals of the Provinces and Harbours, the Protontini, Calkers, Boat-Swains, Carpenters, and all the other inferior Sea-Officers were under his Direction¹.

AT present our High Admiral retains the Jurisdiction, both Civil and Criminal, over all the Officers that are subordinate to him, and over all Sea-faring Persons²; for which end he has a particular Tribunal, where the Judges appointed by him, administer Justice to all under his Command, and there are special Laws establish'd for Sea Affairs, by which all Suits relating thereto are decided; and as with respect to Fiefs, we have a new Body of Feudal Laws, so likewise with respect to Sea Affairs, we have a new Body of Sea Laws, of which we shall treat by-and-by. The Admiral with us has for his Coat of Arms a Ship Lanthorn, which was borne of old by the High Admiral of France, who has now laid the Lanthorn aside, and bears the Anchor³. He wears a Purple Robe, and in Parliament sits on the King's Right-Hand, after, and next to the High Constable.

THE first we meet with in the Reign of Roger is Giorgio Antiocheno, who for his eminent Virtues, and Skill in Maritime Affairs, was invited from Antioch, and by this Prince made High Admiral, and was consulted by Roger, as well in his Land as Sea Expeditions⁴: It was the Custom of this glorious Prince, to invite from different Parts of the World, not only famous Warriors, but also learn'd Men. This great Captain gain'd many Victories in Greece, and carried Roger's victorious Banners to the Port of Constantinople. He rescu'd Lewis King of France, who while he was returning from Palestine, had been taken by the Greeks, and was to have been deliver'd to the Emperor of Constantinople; for having rencounter'd the Grecian Fleet, he fought it, and soon set the French King at liberty, who was honourably receiv'd by Roger in Sicily, from whence he return'd to France. He was the first, who in publick Writs sign'd himself Georgius Admiratorum Admiratus, as we see in the Writ quoted by Tutini; for as there were many Fleets, it was fit to have as many Admirals in different Parts of the Kingdom, so the first rightly stil'd himself the Admiral of Admirals.

THE next we find in the Reign of this Prince, is Philip the Eunuch; and, as Claudianus tells us, that Eutropius from an Eunuch was rais'd to be Consul, so Philip was made High Admiral by Roger. Philip, according to Romualdus Archbishop of *Salerno*⁵, was brought up from his Youth in Roger's Household; he was just such another as Eutropius, and by covering his Vices under the Cloke of Virtue, he insinuated himself so much into the King's Favour, that he was thought worthy to be made Steward of the King's Household; afterwards the King having a Mind to make an Expedition into Turky, for taking Bonna, pitch'd upon Philip to manage that War; and in the Year 1149, made him High Admiral, who having a strong Fleet under his Command, took the City, and with a great Booty return'd in Triumph to Sicily; where he remain'd for a long time ; but afterwards, seeing himself rais'd to such a Pitch of Grandeur, he could no longer conceal his being of the Saracen Religion, which he had hitherto cloak'd under the Appearance of a Christian ; he soon discover'd that he abhorr'd the Christians, and had a great Value for the Jews and Mahometans, by frequently sending Messengers with Presents to Mecca to the Tomb of the Impostor Mahomet. Roger having discover'd this Treachery, and being afraid, that if he did not punish his Villany, the Saracen Religion might again get footing in that Island, out of which with so much Pains and Trouble he had driven the perfidious Saracens, punish'd him severely ; for having caus'd the Learn'd Men, and Barons of his Council to be conven'd, Philip was condemn'd to be burnt, and accordingly the Sentence was publickly put in Execution before the Royal Palace.

AFTERWARDS, in the Reign of William, this Office of High Admiral was bestow'd on the famous Majone di Bari, whose Exploits, so far as they have relation to the Design of this History, shall be treated of at large in the following Book. Majone being rais'd to the first Honours of the Kingdom by William, exercis'd the Office of High Admiral more haughtily and independently. He likewise, as being so call'd by the King, sign'd himself Majo Admiratus Admiratorum, having supreme Authority, and chief Command over all the other Admirals of the Kingdom.

WE have before observ'd, that in the Times of the Normans and Suevi, till this Kingdom was divided from that of Sicily, and this last subjected to the Family of Arragon, by the famous Sicilian Vespers, there was one High Admiral who had command over all the other Admirals of the Provinces of both Kingdoms, contrary to the Custom of France, where, when Provence was join'd to that Kingdom, there were four Admirals, one in Guienne ; another in Bretagne ; a third in Provence ; who tho' he had not the Title of Admiral, but General of the Gallies, as now with us in Naples, nevertheless he had the same Power with the Admirals ; so that there was nothing left to the ancient Admiral, but only the Coast of Normandy and Picardy, with the Title of Admiral of France indefinitely¹ ; but the High Admiral of Sicily had the Command of all the other Admirals, therefore he was call'd Admiratus Admiratorum ; for in all the other Parts of the Kingdom, on both Sides of the Phare, not only the Provinces, but even the Cities had their particular Admirals, all subordinate to the Chief and High Admiral. In short, there were many Admirals in these our Provinces at the same Time, which is clear from the Chronicle of *Cassino*², where some of them are frequently mention'd ; and an Admiral resided almost in every Maritime City, these formerly were made by the King, and had the Charge of the King's Wood and Ships, and in the latter Times of the Family of Anjou, they were call'd Protontini, and administred Justice to all Seafaring Persons, who liv'd in these Cities, and on these Coasts. Tutini quotes several Writs, in which many are call'd Admirals of different Maritime Cities, such as Landulfo Calenda Admiral of Salerno, Lisolo Serfale, and many others. Thus our Norman Kings establish'd their Empire, not only at Land, but likewise at Sea, and appointed diverse Officers, to whom the Government and Security of the Sea, Harbours, Commerce, Navigation, and Traffick were committed ; therefore they took care also to make many Laws, which in process of Time became a new Body of Laws ; and like as, besides the Jus commune Feudale, we had a Jus particulare Feudale, so besides the Jus commune Navale, we had a Jus particulare Navale calculated for these our Provinces.

Of the Naval Laws.

THE Romans had no other Naval Laws but what they learn'd from the Rhodians ; for the Rhodian Laws were so famous, as to be known over all that vast Empire ; and the Emperors Tiberius, Adrianus, Antoninus, Pertinax, and Lucius Septimus Severus made many Laws approving of them, and giving them Force and Vigour Vigour through all the Empire; whence came the Jus Navale Rhodianum, taken from the eleventh Book of the Digests¹, which, after it had a long Time lain buried in the Library of Francisco Piteo, was at last publish'd. But after the Emperors of the East having fix'd their Residence in Constantinople, a City wash'd by the Sea on three Sides, found their Empire began to decline, they laid greater Stress on their Sea than Land Forces, and thought their Fleets a greater Security for the Provinces of their Empire, which for the most part border'd, or were surrounded by the Sea, than their Land Armies; for which reason we have many Laws concerning Sea Affairs, Commerce, the Security of Harbours and Navigation, made by the last Emperors of the East, which were partly collected by Leunclavius and Petrus Peckius, and partly by the incomparable Arnoldus Vinnius, who likewise exercis'd his noble Genius about these Laws, and made his Observations on Peckius.

BUT these Laws of the Emperors of the East underwent the same Misfortune with all their other Collections. According to *Marino Freccia*², it was from the Amalphitans that we learn'd our Naval Laws; neither is it unlikely, that the Amalphitans, by reason of their frequent Voyages, and continual Traffick they had with the Eastern Nations, learn'd them from the Laws of those Emperors, or rather from long Experience, and the Risque they run at Sea. And seeing at the same Time the Catalans, the Arragonians, the Pisans, the Genoese, and the Venetians had become powerful at Sea, and famous by their Voyages to the Eastern Parts, and elsewhere, as well as the Amalphitans, therefore a new Body of Statutes and Customs came to be fram'd, which now being abridg'd into a small Volume, is to be had every where, intitled, Il Consolato del Mare, whence Sea-faring Men are guided in deciding their Controversies; which producing so good Effects, is approv'd of by all Princes, and the Rules thereof are as well observ'd as their own Laws and Statutes.

THESE Capitula, of which the Consolato del Mare is compos'd, were approved of by the Romans, Pisans, Lewis King of France, the Count of Toulouse, and many other Princes and Sovereigns; and the Kings of Arragon, and Counts of Barcelona added others to them; and Arnoldus Vinnius is of their Opinion, who relate, that this Collection was made in the Time of St. Lewis King of France. It was afterwards printed in Venice by Giovambatista Pedrezano, who gave it this Title, Il libro del Consolato de Marinari, and dedicated it to M. Tomaso Zarmora, then Consul in Venice for the Emperor Charles V.; it was afterwards, in the Year 1567, re-printed in Venice, and is now to be found every where; and in the Tribunal of the High Admiral of our Kingdom has all Force and Authority.

BUT our Princes, not content with this, made particular Laws for this Kingdom concerning Maritime Affairs. The Emperor Frederick II. besides those inserted in the Code³, made many Rules concerning the Office of Admiral, by which are prescrib'd his Charge, his Duty, and how far his Authority ought to be extended. In the Time of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, many other Capitula were added to them, by which his Authority was limited after a new manner, as may be observ'd in those made by Charles II. of Anjou for Philip Prince of Achaia and Taranto, his fourth Son, when he made him High Admiral, which are transcrib'd by Tutini. Afterwards the Arragon Kings added many other Things to the Capitula of their Predecessors, which the High Admiral was to observe; and Ferdinand I. added many for Roberto S. Severino, Count of Marsico, when in the Year 1460. he made him High Admiral, likewise related by Tutini. And in the Times of the Family of Austria, many Pragmaticks were publish'd concerning this Office, of which we shall have occasion to treat in their Place.

SUCH and so great was the Dignity of High Admiral, and his Charge so vast in former Times, that in order to regulate it, so many Rules were necessary, as at last produc'd a new Law, call'd Naval. But this noble Office began to lose its Lustre in our Kingdom in the Time of Marino Freccia, and much more in later Times, and now there's scarcely any Vestige of its Grandeur remaining besides Honour and Pre-eminency, with a separate Tribunal depending on it, and Jurisdiction over Sea-faring Men. The Causes of this Declension will be understood in the Course of this History, where it will be seen, that while our Kings were powerful at Sea, and while the Normans, the Suevi, and especially the Kings of the House of Anjou maintain'd a strong Naval Force, the Office of High Admiral made a shining Figure; but when afterwards the Fleets were diminish'd, and the Kingdom came under the Dominion of the House of Austria, and a new Model and Form of Government was introduc'd, depending on that of Spain, this great Authority vanish'd, and was partly lodg'd in the Generals of the Gallies, though not with the same Power and Authority that the High Admiral had.

S E C T. III.

Of the High Chancellor.

THE Order which I observe in treating of the Officers of the Crown, and placing the High Chancellor next to the High Admiral, contrary to what other Authors have done, ought not to be look'd upon as disorderly. I know that Marino Freccia gives this Office the last Place, though without any Reason, since he himself in Parliaments, and other publick Assemblies, gives it the Sixth Place, and ranks this Officer before the High Steward, who sits not at the King's Side, but at his Feet. Others however put him in the Sixth Place after the great Prototary; and both they and Freccia give the second Place to the Lord Chief Justice, next to the High Constable.

However the French rank the High Chancellor next to the High Constable, and I say, that both of them have done very well in observing this Order. The High Chancellor of France is very different from what the High Chancellor of Sicily was in the Time of the Normans, and even the High Chancellor of the Kingdom of Naples differs widely, especially if we consider the Times in which Freccia and the other Authors wrote, and more if we look to our own Times.

DIGNITIES rise and fall at the Pleasure of Princes; as the Prince is the Fountain of all Honour, so he appoints the Rules; and as *Georgius Codinus*¹ very appositely says of the Officers of the King's Household, he may alter both Things and Names, and exalt and abase as he pleases.

THE Chancellor among the French was the same with the Quæstor among the Romans, as *Symmachus*² and Cassiodorus describe him; Quæstor es, Legum conditor, Regalis Consilii particeps, Justitiæ Arbitrator. Therefore he was the Chief in Matters of Justice, as the Constable in those of War: The first of all the Officers of Peace, and chief Magistrate.

T H E R E are various Opinions concerning the Etymology of the Word Chancellor. The antient Glossator says, it's deriv'd from the Duty of this Officer, whose Business it is to examine all Petitions that are given to the Prince, to mark those that are fit to be presented, and to cancel the Impertinent, by drawing with a Pen cross ^{* Cancelli.} Lines after the Manner of * Lettices. But this is a very strange Etymology, that gives the Chancellor his Title from the Thing which he undoes, rather than from what he does. *Cassiodorus*³, and Agathias derive it better, who take it à Cancellis; for it being this Officer's Business to have Inspection of the Dispatch of all the Prince's Rescripts, to hear all those, who present Petitions to him, to prevent his being crowded by the People, and at the same time that he might be seen by every Body, he was wont to stand within a Bar, as was the Custom in Rome and France; whence Tertullian used to say; Cancellis non adoro, subsellia non contundo.

F O R which Reason he has the King's Seal for his Badge, whence he is likewise call'd by the French, Keeper of the Seal, because all special Grants and Dispatches from the King pass through his Hands, which he seals; and he gives Commissions, and Pensions to all Offices, which he may either refuse or delay, as he thinks fit, by not sealing them. Whence Torquato gives the High Chancellor of Egypt the Seal for his Badge :

The Seal he bears, his Office to denote.

T H E R E F O R E he enjoys many notable Prerogatives ; he presides in the Council of State in the Civil Affairs of the Kingdom.

H E dispatches the King's Edicts, and all his other Orders. He has the Inspection of Justice, and is Judge in all Disputes concerning Offices and Officers, regulates their Precedencies, and determines what is the Duty of each Magistrate, that one may not inroach upon another.

T H E S E were the great Prerogatives of the Chancellors of France, whence Roger took them, and of the Kingdom of Sicily in the Time of the Normans. Two principal Dignities, which in a manner vied with that of the Princes themselves ; so that next to the Constable, the Chancellor had the second Place.

T H E first Chancellor we meet with in the Reign of Roger, is Guarino Canzolino, much celebrated in Petrus Diaconus his Appendix to the Chronicle of Cassino ² ; Roger imploy'd him in the most weighty Affairs of State, and gave him the Superintendency and chief Command of these our Provinces. 'Tis said, that Guarino being jealous that the Monks of Cassino would joyn Lothaire's Party, had at last resolv'd to assault their Monastery by Force, for which end he had order'd a Body of Soldiers, and some warlike Machines to be brought from Benevento, Puglia, Calabria, and the Basilicata ; but soon after falling sick in Salerno, and being at the Point of Death, with his last Breath cry'd out ; Alas ! Benedict and Mauro, why do you kill me ? Whence Petrus Diaconus ³ relates, that at the same Instant Crescenzio Romano, a Monk of that Monastery, in a terrible Fright and Trembling, said to the Monks, that he had seen a Vision, in which there appear'd to him a horrible Lake all on Fire, the dreadful Waves of which reach'd to the very Sky ; among which he saw the Soul of the High Chancellor tofs'd up and down ; that he likewise thought he saw two Friers on the Bank of the Lake, and being ask'd by the Eldest of the Two, if he knew who it was that was so tofs'd by the Waves ? answer'd no ; and that the Frier declar'd to him, that it was Guarino's Soul that was condemn'd to be punish'd in such a manner, for having troubled the Monks of Monte Cassino : That he then ask'd the Frier who he was ? who answer'd, that he was Frier Benedict ; upon which Crescenzio awak'd, and the Vision disappear'd.

T H E next who exercis'd the Office of Chancellor in Roger's Time was Robert, of English Extract ⁴. Roger, as has been already observ'd, in the Government of his Dominions, always made use of Ministers of great Learning and Prudence, which he invited from distant Countries ; and as he rais'd George of Antioch to be great Admiral, so likewise he call'd this famous Robert out of England, whom he not only imploy'd in the most important Affairs of State, and to whom he committed the Defence of Salerno, when it was besieg'd by Lothaire, the Prince of Capua, and the Pisans ; but likewise gave him the Government of Puglia and Calabria ; and he was so renown'd for Wisdom and Integrity, that John of Salisbury, Bishop of Chartres ⁵, relates an Adventure which deserves to be taken Notice of in this History. Whilst the Chancellor govern'd Puglia and Calabria, the Church of Avellino happen'd to be vacant by the Death of her Bishop. For the Election of a Successor, it was necessary to have the King's Consent, as was the Custom in all Cathedral Churches : Robert, who was to give it in the King's Name, was earnestly solicited for it by many ; amongst the rest there were three strong Pretenders, an Abbot, an Archdeacon, and a Lay-man belonging to the King's Household, who had a Brother that was a Clergyman ; they all made great Offers to Robert, each of them promis'd him a vast Sum of Money if he would make him Bishop whom they should name ; the Chancellor, who had a mind to expose their Villainy, made a Bargain with each of the Three separately, giving them to understand, that he would do what each of them desir'd : After they had given Pledges and Security for what they had promis'd, the Day appointed for the Election came ; Robert having conven'd the Clergy of Avellino, with many Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates and Persons of Distinction, told the Fraud which the three Candidates had a mind to commit ; they were all Three rejected as guilty of Simony, by the unanimous Suffrage of all the Assembly, and the Money agreed upon was exacted as a Punishment for their Crime ; then Robert got a poor Frier of a good and holy Life, who had no such View, to be elected Bishop.

THE third High Chancellor we find in the Reign of Roger, is the so much renown'd Giorgio Majone. He was born in Bari of very mean Parentage ; but by Nature endow'd with a wonderful Eloquence and Wit, and being but the Son of a poor Oyl-Merchant ¹, he found means to get a Place at Court in the Royal Chancery, where King Roger first made him his Notary ; after having gone through other petty Offices of the Chancery, he was made Vice-Chancellor, and at last High Chancellor, and was so much in Favour with this Prince, that during all his Life he employ'd him in the most weighty Transactions of his Kingdom ; and after Roger's Death, he was so belov'd by William his Son and Successor, which rarely happens, that, besides having made him High Admiral, he intrusted him with the Government of the Kingdom. Under the Two Williams, the chief Personages of these Times held this Office, viz. the Elect of Syracusa, and after him Stephano di Parzio Archbishop of Palermo.

THUS the Dignity of this high Office was as great in Sicily under the Normans, as in France ; neither was it in less Esteem in the Courts of other Princes. But afterwards it was rightly judg'd in Princes to lessen so many and eminent Prerogatives, by reassuming them to themselves from whence they sprung ; of which we have a very notable Instance in the Chancellor of the Holy See of Rome. In old Times, this See had a Chancellor, whose Authority was so great, that he vied with the Pope himself ; on which account it was exercis'd by the chief Personages ; and it was the next Step to the Papacy. Thus Pope Gelasius II. according to the Epitaph compos'd by Pietro Pittaviense, before he was Pope, Archilevita fuit, & Cancellarius Urbis ; and 'tis likewise said, that Alexander II. was Chancellor of the Roman See when he was elected Pope.

BUT after Boniface VIII. saw the Authority of the Chancellor at such a pitch of Greatness, that, as many Writers relate ², quasi de pari cum Papa certabat, he abolish'd this Office of Chancellor in Rome, and assuming it to himself, appointed only a Vice-Chancellor there ; whence this Office of Vice-Chancellor in Rome acknowledgeth none superior to it in the same Sphere, seeing the Chancellorship is lodg'd in the Pope ; and whereas this Office was formerly given to such as were not Cardinals, when Cardinals came to get it, they still retain'd the Name of Vice-Chancellors, though that of Chancellor be abolish'd ; just so as that Cardinal who is Head of the Pope's Datary, is call'd Prodatary, and Vicedatary, though he acts not in the Place of another Minister superior to him, for both the Chancery and Datary are lodg'd in the Pope.

FOR the very same Reason the Vice-Chancellor is mention'd only in the Sixth Decretal ; as is taken notice of in the Gloss ³, and by Gomes on the Rules of the Chancery ; though Onuphrius Panvinus, in his Book de Pontificibus, says, that from the Time of Honorius III. there were no more Chancellors in Rome, but only Vice-Chancellors.

THIS supreme Office of great Chancellor had the same Fate in our Kingdom ; for in the Time of the Catholick King, and of the Emperor Charles V. the Chancery was in the King's Person ⁴, and therefore a new Tribunal was erected, still call'd the Chancery, and manag'd by Regents, call'd Regents of the Chancery, who perform all the Duties formerly incumbent on the High Chancellor, for they subscribe the Petitions that are presented to the Prince, and the special Grants, and dispatch the King's Edicts and Orders. They are Judges of Differences amongst Officers, decide their Precedency, and prescribe to each Magistrate his Duty ; the Chancery is lodg'd in them, and they have the Charge of the Records and Registers, and all that formerly belong'd to the High Chancellor; therefore they have a Secretary, and many other inferior Officers, who are call'd Officers of the Chancery; of which we shall discourse in another Place, when we come to treat of this Tribunal.

THAT Office, which is now in the Family of the Princes of Avellino, depends on the Chancery; for their Prerogatives are restricted purely to the College of Doctors, and they have only Power to confer the Degree of Doctor, and for that end to call a Convocation of Doctors, in order to examine the Candidates, to approve of, or reject them, and to do other Things thereunto belonging; for with us it does not belong to the Universities to confer the Degree of Doctor, but to the Prince who has lodg'd this Power with the High Chancellor and his College. There were many such Chancellors in France, such as the Chancellor of the University of Paris, which of old was an Office of so great Importance, that Boniface VIII. on account of the great Affairs he had in France, and that he might have a particular Authority over that University, especially with respect to the Divines who receive their Degrees, Benediction and Commission, to preach over all the World, from the Chancellor, usurp'd it to himself; but after Boniface's Death, the University of Paris left no Stone unturn'd to recover this Office, insomuch that it was restor'd them by Benedict XI. his Successor; and to prevent the like Usurpation in Time to come, it was annex'd to a Canonship of the Cathedral Church of Paris.

FOR this Reason Morino Freccia treating of these Offices, and having an Eye only to what was practis'd in his own Time, ranks the High Chancellor last of all; for now-a-days the great Chancellor, who is look'd upon as one of the Seven Officers of the Kingdom, is only a Shadow of what this Office was formerly: He enjoys but one of the many Prerogatives that of old adorn'd that Dignity, which is now in a manner abolish'd, and all its Privileges and Pre-eminences lodg'd in the King, who therefore has erected a new supreme Tribunal in its Place, call'd the Court of Chancery, administred, as we have said, by Regents.

HOWEVER we must not omit, that in the Times of the Emperor Frederick II. and King Charles of Anjou, though this Office was much decay'd in its antient Splendor, yet it retain'd Jurisdiction over all the Clergy of the King's Palace, and all his Chaplains: *Marino Freccia*² is much surpriz'd to find a Laick have Jurisdiction over the Clergy, seeing both by Divine, Canonical and Imperial Laws, they are exempted from Laick Jurisdiction; so that he endeavours to explain what he reckon'd a Paradox, by saying, that this Kingdom being a Part of St. Peter's Patrimony, 'tis to be believ'd the Kings have been invested with this Prerogative by the Apostolick See, therefore they are to be look'd upon as Ministers and Delegates of that See. Neither ought this to seem strange, says he, because the Kings are not to be consider'd as mere Laicks, seeing they are anointed, and were also Priests of Old. And not content with this, he adds, that Frederick, and especially Charles, were authoriz'd by the Apostolick See, to appoint a Judge over all the Clergy of the Royal Household; and that afterwards, it seeming very unbecoming and unhand-some for a Laick to exercise Jurisdiction over the Clergy, Alphonfus I. appointed one of his own Chaplains to be Judge, who exercis'd Jurisdiction over all the other Chaplains and Clergy of the Royal Chapel, and was therefore call'd Chaplain Major, and that by Permission of the Apostolick See; so that the High Chancellor had no longer such Jurisdiction, all being left to the Chaplain Major.

BUT Freccia had no Reason to be so much surpriz'd, for in these Times the Chaplain Major was subordinate to the High Chancellor, and assisted in the Chancery; for in France, according to *Peter de Marca*³, the same was practis'd under the Carlovingian Race; when the Maires of the Palace presided in the Royal Palace in Matters of State, and the Chaplain Major, likewise call'd Archchaplain, in Ecclesiastick and Spiritual Matters, who, as Hincmare informs us, Vice Regis in consessu Episcoporum & Procerum jus dicebat, nisi causæ gravitas exigeret Regis præsentiam. And it was not in the Time of Alphonfus I. of Aragon, that this Pre-eminence was disjoin'd from the Office of High Chancellor, but long before, when Charles I. of Anjou had fix'd his Royal Seat in Naples, and appointed one of his Chaplains as Judge, who exercis'd Jurisdiction independently on the High Chancellor, over all the other Chaplains and Clergy of the Royal Chapel; whence he got the Title of Protophain Royal, or Master of the Royal Chapel, and at last Chaplain Major; of which Office, and such like, introduc'd by Charles I. of Anjou into his Royal Palace at Naples, we shall treat in his Reign.

T H U S in process of Time, the great and many Prerogatives of this Officer being lodg'd in the King's Chancery; the High Chancellor retains no other Power, but that of conferring the Degrees of Doctor of Law, Divinity, Philosophy, and Physick, and the Superintendency of the College of Doctors¹. Nevertheless he has the Honour to wear Purple, to sit in Parliament, and other publick Assemblies where the King is present; but in the sixth Place on the King's Left Hand next to the great Protonotary, and he is also counted among the Seven Officers of the Crown.

Of the Lord Chief Justice.

A L T H O U G H in France the Office of Lord Chief Justice was subordinate to the great Chancellor, who was the Magistrate of Magistrates, and Head of all the Officers of Justice, and in the Reign of Roger his Authority was not so ample; nevertheless William his Successor having appointed the Tribunal of the High Court, and Frederick II. having afterwards by many Constitutions, establish'd, that the Chief Justice who presided in this Tribunal, should be Head, and Supreme over all the other Justices of the Provinces, this Office came to be look'd upon not only as one of the chief and greatest of the Kingdom, but to have the second Rank next to the great Constable; for which Reason he sat next the King on his Left Hand, cloathed in Purple, and had the Standard for his particular Badge; of which with us there remains as yet some Vestige; for when Sentence is to be put in Execution upon a Person condemn'd to die, this Standard is display'd from a Balcony, in token of the Chief Justice's Authority. By how much the more the Tribunal of the High Court was exalted by Frederick II. who made it the Supreme and Superior to all the other Courts of the Kingdom, where not only civil and criminal Causes were to be discuss'd, but likewise the Feodal relating to the Baronies, Counties, and all Appeals from the Courts of the other Justices of the Provinces, even those delegated by the King, and subjected all the Dukes, Princes, and all the other Barons of the Kingdom to its Jurisdiction; and besides gave it Power to take Cognizance of Crimes of High Treason: So much the more was the Lord Chief Justice rais'd above the other Officers of the Crown, and deservedly call'd Chief Justice; and therefore Frederick in one of his Constitutions¹ calls him Luminare Majus, on account of the Lustre with which he eclipseth the other inferior Justices, so that when he visits the Provinces, their Office ceases.

W E are to observe, that from this Time of the Norman Kings began that Division of the Provinces, that in a great measure continues to this Day: They were not then call'd Provinces, but Giustizierati from Giustizieri, the Justices who govern'd them²; as in the Time of the Longobards, the Castaldati were so call'd, from the Castaldi, who had the Government of them. In effect, in the Time of King William II. Tancred Count of Lecce, was Justice of Puglia, and Terra di Lavoro; Count Pietro Celano, and Riccardo Fondano were also Justices of the same Provinces³. Thus in later Times we frequently meet with in the Registers recorded by *Tutino*⁴, that when these Justices were sent into the Provinces, they were not call'd Chief Justices, but only Justices of the Provinces which they govern'd, in order to distinguish them from the Chief Justice of the Kingdom. Thus Giovanni Scotto was call'd Justice of Apruzo, and Guglielmo Sanfelice, Justice of Terra di Lavoro, whence those Governments got the Name of Provinces, such as the Justiziarato of Calabria, Puglia, Terra di Lavoro, and others, which are now call'd Provinces; and even in these same Times of the Normans and likewise of the Suevi; one Province was frequently govern'd by two Justices, as in the Time of William II. Luca Guarna and Filippo da Camarota were both Justices of Salerno at the same Time. And in the Year 1197 we find¹, that Roberto di Venosa, and Giovanni di Frassineto were both Justices of *Terra di Lavoro*². But Matters were afterwards put upon a better Footing by Frederick II. who for each Province appointed but one Justice, who was to have one single Judge, and one Notary, whom we now call Mastrodatti, as was establish'd in the Constitution Occupatis in the first Book. This was continued by the Kings of the Family of Anjou, who, to each Province sent only one Justice, whom we now call President.

In the Reign of Roger, we find only one Chief Justice in the Archives of the Monastery of the Trinity in Venosa, and in an Instrument recorded by Tutino, we read, that in the Year 1141. Errico Ollia was Chief Justice. Ego Henricus Ollia Dei Gratia Regalis Justitiarius; but in the Reigns of the Two Williams his Successors, many are mention'd by Romualdus Archbishop of Salerno, and in the Chronicle of Notar Riccardo da S. Germano; such as Roberto Conte di Caserta, Ruggiero Conte d'Andria, and Luca Guarna, as shall be related in the Reigns of these Princes; whence they are mistaken, who believe that this Office was introduc'd into the Kingdom by Frederick II.: For though this Emperor, by means of his many Constitutions relating to this Office, regulated and put it upon a better Footing, yet he was not the first that introduc'd it, which is evident from these very Constitutions. There were other Laws publish'd afterwards, in the Reigns of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, concerning this Office of Chief Justice, and we have many Constitutions of Charles II. concerning his Jurisdiction and Duty; but being to discourse more at large of this Officer, when we come to treat of the Tribunal of the Curia Vicaria, we shall therefore refer it to that Place; for in process of Time, under the Aragon and Austrian Princes, other Tribunals were erected; and as that of the High Court lost its antient Authority and Dignity, so likewise the Chief Justice was in a great measure stript of his Splendor and Prerogatives, insomuch that now he enjoys no more than a bare Title of Honour, with the Privileges common to other Officers of the Crown, only on publick and solemn Occasions, he sits next to the High Constable, and wears Purple.

Of the High Chamberlain.

OUR High Chamberlain or Chief Officer of the King's Chamber of Accounts, was the same with the High Treasurer of France, or Superintendant of the Finances. He had the Charge of the King's Person and Household, provided Cloaths for him and his Children: Saw the Centinels rightly plac'd about the Court, dispos'd of the Ushers, cloath'd the King's Household, kept the Jewels, the Gold, the Silver; the Silk and Woollen Robes. But his chief Business was to receive all the Money that was sent to the King's Treasury; to have Jurisdiction over all the other Treasurers of the Kingdom, all the Receivers of the Revenues and Customs, and the Officers belonging thereto, whom he could put in or turn out as he saw Reason. And seeing, as in France, when Treasurers were sent to the particular Provinces, it was thought necessary to erect a supreme Tribunal of the Finances, to which all the inferior Tribunals were accountable; so with us a new supreme and general Tribunal of the Finances was erected, the Head of which was the High Chamberlain, Chamberlain, to whom, all the particular Treasurers of the Provinces, Toll-gatherers, Officers of the Customs, Receivers of the Revenues, and all others, were to be accountable, therefore he was call'd the Chief Officer of the Chamber of Accounts, which is much the same with the Comes sacrarum largitionum among the Romans; and as they had many Quæstores pecuniarum, so likewise with us there were many Under-Treasurers, Chamberlains, Toll-gatherers, Custom-House Officers, and others, whose Business it was to collect the King's Money. In the Reigns of Frederick II. and of the Kings of the House of Anjou, this Tribunal was govern'd by the Masters of Accounts, in the Court of the King's Mint; they were call'd Masters of Accounts, because their greatest Business was to take care that the Under-Chamberlains, Treasurers, Custom-House Officers, and others, should give account of their Administration, and to receive from them an Account of what Money they receiv'd and sent to the King's Treasury.

G R E A T Privileges and Prerogatives were given to these Masters of Accounts by King Lewis of Anjou, and Queen *Joan I.*¹; and they were likewise call'd Masters of Accounts of the High Court; and how illustrious a Dignity this was in the Times of the Kings of the House of Anjou, may be seen by the Personages who bore these Employments; for we read, that the famous Andrea d'Isfernia, the renown'd Niccolo Alunno d'Alife, and other eminent Civilians in the Reigns of King Charles II. Robert, and other Kings their Successors, were Masters of Accounts.

A F T E R W A R D S when the Family of Arragon came to reign, Alphonfus I. annex'd to this Tribunal one created by himself, call'd Summaria, which was govern'd by four Presidents that were Lawyers, and two private Men, besides one who presided over all in place of the High Chamberlain, and therefore was call'd his Lieutenant². For which Cause this Tribunal was more eminent, and had greater Authority; for besides the Care of the Royal Demefne, it was vested with that of Feodal Causes, which formerly belong'd to the High Court. From hence arose the Name of Camera Summaria, and Presidents of the Summaria; the Denomination (not to amuse ourselves with the specious Etymologies of Summa rei, or Rationis, as *Luca di Penna*³ dreameth, who was follow'd by *Marino Freccia*⁴, for which he was check'd by Moles) was taken from their summary Examination of the Accounts made up by the Masters of Accounts. And as the French call this Tribunal the Chamber of Accounts, or of the Finances, so with us, for the same Reason, it's call'd Camera della Summaria. Which is evident from a Privilege granted by the same King Alphonfus, inserted in our Statutes⁵, where the King plainly says, that this Tribunal is call'd Summaria, quod rationes ipsæ in Camera per Præsidentes, & Rationales ibidem ordinatos SUMMARIE viderentur; of which we shall have Occasion to discourse more at large, when we come to treat of the Institution of this Tribunal in the Reign of Alphonfus I.

T H O' this supreme Office of High Chamberlain, according to Freccia, was put upon a better footing, like that of France by Charles I. of Anjou; yet it was not he that first introduc'd it, for it was known among our Norman and Suevian Kings; and many Chamberlains are mention'd during the Reigns of these Princes, and particularly in that of Roger; but Length of Time having bereav'd us of their Names, we have not been able to record them. Yet in the Time of William I. his Successor, among others, we find, that Gaito Joario was High Chamberlain of the King's Household; after whose Death Gaito Pietro an Eunuch succeeded in that Office, both of them *Saracens*⁶. The Word Gaito, in the Language of these People, was the Name of an Office, and signifies Captain⁷. And in the Reign of William II. we read, that Gaito Riccardo was High Chamberlain of the Household⁸; and that Gaito Martino had the Charge of the Revenues of the Custom-House. And under the same King, we likewise find mention made of the Chamberlains of Calabria, who resided in Reggio, among these we find Giovanni Colomeno, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the Reign of this Prince⁹. Thus also in the Times of their Suevian Successors, and in the Constitutions of Frederick ¹ we read many Laws, both concerning the Office of High Chamberlain, and other Officers, as may be seen in Toppi.

CHARLES of Anjou reduc'd this Office into a better Form, after the same Method with that of France, by establishing one sole High Chamberlain, whom all the other Chamberlains of the Provinces were to obey, and to whom they were all accountable, as supreme Officer of all the Finances. And this Prince left us many written Laws and Establishments concerning the Duty of this Officer, by framing a particular Regulation for his Office, in doing of which he could not forbear to make use of the French Terms; for he ordain'd that it should be in the Power of the High Chamberlain to depute, substitute, and correct the Graffieri, or Clerks, whose Business it was to write and note, as that of the Comptrollers to inspect and observe that there was no Fraud in the Collections. He appointed likewise Maestri degli Arresti, Masters of Arrests; whence this French Term has continu'd among us to this Day; and therefore we say, gli Arresti della Camera, which they call the Decisions and Decrees of their Parliaments ².

IN after Times the High Chamberlain began to lose these his so great Prerogatives, but it was not so with the Tribunal of the Camera della Summaria, which had its own Presidents and Accomptants, and was govern'd by his Lieutenant, who, tho' call'd so, was made by the King, and not by the High Chamberlain; whence it came, that tho' this Tribunal was put upon an equal footing with the other supreme Tribunals of the Kingdom, yet the High Chamberlain is now no more than a bare Title of Honour, neither does he concern himself with the Affairs of this Tribunal, nor has he any Thing to do with the Revenues of the Camera Summaria; but all is manag'd by the Lieutenant and his Officers, who are accountable to the Viceroy, who is in place of the King, there being a particular Treasurer who has the Charge of the King's Money. Nevertheless he retains his Prerogatives, as well in sitting on the King's Left-Hand, next the Chief Justice ³, in the fourth Place, as at solemn Marriages, and other publick Occasions, in wearing purple Robes, and he is reckon'd one of the seven Officers of the Crown, and till of late he had the Emoluments.

Of the Great Protonotary.

PIETRO VINCENTI has written a small Treatise concerning the Protonotaries of the Kingdom, wherein he has given us rather a long Catalogue of those who have exercis'd this Office, than describ'd their Business and Charge. The Protonotary, or Logotheta with us, certainly had his Rise from the Greeks, as the Word itself testifies; nevertheless this Office was known among the Romans under another Name. In the Empire, as Head of the Notaries, he was call'd Primicerius Notariorum, and was honour'd with the Proconsular Dignity; and after he had exercis'd his Office two Years, he became Illustris. In the ancient Empire he had three Sorts or Degrees of Notaries under him, which are plainly describ'd in the Theodosian Code ¹. The first were call'd Tribuni Prætoriani, & Notarii; and as Cassiodore ² witnesseth, were call'd Candidati; and were of the same Dignity with Counts. The second were plainly nam'd Tribuni & Notarii; these were of equal Dignity with the Vicarii. Lastly, the third were call'd Notarii Familiares, or Domestici, who were of Consular Rank and Dignity.

BUT 'tis needless to confound these Notaries with those now a-days, whom the Romans call'd Tabelliones, whose Office and Employment were quite different, as shall be related. Neither are we to confound the Office of Great Protonotary, in the

² Cassiodor. lib. 4. epist. 3.

Times of our Norman and Suevian Kings, and of those of the Houses of Anjou and Aragon, with that of the Viceprotonotary at this Time, which is solely confin'd to the making of Notaries, and Judices Chartularii.

THE Office of Great Protonotary in the Times of these Kings, was so eminent, that in a great measure it resembled that of Primicerius Notariorum among the Roman. These, as Cassiodorus ¹, and Gotofredus ² describe them to us, were of the Prince's Council, and acted therein as Secretaries; the Imperial Answers and Decrees pass'd thro' their Hands, and the Orations of the Emperors to the Senate, were frequently deliver'd by the Primicerius: In short, he was the Prince's Secretary, with whom he trusted all his Secrets and Designs, and therefore by his Office he was constantly oblig'd to attend him, and see his Imperial Commands dispatch'd. For which Cause he had under him these three Degrees of Notaries, which were form'd into a Body or College, and were much the same with the present Secretaries of State, or of the King's Cabinet, or Household, of whom we shall treat in the Reign of Charles II. of Anjou.

SUCH was the Office and Power of the Great Protonotary in the Times of the abovemention'd Kings. His chief Business was not to make Notaries, and Judices Chartularii, but constantly to attend the King's Person, receive the Petitions and Memorials that were to be presented to him; give Audience to those who had recourse to the King, and give the King account of what had pass'd: All Letters Patent pass'd thro' his Hands, and were drawn up by him. All new Constitutions, Edicts, and Statutes made by the King, were penn'd and seal'd by the Protonotary. Whatever the Prince resolv'd or decreed in Council, or elsewhere, he couch'd it in Writing, either in the Form of a Sentence, Decree, Letters Patent, or Special Grant ³. And we see to what a Pitch of Eminency this Office was rais'd in the Reign of Charles II. of Anjou ⁴, when it was exercis'd by Bartolomeo di Capua, thro' whose Hands the most weighty and important Affairs of the Crown pass'd.

BUT as in process of Time, the Tribunal of the Curia Vicaria depress'd the High Justice, and reduc'd him to the Condition he is in at present, so the Erection of the Council of Sancta Clara, in the Time of Alphonfus I. King of Aragon, almost quite eclips'd the Great Protonotary; for tho' Alphonfus, when he vested the President of this Council with the same Power, declar'd, that he did not mean by that to inroach upon the Prerogatives of the Great Protonotary; and tho', either he or his Viceprotonotary was admitted to preside in that Council, and frequently hear Causes as well as the President; nevertheless by Degrees this Office was afterwards reduc'd to a meer Title of Honour, and the Protonotary excluded from that Council; for being oblig'd to be always present in Person, and not having Power to elect a Viceprotonotary without a new Grant, which the King refus'd, the Viceprotonotary was no more made by him, but directly by the King, as is still practis'd. Besides, when the Great Protonotary was elected by the King, with great Solemnity he took Possession of his Place in the Council of Sancta Clara, and was present with the President and all the other Counsellors at all the Sentences and Decrees that were given; and at last the King made the President of that Council Viceprotonotary: Thus these two Offices were united in the same Person, as shall be related more at large in the Reign of Alphonfus I.

IN process of Time, when the great Barons were advanc'd to this Office, and no Regard had to Lawyers, as in the Time of Bartolomeo di Capua; the Great Protonotaries, as Persons of high Quality, in a manner disdain'd to go in Person to the Council of Sancta Clara, the Viceprotonotaries went; and these being no more made by those, but by the King, the Great Protonotaries at last came to be excluded altogether out of that Council. On the other hand, the Presidents of the Council, whose Authority was very great, excluded afterwards the Viceprotonotaries from all the Prerogatives which formerly they had, as representing the Person of the Great Protonotary; so that their Authority came to be restricted to the sole making of Notaries, and Judices Chartularii, &c. which they still have.

BUT tho' the Office of Viceprotonotary was thus restricted, yet the making of Notaries and the Judices Chartularii, the examining their Privileges and Protocols brought great Emoluments, which occasion'd grievous Disputes betwixt the Great Protonotaries, who pretended they belong'd to them, and the Viceprotonotaries, who being appointed by the King, appropriated all to themselves; and *Marino Freccia*¹ relates a bitter Dispute that aroſe in his Time betwixt the Duke of Castro-villari Great Protonotary, and the famous Cico Loffredo Viceprotonotary. At present all these Disputes are over; for the Viceprotonotary holding his Office of none but the King, enjoys all the Profits, and now the Office of Great Protonotary is only a bare Title of Honour, without any Emoluments, but he still retains the Honour of Purple Robes, and his Seat in Parliament on the King's Right-Hand next the High Admiral.

BUT it must be observ'd, that the present Notaries, who are made by the Viceprotonotary, bear no Resemblance with those Notaries mention'd in the Theodosian Code, and by Cassiodorus, who, as we have said, resembled more the Officers of the King's Secretary or Chancery Offices, who have the Charge of the King's publick Acts and Writs, than the present Notaries, whose Business relates only to the Deeds and Writs of private Persons, tho' their Office be of a publick nature. These are more like the Tabelliones of the ancient Romans, whose Office was very much the same, with this one Difference, that the present Notaries perform the Office both of the Tabularii and the Tabelliones.

AMONG the Romans, those who were appointed to keep the publick Archives, where the Publick Instruments and Records were preserv'd, were call'd Tabularii, because the Place where these Things were kept was call'd Tabularium, and the Greeks call'd it Grammatophylacium, or *Archium*²; and the Care of these Places was often committed to publick Slaves, that is, such as were bought with the publick Money of the Cities or Provinces; and these Tabularii being publick Slaves, could not only act, covenant, acquire, and in their Names take Possession for the Publick, but likewise for private Persons³. The Emperor Arcadius afterwards turn'd out these publick Slaves from the Tabularia, and order'd that the Tabularii should be Freemen⁴, who, as publick Persons, could covenant for others, in the same manner as a Magistrate⁵. But the Office of these Tabularii was only to take care of the publick Instruments and Records in the Archives, and as publick Persons to act and covenant for others.

THE Tabelliones were those who indited and wrote Testaments or last Wills, and drew up Contracts, making them publick Instruments in the Presence of the *Tabularii*⁶, which were afterwards given to the Tabularii to be kept. These Tabelliones were likewise call'd Nomici, that is to say, Juris studiosi, because in order to be skill'd in drawing up and writing these Instruments and Testaments, it behoved them to have some Knowledge of the Laws⁷. Some interpret the Word Nomicus, viz. Legitimus, because he made all Deeds lawful. However that may be, 'tis certain, that the Tabelliones, whom we now call Notaries, were quite different from the Tabularii, who had the Charge of the Archives; and seeing they were distinguish'd by Justinian in his *Novellæ*⁸, 'tis needless to confound them, as *Accursius*⁹, *Goveanus*¹⁰, and *Forcatulus*¹¹ have done.

NEVERTHELESS these two Employments were afterwards united in our Notaries; for as formerly the Tabelliones wrote the Instruments in the Presence of the Tabularii, who preserv'd them in the Archives, it was afterwards brought into Practice, that the Instruments or Testaments were wrote in the Presence of the Tabelliones, without having recourse to the Tabularii, and the Tabelliones made Protocols of them, and kept them in their own Houses, not in the Archives. Whence, by confounding these two Offices, a Notary was look'd upon as a publick Person, that could covenant for other People, as the Tabularii did.

THEREFORE the Office of Notary came to be in greater Esteem and Credit; so that when Princes made them, there were certain Laws enacted concerning them, and many Qualifications requir'd, such as Integrity, a good Reputation, Fidelity, and Knowledge; a fair Hand, and a ready Conception, in order to couch in Writing, the Articles agreed upon betwixt Parties; they were to be Close, Freemen, Christians, and Natives of the Places where they were to officiate, that they might know the contracting Parties. And this Office requiring the utmost Fidelity, with us of old, the Nobility were not ashamed to exercise it; and, as once it was not below the Nobility, particularly those of Salerno, to practise Physick, so likewise many Noblemen of our Sedeli * did not think it below them to be Notaries formerly; Marino Freccia ¹ declares, that he has seen many Instruments, Records, Inventories, and other ancient Documents, written by the Hands of noble Notaries, whose Families, he says, he would not name, for fear of displeasing their Posterity. Whence 'tis a Rule among us, that the Office of Notary does not derogate from a Man's Nobility, and that Notaries are not reckon'd among Tradesmen ².

Of the High Steward.

AS upon the Suppression of the Maires of the Palace in France, four new Offices, with respect to War, Justice, the Finances, and the King's Household had their Rise; for War, the High Constable; for Justice, the High Chancellor; for the Finances, the High Treasurer, chief Officer of the Chamber of Accounts; and for the King's Household, the Great Master of France, of old call'd the Count of the Palace, that is to say, Judge of the King's Household, who had the Government thereof.

IN the same manner in the Kingdom of Sicily, besides the Officers already mention'd, in imitation of France, the Great Master of Sicily was created, and also by a French Word call'd Siniscalco, or Steward of the King's Household, of which he had the Charge, and furnish'd it with all Sorts of Provisions; it was likewise his Business to provide Corn and all other Fodder for the King's Horses, to take care of the Forests, and the Game reserv'd for the King's Diversion, to have Inspection over the King's Domesticks, and other Servants, whom he had Power to correct and punish, except the Chamberlains, who were of the King's Bedchamber, and who undress'd and put the King to Bed, and all Privy Counsellors were also exempted from the Jurisdiction of the High Steward ¹.

THEREFORE he was Judge of the King's Household, and the whole Family of the Royal Palace was under his Care, as also all the other inferior Officers, who according to their several Employments had different Names, whence there sprung many Offices that were not Offices of the Crown, but of the Royal Household.

IN the Time of the Normans we find there were High Ssewards, call'd so, because they were at the Head of, and commanded all the other inferior Stewards of the King's Household; and tho' we cannot discover from Records who was Roger's High Steward, yet in the Reign of William I. his Successor, we find Simone a Kinsman of the famous Majone, was High Steward, whom Pellegrinus also mentions ², and to whom William gave the Government of Puglia ³; so that without doubt this Office, as well as the rest, was introduc'd among us by the Normans.

'TIS likewise evident, that in the Time of the Kings of the House of Anjou, particularly of Charles II. this Office was put on a better Footing, according to the Establishment of this Office recorded by Freccia; whence sprung those lesser Offices of the King's Household in Naples depending on the High Steward; and the Reason was, because Charles I. of Anjou, having fix'd his Royal Seat in Naples, the High Steward distinguish'd himself above all the other Officers of the King's Household, which were many; therefore in the Time of these Kings of the House of Anjou, we often find mention made of the Stewards of the King's Household, of the King's Masters of the Horse, his Masters of the Pantry, Grooms of the Stables, Chief Querries, Masters of the Household, Masters of the Stud, Masters Oeconomists, and the Senescalli Regii Hospitii, as we read in the Time of Queen Joan I. Phibillus Gaetanus Reginalis hospitii Senescallus; and in the Time of Charles III. Nobilis vir Bartholomæus Tomacellus miles Regii hospitii Senescallus; and under King Ladislaus we find Paolino Scaglione High Steward to this King, and others mention'd by *Tutino*¹. So likewise there were other Officers of the King's Household under the High Steward, such as the Master Cook, the Master Butcher, the Judge of the King's Household, the King's Chamberlains, his Huntsmen, Birdcatcher, Falconer, and others, of whom we shall have occasion to discourse more at large in the Reigns of these Princes.

³ Capececiatt. lib. 2. pag. 77.

BUT as in the Time of the Kings of the House of Anjou, the High Steward on account of so many Officers that were under him, was at his highest Pitch of Grandeur, and his Prerogatives were still continu'd to him under the Kings of the House of Arragon, because they also made Naples the Place of their Residence; so afterwards, when this Kingdom came under the Dominion of the House of Austria, and Naples was no more the Seat of the Kings, the Prerogatives of the High Steward were much diminish'd, and many of the abovemention'd Officers of the King's Household suppress'd, and at last for the same Reason it was reduc'd to a bare Title of Honour, without Function or Office.

BY this Suppression, many of these Offices that depended on the High Steward came to be more esteem'd, and to be reckon'd (tho' none of the seven Offices of the Crown) at least among the Chief of the Kingdom, no ways subordinate to others, such as the Master of the King's Studs, his chief Huntsman, who has the Overseeing of all the King's Huntsmen, his Forests and Game; and others, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in a more fit Place. 'Tis worthy of Observation, that in the Notitia Imperii there are to be found Officers that have some Resemblance with each of those we have hitherto nam'd; but as for the chief Huntsman, 'tis in vain to expect such a one among the Romans, for their Emperors had no Inclination for Hunting, as our Kings had, who look'd upon that Exercise as proper for Warriors, such as they were, who often went in Person at the Head of their Armies; they reckon'd that by going a Hunting they made themselves acquainted with the Situation and Position of the Mountains, Valleys, Hillocks, Plains and Rivers, which, generally speaking, have the same Positions all the World over.

THUS at present among us, by the long Absence of our Kings, who have their Royal Seats elsewhere, the Office of High Steward is in a manner extinct, and only continues to be a Title of Honour; yet on some Occasions, such as in Parliaments, and at publick Solemnities, he retains his Prerogatives and Pre-eminences; he wears Purple Robes, and sits in the last Place at the King's Feet, and is reckon'd one of the seven Officers of the Crown.

THUS did Roger establish his Kingdom, and such were the Laws and Polity which he introduc'd, and the Officers by whom the Kingdom was manag'd, which after so much Labour he brought to a solid State of Tranquillity. But his heroick Spirit, not content with having establish'd the Monarchy in this manner, was wholly bent on acquiring new Kingdoms and Provinces, tho' situated in the more remote and distant Parts of Africa.

Roger's Expedition into Africa. His Virtues and Death.

IN the mean time Pope Innocent, after he had govern'd the Church of Rome for the Space of Fourteen Years, on the 24th Day of September in the Year 1143, died in Rome much afflicted with the Trouble which the Arnaldists and Romans gave him, who had undertaken to restore their native Country to its antient Liberty, and to re-instate the antient Senatorian and Equestrian Orders, and to humble the Ecclesiastical State, on which account they had continual Broils with this Pope.

GUIDO CASTELLO a Cardinal, by the Title of St. Mark, was elected in his Room, and proclaim'd Pope by the Name of Celestine II. who had scarcely been Six Months in the Chair, when he became jealous of Roger's Greatness, and endeavour'd to break the Peace made by his Predecessor with this Prince; but he was prevented by Death on the 8th Day of March in the following Year 1144. The Cardinals elected Gerardo Cacciaemico da Bologna, Cardinal of the Holy Cross, his Successor, who took the Name of Lucius II.

THIS Pope, treading in the Footsteps of Celestine, was ill pleas'd with Roger; and this Prince, endeavouring to make him his Friend, they had an Interview in the Monastery of Cassino; but not coming to an Agreement, by reason of the Obstacles which the Cardinals threw in the Way, the King in a hostile Manner entered the State of the Church, took Terracina, and many other Places in the *Campagna di Roma*¹. This made the Cardinals immediately remove the Obstacles, and the Pope soon came to an Agreement, and having granted Roger many Prerogatives, Terracina and the other Places were restor'd to him again. Then it was, that this Pope, in order to the better establishing of the Monarchy of Sicily, besides what Urban II. had confer'd on Roger, granted him the Ring, the Sandals, the Scepter, the Mitre and the Dalmatick, and promis'd not to send any Person as Legate into Roger's Dominions but such as should be acceptable to him², (tho' *Sigonius*³ says, that these Ornaments were granted to Roger the following Year 1145, by Honorius III. and not by Pope Lucius II.) whence our Kings value themselves in being not only Lords in Temporals, but likewise in Spirituals in Sicily; and indeed on the Money which William I. caus'd to be coin'd, on one Side we see the King crown'd with a Crown of four Rays, the Verge in his Hand, with the Dalmatick or Stole Cross-wise on his Breast, and seated on the Royal Throne with the Sandals on his Feet⁴.

THE Arnaldists, who continu'd to plague Rome under the famous Arnaldo da Brescia their Head, who had been condemn'd by Innocent II. in the Lateran Council, accus'd Lucius before Conrade King of the Romans, that for a great Sum of Money, he had granted Roger his Enemy these Prerogatives, and had enter'd into a Confederacy with him⁵.

ROGER return'd afterwards to Palermo, and this very Year Anfusus Prince of Capua his Son, died, which Principality Roger gave to William, whom he also made Duke of Naples; and who afterwards succeeded him in his Dominions.

*Augustinus Inveges*¹; and *Camillus Pellegrinus*² relate, that Tancred his second Son, Prince of Bari and Taranto, died either in the Year 1142 or 1143, and that Anfusus his third Son, died this Year 1144. Roger this same Year return'd to Capua, where he call'd the first general Meeting; for that which a little before he had call'd in Ariano, consisted only of the Prelates and Barons of Puglia: His Son William, with the Archbishops, Bishops and Abbots, with many Counts and Barons, were present in this Meeting; in which many provident Laws were made for the good Government of the Kingdom, and many Law-Suits were compounded, and particularly one that had arisen betwixt John Bishop of Aversa, and Walter Abbot of St. Lorenzo, in the same City, about the fishing of the Lake of *Patria*³; the Writ of which is recorded by *Chioccarelli*⁴.

IN the Year 1145, Pope Lucius II. died in Rome, and the Cardinals elected Bernard Abbot of St. Anastasius, Disciple of St. Bernard, his Successor, who took the Name of Eugene III. who, notwithstanding that the Romans and Arnaldists continued to disturb him, hearing that the Affairs of the Christians in Palestine grew worse and worse, resolv'd to relieve those Holy Places, and, by his Letters, and the Persuasion of St. Bernard, the Emperor Conrad, and Lewis King of France, were mov'd to go with a great and powerful Army to the Holy Land. Roger would not enter into this Confederacy, because the Intent of it was to preserve the Kingdom of Jerusalem to Baldwin III. and, as we have said, he had always been push'd on by Adelaida his Mother, to conquer it for himself; so that having settled his Dominions in a solid and lasting Peace, and being of a heroick Spirit, and covetous of Dominion, he resolv'd to extend his Conquests to other more remote Parts. Therefore he made every thing ready for an Expedition into Africa, and having order'd a great Fleet to rendezvous in Sicily, he embark'd in it, and steer'd for the Kingdom of Tunis, and having attack'd that King, he made himself Master of the Cities of Tripoly, Stace and Cassia, and so harass'd him in other Parts of the Kingdom, that he forc'd him to buy his Peace for a yearly Tribute⁵, which continu'd to be pay'd for the Space of Thirty Years, both to himself and his Son William; whence, according to *Inveges*⁶, the Church of Tripoli in Africa was made Suffragan to that of Palermo. Roger, proud of having made the King of Tripoli Tributary to him, took for his military Motto, which he caus'd to be engraven upon his Sword, this Verse, Appulus, & Calaber, Siculus mihi servit, & Afer.

HE likewise carried his victorious Arms into Greece; for the Emperor Callo-Joannes dying about this Time, was succeeded in the Empire by his Son Emanuel, who sent Ambassadors to the King, desiring to enter into Alliance with him by Marriage, and Roger, that it might take Effect, sent Ambassadors to Constantinople; but the perfidious Greek changing his Mind, and amusing them for some Time, caus'd them to be put in Prison; which so irrag'd Roger, that he order'd a strong Fleet to be conven'd at Otranto, and sent it with a great many of his Barons into Greece, under the Command of George of Antioch his High Admiral, who having taken the City of Mutine, fell upon the Island of Corfu; and from thence he sail'd into the Morea, and scowering along into the Gulf of Saronico near Cancrea, a Port belonging to Corinth, he destroy'd all that Country with Fire and Sword; from thence he went and ransack'd all Achaia, and ruin'd Thebe, and committed Hostilities in all Places of the Negropont and Bæotia; from whence, besides the rich Booty, he carried off with him the chief Workmen of the Silk Manufactures, and brought them to Sicily and these our Provinces, which Art had never been known in Italy before this Time; and had not the Venetians, who, at the Request of the Emperor Emanuel, came to his Assistance with Sixty Gallies, oblig'd him to return to Sicily, he would have carried his victorious Banner to the Walls of Constantinople.

BUT all these Triumphs were imbitter'd by the Death of Henry his Fifth Son, there being now none left of so many Sons, but only Two, Roger Duke of Puglia, and William Duke of Naples and Prince of Capua. Camillus Pellegrinus says, that Henry died when he was very Young: but he is much mistaken; for he was the Son of Queen Albira, who died in the Year 1134, and 'tis certain that Henry was at that Time a Youth at least of 14 Years old. And what added to his Grief, was, that he discover'd that this Year 1149, the Emperor Conrad had enter'd into an Alliance with the Emperor Emanuel to his Prejudice, and soon after in the same Year, Roger Duke of Puglia died¹. Therefore the King resolv'd to marry again, and took to Wife Sibilla, Sister to the Duke of Burgundy; but this Princess died the Year following 1150 in Salerno, and was buried in the Church of the Trinity of the Cave, where her Tomb is to be seen to this Day².

S E C T. I.

The Coronation of William I. and the Deaths of Pope Eugen, and the Emperor Conrad, who was succeeded by Frederick Barbarossa.

RÓGER, being thus left alone, made William his Colleague, and caus'd him to be crown'd and anointed King of Sicily the same Year 1150, which Ceremony was perform'd in Palermo by Hugo, Archbishop of that City; whence Inveges says¹, that though the Family of Caravella claim it as their Right to crown the Kings of Sicily, nevertheless the Palermitans dispute it with them, and say, that 'tis the Prerogative of their Archbishop. However that may be, in all Writs the Years of William's Reign are computed from 1150, in which his Father made him his Colleague. And Roger, Sibilla having died so soon without leaving Children, married anew, and took to Wife Beatrice the Sister of Count di Retesta; this Queen after Roger's Death, being left big with Child, brought forth Constance, whom Henry of Suevia married when she was Thirty Years of Age, and by whose Right he afterwards became King of Sicily, as shall be related more at large in its Place; so that those Authors are grossly mistaken, who have written, that this Constance was a Nun; whence we may see, that what's told of Roger his having consulted the Abbot Gioachimo, concerning his Prophecy relating to Constance, is a meer Fable; but some Authors, such as Vilani, tell the Story of his Son William.

THE Year following 1151, the Emperor Conrad died in Germany in the City of Bamberg, not without Suspicion of having been poison'd by Roger's Means, who had still been his Enemy, (as all the Kings of Sicily had been to the Emperors) neither had the famous Peter, Abbot of Clugny, been able to reconcile Conrad and Roger. His Nephew Frederick Duke of Suevia, surnam'd Barbarossa, a gallant and wise Prince, was elected his Successor, whose Exploits shall be recorded in the following Book.

THE Year following 1152, Pope Eugen, after having restor'd Tranquillity in Rome, where he had been joyfully receiv'd, likewise died, and Cardinal Conrad a Roman, in the Year 1153, was elected in his Room, and took the Name of Anastasius IV.

IN the mean time Roger, after having, by the Means of his Captains, conquer'd the City Hippon in Africa, famous for having been the See of the Great Augustine, laid aside any more Thoughts of War, took up his Residence in Palermo, and spent the Two remaining Years of his Life in erecting perpetual Monuments both of his Magnificence and Piety; for besides a stately Palace which he built in Palermo, and a noble Royal Chapel dedicated to St. Peter, and another Church in Messina, dedicated to St. Nicholas, he founded a noble Church to Nicholas Bishop of Mira.

IN the Year 1078, as we have said, the Bones of this Saint had been transported to Bari; and now on account of the Liquor which was seen to drop out of them, were become the Wonder of the World: The Fame of the Prodigy increas'd, and in these Times this Church and Bari grew so famous in the East, that it drew Veneration from the very Emperors of Greece, as may be seen in the Novellæ of the Emperor Emanuel, wherein so notable a Miracle is mention'd. Roger, out of Devotion, went frequently to Bari, most graciously confirm'd the Customs or Laws of that City, and erected this magnificent Church there, and declar'd it to be his Royal Chapel: he would not have it to be subject to the Archbishop of the City, but absolutely to the Pope, and instituted a Prior and many Canons in it: He enrich'd it with great Revenues, Castles and Farms, as may be seen by an Inscription on Marble in that Place; though Beatillo, who wrote the History of the City of Bari, and the Life of this Saint, mentions no such thing; but gives the Church and Priory a more antient and different Rise. Some will have it, that Charles of Anjou instituted that Priory, and declar'd this Church his Chapel Royal; of which we shall have occasion to discourse in another Place.

ROGER gave likewise many noble Ornaments both of Gold and Silver, and the Inheritance of many Lands to St. Matthew's Chapel in Salerno; and some rich Presents to the Monastery of the Trinity of the Cave; and though he did not think fit to make use of Violence to oblige the Saracens and Jews that were in Sicily to turn Christians, yet he was at great Pains to bring it about.

BUT this Prince, after having, by his notable Exploits, made himself so famous and renown'd in the World, in the Month of February of this Year 1154, fell sick in Palermo, and died in the 58th Year of his Age: A short Life for so many noble Actions perform'd by him; whose Death was soon followed in the Month of December of the same Year, by that of Anastasius; and Adrian IV. was elected in his Room.

ROGER was truly a great and illustrious Prince, whose magnanimous Exploits rais'd him to be one of the most powerful and greatest Kings in the World, who not only struck Terror into the Emperors of the West, but also into those of the East; and by his Conduct rais'd his Kingdom in the midst of these Two potent Empires: He was no less prudent in Council, than brave in the Field, unshaken in Adversity, and moderate in Prosperity. An equal Admirer of gallant and learned Men, whom he invited from the most remote Countries, and rais'd to the first Honours of his Kingdom. He was judicious in making new Laws, and govern'd his Dominions with the utmost Justice. He had a great Affection for the French, his Forefathers having been of French Extract. He left notable Monuments of his Piety; and tho' some have charg'd him with Cruelty towards his Enemies and Rebels; yet he was not to be blam'd for that, seeing he was oblig'd to make use of all those Means which are proper and necessary to a Prince, who was to establish a new Kingdom.

I KNOW that St. Bernard, and the Emperor Emanuel spoke of him as a Tyrant and Usurper; but the first, who was of Innocent's and Lothair's Faction, spoke the Sentiments of that Party; which was evident, for no sooner had Roger made up Matters with Innocent, than the Title of Tyrant and Usurper vanish'd; whence we have many Letters of the same Bernard written to Roger, full of Encomiums on him. And our modern Neapolitan Historian, says, that Roger, after this Peace, of the worst, became the best of Men; for in the Opinion of Writers of this Kidney, he's a wicked Prince, who, in order to preserve his own Rights and Royal Prerogatives, opposes the Popes; and he's a good Prince, who, to curry Favour with them, cringes, and is at their Devotion. As for the Emperor Emanuel, no other could be expected from him, because he was his mortal Enemy, as all the Norman Princes were to the Emperors of the East, on account of the continual Wars they had with one another; thus, the Princess Anna Comnena calls the famous Robert Guiscard a Robber, because of the cruel War which he made on Alexius Comnenus her Father.

I likewise know, that some blame this Prince for having join'd the Faction of Anaclet the Anti-Pope, and rejected Innocent; but they ought to consider, that by blaming Roger for this, they accuse at the same Time almost the whole Catholick World, that then look'd upon Anaclet, and not Innocent, to be the true Pope.

| Capecelatr. hist. lib. 1. pag. 59.

They were both created the same Day, and tho' Innocent was first elected, yet Anaclet had the greatest Number of Votes ; and the Suffrages of those Cardinals, who after they had elected Anaclet, went over to Innocent's Faction, could be of no stead to him. Though the People of Rome, and the chief Men of that City at first stuck by Innocent, nevertheless they afterwards publish'd to the World by several Manifestoes, that since they had come to the Knowledge of the Truth, they own'd Anaclet for true Pope. The Monks of Monte Cassino with their Abbot, acknowledg'd him as such: Many Cardinals, Bishops and the chief Prelates of the Church, sided with Anaclet; and many Princes and Kingdoms did the same; and before the Council of Eftampes, a City betwixt Paris and Orleans, which decided in Favour of Innocent, France was very uncertain what Side to chuse. Henry King of England was afraid to own Innocent for Pope, and till St. Bernard satisfied his Conscience, he never would acknowledge him'. And though Germany was for Innocent, yet it was more owing to Lotbair, than to the want of Scruple of Conscience. It was a hard Matter at this Time to discover Truth amidst so many and opposite Factions under which it was disguis'd; and the World was witness to a most deplorable Tragedy. Innocent excommunicated Anaclet with his Adherents; and Anaclet excommunicated Innocent with his Followers: Bernard and Peter of Pisa contended with one another, and both of them were reckon'd equally wise and learned. Many Disputes arose amongst the gravest Divines of those Times, insomuch that by the Arguments of both Sides, the People were confounded. In which Circumstance, as St. *Anthony*², speaking of the Schism which fell out betwixt Urban VI. and Clement VII. very much to the Purpose, said, tho' we must believe, that as there is but one Catholick Church, so likewise she can have but one Head; nevertheless if through Schism, more Popes than one happen to be elected at the same Time, our Salvation do's not depend upon believing absolutely this one or that one to be true Pope; but that one of them who has been lawfully elected, must be such; and we are neither oblig'd to inquire narrowly, nor to know which of them has been lawfully elected; and the People are to be guided in that by their Superiors and Prelates; whence this same Writer does not condemn St. Vincent Ferreri or his own Order, for having spent almost his whole Life-time in Avignon, where Benedict XIII. kept his Court, and whom he acknowledg'd to be the true Pope, tho' the Italians, and many other Nations, look'd upon him as an Apostate and Schismatick, and especially in so intricate and doubtful a Case; and many things may be said to be lawful while doubtful; but not when the Truth is set in a clear light. If any thing derogates from the Worth of this Prince, it is, that after almost all the World had acknowledg'd Innocent as true Pope, and even after Anaclet's Death, he obstinately stood it out, and got others to be elected in his Room; but 'tis very clear he did so for Reasons of State, and not of Religion: By this Behaviour he had a mind to humble Innocent his implacable Enemy, by keeping up the opposite Faction, whereby Innocent might be forc'd to be friends with him. But that did not take with the obstinate Pope, who must needs put himself at the Head of an Army, in order to crush Roger. But it happen'd quite otherwise, for the Pope was taken in the Battle and made Prisoner. This Action made Roger's Piety more conspicuous, for tho' he had it in his Power to treat him according to the Laws of Victory, yet he then pay'd him Respect, and acknowledg'd him for the Vicar of Christ, and would make Peace with him, and he was afterwards the greatest Defender that the Church of Rome had against the Incroachments both of the Emperors of the East and West; as the famous Robert Guiscard had been, and the Two Williams his Successors were.

THIS Prince, by his so many Wives, left no Children but William, who succeeded him in the Kingdom, and Constantia his posthumous Daughter: He foresaw, that though he left him Heir to his Dominions, he would not inherit his Virtues: To his great Grief he had lost all his other Sons, and Death had snatch'd away the best, and left the worst; he had made William his Collegue, that he might learn of him the Art of Government.

BY the four Concubines which at different Times he had had, he left some Children. It was an Error in Fazzellus to write, that Tancred Prince of Bari or Taranto, was the Son of one of Roger's Concubines¹; for, as we have said, he was his lawful Son, by Albiria his first Wife. Neither was that Tancred, who was fourth King of Sicily, Son to this King Roger, but he was his Grandchild by Roger his eldest Son, Duke of Puglia, so that 'tis uncertain what Children Roger left by his first Concubine. By the Second he had Simon, to whom by his Will he left the Principality of Taranto; but King William his Brother took it from him, and gave him the County of PolICASTRO. The Third was Mother of Clementia Countess of Catanzaro, who was first married to Hugo di Molino Count of Molise, and afterwards Matteo Bonello, Son-in-Law to the High Admiral Majone, courted her. The Fourth was Mother of her, whom Queen Margaret the Wife of William I. married to Henry her bastard Brother, who got with her the County of Monte Scaglioso.

WE are not to be surpriz'd to find this religious Prince keep Concubines in his Palace; for in these Times Concubinage was not so ignominious as at present. Formerly among the Romans, as we have observ'd elsewhere, it was look'd upon as a lawful Conjunction, and the Concubines were in a manner Wives, and Concubinage was call'd Scimmatrimonium. And when Priests could marry, they were allowed to keep one of the Two, either a Concubine, or a Wife, as we read in the first Council of Toledo. Thereafter, the Latin Church not allowing Priests to marry, though the Greek Church did, there were many Councils held for prohibiting the Use of Concubines likewise, which Custom requir'd the Labour of many Ages to extirpate it, as we have said on another Occasion; but Concubinage continu'd amongst Laicks for many Ages; and tho' in the East, Leo by one of his Novellæ forbid it altogether, as Constantinus Porphyrogenitus afterwards did, yet in the West the Longobards and many other Nations continued to practise it; and Cujacius writes, that even in his Time, some People in France towards the Pyrenean Mountains retain'd it. The Normans, who were exact Observers of the Laws and Customs of the Longobards, likewise kept it up; so that we must not wonder at Roger's keeping Concubines while he was a Widower; for none, except the Jews and Turks (who reckon'd Polygamy lawful) were ever allow'd to have a Wife and Concubine; or two Wives, or two Concubines at the same Time.

IN After-times, Concubinage was prohibited by the Civil Law, and by many Councils afterwards it was declar'd unlawful; so that it is not now, as formerly, a lawful Conjunction, but scandalous and opprobrious; and to keep a Concubine, is look'd upon at present to be as great a Crime, as to commit Adultery, Incest, or any other wicked Lust. Thus Time changes Things, and what was formerly honest and lawful, becomes shameful and blame-worthy.

THE
CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of NAPLES.

BOOK XII.

THE Reign of William I. was not so much confounded and disturb'd by the Power of a foreign Enemy, as by the intestine Commotions of his Barons; and it was more remarkable for the Plots and Conspiracies against his own Person, and the Great Men of his Court, than for Wars and Battles. The Occasion of so much Mischief was, that he undervalu'd the Actions of his most worthy Father, and suffer'd his Court, which his Father had reform'd and put on a good Footing, to go to ruin, partly by banishing, and partly by imprisoning those Persons whom Roger had most esteem'd. For having indiscreetly rais'd Majone di Bari to the chief Honours of the Kingdom, and made him his High Admiral, he likewise intrusted him with the whole Government of the Kingdom; he was so dear to him, that when he was surly and austere to others, he was open and serene to him; which so much offended the principal Barons, that they withdrew their Affection from him to that Degree, as turn'd the Kingdom topsy-turvy, as shall be related by-and-by.

AS soon as his Father was dead, tho' he had reign'd in company with him little less than four Years, he caus'd all the Prelates and Barons of the Kingdom to be assembled, and made himself to be solemnly crown'd anew in Palermo, on Easter Day this same Year 1154. And soon after this great Solemnity, the Birth of his second Son William, by Queen Margaret his Wife, Daughter of Garfias II. King of Nicar, was celebrated with great Magnificence and Feasting; for his eldest Son Roger was born while his Grandfather was alive¹. There were no other Princes of the Blood in the Royal Family but Roger and William II. both Infants. Their Aunt Constantia, the posthumous Daughter of Roger, was still a Child. Tancred and William, the Sons of Roger Duke of Puglia, tho' but Youths, for Reasons of State, were kept Prisoners in the Royal Palace in Palermo: Thus William was left alone at the Age of 34 Years, without the Assistance or Advice of Kinsmen, to govern the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, and the other Provinces and Cities of Greece and Africa.

THEREFORE the High Admiral Majone, who was endued with Talents fit to raise a private Man to be a Prince, had free scope for imposing on the King, and governing his Dominions without Controul. He was of a ready and piercing Wit, and fitted for the hardiest and most difficult Undertaking; fluent in Speech, exceeding generous, a most cunning Dissembler, and greedy of Command; for which end he had his Thoughts always employ'd in contriving how to arrive at the highest Pitch of Dignity and Honour; but he conceal'd all under a serene and chearful Countenance: he spent whole Days with the King on the Affairs of State, and the most secret Transactions were intrusted with him alone, and his Advice was solely acceptable and rely'd upon. His Authority gain'd him Friends and Partisans, to whom, at his Pleasure, he gave the Government of Provinces, Castles, and military Employments; and William was so much his Bubble, that whatever he was pleas'd to ask was immediately granted: In order to remove all Obstacles that possibly could stand in his way, he pretended to be in Love with the Queen, and sully'd her Virtue, by gaining to his Interest all the Saracen Eunuchs, Keepers of the Royal Palace. In short, he was the Director of the Kingdom; he was so forward to raise his own Family, that he advanc'd one of his Brothers, and one of his Sons, both of them nam'd Stephen, to the chief Military Employments, and made the Son of one of his Sisters, call'd Simon, High Steward of the Kingdom, and married one of his Daughters to Matteo Bonello, one of the principal Barons of the Kingdom; and he caus'd to be registred by the Monks of Monte Cassino, in a Book wherein the Deaths of Popes, Emperors, Kings, Sovereign Dukes, and such like Personages were recorded, the Days on which Leo and Curazzo, his own Father and Mother, formerly very mean Persons, died, in these Words; *Curazza Mater Madii magni Admirati Admiratorum obijt VII. Kal. Aug. & Leo Pater Admirati Admiratorum obijt VI. id. Septembris*². And Cardinal Laborante, who in these Days was reckon'd the most knowing and learned Man that flourish'd in Rome, having compos'd a Book, De Justis, & Justitiæ rationibus, which is to be seen at this Time divided into four Parts, he dedicated it to this Majone, as to the most renown'd and remarkable Personage in Europe at this Time.

HE being arriv'd to this Pitch of Grandeur, bethought himself how he might at last accomplish his Design of usurping the Kingdom; and finding that he had nothing else to do but to dispatch out of the Way all those who were able to obstruct it, he employ'd all his Thoughts how to ruin them.

THOSE that he thought were most likely to baulk him, were Simon Count of Policaastro, the bastard Son, as we have said, of King Roger, Roberto da Bassavilla Count of Loritello, William's Cousin-German, and Eberard Count of Squillace, who were all Men of consummate Virtue, who could neither be brib'd nor cozen'd; and he was convinc'd, that while they were alive, all his Labour would be in vain. He began then to contrive their Ruin; and being sensible that Hugo Archbishop of Palermo was a fit Person to communicate his Design to, and be his Accomplice, by whose Assistance he should the more easily be able to bring his Project to bear; for the Archbishop was a subtle and bold Man, both fit for any great Undertaking, and greedy of Command; therefore the Admiral began to sound him by Degrees, by insinuating, that if once the King were dispatch'd, as being a Man both unfit for Government, and wicked, they might then easily take the young Sons into their Charge, by which Means they would be Masters of all, till the Children should be of Age. He would not discover his Resolution of usurping the Kingdom, for fear that the Heinousness of the Crime might surprize him, hoping, that if he were once Tutor to the King's Children, nothing could stop him from putting his Designs in Execution. Therefore he enter'd into a strict Friendship with the Archbishop, and they mutually swore to assist one another, happen what would; and the Admiral order'd Matters so, that the Archbishop became one of the King's Confidents and Creatures, in order to approve or disapprove of the King's Actions, how wicked soever, as he thought fit.

THESE were the Foundations which Majone laid for supporting the lofty Fabrick of his Ambition: In the mean Time new Opportunities offer'd; which the Admiral seasonably laid hold of in order to ruin his Rivals, and those who were able to obstruct his Design. Pope Anastasius, as we have said, had died in Rome, and Adrian IV. an Englishman, had been elected in his Stead. This Pope was offended at William's having caus'd himself to be crown'd in Palermo without asking his Consent, which the Popes pretend to be necessary to the Coronation of their Feudatory Princes, and the King having heard of Adrian's Election, sent Ambassadors to confirm the Peace which he had made with his Predecessor, but the Pope dismiss'd them without concluding any Thing. William went afterwards from Palermo to Messina, and from thence to Salerno, and while he was there, Adrian sent Cardinal Henry with Letters to him, who not only would not receive them, but order'd the Cardinal immediately to depart his Kingdom; the King was likewise offended because the Pope in his Letters did not give him the Title of King, but only Lord of Sicily, pretending that he could not give him that Title, because he had been crown'd without his Permission and Authority¹. But William, who took it as an Affront to be oblig'd to ask of the Pope what was in his own Power, after having celebrated the Feast of Easter in Salerno this Year 1155, and created Ascleettino Archdeacon of Catania High Chancellor, and Governor of Puglia, in a bitter Passion order'd him to assemble a strong Army to besiege Benevento, lay waste all its Territories, and take it in spite of the Pope. On the other hand Adrian excommunicated the King, who, besides having commanded the Chancellor to besiege Benevento, likewise order'd that none of the Bishops of his Kingdom should acknowledge the Pope, nor be consecrated by him. Then, he left Salerno, and accompanied, with Majone, return'd to Palermo.

MEAN while the Chancellor, after having laid waste the Territory of Benevento to the very Walls of the City, endeavour'd to surprize it, but it being bravely defended by the Beneventans, who put their Archbishop to Death, because he had been discover'd to be a secret Friend and Partisan of William's, the Chancellor was forc'd to lay close Siege to it: During the Siege, some Barons not satisfied with the present Government, and besides spurr'd on by the Pope, deserted the Army, and threw themselves into Benevento, and others, without Leave, left the Camp; for which Cause, the Army being divided, the Siege was rais'd². Robert Count of Bassavilla, full of Rage return'd to Puglia, for he having been to wait upon the King while he was in Salerno, by the Means of Majone was so coldly receiv'd, that the King did not so much as speak to him. The Chancellor with that part of the Army that had stuck by him, and some new levied Soldiers, march'd into Campagna di Roma, where he took and burnt Cepparano, Basucco, Frusinone, Arce, and other neighbouring Places; and afterwards in his marching back to the Kingdom, he caus'd the Walls of Aquino, Pontecorvo, and other Castles belonging to the Monks of *Monte Cassino*³ to be demolish'd, and besides, he turn'd out all the Monks of that Monastery, because they were Partisans of the Pope, excepting twelve, which he left to take care of the Church, and return'd to Capua, where he remain'd in Company with Count Simon, in order to be at hand for the Defence of the Kingdom, and to prevent any Commotion of the Barons, who were cruelly vex'd at the Admiral's Power, which was so great, that it was a hard matter to distinguish whether he or William was King of Sicily; but more especially to prevent a new Storm that was threatening; for it was rumour'd aboad, that the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, with a great Army, was on his march from Germany to Italy.

S E C T. I.

The Emperor Frederick I. enters into a League with Emanuel Comnenus Emperor of the East, and with the Pope makes War against King William.

FREDERICK, as his Predecessors had been, was an implacable Enemy to the Normans, and as Lothaire, Henry, and Conrade had oppos'd Roger, so he bent all his Thoughts on driving William out of Puglia and Sicily, looking upon him as an Usurper of the Provinces of the Empire. No Emperor had ever conceiv'd such high Thoughts of the Empire restor'd by Charles the Great in the West, as he did; for he look'd upon himself to be another Octavianus Augustus, and that all the Provinces which were formerly under that vast Empire, whether in Asia, Africa, or in any other more remote Part of the World, belong'd to his Empire, and that therefore he had sufficient Right to expel the Invaders; for Saladin had no sooner made himself Master of many Places of Syria, than he immediately declar'd War against him, and by a thundering Letter threaten'd him, if he did not restore those Places, which Letter is recorded in the Annals of England by Roger, and Matheæ Paris, in which among other Brags and Rodomantados, he tells him, that he could not but know, that both the Æthiopias, Mauritania, Persia, Syria, Parthia, where Marcus Crassus died, Judea, Samaria, Arabia, Chaldaea, and Egypt itself, where Anthony fell in Love with Cleopatra, Armenia, and a multitude of other Places were subject to his Empire. But Saladin answer'd him with no less Haughtiness and Pride, as may be seen in his Answer recorded by the same Writers. 'Tis likewise known, that no Emperor before him, was seiz'd with the Whim of creating so many honorary Kings as he did; for he sent the Sword and Royal Crown to Peter King of Denmark, the Dukes of Austria and Bohemia, to whom he gave the Title of Kings, as we have related in the preceding Book.

AND this Vanity of believing himself to be Lord of all the World, and of particular Cities and Places, was of so pernicious Consequence to him, that when, according to these Notions (fomented by the fawning Martin the Civilian) he was imposing severe and rigorous Laws upon the Nobility and Cities of Italy, all Lombardy revolted, which occasion'd the Ruin of Milan, as we shall see anon.

BY the same airy Notions he look'd upon William as an Invader and unjust Usurper both of Puglia and Calabria, therefore he employ'd all his Thoughts and Power in order to drive this Enemy from his Throne; but considering that of himself he could not bring it to bear, for tho' he could bring an Army into the Field sufficient to conquer Puglia, yet for want of Sea Forces, it was impossible to undertake any Thing against Sicily; therefore the preceding Year 1154, after having call'd a Dyet at Ratisbon, he had sent Ambassadors to the Emperor Emanuel Comnenus to solicit an Alliance with him against *William*¹. Emanuel was as jealous of the Growth of the Normans as Frederick, for they had not only possess'd themselves of Sicily, but had likewise got footing in Greece, and had extended their Conquests to the very Gates of Constantinople. William found himself betwixt two powerful Enemies, united and confederated together. It was truly a very unaccountable Thing to see Frederick on the one hand boast, that William's Dominions belong'd to his Empire of the West; and on the other hand Emanuel threaten'd, that he and his Romans would never desist from making War in Italy, until it, and the whole Island of Sicily were restor'd to his Empire, from which they had been wrested². Frederick likewise found Means to get the Pisans, who were then powerful at Sea, to enter into this League against William; who being also involv'd in a War with the Pope, and jealous of the Loyalty of his Barons, was seiz'd with such a Consternation and Melancholy, that abhorring to see any Person, he was always shut up in his Palace, where he only convers'd with Majone and the Archbishop, from whom he learnt how the Affairs of his Dominions went, not as was fitting, but as best suited with their Designs. And in the mean while, Majone perceiving that he could not expect a more fit Opportunity than the present for accomplishing his deep Designs; he made the King believe that the Count of Loritello had retir'd to Puglia, on purpose to get himself made King, by Virtue of a certain Testament of Roger's, wherein 'tis said, that he should succeed in case his Son William was not found fit to govern his Dominions; and therefore he ought to order Ascleettino to invite him to Capua, and upon his Arrival to make him Prisoner, and send him under a strong Guard to Palermo. But the Count immediately suspected this Invitation, and afterwards having discover'd the Trick, he refus'd to obey the Chancellor, who commanded him in the King's Name, to deliver over his Soldiers to Count Buemondo, and in a great Passion told him, it was the Order of a Fool, or a Traytor, and forthwith left Puglia, and with all his Men went to Abruzzo. Majone not content with this, at the same Time resolv'd to ruin Count Simon likewise, by artfully sowing Dissention betwixt the Count and the Chancellor, and a Mutiny happening among the Soldiers, he represented the Matter at Court, not as it really was, but as he thought fit, adding, that the Count was the Occasion of those Tumults, and that there was a secret Correspondence, by Letters, carried on betwixt him and Count Robert, about Affairs of great Consequence; this was enough to make the King believe that the Counts Simon and Robert, with many others, were in a Plot against him, in order to dethrone him; whereupon William, who was always jealous of his nearest Kinsmen, invited Count Simon to Palermo, and without giving him Time to alledge any Thing in Defence of his Innocence, he caus'd him to be shut up in Prison, which rais'd Indignation in every Body against the Admiral, by whose Means all these Mischiefs were brought about.

AT this very Time it happen'd, that the King, either on account of a violent Fit of Sickness, or for some other Reason, shut himself himself so close up in his Palace for several Days, that he could neither be seen nor spoke to by any Person, except by the Archbishop and Majone; which made it to be rumour'd abroad in his Dominions, that he had died of Poison given him by the Admiral. This Report being spread in Puglia, occasion'd terrible Commotions, insomuch that many Provinces immediately revolted; for Pope Adrian taking Advantage of the Opportunity stirr'd up the Barons of Puglia, and those whom William had expell'd, to rise in Arms all of a sudden¹. They had such an Aversion to the King on the Score of Majone, that it was no hard matter to bring about a Rebellion; therefore Calabria, Puglia, and Terra di Lavoro were immediately imbroil'd in a cruel War, and full of Tumults and Sedition. Count Robert having assembled a great Army in the Neighbourhood of Abruzzo, surpriz'd many of the Maritime Cities of Puglia, as far as Taranto, and having taken Bari, with the Consent of the Citizens, he caus'd the Castle built by Roger a few Years before, to be demolish'd; and besides, together with the Pope, prevail'd upon the Emperor to join them, by promising to restore Puglia to the Empire of the East. Emanuel sent a good Army commanded by gallant Officers, and a great Sum of Money to Brindisi; for which end they repair'd the Harbour of that City, whither Emanuel resolv'd to send more Troops.

THE Report of the King's Death occasion'd the like Commotions in Terra di Lavoro; for Robert the exil'd Prince of Capua, who hitherto had led a private Life in Sorrento, which Roger had wink'd at, whence he was also call'd *Robert of Sorrento*², wanted not to be spurr'd on by the Pope, but came quickly to Capua, and took Possession of his ancient Inheritance, and soon after he not only intirely subjeeted all the Cities of his own Principality, but having likewise march'd into Puglia, he subdu'd all the rest, excepting Melphis and Troja. And the King's Affairs were in such a bad Situation in the Country of the Picentini, and Terra di Lavoro, that nothing remain'd under his Obedience but the Cities of Amalphis, Naples and Salerno, and a few Forts and Castles, for Riccardo dell' Aquila Count of Fondi, had taken Sessa and Tiano, and the Count Andrea da Rupe Canina had possess'd himself of Alife.

IN the mean Time the Fear of greater Troubles increas'd; for the Emperor Frederick had come from Germany to Rome, where he had been receiv'd with great Pomp, and solemnly crown'd in St. Peter's Church by Pope Adrian; and before his Coronation, the Pope had made him promise, that besides his marching into Puglia against William, which, out of Enmity, he would have done without being desir'd, he should likewise depose the Senators of Rome, and reduce that City, as formerly, under his, the Pope's, Obedience. But Frederick could neither perform the one nor the other, for not only the Plague had seiz'd his Army, but he was oblig'd to return to Germany, and on his march to quell the Commotions that had arisen, in some Cities of Lombardy, and now that he was crown'd, he made no account of his Promises, only he animated the Pisans to send their Fleet against William.

ALTHO' the Pope had been thus bubbled by Frederick, nevertheless he was no ways dishearten'd, but was resolv'd to make the best of this favourable Juncture; for having assembled a great Army, the best way he could, and put himself at the Head of it, he enter'd the Kingdom, and immediately Count Andrea di Rupe Canina, and the Malecontent Barons join'd him; he was likewise join'd by Robert, now Prince of Capua, who march'd into Terra di Lavoro, and from thence to Benevento, where he was honourably receiv'd: On the other hand the Emperor Emanuel resolving to be reveng'd of the Injuries he had receiv'd from Roger, upon his Son William, had sent Paleologus, Cominatus, Sebastus, and other renown'd and brave Captains, with a good Body of Troops, and a large Sum of Money into Puglia to Robert's Assistance; and besides he had sent the Pope Word, that he would assist him to ruin William altogether, provided he would put him in Possession of three Maritime Cities of that Province, with which Reinforcement Count Robert carried on a terrible War in Puglia, and had already possess'd himself of a great Part of it.

SUCH was the deplorable State to which these our Provinces were reduc'd in this Year 1155. Tho' the King was appriz'd of all these Mischiefs, yet they were not sufficient to oblige him to shake off his Indolence, which had so glued him to the Pleasures of a Court, that his being coop'd up in his Palace, had given Rise to the false Report of his Death; for Majone, disguising his own inward Trouble with a chearful Countenance, did not discover his Fear to the King nor the Archbishop, only he thought fit to desire the King to write to those who had continu'd Loyal to him, that the Report of his Death was false, and invented by his rebellious Subjects, against whom he order'd them to take Arms.

BUT tho' the Commotions of these Provinces occasion'd by Majone, were not sufficient for rousing the King out of so long and deep a Lethargy, yet those which were rais'd in Sicily, and soon after in the very City of Palermo were; for Count Giuffredi, having discover'd Majone's Conspiracy, tho' the King would not give credit to it, revolted; and the Sicilians, on account of the Admiral's Tyranny, rising up in Arms, possess'd themselves of Butera; and the Citizens of Palermo making a terrible Uproar for the unjust Imprisonment of Count Simon; all these and other Things join'd together, at last rous'd the King to that Degree, that, forsaking the Pleasures of his Court, and exposing himself to the greatest Dangers, he pacified the Tumults in Palermo, by setting Count Simon at Liberty, and recover'd Butera; and having restor'd that Island to its former Quiet, he resolv'd to go in Person to Puglia, in order to subdue his rebellious Subjects, and restore Peace in that Kingdom; for which end he went to embark at Messina, where he was met by the Chancellor, of whom Count Simon made heavy Complaints to the King, for not defending Terra di Lavoro as he ought to have done; the Chancellor boldly endeavouring to defend himself, was not heard, but immediately put in Prison, where some Years after he ended his Days. William having assembled an Army the best way he could, left Messina, landed in Puglia, and in the Beginning of this Year 1156 incamp'd at *Brindisi*¹; from thence he sent the Elect of Catania to make Peace with the Pope, by offering him advantageous Conditions; but by the Means of some Cardinals who were Partisans of the Emperor Frederick he was dismiss'd without concluding any thing; whereupon the King, seeing there were no Hopes of an Agreement, without any more ado, boldly invested Brindisi, where the Greeks, and the greatest Part of his rebellious Barons were: He besieg'd it so closely, that Roberto da Bassavilla, who commanded the City, being terrified, fled to Benevento, and the King so annoy'd that City with continual Attacks both by Sea and Land, that at last he took it, and made all the Greeks, with their Officers, and the rebellious Barons, with their Followers, Prisoners, of which last he caus'd a great many to be hang'd, and the Eyes of others to be put out; he likewise got the rich Spoils of the Greeks, and a great Sum of Money which they had brought with them for the Occasions of the War¹.

THE King with his victorious Army march'd afterwards to Bari, whose Citizens seeing that neither the Pope, nor the Count, who had been the Promoters of the Rebellion, sent them Assistance, resolv'd to surrender themselves to the King's Mercy; and in order to mitigate his Wrath, they went disarm'd to meet him and ask his Pardon; but William observing the Ruins of the Castle, which his Father Roger had built there, and which the Baresians had demolish'd, answer'd them, *I shall not spare your Houses, because you have had no Regard for mine*²: He then order'd, that within two Days they should all depart with Bag and Baggage; which being put in Execution, he likewise caus'd the Walls of the City to be demolish'd to the very Foundation, and the Houses to be pull'd down and levell'd with the Ground. Thus was Bari destroy'd, which for its Richness, the Nobility of its Citizens, Populousness, the Beauty of its Palaces, and the Strength of its Walls, of all the other Cities of Puglia was the first, and once the Seat of the greatest Personages of Greece. This may convince us of the Error of those, who will have Bari, in the Time of Queen Constantia, and Manfred, to be reckon'd a Royal Seat, where these Princes were crown'd; for Bari, after this Misfortune, was reduc'd to some Villages, and it was long after that it recovered the Face of a City. Thus we see the Vicissitude of worldly Things, and how these Changes serv'd to raise Naples above all the other Cities of this Kingdom; for tho' Salerno was at this Time in being, yet not many Years after we shall find this City likewise ruin'd and destroy'd, by the Hatred which Henry the Husband of Constantia bore it.

THE King afterwards took Taranto, and all the other Places of that Province, which Count Robert and the Greeks had taken Possession of; and from thence he march'd to Benevento, whither Pope Adrian with his Cardinals, and a great Number of Barons had fled, to which Place he laid close Siege, and so harass'd that City, that the Pope, without the least Regard for the Barons of the Kingdom whom he had involv'd into these Difficulties and Dangers, seeing the Peril he himself was in, for not having accepted the advantagious Conditions of Peace which William had offer'd him, sent three Cardinals his Legates, to beg Peace of him. These were Ubaldo Cardinal of Sancta Praxide; Giulio Cardinal of St. Marcello; Rolando Chancellor of the Holy Church, and Cardinal of *St. Mark*³; and as Gregory II. wrote three Letters to Pepin in the Name of St. Peter, so they in the Name of the Prince of the Apostles, begg'd of William to forbear disturbing the Pope any more, and to preserve intire the Rights of God's Church.

Articles of Peace settled with Pope Adrian, and Investiture given by him to King William; whereupon a Peace with the Emperor Emanuel follow'd.

THE Legates were courteously receiv'd by the King, who willingly heard the Proposals of Peace which they laid before him, and he on his Part appointed Five Plenipotentiaries for settling the Articles. These were the High Admiral Majone, Hugo Archbishop of Palermo, Romualdus Archbishop of Salerno, William Bishop of Calano, and Marinus Abbot of Monte Cassino; who meeting with the Three Cardinals, agreed on the Articles of Peace, as they are recorded by Baronius, and as we shall relate them by and by; in which Peace the Barons were not only not comprehended, but all of them excluded, and it was only made betwixt the Pope and the King.

THEN William coming to the Church of St. Mark, which is without the Walls of Benevento, on his Knees at the Pope's Feet, receiv'd Absolution from the by-past

by-past Censures, and on his Part in Presence of many Cardinals, Barons, and a multitude of other Spectators, did Homage to the Pope for the Kingdom, and swore Fealty; Otho Francipane read the Words of the Oath, and the Pope putting the Crown upon his Head, gave him Investiture, first by delivering to him one Standard for the Kingdom of Sicily, then another for the Dukedom of Puglia, and a Third for the Principality of Capua.

THE Investiture, which Pope Adrian at this Time gave to William, was the most ample, and by far the most advantageous of all that ever had been by other Popes given to the Norman Princes; for he not only invested him with the Kingdom of Sicily, the Dukedom of Puglia, and Principality of Capua, with all their Dependencies, as other Popes had done; but Adrian did what Gregory VII. and his Successors on no account would ever yield to, which was to invest William likewise with Salerno, Amalphis and Naples, with their Appurtenances, with Marca, and all the other Lands which he possess'd. This Investiture was not only given to William, but also to his Son Roger, whom his Father the preceding Year 1155, when he was but four Years of Age, had created Duke of Puglia and Calabria, and to all his Heirs, whom he by a voluntary Destination shall appoint to succeed him in the Kingdom; these are the Words of the Writ of Investiture, likewise recorded by Baronius; Profecto vos nobis, & Rogerio Duci filio nostro, & hæredibus nostris, qui in Regnum pro voluntaria ordinatione nostra successerint, concedetis Regnum Siciliae, Ducatum Apuliae, Principatum Capuae, cum omnibus pertinentiis suis; Neapolim, Salernum, & Malphiam cum pertinentiis suis; Marchiam, & alia quæ ultra Marsicam debemus habere, & reliqua tenementa, quæ tenemus a prædecessoribus nostris hominibus Sacrosanctæ Ecclesiæ jure detenta, & contra omnes homines adjuvabitur honorifice manutenere. The King for his Part, promis'd to pay the Pope for Puglia and Calabria, Six hundred Schifati, and for la Marca Five hundred, as Quit-rent.

ON this Occasion there were many Articles agreed upon concerning Appeals, Elections, and other Things touching the Ecclesiastical Polity and Government of the Kingdom of Puglia. As for Appeals, it was stipulated, that if any Clergy-man in Puglia, Calabria, and the Lands of the Neighbourhood, shall have occasion of Complaint concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs, against another Clergyman, and which cannot be redress'd by the Chapter, Bishop, Archbishop, or other Ecclesiastical Person of that Province, it shall be lawful, if he shall think fit, to appeal to the Church of Rome. That if the Necessity or Advantage of the Church shall require it, Translations from one Church to another may be made. That the Church of Rome may freely perform Visitations and Consecrations in the Cities of Puglia and Calabria, and the adjacent Places, excepting however the Cities in which the King or his Heirs may happen to be at the Time, to which their Consent must be had. That the Church of Rome may freely send Legates into Puglia and Calabria, and the neighbouring Places, who are to behave themselves moderately, without invading or wasting the Possessions of the Church.

THAT in Sicily likewise, the Church of Rome may make Visitations and Consecrations; and that if the King or his Successors, shall call Ecclesiastical Persons from Sicily, either to be crown'd by them, or for other Affairs, they are to answer the Call, and he may oblige those he shall think fit to stay with him. As for other Matters, the Church of Rome shall have the same Privileges in Sicily that she has in the other Parts of the King's Dominions, excepting as to Appeals, and the Privilege of sending Legates, which shall not be sent without the Desire of the King or his Heirs. The Roman Church shall retain in the Churches and Monasteries of the King's Dominions, all that she retains in other Churches, such as the wonted Consecrations and Benedictions, and they shall pay to her the usual and establish'd Taxes.

CONCERNING Elections, it was settled, that the Clergy being conven'd, are to elect a Person whom they shall judge worthy, and to conceal him, until they divulge him to the King, who shall approve of him, unless he find him to be in a Confederacy with Traitors and Enemies to the King and his Heirs, or for any other Cause, whereby he thinks him unworthy of his Assent. Such were the Articles of this Peace sign'd at Benevento in the Month of June 1156, and as they concern the Ecclesiastical State, we shall have occasion to mention them in another Place.

THE Barons of Puglia, contrary to all their Expectations, seeing themselves thus deserted by the Pope, and left a Prey to the King's Wrath, were so terrified, that they they immediately made their Escape. Count Roberto da Bassavilla, and Count Andrea da Rupe Canina, with some others, fled to Lombardy, and shelter'd themselves under the Emperor Frederick's Protection, who imploy'd them in the War which at that Time he had with the People of the Milaneſe; but Robert Prince of Capua with his Followers, likewise endeavouring to make his Escape out of the Kingdom, in passing through the Territories of Riccardo dell' Aquila Count of Fondi his own Vassal, where he thought himself safe, was taken with all his Men as he cross'd the Garigliano, and deliver'd up to the King¹; by which Piece of Treachery Count Riccardo was restor'd to William's Favour; but he did not escape the Infamy of his Treachery. The Prince with one of his Sons, and a Daughter, at the Admiral's Desire, were sent Prisoners to Palermo, where the Prince had his Eyes put out, and soon after died in Prison. Such was the End of Robert Son of Giordano II. Prince of Capua, descended of the most noble Blood of the Normans, after he had so often lost and recover'd his Principality, which was altogether extinguish'd in him, and united to the Kingdom of Puglia, as it continues to this Day: Another Son of his nam'd Giordano, after this Misfortune of the Father, fled to Constantinople, and put himself under the Protection of the Emperor Emanuel, who afterwards sent him Ambassador to Alexander III. in the Year 1166, as shall shortly be related².

AFTER all these Matters were over, the Pope went to Compagna di Roma, and the King having defeated the Greeks, banish'd some of his Enemies, imprison'd others, and put the rest to death, or restor'd them to Favour, gave the Government of Puglia to Simon the High Steward, Brother-in-Law to Majone, and having thus quieted the Tumults of the Kingdom, he return'd to Palermo.

WILLIAM was no less successful in the War which shortly after he made with the Emperor Emanuel; for he equipt a great Fleet, and gave the Command of it to Stephen, Majone's Brother, who fought that of the Greeks on the Coast of Peloponnesus, and obtain'd a compleat Victory over them. Emanuel was so much struck with this Victory, that he was desirous of Peace with William, and having sent Ambassadors to him for that end, it was at last concluded, and all the Greeks that were in Sicily were set at liberty, and though hitherto neither Emanuel, nor any of his Predecessors by any means could be brought to give William the Title of King, nevertheless from this Time forward he acknowledg'd him as such³; and this Peace was made so firm and solid, that 'tis certain from this Time forth there were never any Wars heard of betwixt the Normans and the Emperors of the East.

THUS William having restor'd Tranquillity in his Kingdom, and made Peace with the Pope, and the Emperor of the East, in these first Years of his Reign, he acquir'd the Title of Great; and there was good Reason to hope, that this Peace would have been durable, if it had not been disturb'd by Majone; for the King attributing all these prosperous Events to his Conduct and Prudence; the Admiral was arriv'd at that pitch of Greatness, that he seem'd rather to be King, than Admiral of Sicily; which gave fresh Provocation to the Malecontent Barons to hatch those Plots and Tumults, of which we shall give an account by and by.

C H A P. I.

The Emperor Frederick, being offended at the Pope for the Peace he had made with William, return'd anew into Italy. Held a Diet in Roncaglia, and restor'd the Regalia in Italy.

IN the mean time the Emperor Frederick, being inform'd by the Counts Robert and Andrew, and others of the King's Rebels, who after the Conclusion of the Peace, had fled to Lombardy, that the Pope by secret Articles had made Peace with William, and excluded all others, was very much offended at Adrian, and complain'd of him to all the German Princes and Prelates; whereupon the Bishops of Germany did not stick to write a Letter to the Pope on that Subject, wherein among other Things they upbraided him with this Peace¹.

AND the Emperor himself in a Letter to Eberard Archbishop of *Saltzburg*², complain'd of this Peace; and therefore from this Year 1158, declar'd himself as much an Enemy to the Pope, as he was to William, and being afraid lest these two joined together should abolish the Authority of his Empire in Italy, he began to be more severe upon the Cities of Lombardy; for which end he resolv'd to go to Italy as he did, but full of high-flown and extravagant Notions; and being arriv'd in Lombardy, after having defeated the People of the Milanese, and subjected their City of Milan, according to the Custom of his Predecessors, he summon'd a Diet in Roncaglia for settling the Articles of Peace, and taking the State of that Province into Consideration. It was at this Time, that Frederick on his March, passing by a fine Castle, ask'd whose it was? and being told who the Owner was, some of his Flatterers said, It's your own, Sir, for the Dominion of the whole World, and even of private Possessions, belongs to the Emperor: Some of the Emperor's Retinue, who could not bear such impudent Flattery, objected against the Answer; insomuch that it occasion'd a great Debate, which the Emperor order'd to be decided by the wise Men, and Lawyers of the Cities of Lombardy.

SOME Years before, during the Empire of Lothaire, the Pandects having been found in Amalphis, and, as we have said, Irnerius having imploy'd all his Skill in explaining, and publickly teaching them, his School had bred up many, who, after his Example, gave themselves wholly to the Study of the Pandects, and the other Books of Justinian. Whence it came to pass, that in the Cities of Italy, many, encourag'd by the Novelty, Elegancy, and Wisdom of these Laws, imploy'd all their Study in learning them; so that from Irnerius's School, as from the Trojan Horse, came forth many Civilians, and the Study of the Roman Jurisprudence was most frequent, and Scholars and Professors were equally numerous; but seeing this Study began in an Age of Ignorance, when without the Help of other Latin Books, the Roman History and Learning, these Laws could not be well understood; they who first taught them, without these Means, fell into many childish Errors, not through their Fault, but that of the Age; for some of them were Men of admirable Genius, and tho' Learning and History have been eclips'd, yet the World was never quite destitute of Men of good Parts; for Nature is a punctual Observer of her own Laws, and has distributed Endowments with an impartial Hand.

FOR these Reasons it being found in some Laws of the Pandects, that the Emperor Antoninus ¹, call'd himself Lord of the Universe, and that Ulpianus ² writes, that as the People of Rome could give the Slaves of private Men their Liberty, so it was likewise in the Power of the Emperor to do the same; and it being also found in the Code ³, that Justinian said, every thing belong'd to the Prince; these Civilians believ'd that the same might be said of Frederick, so it was an easy Matter to persuade him, that he was Lord of the whole World, and consequently of the Right of private Persons. In these Times many Civilians had been brought up at Irnerius's School; such as Placentino in Montepessulo, who was the first that taught the Roman Jurisprudence in France. Bagarotto, and Giovanni Basiano, flourish'd in Bologna, and Antonio Lyo in Padua; but there were four Civilians in Bologna, who distinguish'd themselves above all the rest, and for their Learning made themselves so famous, that the Emperor Frederick made them of his Council, and took their Advice in his most weighty Deliberations, and, according to Radevicus ⁴, made them his Assessors, as the antient Roman Emperors did by our Civilians.

THESE were Bulgaro, a Native of Pisa, who at first taught Law in Bologna, and by the Emperor Frederick was made Prefect of that City: Ugolino, who likewise flourish'd in Bologna, and was Author of the Tenth Collation, and Collector of the Books of Fiefs, and the Constitutions of Conrade, Lothaire and Frederick, which he annex'd to the Ninth Collation of the Authentick, as shall be told by and by. Martino, likewise famous at this Time, who wrote some Glosses on the Pandects, which were afterwards call'd into Question, and rejected; and Giacomo, who was also of Frederick's Council. There were likewise at this Time other two in Milan, to wit, Oberto de Orto, Great Advocate in the Court of Milan, and Gerardo Negro, or, as some call him, Cagapisto; these two compil'd the Feudal Customs, which, with the other Laws of the Emperors concerning Fiefs, they put in writing, as shall be told.

THE Emperor being come to Roncaglia, Bulgaro and Martino were appointed to dispute this Case: Bulgaro condemn'd the Flatterers; but Martino, whether out of Fear or Love, sided with Frederick, and said that the Emperor was not only Lord of all the World, but of every thing belonging to private Persons; and the Emperor being of the same Opinion, the Dispute was determin'd in Martino's Favour ⁵. Whence it came to pass that the Civilians of later Times maintain'd Martino's Opinion, and Bartolo did not stick to say, that whoever believ'd otherwise was a Heretick.

THIS Dispute might easily have been decided according to Seneca, by distinguishing betwixt private Right and publick and sovereign Empire: This positive Decision in Frederick's Favour, was the Occasion of most pernicious Consequences both to him and all Lombardy; for founding on this Maxim, he impos'd very severe Laws and Conditions, both on the Nobility and Cities of Lombardy in this Diet. He prohibited all Assemblies, and City Corporations, and especially the Power of electing Magistrates, and, contrary to former Custom, put Officers of his own making to govern the Cities: he impos'd severe Penalties on the Cities, and those who should contravene these Laws; and gave them Peace on very rigorous and severe Conditions, as may be seen in his Constitution which he made in Roncaglia, inserted in the fifth Book of Fiefs ⁶.

BUT he did not long enjoy the Fruits of this Peace, for he was no sooner return'd to Germany, than Lombardy revolted, so that he was forc'd to come back to Italy, and besiege Milan, which, after a long Siege, and a gallant Defence, was at last taken and utterly ruin'd, and reduc'd to a Village, and all Lombardy being subdued, underwent a terrible Slavery.

IT was at this Time, that, besides his having more strictly than Lothaire, forbid the Alienation of Fiefs by his Constitution ¹ which we read in the Feodal Books, he resolv'd to restore the Regalia and Fiscalia, which had been long forgot, and in Disuse in Italy; for which end he oblig'd the Bishops, Nobles and Cities of Italy to set them on Foot again, and restore them to him ².

IT was decreed, that all contain'd in the Roman Division in bona Communia, Publica, Universitatis, & Nullius should belong to the Prince, and nothing remain to others, but what they had an exclusive Right in. Therefore Princes claim the Property of the Sea, navigable Rivers, Streets, Fields, Walls and Ditches of Cities, and generally every thing that comes not under Commerce, and even that, when it has no Owner. And though Frederick did not reckon up all these in his Constitution de Regalibus, nevertheless he mentions the most remarkable and considerable Regalia, such as the publick Buildings and Armories, which he calls Armannie, High-ways, navigable Rivers, and those by which they are made Navigable, and all the Profits arising from the Navigation of them. Harbours, Toll, Money, Fines, waif Goods, the Augariæ and Parangariæ, the Use of Ships and Carts, extraordinary Collections, Silver Mines, Salt-pits, Mines out of which Pitch is dug, for according to Pliny ³, Pitch is Fossile, Fishings, Game, Treasure, the making of Magistrates, for administering Justice and other Fiscalia, which he does not mention in the Constitution, wherein he names only the Principal, which for a long Time had been in Disuse in Italy.

WHENCE it came to pass, that what Frederick did in Italy, was imitated by other Princes in their Dominions, such as our William, who not content with what Frederick had establish'd concerning Treasurer, conformable to Adrian's Constitution; which was, that if a Treasure was found by Accident, either in a publick or religious Place, the Half should belong to the Finder: He made a more severe Law, that in whatever Place, and in what Manner soever found, all should belong to the King; of which Constitution, when we come to treat of the other Laws of this Prince, we shall take notice.

FREDERICK having reduc'd Lombardy into such Slavery, and being lifted up with high, whimsical Notions, was disgusted at the Pope for having made Peace with William, which was like to turn to a Quarrel in good Earnest; for the Bishop of Leudun as he was returning from Rome to Germany, was, by the Emperor's Order, made Prisoner: Adrian, who valued himself as much upon being Pope, as Frederick did upon being Emperor, wrote some Letters to him by Cardinal Rolando Chancellor of the Holy Church, and Bernardo Cardinal of St. Clement, in which he admonish'd him to set the Bishop at liberty, and among other things, he put him in mind of the Favours he ow'd him, and besides that he held the Empire as Beneficium Ecclesiæ Romanæ. One may easily imagine with what Spite and Indignation Frederick receiv'd such a Wipe: He was in such Rage and Fury, that he not only refused to comply with the Pope's Demand; but inveigh'd so bitterly against him, that he was forc'd to send other two Cardinals to pacify him, and to retract what he had written, by saying, that by these Words he did not mean, that the Empire was a Fief of the Church, but that the Word Beneficium imply'd only pro bono, & facto junctum ⁴. These Cardinals had much ado to pacify him; and though shortly after, a new Quarrel happen'd betwixt them, because Frederick frequently hinder'd the Pope's Ministers from gathering in the Ecclesiastical Revenues, and besides, he would have a certain Guido to be elected Bishop of Ravenna; nevertheless after various Treaties, they were once more made Friends.

BUT Adrian died soon after in Alagna, in the Month of September 1159 ⁵. His Death occasion'd new Troubles and Commotions in Rome, by a Schism in electing a Successor; for the greatest part of the Cardinals elected Cardinal Rolando Chancellor of the Holy Church, who took the Name of Pope Alexander III. and at the same time Giovanni Pisano Cardinal of St. Martin, and Guido da Siena Cardinal of St. Calistus, with the Assistance of Otho Count of Placentia, and Count Guido, Frederick's Ambassadors, who were then in Rome, elected Octavianus Cardinal of St. Cecilia Anti-pope, and gave him the Name of Victor IV. and they had the Boldness to besiege Alexander, with the College of Cardinals in St. Peter's Tower ; for what with Money, and what with the Emperor's Favour, the Anti-pope had made many Friends in Rome : Whereupon Odone Frangipane and other noble Romans, inrag'd at such an Indignity, reliev'd the Pope and Cardinals, and convey'd them out of Rome to a Place of Safety, and after the usual Manner Alexander was solemnly crown'd ; and Octavianus remain'd in Rome, whither Alexander in the second Year of his Pontificate return'd ; but seeing he could not stay there in Safety, because of the Anti-pope's Power, having left Gialio Bishop of Præneste his Legate, he went to Terracina, in order to take Shipping for France.

C H A P. II.

The Barons of the Kingdom of Puglia conspire against Majone. Matteo Bonello kills him ; and a new Conspiracy is hatch'd, in order to dethrone King William, and to set Roger his Son, a Child of Nine Years of Age, upon the Throne.

IN the mean time King William, in opposition to the Emperor Frederick his Enemy, no sooner heard of Alexander's Election, than he sent his Ambassadors to pay him Homage, and acknowledge him for the true and lawful Pope ; and understanding afterwards that the Pope had a mind to go to Terracina, in order to imbarc for France, he sent four Gallies well arm'd to that City, to be at the Pope's Command, in which he and the Cardinals imbarc'd, and were advanc'd but a little way from the Harbour, when a violent Storm overtook them. This Alliance and Friendship betwixt William and Alexander was of such Advantage to the King, that it sav'd him from a mischievous Plot, which Majone was hatching against him, for Majone, still intent how to effectuate his ambitious Designs, by the means of wicked Men, endeavour'd to corrupt Alexander with a great Sum of Money, that, after the Example of Zachary, he might remove William from the Kingdom as useless and wicked, hated by the People, and unfit for such a great Charge, and invest him with it, just so as Chilperic was serv'd in France, who was dethron'd, and Pepin put in his Room¹. But Pope Alexander perceiving the Villany of Majone, and his Thirst after Government, abhor'd his Impudence : This horrid Enterprize, being nois'd abroad, and divulg'd in Sicily and Puglia, hasten'd his Ruin ; for it being publickly said, that the Admiral had either put the King to death in his Palace, or had imprison'd him, or confin'd him to some Island, in order to usurp the Kingdom, many Cities of Puglia furiously inrag'd at such a Report, began to mutiny². The first was Melphis, to which soon after some other Cities join'd, and firmly resolv'd neither to obey the Letters, nor any Orders sent by Majone, nor to admit within their Bounds any Officers sent by him. Many Counts and Barons, who were jealous of the Tyrant's Power, made the same Resolutions, and ingag'd themselves to use their utmost Efforts for putting the Admiral to death, and never to lay down their Arms till he was either dead or banish'd. For which end a great Band of arm'd Men over-run all Puglia and Terra di Lavoro, to oblige the other Cities to join them, which they actually did. The Heads of this Association were Gionata di Valvano Count of Consa, Boemondo Count of Mancello, Filippo Count of Sangro, Ruggieri da Sanseverino Count of Tricarico, Riccardo dell' Aquila Count of Fondi, Ruggieri Count of Cerra, and Count Gilberto, the Queen's Cousin, to whom the King had lately given the County of *Gravina*¹. Besides these Mario Borrello, a Man of admirable Eloquence, got the City of Salerno, wherein he resided, and had many Followers, to join them, and the City of Naples likewise did the same. Count Andrea di Rupe Canina, who liv'd in Campagna di Roma, hearing these Reports, enter'd into Campagna, took Aquino, Alife, and S. Germano, Cities situated on the Skirts of Monte Cassino, and having march'd up the Hill, boldly attack'd the Monastery, but was repuls'd by those within².

IN the mean Time the King being appriz'd of this Association of the Barons and Cities of the Kingdom of Puglia, was grievously offended, for he had such a tender Love for, and Confidence in Majone, that he could never be persuaded of his Villany, and treasonable Design to rob him both of his Life and Kingdom; therefore by particular Messengers and Letters he expressly commanded the associated Barons and Cities to give over their Undertaking, because he was convinc'd of the Admiral's Fidelity, and that he aim'd at nothing but his Service; but these Messengers and Letters were of no Effect, for believing them to be of the Admiral's dictating, they plainly declar'd to the King, that they would by no means suffer themselves to be govern'd and commanded by Majone. No less was the Admiral hated by the Sicilians, who being nearest the Danger, durst not discover themselves as yet, tho' they lik'd the Commotion of the Barons of Puglia.

NOW the Admiral, contrary to his Expectation, seeing the Power of the Conspirators daily increasing, began by all Means possible to put a Stop to it; he got the King to write to the Cities of Amalphis and Sorrento, which continued as yet in their Allegiance to him; he did the same to Taranto, Otranto, Brindisi, and Bari, admonishing them not to give ear to such Reports, nor to believe the Stories of these treacherous Counts, nor to embark themselves in company with his Rebels. But these Letters were as little minded, because they look'd upon them as design'd for the Service of Majone the Traytor, and not for the King's. Majone likewise wrote to his Brother Stephen, who was President of Puglia, boldly to oppose the Designs of Count Robert, and by large Promises to gain a Party. Besides he sent the Bishop of Mazzara Ambassador to Melphis in Puglia, in the Name of the King to reclaim that People; but the Bishop acted quite contrary, for he encourag'd them to persist in their Undertaking against the Tyrant, by telling them more of his Villany than they knew. Upon which Calabria, following the Example of the neighbouring Puglia, likewise began to rise in Arms, which struck greater Terror into Majone; whereupon he bethought himself of sending a Man of such Authority as might be able to quell all these Commotions, and after mature Deliberation, he judg'd Matteo Bonello to be fittest for such a Business. Bonello was a Man of noble Blood, and extremely rich; but what he most excell'd in, was the Beauty of his Countenance, his Strength of Body, and great Courage; therefore he was not only famous and remarkable in Sicily, but likewise in Calabria, where he had most noble Kindred; and, on account of his so great Endowments, was much belov'd by the Admiral, who design'd him for a Husband for one of his Daughters, yet an Infant³. But his inconstant, rash, and changeable Temper, and his Self-conceitedness, eclips'd all these noble Talents; and tho' Bonello was so much belov'd by the Admiral, yet he hated the Admiral mortally, because, that he might get him to marry his Daughter, he had put a Stop to his Marriage which he intended (disdaining the mean Birth of the Admiral) with Clementia Countess of Catanzara, bastard Daughter, as is said, of King Roger, and Widow of Ugone di Molino Count of Molise, whom Bonello lov'd exceedingly, on account of her Beauty, and she was no less enamour'd with him; so that Majone standing in the way of their mutual Affection, was mortally hated by them both.

IN the mean Time Bonello having receiv'd the necessary Orders for his Departure, and taken Leave of the King, pass'd the Straits of Messina, and went to Calabria, where on a set Day, in a Meeting of the Barons of the Province, he endeavour'd by many Arguments (dissembling the Sentiments of his Heart) to persuade them, that the Admiral was innocent of all the Crimes laid to his Charge. But Ruggerio di Martorano of the Family of Sanseverino, a Man of great Knowledge, and much esteem'd, rose up, and in the Name of all the rest answer'd him with so much Force and Energy, that he not only brought him over to their Party, but likewise imbolden'd him, by telling him that he was the fittest Person to recover all their Liberties, by putting the Tyrant to Death, the Result of which would be, that they would all concur to get his Marriage with the Countess of Catanzaro accomplish'd; whereupon he enter'd into their Measures, and firmly promis'd, that in a short Time he would dispatch the Admiral out of the Way.

BUT a very weighty Incident hasten'd Majone's Ruin; for he having prepar'd every Thing in order to murder the King, and the Day appointed for such a fatal Tragedy drawing near, he resolv'd first to consult the Archbishop about proper Methods to prevent an Insurrection of the People when the Fact should come to be divulg'd, and likewise how they were to govern the Kingdom afterwards¹; whereupon great Disputes arose betwixt them, for the Admiral pretended that the Guardianship of the King's young Children, and the keeping of the Treasures, and all the Royal Palace ought to be intrusted to him; on the contrary, the Archbishop claim'd all these to himself, because, said he, by that Means the People would not mutiny, as they certainly would do, if they should see the Admiral take the Charge of the Royal Family, for they would be apt to suspect that the Children would be murder'd, seeing every Body was persuaded that he aspir'd to the Kingdom; which could not be suspected in Prelates, or other Ecclesiastical Persons, who aim not at any such Thing, therefore of Necessity the Children and Treasure must be put into their Hands; but the Admiral flatly oppos'd it, as a Thing quite contrary to his Intentions, and said, that he did not deserve such Treatment at his Hands, seeing he had rais'd him to such Grandeur: In fine, after some bitter Words, they parted declar'd Enemies. Whereupon the Archbishop was soon after in Disgrace at Court, for the Admiral persuaded the credulous and covetous King to force the Archbishop to pay him 700 Ounces of Gold, which he ow'd him; the Archbishop perceiving that all these bad Offices proceeded from Majone, began to hate him in earnest, and of dear Friends they became bitter Enemies, and fought to do one another all the Mischief in their Power. The Admiral resolv'd to poison the Archbishop, who, aware of his Design, was on his Guard, and at the same Time exhorted the Great Men, Soldiers, and common People to rise and put Majone to Death. In the mean Time Matteo Bonello return'd to Palermo, and having made the Admiral, who was now begun to be jealous of him, easy, by giving him to understand that he had soon quieted the Commotions of Calabria, he went privately to wait upon the Archbishop, who was lying sick a Bed, and gave him an Account of what had pass'd till that Time, the Archbishop advis'd him to put his Design immediately in Execution, because Matters of such Importance being delay'd, were in Danger of being discover'd; whereupon Bonello, fully resolv'd, wanted nothing but a fit Opportunity to strike the Blow; and Fortune conspiring to hasten the Admiral's Death, it was not long before a convenient Occasion offer'd.

MAYONE had caus'd Poison to be given to the Archbishop by one of his Domesticks, whom he had corrupted with Gifts and great Promises, which had occasion'd his present Sicknefs; but because the Poison had been weak, he was afraid that by proper Remedies he might recover his Health; and impatient that he should be so long a dying, he caus'd another much stronger Potion, and of a quicker Operation to be prepar'd, of which he took a Vial, and went to visit the Archbishop, and having plac'd himself near the Bed, began to ask him how he did; and then told him, that if he would follow the Advice of his Friends, he should soon recover his Health, for he had a Medicine, which out of Love to him he had caus'd to be compos'd in his own Sight, and had brought it along with him; but the Archbishop perceiving the Trick, told him, that his Disease had brought him so low, and his Stomach was so weak, that he not only abhorr'd all Potions, but with Difficulty could take any Food; yet notwithstanding this Answer, the Admiral, seeming not to understand that the Archbishop had discover'd the Treachery, impudently press'd him to take the Potion; but he reply'd, that he would refer the taking of it to another Day; then they began to talk together with much Confidence and Affection, and sought to betray and destroy one another with brazen-fac'd Dissimulation, and as Fortune would have it, they both obtain'd their Ends; for Majone by the Archbishop's means was murder'd that same Night, as we shall presently relate, and the Archbishop died soon after of the Poison formerly given him by the Admiral's means, tho' he had the Satisfaction to see his Enemy die before him. While the Archbishop was discoursing with the Admiral, he sent the Bishop of Messina, who was sitting by him, to tell Matteo Bonello, that this Night would be a fit Time for putting his Design in Execution; whereupon Bonello, already resolv'd upon the Crime, assembled some arm'd Men, and having encourag'd them, he posted them in different Places, that Majone might not escape any where, and he himself, with a good Number of them, lay in wait for him at the Gate of St. Agatha, thro' which he would probably pass in returning to the Royal Palace; and having acquainted the Archbishop that all was in Order, and Night come on, he expected the Admiral, who at last took Leave of the Archbishop, and departed. But immediately some of his Attendants perceiving the Snare that Bonello had laid for him, turn'd back and acquainted Majone with it, who terrified with the imminent Danger he was in, order'd them to tell Bonello to come and speak with him; but Bonello, finding that he was already discover'd, had no mind to dally, drew his Sword, attack'd him briskly, and said, I am come here to kill thee, and by thy Death to put an end to thy Wickedness, and to dispatch out of the World an Adulterer and Defiler of the King's Bed; the Admiral put by the first Thrust that Bonello made, but was run through and dispatch'd with the Second¹, his numerous Attendants leaving him without offering the least Resistance. Thus ended the ambitious Designs of Majone da Bari, High Admiral of Sicily, who, being of a very mean Extract, was by Fortune rais'd to great Honour; and, if I may be allow'd to compare small Things with great, he very much resembled Sejanus. Both of them being born of mean Parentage, by means of their Patrons liv'd long in great Splendor; both of them capable of the greatest Villainy, were Enemies to the Royal Family, and the Nobility of their Master's Dominions; both of them Adulterers and Defilers of the Royal Bed, with the Consent of their Masters Wives; the one got the Son of his Emperor to be murder'd, and the other (tho' he could not bring it about) design'd to murder his King; both of them endeavour'd to usurp their Masters Dominions, which themselves govern'd, and both of them came to an unlucky End, tho' the manner of their Deaths was different; for Tiberius, by his own Penetration having found out the Treason, caus'd Sejanus to be put to Death by the Hands of the common Hangman; and Majone through the Stupidity of William, who minded nothing, was kill'd by Conspirators, who could no longer bear his Villany.

IN the near Time Bonello, not knowing what the King would do, nor thinking himself safe in Palermo, retir'd to Cacabo his own Castle, and there fortified himself and Followers; the People of Palermo hearing of the Admiral's Death, discover'd the extreme Hatred they bore him, and began to tear his dead Carcass to pieces, some stabbing it, others, with a thousand ignominious Reproaches, deriding it. It being now late in the Night, King William was surpriz'd at the unusual Noise he heard, but Odone his Master of the Horse having told him all that had pass'd, he was grievously offended, and said, that if the Admiral had fail'd in his Duty to him, it was his Business, and no Body's else, to punish him; and the Queen, out of the Love she bore the Adulterer, being more offended than the King, was terribly inrag'd against Bonello and the other Conspirators. But the King, afraid of greater Disturbance among the Palermitans on this Occasion, and lest they should insult the Relations of the Deceas'd, and plunder their Houses, and those of the Admiral, order'd a strong Body of arm'd Men to guard and walk Rounds in the City. The next Day the King took care to appoint Errico Aristippo Archdeacon of Catania, and one of his Favourites², a Man of peaceable and mild Disposition, and very learn'd in the Latin and Greek Languages, to exercise the Office of High Admiral, till he should dispose of it otherwise, by whose Advice the Affairs of the Kingdom began to be manag'd; and the new Admiral and Count Silvestro having discover'd to the King the Conspiracy which Majone had hatch'd against him, were at great Pains to allay the mortal Hatred he had conceiv'd against Bonello, but he could never be persuaded to pardon him, till among Majone's Treasure, the Scepter, the Crown, and the other Ensigns of Royalty were found ; which being evident Proofs of his Villany, the King was pacified, and immediately caus'd the two Stephens, one of them the Brother, and the other the Son of Majone, with Matteo the Notary, his intimate Friend, to be put into Prison, and likewise order'd all the Deceased's Treasure, that could be found, to be carried to the Royal Palace, and caus'd Andrea the Eunuch, and many others of the Admiral's Domesticks to be put to the Torture, and threaten'd Stephen the Son with the same, if he did not discover where the rest lay conceal'd ; by their Information a great Sum of Money was found in the Custody of the Bishop of Tropea, which being demanded by the King, was deliver'd. Afterwards William sent Messengers to Cacabo to tell Bonello, that now, being appriz'd of the Admiral's Villany, he was oblig'd to him for having put him to Death, and therefore he might come very safely to him. Bonello upon this Message, trusting to the Love of the Barons and People, and the Assistance of his Followers, came immediately to Palermo, where he was met by a vast Multitude both of Men and Women, who with great Demonstrations of Joy welcom'd him, and conducted him to the Royal Palace, where he was kindly receiv'd by the King, and restor'd to his Favour. And having taken Leave of the King, he was honourably accompanied by the greatest Men of the Court, and the same Crowd of People to his own House ; and he became so famous and renown'd, not only in Palermo, but over all Sicily, that he gain'd the Love and Esteem of every Body.

BUT see the Instability of worldly Things, this his so great Happiness, soon became his Ruin ; for the Eunuchs of the Royal Palace, who, together with the Queen, had been Partners in Majone's Conspiracy against the King, much displeas'd at Bonello's Prosperity, and afraid lest some Time or other he should call them to account, began by several Means to put him in Disgrace with the King, and make his Power to be suspected by him, by telling him that Bonello had a mind to be Master of Sicily, and for that end was currying Favour with the Barons and People ; and for carrying on the same Design, had unjustly murder'd the Admiral, who was the Person that had the King's Safety and Interest most at Heart, all being manifest Untruths that were laid to his Charge ; and that the Crown and other Royal Ensigns, found amongst his Treasure, had been provided by the Admiral in order to be presented to his Majesty the ensuing Month of January, as a new Year's Gift¹. The King, by being addicted to the Pleasures of a Court, and an unactive Life, was become so indolent and stupid, that, excepting the Pains he took to gather Wealth, which made him lay heavy Taxes upon his Subjects, and got him the Name of Wicked, he was quite another Man than he had been formerly ; and was now so foolish and credulous, that it was an easy matter to make him believe all that was laid to Bonello's Charge, so that he began to hate him, and to believe that he had murder'd Majone, in order the more easily to take away his Life. And tho' it was easy for the King to crush Bonello, yet seeing the Palermitans, who were still in a State of Commotion, and not quite pacified, had such a Regard for him, he thought fit not to meddle with him. However he began to require a great Sum of Money of him, which for a long Time had been owing to the Crown, and never demanded of him, as being Majone's Son-in-Law. Therefore Bonello seeing himself all of a sudden su'd for an old Debt, that had been quite forgot, and that he was rarely call'd to Court, and had not the same Reception there as formerly, began to be surpriz'd, and to revolve in his Mind what could be the Occasion of so sudden a Change ; and what increas'd his Jealousy and Fear, was to see Adinolfo the Chamberlain, formerly a Creature of Majone's, much in Favour with the King, and that both he and his other Enemies impudently shew'd him the Hatred they bore him. And about this Time the Archbishop dying of the Poison given him by the Admiral, Bonello was both depriv'd of his Advice and Assistance, and more avowedly persecuted by his Rivals ; all which he look'd upon to be evident Marks that the King had alter'd his Mind with respect to him, and that therefore his Enemies had the Assurance to lie in wait for his Life. Wherefore he resolv'd to acquaint Matteo Santa Lucia, his Cousin, and many other Sicilian Barons, who being invited by his Letters had come to Palermo, with the whole Matter ; he told them that the King, instead of rewarding him for saving his Life, by killing the Admiral, was now, at the Instigation of the Queen and the Eunuchs, pressing him to pay an old Debt, and persecuting him to that Degree, that he was in Danger of his Life ; therefore he begg'd of them not to desert him in such a dangerous State, but to associate themselves with him for defending him against his Enemies. This Speech of Bonello wrought more upon the Barons than he could have expected ; for finding them all at his Disposol, after various Consultations, they concluded to strike at the Head of all these Mischiefs, either by putting the King to Death, or in Prison, and making his Son Roger, a Boy of nine Years of Age, King, who, on account of the Virtues that began to appear in so tender an Age, like his Grandfather, could not fail to prove an excellent Prince ; but not thinking it fit to take so weighty an Affair upon themselves alone, they brought over to their Party, Simon the bastard Son of King Roger, who mortally hated his Brother, for having taken from him the Principality of Taranto, which his Father had left him, and in lieu thereof given him the County of Policastro. They likewise brought over Tancred the Son of Roger Duke of Puglia, who, tho' a little Valetudinary, yet was a Man of great Judgment and Courage, and kept in a manner Prisoner in the Royal Palace by William ; and they also ingag'd to be of their Party, Roger Count of Avellino, the King's Cousin by his Grandmother Adelasia ; and their Design of making the Infant Roger King, was to let the Sicilians see that they had no mind to deprive William's Children of the Kingdom, but himself who was a Tyrant. Having brib'd Gavaretto, who kept the Keys of the Prisons, and who was often intrusted by Malgerio with the Charge of the Castle, they agreed, that on a fix'd Day all the Prisoners should be set at Liberty, provided with Arms, and acquainted with the Signal that was agreed upon, when every Thing was ready for putting their Design in Execution. After this Bonello went to his Castle Misfretto, not far from Palermo, to lay up Provisions there, and in some other Places belonging to him, whither they might retire in case of any cross Accident, and forbad his Associates to do any Thing, but lie snug till his Return ; and if any Thing of Moment should happen, he desir'd to be acquainted by Letters, and he would immediately return with a strong Body of arm'd Men. Whilst Bonello was thus employ'd in the Country, it happen'd that one of the Conspirators discover'd the Matter to a Soldier his Friend, by thinking to ingage him in the Plot ; the Soldier being let in to the whole Design, thank'd his Friend, and said he would consider of it till the next Day, when he would give him his Answer ; immediately the Soldier went to another of his Friends, who happen'd to be one of the Conspirators, to whom he told the Story with Indignation, and said, to prevent such a piece of Villany, which would be a lasting Infamy upon the Sicilians, he was resolv'd to discover the whole to the King. This Friend of his, dissembling the Matter, seem'd much offended at such a Thing, but he went immediately to Count Simon, and the other Heads of the Conspiracy, and told them what had happen'd through the Indiscretion of one of their Friends, and that they had best consider that Night what they were to do, because the next Morning the King would be appriz'd of the whole Matter. Therefore terrified at their imminent Danger, and not having Time to acquaint Bonello, they resolv'd to put their Design immediately in Execution ; for which end they sent Word to the Keeper of the Prisons, to set all the Prisoners at Liberty the next Day, because they could delay no longer ; the Keeper return'd them answer, that it should be done against Three a Clock next Day, when the King would be in the Chamber of Audience, conferring with the Admiral Archdeacon of Catania, on the Affairs of State, where, without any Noise or Resistance, they might either kill or imprison him as they thought fit ; this so distinct and faithful Answer of Gavaretto, put new Life into the Conspirators, who had been much dishearten'd, partly on account of Bonello's Absence, and of those that had gone with him to Misfretto, and partly because they were forc'd to do in a hurry, what, after mature Deliberation, and in a proper Time, they had resolv'd to execute.

THE next Day Gavaretto at the Hour appointed punctually perform'd his Part, for he set at Liberty William Count of Principato, with all the other Noblemen, whom he had before provided with Arms, and conducted them to the Place where he had posted the other Conspirators, and Count Simon their Head, who having been bred up in the Palace, knew all the Apartments of it, so that he went directly to that where the King was discoursing with the Admiral. But the King seeing Count Simon his Brother, and Tancred his Nephew advancing towards him, was much offended that they should offer to come into his Presence without his License, and wonder'd wonder'd how his Guards came to let them pass; but when he saw that they were follow'd by a great Body of arm'd Men, perceiving what they would be at, and struck with the Fear of Death, he had a mind to make his Escape, but was quickly seiz'd, and while they were reproaching him with his Tyranny, he observing William Count of Lefina, and Roberto Bovenfe, bold and cruel Men, ready to fall upon him with their drawn Swords, begg'd those that held him not to suffer him to be murder'd, for he would immediately renounce the Kingdom. Had it not been for Riccardo Mandra, who stept in betwixt them, and calm'd their Fury, they certainly would have put him to Death; his Life being thus sav'd, he was shut up into close Prison, and having put a Guard upon the Queen and her Children in their own Apartment, they search'd and plunder'd the Palace of all the precious Jewels and rich Furniture, not sparing even the Honour of the Queen's Maids¹. They kill'd all the Eunuchs that came in their Way, they went to the City, where they plunder'd the rich Merchandizes of the Saracens, that were either in their Shops, or the Custom-House. After all this was over, Count Simon with his Followers took Roger Duke of Puglia, William's eldest Son, carried him out of the Palace, and to shew him to the People, mounted him on a white Horse, and marching through the Streets of Palermo, with chearful Voices they proclaim'd him King, which, out of Respect to his Grandfather, was answer'd with loud Acclamations of the People; but his Coronation was delay'd till Bonello, who was hourly expected, should arrive. Walter Archdeacon of Ceffalu, the Child's Preceptor, publicly inveighing against the Cruelty and other Misdeeds of William, told the People, that they ought to swear to obey Prince Simon, who would govern the Kingdom till the young King should be of Age; by Walter's Means many swore such an Oath, others refus'd to do it, tho' none had the Boldness to oppose the Conspirators, because some of the Bishops, who were then in Palermo, and had great Authority in the Kingdom, openly approv'd of these Proceedings; and others by their Silence gave their Consent to them: The Commonalty being told that the whole had been brought about by Bonello's Means, were easy. But seeing he delay'd to come, William Count of Principato, and Tancred Count of Lecce, went to Mistretto to bring him and the arm'd Men that were with him to Palermo, lest the Palermitans should change their Mind, and set the King at Liberty, as they afterwards did.

AFTER they had waited three Days, the King still in Prison, and had no Tidings of Bonello, Romualdo Archbishop of Salerno, Roberto Archbishop of Messina, Riccardo Elect of Syracusa, and Giustino Bishop of Mazza, began to encourage the Salernitans to set him at Liberty, saying, it was a very ugly and shameful Thing to suffer their Sovereign to be so ignominiously used, and the Treasure laid up by the good King, for the Defence of the Kingdom, to be thus robb'd and wasted². These Words, spoken at first in Presence only of a few, were soon spread abroad amongst the Commonalty; whereupon, as if they had been call'd from Heaven, or led on by a brave Captain, they took up Arms, and besieg'd the Palace, requiring those within at their Peril immediately to set the King at Liberty. The Conspirators astonish'd and confounded at so sudden a Change, began at first to make a gallant Defence, but finding it would be to no purpose for a handful of Men to pretend to stand out against an inrag'd Multitude, out of cruel Necessity they had recourse to the King, whom they took out of Prison, and capitulated with him for Liberty to go where they should think fit; then they conducted him to a Balcony to be seen by the People. But the Palermitans seeing their King in that Condition, became more furious, and by all Means resolv'd to break open the Gates, and be reveng'd of the Conspirators, who would certainly have been put to Death, if the King had not beckon'd to them with his Hand, telling them that they had given sufficient Proof of their Loyalty in setting him at Liberty, and that they might lay down their Arms, and allow those who had made him Prisoner, to go freely where they pleas'd, because he had consented to it; upon which they all obey'd, and left the Passage out of the Castle free; the Conspirators march'd out, left Palermo, and retir'd to Cacabo.

C H A P. III.

King William being set at Liberty, takes upon him again the Government of the Kingdom. The Death of Roger his eldest Son. New Commotions in Palermo and Puglia, which at last are quieted by the Death of Bonello, and of the other Conspirators.

HIS Adventure was the Cause, in a short Time, of great Mischiefs to Sicily, for not only a great many noble Barons lost their Lives on that account, and a great Part of the Royal Treasure was purloin'd, but Duke Roger likewise, who had hitherto given notable Indications that he would prove an excellent Prince, died; for during the Tumult of the People, having rashly thrust his Head out of a Window that fac'd those who were besieging the Palace, he was wounded with an Arrow, shot, as was then commonly reported, by Dario the King's Porter; however, the Wound would not have prov'd Mortal, had it not been, that the King, his Father, seeing him go merrily along before him after he had been set at Liberty, vex'd that he had been preferr'd to him, and not minding that his Son had had no Hand in it, struck him unmercifully with his Foot on the Breast: Roger having told his Mother what had happen'd, died soon after.

THE King being sensible of the shameful Action, and his other Misfortunes, forgetful of his Dignity, stripp'd himself of the Royal Garments, lamented his wretched Condition, and almost distracted, did nothing but mourn bitterly, open'd his Doors to whoever was pleas'd to enter, and related to them his Misfortunes, which drew Tears even from his Enemies. But at last, by the Advice of his intimate Friends, and many Prelates who had come to comfort him, he order'd the People to be assembled in the Court of his Palace, whither he went down, and first gave them Thanks for their Loyalty; then exhorted them to continue in their Fidelity; and taking all that had befallen him as a just Punishment which God had deservedly afflicted him with, said, from that Time forth he was resolv'd to lead a better Life; but his Grief and Tears hindering him to proceed, Riccardo Elect of Syracusa, a Man of great Learning, and wonderful Eloquence, explain'd more fully to the People what the King had said, who, in Testimony of his good Will towards them, granted them at that Time many Privileges and Immunities, which was a Thing so much the more agreeable, as it was given when they least expected it.

WHEN Bonello receiv'd the News of the King's being set at liberty, he was inwardly vex'd and displeas'd, though he pretended the contrary, because he had no hand in it, and the King also temporizing, us'd the like Dissimulation, yet his being at Cacabo with so many Barons, could no longer be dissembled; for Count Simon, Tancred Count of Lecce, William Count of Lessina, Alexander Count of Conversano, Ruggiero Sclavo, and all the rest that had imprison'd the King, had join'd Bonello at Cacabo, and had a good Body of arm'd Men with them; therefore William sent Messengers to Bonello to demand what that Meeting and those Soldiers meant, and whether he was imbark'd in the Designs of the Conspirators, and how he came to shelter them in his Castle? to which Message he answer'd, That it would be the Height of Cruelty in him to expose so many great Men, who had had recourse to him, to his his Indignation, and that he could not forbear to tell him, that if he would narrowly examine his own Actions, he would be surpriz'd, how so many illustrious Men have been able to bear the Yoke of the many grievous Laws he had impos'd upon them, for destroying their Liberty; especially that Law which obliges their Daughters to live in perpetual Virginity, they not being allow'd to marry till they are past child-bearing, that the Fiefs may devolve to him; so that if he had a mind that he, Bonello, and the Conspirators should live peaceably, he must abrogate those Laws which had been lately made for depriving them of their Liberties, and restore those commendable Usages, introduc'd into the Kingdom by his Forefathers Roger Count of Sicily, and the famous Robert Guiscard, otherwise they would endeavour to do themselves Justice by Force of Arms¹. This bold Answer much displeas'd the King; who immediately sent them Word, that he would rather chuse to lose both his Life and Kingdom, than out of Fear of them, yield to what they requir'd; but if they would lay down their Arms, and be at his Devotion, they might ask any reasonable thing, and he would grant it them. To which they would by no means consent, but march'd straight to Palermo, which put the Citizens into a terrible Fright, because they would probably hinder Provisions from coming to the City. On the other hand, the King having assembled a good Body of Troops, laugh'd at what they could do; yet for Peace sake, he sent anew to Bonello, Roberto da S. Giovanni, a Canon of Palermo, a Man of a bright Character, and untainted Loyalty, who wrought so effectually and dextrously, that he brought both Parties to an Agreement, by which the King pardon'd the Conspirators, and gave them arm'd Gallies to transport themselves out of the Kingdom, whereupon some of them with Count Simon, went to Greece, and others to Jerusalem. The King restor'd Bonello to favour, and likewise pardon'd Roger Count of Avellino, as well because he was very young, as at the Request and Tears of his Grandmother Adelasia, the King's first Cousin, who lov'd him dearly, he being the only remaining Heir of this County; and he kept Riccardo Mandra, who had sav'd his Life, near his own Person, and created him High Constable of *Sicily*². But the Misfortunes of Sicily did not end here; for Ruggiero Sclavo, Son of Count Simon, and Tancred Count of Lecce, with many others of their Associates, who would not enter into the Agreement with the King, began to possess themselves of many Towns, and to lay Waste all the Country about Syracusa and Catania. Which Proceedings struck Terror in the Court, and the King being persuaded that all was done by Bonello's Directions, shut him up in Prison; and though the Palermians at first made an Uproar, and endeavour'd to set him at liberty; yet the fickle Mob, afraid of the King, soon lost Courage, and minded him no more, for Bonello being put in a dark Prison under Ground, had his Eyes put out, the Sinews above his Heels cut, and was condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment, where, soon after, lamenting his Misfortune, he died of Grief. The King likewise crush'd the other Conspirators, and in a short time quieted Palermo and all Sicily.

WILLIAM now wanted to quell the Commotions of Puglia, rais'd by some Barons, who had been Partisans of the Admiral Majone, and especially Roberto di Bassavilla Count of Loritello, who, joining with the Counts Gilberto and Boemondo, possess'd himself of many of the King's Towns in Puglia as far as Oriolo, a Castle situated on the Confines of Puglia and Calabria. From thence he went to Terra di Lavoro, where he endeavour'd to be Master of Salerno; but that not succeeding, he march'd to Benevento, which immediately surrender'd; from thence returning to Puglia, he took Taranto. Calabria was likewise in Confusion, where all the most powerful Barons were Enemies to the King, and sided with Count Roberto, among the rest Clementia Countess of Catanzaro, in order to oppose the King, had reinforc'd Taverna with a strong Garrison. William finding all the Provinces of the Kingdom of Puglia in this Condition, in order to suppress these Commotions, resolv'd to go thither at the Head of a good Army; and before he set out, under a sham Pretence, he sent for Ruggiero Sanseverino, call'd di Martonaro, a Baron much respected in Calabria, whom he look'd upon to be his bitter Enemy, because he had stuck close by Bonello in the late Troubles, and for that Crime only, caus'd him to be imprison'd, and his Eyes to be put out.

IN the mean time he went to Calabria, and laid close Siege to Taverna, and tho' the Countess Clementia with her Mother, and Alferio and Tommaso her Uncles, together with the Inhabitants, defended themselves gallantly, yet it was taken at last, and destroy'd, and the Countess with her Mother sent Prisoners to Palermo, and Tommaso and Alferio were immediately hang'd. Count Roberto hearing that Taverna was taken, went presently to Taranto, and having encourag'd the Citizens to make a stout Defence, and put a new Garrison in the Town, in order to shun William's Army he went immediately into Abbruzzi. But William march'd strait to Taranto, and soon made himself Master of that City, and caus'd some of Count Roberto's Soldiers, whom he found there, to be hang'd. He recover'd all the Places of Puglia and Campania, as fast as he had lost them. Then hearing, that Roberto di Bassavilla with a Part of his Forces, had march'd into Abbruzzi, he presently sent Riccardo di Soria with a good Body of Troops to make him Prisoner; but he being appriz'd of it, fled the Kingdom, and went to the Emperor Frederick in Germany. The other Barons seeing the King so successful, likewise fled, some to Romagna and some to Abbruzzi. Ruggieri dell' Aquila Count of Avellino, also made his Escape, for tho' the King had formerly pardon'd him, yet he had incur'd his Displeasure in marrying, without his Consent, the Sister of Guglielmo da Sanseverino, who, for the same Reason, likewise fled to shun the King's Resentment. After all this was over, the King went to Salerno, which he grievously oppress'd, by extorting a great Sum of Money from the Inhabitants; from thence he embark'd and return'd to Palermo. Thus William by his Severity, having restor'd Peace in his Dominions, wearied with the past Troubles, resolv'd for the future to lead a more peaceable and quiet Life; and having committed the Government of his Kingdom to Matteo Notajo di Salerno, and Henry Bishop of Syracusa, an Englishman, he gave himself up to the Ease and Pleasures of a Court, and never minded the Affairs of his Kingdom any more.

C H A P. IV.

After the Death of Victor the Anti-pope, Alexander III. is acknowledg'd for true Pope, and returns to Rome; and King William, after having appeas'd some Disturbances that happen'd in his Palace, in the Year 1160, dies in Palermo.

URING these Commotions in the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, others much more remarkable happen'd in France and Italy, betwixt Pope Alexander and the Emperor Frederick; for Alexander, after having continued some time in Alagna, went to Genoa, and from thence took Shipping and went to Provence: Victor the Anti-pope, who stay'd in Segna, hearing of Alexander's Departure, went immediately into Lombardy to Frederick, to acquaint him that Alexander had gone to France: The Emperor no sooner heard of it, than, being afraid lest Lewis King of France should receive him as true Pope, he sent Henry his Ambassador to France, to desire an Interview with Lewis near Avignon, for settling the Affairs and reforming the Abuses of the Church. The Emperor seeing that the Anti-pope had not so strong strong a Party as Alexander, resolv'd on this Occasion to endeavour to get them both depos'd, and to make a new Pope, lest Alexander, his open Enemy, at last should be acknowledg'd by all for true Pope; Lewis, a simple Man, and easily impos'd upon, was persuad'd, with a small Retinue, to come to the appointed Place, and Frederick, with a great Army, arriv'd the Day following, which very much perplex'd both the Pope and the King, who were too late in finding out his deceitful Intention; and they would have been in a sorry Condition, if Henry King of England, a gallant and most religious Prince, who had smelt Frederick's Designs, had not landed in France with a strong Army to relieve Alexander and Lewis. This seasonable Arrival of an Army, equal to that of Frederick, baulk'd his Design, in so much that after various Conferences, the Emperor, angry at his Disappointment, went to Germany with his Anti-pope; and Alexander having escap'd this Danger, was acknowledg'd and respected by the Kings of England and France, and all their Kingdoms, for true Pope. And having accompanied these two Kings to Paris, he compos'd some Differences that were between them, and got them to enter into a League and Fellowship. Alexander this Year 1163, assembled a General Council in Tours, in which all the Bishops of England, Scotland, France, Spain and Ireland, with some German Prelates, were present, wherein he re-establish'd many Things, and reform'd some Abuses with respect to Church Government. In the mean time the Anti-pope, for all that the Emperor could do, was not own'd by the German Bishops; so that he return'd to Italy, and went to Lucca, where he died soon after. Nevertheless the Schism was not at an end, for by the means of Rinaldo, Frederick's Chancellor, another Anti-pope quickly started up, which was Guido da Crema, who took the Name of Pascal III. The Romans having heard of the Death of the Anti-pope, immediately sent Ambassadors to France to invite Alexander back, begging him to return to Rome, where they would receive him with all the Affection and Respect imaginable; whereupon the Pope being sensible that his Presence was necessary in Rome for the Good of the Church, took Shipping, and escaping the Snares which the Pisans, at the Emperor's Desire, had laid for him with their Gallies in order to make him Prisoner, he arriv'd safely at Messina, with all his Cardinals and the Archbishop of Mentz: As soon as King William, who was then at Palermo, had Notice of his Arrival, he sent his Ambassadors to wait upon him, and in his Name to offer him rich Presents, and five arm'd Gallies, in which he embark'd, and first went to Salerno, and from thence in the same Gallies arriv'd in the Tyber, and landed at St. Paul's Church, whither all the People and Clergy of Rome came to meet him, and in great State convey'd him to the Lateran Palace.

BU T while William thought himself secure from all Danger, by an unforeseen Accident, he was like to lose his Life; for some few Prisoners, in Despair of ever obtaining their Liberty, through the Malice of Matteo Notajo, who prov'd as cruel and tyrannical as Majone; and wearied with the Uneasiness and Horror of a Prison, made an Attempt to make their Escape, or put an End to their Miseries. For which end, having brib'd the Keepers, at a Time when the Palace was least frequented, they got out, and though they were but a few, they boldly attack'd the Door-keepers of the Palace, and having enter'd, put all in Confusion, and endeavour'd to seize the King, or his Children; but a great Number of Soldiers with Odone, the King's Master of the Horse coming on the Noise, after a small Resistance, they were at last all put to Death one after another, and their Bodies expos'd to be eaten by the Dogs. This Adventure made the King very uneasy, and considering that the Prisoners of the Castle had put him twice in Danger of his Life, he caus'd those that remain'd to be taken out, and carried to the Castle on the Seashoar, and other Forts of the Island. And after this he gave himself up to such Ease and Quiet, that he expressly forbid his Domesticks to acquaint him with any thing that could give him the least Disturbance; so that his Ignorance of the Affairs of his Kingdom encourag'd Gaito Pietro, and the other Eunuchs of the Palace grievously to oppress and abuse the Sicilians, both in their Persons and Goods, whence they took Occasion to call the King, William the Wicked, which he was found so much the more to deserve, by how much better his Successor prov'd. The King altogether addicted to his Pleasures, bethought himself that his Father

Roger had built two stately Palaces in Palermo, therefore he resolv'd to build a Third, that should far exceed those of his Father, not only in Magnificence and Nobleness of Structure, but likewise in the Fineness of the Gardens, and the Beauty of the Fountains and Fish-ponds which surrounded it on all Hands. But this Work was scarcely finish'd, when Death, which puts an end to all human Designs, prevented his Enjoyment of it; for in the Year 1166, the beginning of Lent, he fell sick of a Flux, which troubled him extremely; whereupon he devoutly took the Sacraments of the Church, reliev'd many Prisoners, and likewise remitted a new Tax which he laid upon the Cities and Lands of Puglia; and having call'd for all the great Men of his Court, and the Archbishops of Salerno and Reggio, he made his Will, by which he left William his eldest Son Heir of his Kingdom, and to Henry his other Son he confirm'd the Principality of Capua, with which he had formerly invested him¹; and he left the Queen Regent of the Kingdom, till the Sons should be of Age; and he enjoin'd her, that in all Affairs of State, she should take Advice of the Bishop of Syracusa, Gaito Pietro and Matteo Notajo; and the Disease increasing, he call'd for Romualdo Guarna Archbishop of Salerno, his near Kinsman, who, according to those Times, was very knowing in Physick, and though he prescrib'd many Medicines proper for his Disease, yet he would take none of them but those that pleas'd himself, which hasten'd his Death, for on the Saturday before the Octave of *Easter*², he was seiz'd with a violent Fever, which soon after carried him off at the Age of 46, after he had reign'd Sixteen Years, two Months and three Days, from the Time of his being crown'd King of Sicily, when his Father was still alive.

THE Queen being afraid lest the sudden News of the King's Death might occasion some dangerous Commotion amongst the Palermitans, caus'd it to be conceal'd, till the Arrival of the Barons who had been already sent for to be present at the Coronation of the new King. After it had been hush'd up for a few Days, the Death of the Father, and the Reign of the Son were publish'd at the same Time; and the Corps was honourably carried to St. Peter's Chapel, where, for three Days successively, the funeral Solemnities were pompously and magnificently celebrated, at which all the Barons and Bishops that were in Palermo were present; and in process of Time the Corps was transported to the Church of Montreale, which the King his Son caus'd to be built, where the Queen made a stately Tomb to be erected, which is to be seen at this Time without any Inscription.

WILLIAM, according to Romualdo, was a Prince of a noble and graceful Aspect, exceeding covetous, and most intrepid in War: He often vanquish'd his Enemies both by Sea and Land; but in Peace was very indiscreet, and beyond measure a Lover of Ease, and indolent. His Inclination to Cruelty, and his too great Desire of heaping up Money, and his Lavishness in spending it, made him appear wicked in the Eyes of the People: As for the rest, he esteem'd and caress'd his Friends, and rais'd them to great Honours, and liberally rewarded them: On the other hand, he was a bitter Persecutor of his Enemies, many of which he put to a cruel Death, and others he banish'd: He was very Religious, and a Lover of Divine Worship, and he had a great Regard for the Popes, with whom he had no Disputes, excepting in the beginning of his Reign with Adrian.

C H A P. V.

The Laws of King William I.

ALTHO' some of this Prince's Laws seem'd grievous to his Subjects, on account of the great Desire he had to heap up Riches; nevertheless all the rest were very good and useful, insomuch that Frederick II. caus'd them to be inserted in the Volume of his Constitutions, compil'd by Pietro delle Vigne, and order'd them and those of Roger to be observ'd. We have Twenty-one of the Laws of this Prince in the Volume of the Constitutions, which must be distinguish'd from those which William II. publish'd afterwards, that they may not be confounded, as some Writers have done, who have taken them all to be William I.'s.

THAT, which we read in the first Book, under the Title de Usurariis puniendis, and which, in some Editions, bears in the Rubrick the Name of Roger, and in some others that of William, as we have said, is neither Roger's, nor, as Andrea d'Isfernia, Afflicto, and some of our Writers have believ'd, William I.'s. It was publish'd long after by William II. his Son; for this Law ordains, that all Causes concerning Usury, that shall be brought before his Court, be decided, and determin'd according to the Pope's Decree lately publish'd in Rome, meaning the Decree which was made against Usurers in the Lateran Council, celebrated in Rome by Alexander III. and inserted by Gregory IX. in his *Decretals*¹; so that William I. cannot be the Author of it, for this Council was celebrated by Alexander in the Year 1180, according to Antonio d'Agostino, or, as the most accurate Writers say, in 1179, when William the Wicked was dead, who, as we have seen, died in the Year 1166, and William II. was reigning in Sicily, who, altogether differing from his Father, hated Usurers and their abominable Pelf, and would have Usury to be judg'd by the Canons of the Lateran Council, and not by the Civil Law. 'Tis worthy of Observation, that in these Times the secular Judges took Cognizance of the Crime of Usury, and it did not belong to the Ecclesiastical Judges, as they afterwards pretended; for William only ordain'd, that his Judges should decide such Causes not by the Civil Law, but according to that Decree, which, without this Constitution, would not have been obligatory upon his Subjects, because the Ecclesiastical Canons had not as yet acquir'd that Force and Authority in the Courts of Justice, which, by long Custom, they afterwards obtain'd in the new Dominions of Christian Princes; but that they might be observ'd in the Tribunals, and have the Force of Laws, the Prince was forc'd to command it.

IN like Manner the other Constitution, which we read in the same first Book, under the Title Ubi Clericus in Maleficiis debeat conveniri, ought to be attributed to William II. and not to William I. This, with another, which we read in the third Book, under the Title de Adulteriis coercendis, was made by William II. at the Desire of Walter Archbishop of *Palermo*², by which the Persons of the Clergy of his Kingdom, with respect to criminal Matters, were exempted from secular Jurisdiction, and subjected to that of the Church, which was to judge them according to the Canons and Ecclesiastical Laws; excepting only the Crimes of Felony, and those, which for their Heinousness, concern'd the King's Majesty, the Cognizance of which he would have to belong to his own Courts.

NEVERTHELESS the other Constitutions which follow in the same first Book, under various Titles, are William I's. We have the first under Title 59, by which Officers are forbid to imploy others to officiate for them in their Employments, and particularly the Lord Chief Justice, and other inferior Justices were not to appoint Deputies for exercising their Offices, and the Offenders were to be punish'd capitally. The second is under the Title De juramentis non remittendis a Bajulis, whereby any of these Officers, who, out of Favour, or for Money, dispensed with the Oaths, or other Proofs in Law Suits, which by the Judges they had been order'd to take, were fin'd in a Pound of Gold. The third under the Title, De Officio Magistri Camerarii, was made to prevent Confusion amongst the Officers, and to inform each of them of their Duty in their several Stations. By which Constitution it was ordain'd, that the High Chamberlain should take Cognizance in Civil Matters only, and not in Feodal, which belong to the High Court, and the Chief Justices; and that the Differences that might arise betwixt Bailiffs and Tax-gatherers under his Jurisdiction, should be decided by him; and that Appeals of Causes decided by the ordinary Judges, should be brought before him, whose Decrees he might either confirm or annul, as he should think just: From whom there was no Appeal to the Chief Justice as formerly, but only to the King.

THE Fourth, under the same Title, orders the High Chamberlain, with the Advice of the Bailiffs to make Assizes of all vendible Things, in every City and Place under his Jurisdiction.

THE Fifth, which we read under the Title De Officio Secreti, is Local, and regards the Province of Calabria, whereby it is ordain'd, that the Office of Secretaries and Tax-gatherers of that Province should be perform'd by the Chamberlain thereof. And in the Sixth, which follows, the said Secretaries and Receivers of the Rents are particularly injoin'd to have a watchful Eye on the Treasures that should be found, and to apply them to the King's Use, and to take Care of all Shipwrecks, because if the Masters of the Vessels were dead, and had no lawful Heirs, the Goods belong'd to the King. And they were likewise to take Care of the Goods of those who died Intestate, and had no lawful Successors, and to give the third Part of the Price of their hereditary Estate to the Poor, to pray for the Soul of the Deceas'd, and all the rest was to be apply'd to the King's Use.

THE Seventh, under the same Title, ordains the Justices, Chamberlains, Castellans and Bailiffs, to be diligent in assisting and advising the said Secretaries and Receivers, in every thing that was for the King's Advantage.

THE Eighth, which we read under the Title De præstando Sacramento Bajulis, & Camerariis, deserves to be minded; for the King prescribes to the Chamberlains and Bailiffs, how they ought to administer Justice to his Subjects. He ordains them to administer it according to his own Constitutions, and those of his Father Roger, and wherein those fail'd, according to the approv'd Customs of his Dominions, and lastly, according to the common Longobard and Roman Laws; which is a Proof, that in this Prince's Time the Longobard Laws were in Force, and observ'd in this Kingdom, and were look'd upon to be as much the common Laws, as the Roman were. Whence it came that the first Works which we have of our Lawyers, are upon the Longobard Laws, and that Carlo di Tocco, Contemporary with this William, who, in the Year 1162, made him Judge of the High Court¹, was at the Pains to comment upon them; in doing of which he made use of the Pandects, and others of Justinian's Books: not that these had acquir'd the Force of Laws in this Kingdom; but because the Longobard Laws were not reputed so barbarous and unpolish'd, seeing many of them were conformable to the Laws of the Pandects, which had inhand'd the Study of many, who began to despise the Longobard Laws. Neither did William mean any other thing by the common Roman Laws, but those that, before the Pandects were found in Amalphis, had continu'd by Tradition amongst our Country-People; for tho' in the other Cities of Italy, as being publickly taught in their Academies, they began to be quoted in the Courts of Justice, yet hitherto in these our Provinces, there being as yet no publick Schools till the Time of Frederick II. they not only had not acquir'd any Authority of Laws, nor were quoted in the Courts; but they were not so much as taught, and explain'd, as they were in Bologna, Milan, and the other Cities of Italy; and Causes were for the most Part decided according to the Longobard Laws, as is clear from those two Sentences formerly mention'd by us, and recorded by Pellegrinus, the one in the Reign of King Roger, the other in that of William II. And this is so certain, that it was not so much as allow'd to have recourse to the Laws of the Pandects, when the Longobard fail'd; which is evident from the Commentaries of the said Carlo di Tocco, wherein he has this Question, As the Child succeeded to the Mother, whether, or no, could the Mother succeed to the Children? he says, that the Longobard Laws have establish'd nothing on this Head, whence the Mother, as a Cognate, ought to be excluded; for according to these Laws the Agnates only succeed, and that therefore a new Law behov'd to be made to make her capable to succeed to her Children, just as was practis'd amongst the Romans, who, in order to make a Mother capable to succeed, were forc'd to establish it by a Senatus consultum. What need then would there have been of this new Law, if the Defect of the Longobard Laws could have been supplied by the Laws of the Pandects? In the Time then of this William, the common Laws of the Romans were not those that were contain'd in the Pandects, but those that had continued among the People, which, after the Roman Empire was extinct, they kept up rather as ancient Usages, than as written Laws, the Books of Justinian not being known in these Provinces for many Ages after, and it was very long before they recover'd their ancient Authority and Force in them, which was owing rather to Custom than any Constitution of a Prince commanding it, as shall be clearly seen in the Course of this History.

WILLIAM's ninth Constitution, which we read under the same Title, runs all upon the Duty of the High Chamberlains and Bailiffs. It prescribes the Number of Bailiffs and Judges in each City and Place of the Province, and orders the Chamberlains not to put these Offices to Sale, but to give them to deserving and faithful Persons, over whom they were to have a watchful Eye, and observe their Proceedings; and to see that Justice was faithfully administred, and the Provinces well govern'd.

THE Tenth, which we have under the Title De quæstionibus inter Fiscum & Privatum, ordains the High Chamberlains to take Cognizance of all Causes, excepting Feodal, both Personal and Real, betwixt the Exchequer and private Persons, with the Assistance of the Justices, in the Presence of the Attorney General.

THE Eleventh, under the Title De cognitione Causæ coram Bajulis, gives Power to the Bailiffs to take Cognizance, within their Jurisdiction, of all Civil Causes, as well Personal as Real, excepting Feodal Causes; and to take Cognizance of petty Larceny, and other lesser Crimes, which were not punishable with Mutilation of Members.

THE Twelfth, which we read under the Title De fure capto per Bajulum, orders the Bailiffs, when they have taken any foreign Thief, to deliver him over with the Goods into the Hands of the Justices; and if he belong to the District, they are likewise to deliver him over to the Justices, but his moveable Goods are to be consign'd in the Hands of the King's Treasurer of that Place.

THE Thirteenth, under the Title De Bajulorum Officio, enjoins the Bailiffs to see that a just Price be put upon vendible Things, and irremissibly to exact the Fines of those who shall sell contrary to the Assizes, or who shall be found to have false Weights and Measures.

THE Fourteenth, under the Title De pœna negantis depositum, vel mutuum, punishes severely Pawnbrokers, or those who refuse to restore to the Owners, Goods lent or pledg'd.

THE Fifteenth, under the Title De Clericis conveniendis pro possessionibus, quas non tenent ab Ecclesia, deserves more Attention than all the rest. In it is decided, that if the Clergy be sued for any Possessions, Tenements, or other Goods belonging to their Patrimony, which has not come to them by the Church, but some other way, such Causes fall under the Cognizance of the Secular Court of the Place where the Possessions are situated, tho' they should object against it; only the Secular Judges are forbid to seize on their Persons, or imprison them; but they are to put their Sentence vigorously in Execution against the Goods in Question. At the Time that this Law of William's was publish'd, it seem'd to be no ways irregular or extravagant; nor even since, in the Time of Marino Caramanico, an ancient Commentator on these Constitutions, who found no Fault with it. But in after Ages, when the Canon Law of the Decretals began to instil other Maxims into the Minds of our Lawyers, it appear'd to be very odd and monstrous. Andrea d'Isernia, who wrote in these Times, did not stick to say that such a Constitution was good for nothing; but ought to be look'd upon as null and void, as levell'd against Ecclesiastick Persons, and the Immunity of the Church. He adds, that the Legislator is mistaken, that considers the Quality and Circumstances of the Goods, and not of the Person, forasmuch as Goods take their Quality from the Persons, and these are sued, and not the Goods. He likewise calls those ignorant, who say that the Pope and the Church of Rome approv'd of these Constitutions; for he says the Confirmation does not appear, and tho' it should appear in general Terms, yet it could not be said that the Pope had approv'd of this Constitution, and if he had been requir'd to approve of it in particular, he would have refus'd to do it. But from what we have said in the preceding Books, when we had occasion to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity, we may easily perceive how little Truth is in what d'Isernia advances.

THE Sixteenth, which is the last of this Prince, by Pietro delle Vigne plac'd in the first Book of the Constitutions of the Kingdom, under the Title De Officio Castellatorum, contains nothing else, but an Order to the Castellans, and their under Officers, not to exact any Thing from Prisoners that have not remain'd a Night in Prison; and if they did remain a Night, they were to pay half a Tarine, and no more.

WE have none of King William's Laws in the Second Book, but in the Third we first meet with the Seventeenth, under the Title De Dotariis constituendis, whereby 'tis ordain'd, that Wives, after the Death of their Husbands, in order to secure their Dowries to the Heirs, shall swear Fealty to the Lords of the Baronies of whom their Dowries are held.

THE Eighteenth, which has for Title De Fratribus obligantibus partem Feudi pro dotibus sororum, allows Brothers who have no moveable or hereditary Goods, to mortgage a Part of the Fief for Portions to their Sisters; and moreover, if they have three or more Fiefs, to give one of them for that same Purpose; but in all these Cases, when either the Fief is mortgag'd, or alienated, or set apart for the Sisters Portions, the King's Consent must always be obtain'd. And besides, Matrimony cannot be contracted without his Assent and Permission, otherwise all is void and null; which, as we have said, gave Occasion to the Barons of the Kingdom to complain of the grievous Yoke impos'd upon them by this Law, which hinder'd their giving their Daughters or Sisters in Marriage without the King's Assent; but for all that, Frederick, for the Reasons we have already alledg'd, when we had Occasion to treat of Roger's Laws, would confirm it; for the Law was not grievous in what it prescrib'd, but in the bad use which William made of it, who, out of Covetousness to have the Fief devolve to himself, was inflexible, and would not give his Consent to such Marriages, whence proceeded those Complaints and Troubles which happen'd in the Reign of this Prince.

THE Nineteenth Law of William, under the Title De Adjutoriis exigendis ab hominibus, deserves to be carefully minded; for in it we meet with many Things worthy of Observation. First it checks the Covetousness of the Prelates, Counts, Barons, and other Feudatories, who, upon the most trifling Occasion, extorted exorbitant Subsidies from their Vassals; whence William, being resolv'd to ease them from this Oppression, settles the Cases wherein they could justly claim them. The Cases are these. I. For ransoming their Superior, when taken by the Enemy fighting under the King's Banner. II. When the Superior had a mind to inroll a Son in the Army. III. When he was to give his Daughter or Sister in Marriage. IV. When he was to buy some Place, that would be of Service to the King, or his Army. The Cases which he establishes, wherein the Prelate can justly claim Subsidies from their Vassals, are likewise very remarkable. I. For their Consecration. II. When they shall be call'd by the Pope to assist at any Council. III. For the Service of the King's Army, if they are in it. IV. When they shall be sent for by the King; where 'tis to be observ'd, that in these Times it was never call'd in Question if Princes could send for Prelates, nor did they make any Difficulty to obey such Calls, as they began to do in later Times; tho' in our Kingdom our Princes have have always maintain'd that Power, and expell'd those who dar'd to disobey. V. If they shall be sent by the King any where for his Service, which frequently happen'd, for they were employ'd in the Affairs of the Crown. And Lastly, When the King had occasion to lodge upon their Lands. In all these Cases the Prelates were allow'd to exact Subsidies from their Vassals, but 'tis subjoin'd in the same Constitution, that they ought to do it moderately.

THAT other, which we read under the Title De Novis ædificiis, tho' in some Editions it bears the Name of Roger, and in others that of William, yet 'tis plain, that it belongs neither to the one nor the other. The Author of it was Frederick II. which is evident from these Words, ab obitu divæ memoriæ Regis Gulielmi consobrini nostri, by which Frederick means William II. who was his first Cousin, as being Son of William I. Brother of Constantia the Mother of Frederick.

THE Twentieth, under the Title De Servis, & ancillis fugitivis, by which William prohibits the entertaining of Servants who have deserted their Masters; and in case they be taken, he ordains them to be deliver'd up to their Masters, if they be known; if not known, he orders them to be deliver'd over to the Bailiffs, who are immediately to send them to his, the King's High Court, otherwise the Transgressors, even the Bailiffs themselves, are liable to lose their whole Substance, which is to be applied to the King's Use; but Frederick in the Constitution De Mancipiis, gives a Year for the Masters to recover them after they are sent to the High Court.

THE last, under the Title De pecunia inventa in rebus alienis. If these Laws which we have hitherto mention'd shew this Prince's Greediness to heap up Riches, and to impose so many pecuniary Mulcts, whereby he might enrich his Treasury, this, which we are now going to give account of, makes it much more evident. From the Year 1161. William had made Laws, that whoever should find a Treasure, it was to belong to the King¹. In this he ordains, that whoever should find Gold, Silver, precious Stones, and other such like Things, that were not his own, should immediately carry them to the Justices, or Bailiffs of the Place where they were found, who were presently to transmit them to his High Court, otherwise they were to be punish'd as Robbers. Declaring likewise in general, that whatsoever shall be found in his Kingdom, the Owner of which cannot be found, shall belong to himself. He would have what follows to be thought an Act of Piety, to wit, that if in the Space of a Year, any Person shall prove that he was the true Owner of the Goods found, they were to be deliver'd to him, but after that Time was expir'd, they were his own. Frederick II. in the following Constitution approves of the Law, and adds only this, that the found Goods were to be kept by the Justices and Bailiffs of the Counties where they were found, because he thought it was unjust to oblige the Owners to go to the High Court to prove that they were theirs, because it might cost them perhaps more than the Value of the Goods.

THESE are the Laws of William I. which Frederick was pleas'd to retain and add to his own, and those of his Grandfather; for the other, which we read under the Title De Adulteriis coercendis, whereby, if no Violence has been us'd, it is remitted to the Ecclesiastical Judges to take cognizance of the Adultery, with which the Empress Constantia comply'd by her Letter recorded by Ughellus, is neither Roger's nor this William's, but William II. his Son's, which will be clearly seen when we come to treat of the Laws of that Prince.

SOME likewise say, that it was William who first instituted the Tribunal of the High Court; neither is it to be doubted, that in the Year 1162. Carlo di Tocco, who commented on our Longobard Laws, was one of the Judges of this High Court. But as that is true, so neither can it be denied, that the High Court in King William's Time, was that which he erected in Palermo, the Place of his Royal Residence, but not that, which in the Reign of Frederick II. and that of Charles I. of Anjou, was establish'd in Naples. In William's Time Naples was no more look'd upon than any other City of the Kingdom; but Salerno, and Bari (before it was demolish'd) were the top Cities. And tho' some say that this Prince fortified Naples with two famous Castles, viz. the Capuan against the Aggressors by Land, and that of Uovo against those by Sea; yet others will have Frederick to be the Founder of them: But none can deny that Frederick II. began by Degrees to make this City the Head and Metropolis of all the rest, as well by introducing the University, as the High Court and Mint, afterwards call'd Camera Summaria ; and that it was not a Royal Seat before the Reign of Charles I. of Anjou, when all the Affairs of the Kingdom were transacted in Naples, which at last rais'd it to be the Head and Metropolis of all the other Cities, as shall be seen in the Course of this History.

IN the Time of the last Norman Kings, there was not a City in these Provinces, that could be said to be the Head of the rest. Each Province had its own Justices, Chamberlains, and other particular Officers, none of which intermeddled with the Affairs of the others. Neither was the Number of Provinces in these Times increas'd to twelve, as it was afterwards (if we may believe Sorgente ¹) in the Time of Frederick, but our Country was divided into Districts, according to the Justices that were sent to govern them ; whence they took the Name of Giustizierati, or Jurisdictions, and afterwards into Provinces, and govern'd by Præsides, which will be better understood in the following Books of this History.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
NAPLES.

BOOK XIII.

THE Death of William I. and the Accession to the Throne of William II. his Son, made the whole Kingdom easy ; for the graceful Behaviour, and Generosity of the Youth, so gain'd him the Love and good Will of every Body, that even those who had been his Father's bitter Enemies, resolv'd to be most faithful to him, being satisfied that the Death of the Father had put an end to all their Troubles, and that they ought not to impute the Tyranny of the Father to the innocent Youth. In the mean time Queen

Margaret his Mother, having assembled all the Prelates and Barons of the Kingdom, caus'd him to be solemnly crown'd in the Cathedral Church of Palermo, by Romualdo Archbishop of Salerno : At which Solemnity, besides the Prelates and Barons, a vast Number of the Inhabitants of the City were present, and after the Coronation was over, with great Marks of Love and Gladness, accompanied him to the Palace. And the Queen, because of his tender Age, not yet Twelve Years of Age compleat, who had taken the Charge of the Government of the Kingdom upon herself, in order to rivet in the People the Love they bore her Son, caus'd all the Prisoners to be set at Liberty, and order'd all those that had been banish'd by the King her Husband to be recall'd, and among the rest Tancred Count of Lecce, and remitted many heavy Taxes that had been impos'd upon the People, for which end she wrote to all the Chamberlains of Puglia, not to exact for the future that insupportable Burden, call'd Redemptionis, which had reduc'd these Provinces to the utmost Despair¹. She restor'd to their Baronage, those who had been depriv'd of it, and granted it to many others, and with a liberal Hand, made many Donations to sundry Churches.

BUT her having, contrary to the last Will of her Husband, indiscreetly advanc'd Gaito Pietro, and made him Superior in the Government to Matteo Notajo, and the Elect of Syracusa, by giving him the whole Charge of the Kingdom, occasion'd new Disturbances at Court; for the other Courtiers envying his Greatness, presum'd too much upon the King's Youth, and little minding the unsettled Government of a Woman, they began to make a Revolution in the King's Family, which was carried on by the Advice of Gentile Bishop of Agrigento, who having ingratiated himself with the Archbishop of Reggio, contriv'd the Ruin of the Elect of Syracuse, and at the same time brib'd Matteo Notajo; and they put Matters into such Confusion, that Gaito Pietro was forc'd to fly for Protection to the King of Morocco. But these Quarrels (after various Turns, which Falcando gives us at length) being over, and the Elect standing his Ground, soon after Ambassadors from Emanuel Emperor of the East arriv'd in Palermo, to renew the Peace with the young King, and offer him Emanuel's only Daughter in Marriage, and the Empire for her Portion; the Ambassadors were kindly receiv'd, and the Peace renew'd; but the Marriage could not then be concluded, on account of the many Difficulties that occur'd in the Treaty.

IN the second Year of William's Reign some Troubles happen'd both in Sicily and Puglia, not occasion'd by foreign Powers, but by the Quarrels of the Courtiers, and some Barons, who got the High Chancellor Stefano di Parzio, Son of Count di Parzio, a Kinsman to the Queen (who had invited him out of France, and, after many Turns, had given him the Charge of the Government) to persuade the King to leave Palermo, and go to Messina, where he would be at hand to settle Matters in Puglia. But these Commotions in Sicily and Puglia were but Trifles, and easily suppress'd, in comparison of those in Lombardy, and of the War ready to break out betwixt Pope Alexander III. and the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa; for both Sicily and Puglia were soon restor'd to a peaceable State. The Eyes of every Body were now fix'd upon the Emperor Frederick, who, with a great and powerful Army had march'd into Italy, to make War upon Pope Alexander and the Romans, who, in a disorderly Manner, charging a Body of Frederick's Army too boldly, were routed, a great many kill'd, and as many taken Prisoners, the rest with Difficulty having got within the Walls of Rome. The Pope, and all the People were in great Perplexity, and the Emperor, who had already taken Ancona, hearing of this Victory, and being determin'd to march into Puglia, came with the rest of his Army directly to *Rome*², and having made a brisk Attack upon the Gate of Castle St. Angelo, he afterwards assaulted St. Peter's Church, but not being able to take it easily, he set fire to it; which so terrified those within, that they immediately surrendered, and Alexander, struck with Fear, quitted the Lateran Palace, and fled to the House of Frangipani, where he with all the Cardinals fortified themselves in a Tower of the Chartulary.

THE Emperor the Sunday following, at a solemn Mass in St. Peter's Church, caus'd himself to be crown'd with the Royal Crown, by his Anti-pope Odone da Crema, and the Monday, being the Feast of St. Peter in Vinculis, the same Anti-pope crown'd him with the Imperial Crown, together with his Wife Beatrice.

OUR William maintain'd the same Friendship and Correspondence with the Pope, as his Father had done, insomuch that Alexander was not in the least offended that William had been crown'd without his Knowledge, which his Predecessors would not have taken in good Part; and having heard of the great Straits the Pope was in, and Frederick's Resolution to march into his Kingdom of Puglia, immediately dispatch'd from Messina, where he now was, two of his Gallies with a great Sum of Money to Alexander, in order to bring him from Rome; the Gallies unexpectedly arriving in the Tyber, much comforted the Pope, who, unwilling as yet to leave the City, kept the King's Ambassadors with him for Eight Days, and then sent them back to their Master with a sincere Acknowledgment of so-seasonable a Relief. He gave part of the Money to the Frangipani, and part of it to Pier Leoni, that thereby they might be enabled the more resolutely and bravely to defend the City. But perceiving afterwards, that the Emperor was resolv'd to turn him out of the Papacy, and that the Romans began to stagger, having put on a Pilgrim's Habit, with a few of his Followers he left Rome, and fled to Gaeta, whither being soon follow'd by his Cardinals, he re-assum'd the Pontifical Habit, and went to Benevento.

BUT soon after, Frederick was forc'd to return to Germany, for his Army being seiz'd with a deadly Pestilence, in the Space of eight Days, the greatest Part of his Soldiers, and the principal Barons that he had brought along with him died, amongst which were Frederick Duke of Bavaria, Count Vaston, Bercard Count of Arlemonte, the Count of Sesia, Reinald Archbishop of Cologne, with his Brother, and the Bishop of Verdun; so that he arriv'd in Germany with a small Number.

IN the mean Time new Troubles and Commotions had arisen in Sicily, still occasion'd by the Courtiers, and the old Domesticks of the King's Household, which, not being to the Purpose of our present History, we willingly pass over in Silence; so much the rather, that they have been minutely transmitted to Posterity by Ugone Falcano, and with great Care lately collected by Francesco Capecepatro, in his History of the Norman Kings, and by Agostino Inveges in his History of Palermo. At this same Time happen'd likewise the famous Conspiracy of the Sicilians, against Stefano di Parzio the Chancellor, whom they oblig'd at last to leave Palermo, and fly to Palestine, where he died: The History of this Conspiracy is written by Peter of Blais, Archdeacon of Battona, a most renown'd Man, who came out of France to Sicily, with Stefano, and was for a Year the young King's Preceptor, and then his Secretary and Counsellor; and being elected Archbishop of Naples, his Enemies took that Opportunity to get him to be remov'd from Court, upon which he renounc'd the Archbishoprick. Being Valetudinary he continued some Time in Sicily after the Chancellor's Departure; and tho' he was intreated by William to spend the rest of his Days there, promising still to have a great Regard for him, yet such was the Abhorrence he had to the Sicilians and their Ways, and their ill Usage of the Chancellor, that by no means could he be persuaded to stay. He was one of the most learned Men of this Age, and we have as yet many of his Works, and a Volume of Letters¹. Ugone Falcano, a Sicilian, having begun his famous History from the Death of King Roger in the Year 1154, brings it down to this present Year 1170. where Peter begins his learn'd History of fifteen Years, with so much Elegancy, that 'tis surprizing, how, in so rude Times, he could write so politely.

IN this Interim died in Rome, Guido da Crema, the Antipope, call'd Pascal III. who, by the Means of the Emperor Frederick, had been created in the Place of Ottavianus; and his Faction, not willing to submit to Alexander, this Year 1170. immediately chose a Third, who was a certain John Abbot of Strumi, a Hungarian, whom they call'd Callistus III. tho' Alexander, who staid in Benevento, was then acknowledg'd for true Pope by all Christians, excepting the Emperor and some of his Germans. Alexander left Benevento and went to Rome; but the Romans being offended with him, because he had receiv'd into Favour the Count of Tusculo their declar'd Enemy, would not receive him, whereupon he return'd to Gaeta, where he remain'd for a long Time; from thence he went to Alagna, where he fix'd his Residence.

IN the mean Time the Emperor Emanuel sent new Ambassadors to King William, who concluded a Marriage betwixt him and Juramutria their Emperor's Daughter, and fix'd the Time for conducting her by Sea to Puglia; and the King, with his Brother Henry, Prince of Capua, soon after went to Taranto to receive the Bride; but the perfidious Greek, for what Reason 'tis not known, slighting the contracted Marriage, did not send the young Lady. Some² make no mention of this Fact, but say, that William, in order not to disgust the Pope, refus'd this Marriage. However that may be, William left Taranto, and went to Benevento, from whence he sent the Prince his Brother, who had been taken ill, to Salerno, from thence to go to Palermo in the Gallies for the Recovery of his Health, which did not avail him, for he was no sooner arriv'd, than he died, in the Thirteenth Year of his Age, Anno 1172. He was with great Pomp interr'd in the Sepulchre of his Grandfather Roger, in the Cathedral of Paërmo, and from thence some Time after transported to the Church of Monreale, where his Tomb is to be seen at this Time ¹.

IN this Henry ended the Norman Princes of Capua, who held this Principality 114 Years, reckoning from the first, who was Richard Count of Aversa, in the Year 1058, to this Henry Son of William I. in this Year 1172, when their Succession fail'd; for William II. having no Sons, he could not continue the Custom of his Father and Grandfather Roger, who made one of their Sons Prince of Capua; and tho' 'tis probable that King Tancred would have continued the same Custom, yet wanting Children, and being involv'd in Wars, and living but a short Time after, could not do it. And the Kings his Successors, abolish'd this Principality and Dynaſty altogether; for tho' in the Publick Deeds they kept up the Name of Principality, which was continu'd to be practis'd to the Year 1435. in the Reign of Queen Joan II.²; nevertheless, excepting the Name, the Principality was quite extinct, and those who afterwards possess'd Capua, were neither in Dignity nor Dominion to be compar'd with these Princes.

HENRY's Death very much afflicted William, who soon after went to Sicily, where having assembled a strong Army, he gave the Command of it to Gualtieri di Moac, afterwards his Admiral ³, and sent him to Alexandria in Egypt, to assist the Christians against Saladin. And this King resolving to out-do his Predecessors in Piety, employ'd a Part of the Treasure which they had heap'd up, in building a magnificent Church upon an Eminence call'd Monreale, not far from Palermo, which he beautified with Marble and Mosaick Work; and having endow'd it with great Revenues, consisting of many Cities, Castles, and rich Farms, and furnish'd it with rich Vestments, and costly sacred Utensils, he dedicated it to our Lady, under the Name of Santa Maria Nova, and gave it to the Fathers of the Order of S. Benedict. Neither ought we to forget in this Place, that the first who had the Charge of this Church were the Monks of the Monastery of the Cave, who were invited from our Provinces to Sicily by William; and who, on account of their great Sanctity, were much respected by the Norman Princes, especially King William. This Church soon became famous, for besides the Sanctity of the Monks employ'd in Divine Services there, by the Advice of Matteo Great Protonotary of Sicily; now, according to Riccardo da S. Germano, Vice-Chancellor of the Kingdom, William obtain'd of Pope Alexander III. that the said Church should be subject to no Archbishop, Bishop, or any other Ecclesiastical Person, but to the Pope alone, and afterwards got it to be erected into an Archiepiscopal See by Pope Lucius III. Matteo did all this out of Spite to Walter Archbishop of Palermo, in whose Jurisdiction this Church was, who in process of Time knew well how to revenge himself, as shall be told. The first Archbishop of Monreale, was William a Monk of the Monastery of the Cave, who had formerly been Prior of it. This Place, on account of this famous Church, drawing many People to live in it, in a short Time became a renown'd and rich City; and at this Time its Prelate is one of the richest and most considerable in Sicily.

C H A P. I.

William II's. Marriage with Joan, Daughter of Henry II. King of England. The Emperor Frederick's Army defeated by the People of the Milanese; whereupon the Emperor made Peace with Pope Alexander III.

IN the mean Time the Emperor Frederick of Suevia had march'd again into Italy with a great and powerful Army, and begun a cruel War in Lombardy; and while he was carrying on this War with alternate Success, considering that the King of Sicily was very powerful, he endeavour'd to break off the Friendship betwixt him and the Pope, and to get him to enter into an Alliance with himself; for which end he sent Tristan his Chancellor, this Year 1176. to offer William his Daughter in Marriage, and to persuade him to enter into a perpetual League ¹. But the King considering, that this Marriage and this Peace would be very disagreeable to Alexander, and detrimental to the Affairs of the Church, rejected the Emperor's Offer. Frederick highly inrag'd at this Rebuff, immediately wrote to Germany for a Reinforcement of Soldiers for subduing the Lombards, who were making a brave Resistance, and order'd Tristan his Chancellor to attack the Kingdom of Puglia with his Army. In the Beginning of the Summer Philip Archbishop of Cologne, with many other great German Barons, and a strong Body of gallant Soldiers, join'd the Emperor near the Alps, and march'd towards the Milanese, in order to burn and destroy that Country; but being met by the Army of the Confederates, a cruel and obstinate Battle ensu'd, in which the Germans were defeated, and the greatest Part of them kill'd, and Frederick being dismounted, was in great Danger of his Life, and with much ado, with a few of his Men, got into Pavia, where he found the Empress, who not having heard any News of him for four Days, had given him over for Dead, and was bitterly lamenting the Loss of him ². Tristan, who had come to attack Puglia, and was encamp'd about the Village of Celle, being met with by Tancred Count of Lecce, who had been recall'd from Exile, and was in great Favour with the King, and Roger Count of Andria, with many other Barons, and a good Body of the Natives of Puglia, was repuls'd, and forc'd to return without being able to do any Thing.

IN the mean Time William, who had been disappointed in his Marriage with the Daughter of the Emperor of the East, and had refus'd the Daughter of the Emperor of the West, being now Twenty-three Years of Age, and left alone, began seriously to think of Marriage; so that by the Advice of the Pope, he sent Elia Bishop of Troja, Arnulfo Bishop of Capaccio, and Florio Camerota the Justice, to Henry II. King of England, to demand Joan his Daughter in Marriage; the Ambassadors were kindly receiv'd by the King, who having conven'd his Barons in Parliament, with their Advice he consented to the Demand, and concluded the Marriage ³. And the Lady immediately set out, accompanied with the Archbishop of Tork, and other English Lords as far as the City of S. Egidio, where she was receiv'd by Alfano Archbishop of Capua, Riccardo Bishop of Syracusa, and Roberto Count of Caserta, with Twenty-five Gallies, under the Command of Gualtieri di Moac Admiral, and conducted to Naples, where they celebrated the Feast of Easter. But the young Lady loathing the Sea, went by Land through Salerno and Calabria, and having pass'd the Straits of Messina, landed at Palermo, where she was magnificently receiv'd by the King her Husband, and the Marriage being solemniz'd, she was crown'd Queen of Sicily.

IT was at this Time that the Archbishop of Palermo, who had perform'd all these Functions, taking hold of this favourable Juncture, begg'd of the King, that the Crime of Adultery might be punish'd by the Bishop of the Diocese where it was committed, and that the Prelates might take Cognizance of the Offences of the Clergy; so that at his Request that Constitution was made by William, which we read in the Volume of our Constitutions, under the Title De Adulteriis coercendis, which by a Mistake of our Writers is attributed to William I. his Father. But if we may give credit to *Inveges*¹, who has recorded a Privilege granted by William some Years before, datèd in April 1172, and directed Comitibus, Justiciariis, Baronibus, & universis Bajulis, qui sunt in Parochia, & Diœcesi Archiepiscopatus Panormi, by which the King ordains, that the Crime of Adultery be tried within the Jurisdiction of Walter Archbishop of Palermo. And indeed in the Reign of Queen Constantia, we find, that the Cognizance of this Crime belong'd to the Ecclesiasticks, which afterwards came to be diffus'd, and they had only the Cognizance of the Crimes of the Clergy of their own Diocesses.

AT this Time the Kings were wont to appoint Dowries for their Wives, so that William appointed Queen Joan her's; and in the Supplement made by the Abbot Giovanni, to the Chronicle of Sigisbert, we have the Writ appointing this Dowry², wherein the Cities of Monte S. Angelo and Vesti, with their Tenements and Appurtenances, are granted to this Queen for her Dowry; and besides, the King gave her the Estate of Count Gaufrido, to wit, Lefina, Pescici, Vico, Caprino, Varano, Ischitella, and all that the Count had in the County of Monte S. Angelo. She likewise got Cadelaro, Santo Chierico, Castel Pagano, Bisentino, and Conaro. As also the Monastery of S. Giovanni in Lama, and the Monastery of Santa Maria di Pulsano, with all the Tenements which the said Monasteries held in the foresaid County of Monte S. Angelo.

THE Emperor Frederick, after having receiv'd so great an Overthrow from the People of the Milaneſe, began seriously to consider, that he was not able to maintain a War against the Lombards, when he had both the Pope and King William his Enemies; therefore, at the earnest Desire of his Barons, who protested that they would no longer follow him, if he did not reconcile himself with the Pope; he plainly, without any Fraud, resolv'd to make Peace with Alexander; and because the Negotiations of this Peace, and the Pope's going to Venice, are variously related by the Modern Writers, who having stuff'd their Histories with many Fables, have pav'd the Way for Painters to take the same Liberty, therefore we shall trace the most accurate Writers; and especially the most exact Capecelatro, and Agostino Inveges, who have more narrowly than others, search'd after these Events in contemporary Authors, and particularly from the History of Romualdo Archbishop of Salerno, who was present at the Treaty as King William's Ambassador; and it ought not to seem tedious, if we give a minute Narrative of these Transactions, as they really happen'd, because they will be found not to be extraneous or foreign to our Purpose, but rather very proper or pertinent to it.

THEREFORE Frederick being resolv'd to make Friends with Alexander, sent his Ambassadors to Alagna, the Place of his Residence, to ask Peace of him; the Ambassadors were the Bishop of Magdeburg, the Archbishop of Mentz, the Elect of Worms, and the Protonotary of the Empire, four Men of great Worth, and who had been often employ'd in such Affairs. These having laid open their Commissions to the Pope, after various Conferences, which lasted fifteen Days, at last in a manner adjusted the Differences betwixt him and their Master; but when they insisted that all the Differences betwixt the Emperor and the People of the Milaneſe, and the Cities of Lombardy, might be made up, they found they could not put the last

Hand to the Peace, without the Presence of the Emperor, and Deputies of the said Cities; therefore it was concluded, that the Pope should go immediately to Lombardy, to have an Interview with Frederick, and that free Passage, and a Safe-Conduct should be given by each Party, to all that had a mind to go to the Place where the Meeting should be appointed, and to remain there, and depart at their Pleasure, without any Molestation. For which end the Pope sent Cardinal Ubaldo Bishop of Ostia, Rinaldo Abbot of Monte Cassino, Cardinal of S. Marcellino, and Pietro of the Race of the Counts of Marfi, to take the Oath of the Emperor, and of the Confederates, that they would observe the Safe-Conduct, and to agree upon a Place for the Interview; and it was appointed by both Parties to be in the City of Bologna. The Pope likewise sent his Legates to desire King William to send some of his Barons in his Name to be present at this Interview; because he did not intend to conclude a Peace with the Emperor, if he, who had been so steadfast a Supporter of the Interest of the Church, was not also comprehended¹; upon which Message, the King presently sent Romualdo Archbishop of Salerno, Author of this Relation, and Ruggerio Count of Andria, High Constable, to be present in his Name at all that should be transacted. Then the Pope left Avagna, and by the Way of Campania came to Benevento, and from thence went to Siponti and Vesti, where, with many Cardinals, and the said Ambassadors, he took Shipping in the Gallies ready prepar'd for him by King William, and had a pleasant Voyage to Venice, where being honourably receiv'd, he was lodg'd in the Monastery of S. Niccolo del Lito, and the next Day was conducted by the Doge and the Patriarch, and a great Number of Bishops, with a vast Multitude, to the Church of St. Mark, and from thence went to the Patriarch's Palace, which had been magnificently prepar'd for his Lodging and Entertainment.

THE Emperor Frederick hearing of the Pope's Arrival in Venice, sent thither the Bishop of Magdeburg, the Elect of Worms, and his Protonotary, to desire that he would be pleas'd to pitch upon another Place for the appointed Interview, because he, the Emperor, had a great many Enemies in Bologna. To which Alexander answer'd, That that Place had not only been fix'd upon by him, the Emperor, but also by the Ambassadors of both Parties, and by all the confederated Lombards, therefore, without the Consent of all, he could not alter it; but, that the common Peace might not be retarded, he caus'd all the Deputies to be conven'd in Ferrara, whither he likewise went himself, and call'd a Meeting in the great Church dedicated to S. George; where, in the Presence of them all, he made a long Speech about the Affairs of Peace. And the Emperor having sent seven Ambassadors, the Pope appointed as many Cardinals, and the confederated Lombards deputed the Bishops of Turin, Bergamo, and Como, the Elect of Asti, Gerardo Pesce a Milanese, Goezzo a Judge of Verona, and Alberto Gammara a Brescian, who, after various Disputes, at which King William's Ambassadors were also present, with common Consent agreed, that the Interview should be in Venice.

THE Pope immediately dispatch'd Ugone da Bologna, and Cardinal Ramieri, with some Lombards to the Doge, and People of Venice (the Government being then lodg'd in the Nobility and People, and not as now in the Nobility only²) to desire them to engage themselves, that he, and all those in Company with him for treating of a Peace, might freely enter their City, remain in it, and depart at their Pleasure, without suffering any Damage or Detriment in the least, and that they would not suffer the Emperor to enter without the Pope's Consent; the Venetians, without taking much Notice of the last Part of the Demand, granted Alexander's Request, and he immediately left Ferrara, and return'd to Venice. Now the Congress for a Peace was open'd, but many Difficulties and Differences arising, it was not likely to be easily concluded; therefore the Pope, that the Trouble they had already been at might not prove fruitless, propos'd, that there should be a Truce with the Lombards for six Years, and with the King of Sicily for fifteen; to which the rest agreeing, the Emperor's Consent was only wanting to finish it; and the Chancellor having gone to the Emperor with this Proposal, at first he rejected it; but he afterwards consented, upon Condition that the Pope should restore to the Empire the Estate of the Countess Mathilda, which Alexander would by no means agree to; thus was the Time spun out ; for the Emperor was at Pomposo, near to Ravenna, and a great deal of Time was spent in sending Messengers on every Incident that happen'd, and waiting their Return ; therefore, at the Request of the Chancellor, and the rest of the Emperor's Ambassadors, the Pope consented that Frederick should come to Cbiozza, a Place distant only Fifteen Miles from Venice, and that without his Liberty he should come no nearer. But Frederick was no sooner arriv'd at Cbiozza, than some of the Populace of Venice went to wait upon him, and tell him not to delay to come to the City, because by his Presence the Peace would be concluded to his Advantage, and they would do their utmost to let him in.

IN the mean time the Pope had sent his Legates to Cbiozza, to tell the Emperor, that if he was resolv'd to make a Truce for Six Years with the Lombards, and for Fifteen with King William, they would take his Oath, and then with his Blessing he might come to Venice. But Frederick, pleas'd with what the Populace had offer'd him, and waiting till they should perform their Promise, pretended that it was a new Proposal, and requir'd Time to be consider'd ; thus from Day to Day he delay'd giving his Answer ; so that the Cardinals suspecting that the Emperor was hatching some Trick, were so much puzzled, that they knew not what was fit to be done ; and the Populace of Venice, resolving to perform their Promise to Frederick, assembled in the Church of St. Mark, mutinied against the Doge, and cried out, that it was a shameful Thing, to suffer the Emperor to be scorch'd with the Heat of the Season, tormented with Gnats and Fleas, by not allowing him to enter Venice, which Injury would stick in his Stomach, and some time or other be retaliated upon them and their Children ; and therefore the Republick ought immediately to invite him to come, and they would have it so ; the Mob having thus spoken with great Boldness, the Doge answer'd them, that the Senate had sworn to the Pope, that the Emperor should not be suffer'd to enter Venice without his Consent ; but this Excuse not weighing with the Mob, he was forc'd to give way to them, and to send some of their own Number to tell the Pope, that they had a Mind to bring the Emperor into Venice ; accordingly they went, and finding the Pope asleep, without a moment's Delay, irreverently awak'd him, and having insolently told him their Errand, it was with great Difficulty that the Pope could persuade them to delay the Emperor's coming till the next Day.

THE News of this Fact was quickly spread over all the City, and the Lombards and others, who were there negotiating the Peace, afraid, that if the Emperor should come into Venice against the Pope's Will, he would make them all Prisoners ; and now distrusting the Faith of the Venetians, they all left that City, and went to Trivigi. But King William's Ambassadors, nothing startled at what had happen'd, went immediately to the Pope, and bid him take Courage and be afraid of nothing, for they had four well arm'd Gallies, with which they would carry him, in spite of the Venetians, whither he thought fit, and this would be a Warning to him not to trust to the Venetian Faith another Time ; then they went to the Doge's Palace, where having found him with a great many Venetians, they began to upbraid them with the Favours their Master had done them, which did not deserve such Usage, and said, if they had known that they were to allow the Emperor to come into their City without the Pope's Leave, they would have return'd to give their Master an Account of the Wrong done him, who knew how to do himself Justice. But the Doge little minded this menacing Speech, though he endeavour'd to soften the Ambassadors with smooth Answers, by assuring them, that they needed not to be afraid of the Emperor's coming ; yet they return'd to their Lodgings in great Wrath, and at parting told the Doge, that they would use all Means to get their Master to revenge himself suitably to the Injury done him ; and order'd the Gallies to be ready to depart next Morning. This Conversation being told amongst the Venetians, frighted them terribly, for they were afraid that if the Ambassadors should go away in such Disgust, King William would imprison all the Venetians that were in his Dominions. Therefore a great Number of those who had Relations in Puglia, in a tumultuous Manner, went to the Doge, and told him, that for pleasing the Emperor, from whom they reap'd no Advantage, it was not fit to incense the Ambassadors, and their Master King William, from whose Dominions they drew so great Profit, which would indanger both the Lives and Estates of their Relations, who were settled there ; moreover they desir'd the Doge to let them know, who they were that had advis'd to allow the Emperor to come to Venice, before he had concluded the Peace with the Pope, that they were ready with their Arms to revenge it.

THE Doge and Senate, finding this obstinate Resolution, and fearing that if the Citizens should once take up Arms, the Result would be Sedition, sent some Persons of Distinction to beg of the Pope to pardon the Trouble he had met with, and by all means keep William's Ambassadors from departing: But these seeming fix'd in their Resolutions, notwithstanding the Intreaties of the Pope and the Doge, occasion'd, that the next Morning a Proclamation, by order of the Republick, was publish'd on the Rialto, forbidding the Emperor's coming into the City so much as to be mention'd by any Person, till the Pope should first order it.

AS soon as Frederick was appriz'd of this at Cbiozza, seeing himself disappointed, he began to speak more favourably of the Peace to the Cardinals that were with him; and besides, the Chancellor, and the other German Barons having told him plainly, that it was necessary to make Peace with Alexander, and to acknowledge him for lawful Pope; they at last persuaded him to send Henry Count of Dieffa, with the Cardinals to Venice, to promise upon Oath, that as soon as he should enter the City, he should swear and confirm the Truce with the Church, the King of Sicily, and the Lombards, exactly in the same Terms, as it had been stipulated by the Deputies of both Parties.

THIS being executed by the Count, the Venetians, by order of the Pope, went with Six Gallies to wait on the Emperor, and conducted him to the Monastery of St. Nicolas, and the next Day Alexander hearing of his being come, went with all the Cardinals, King William's Ambassadors, and the Lombard Deputies, to the Church of St. Mark, and sent three Cardinals to Frederick, to absolve him, and all his Barons from the Censures of the Church. Then the Doge, with the Patriarch, accompanied by all the chief Noblemen of Venice, went to St. Nicholas's Church, and having taken the Emperor aboard of their Gondolas, in great Pomp, conducted him to St. Mark's Church; where a great Multitude had conven'd to see this famous Sight: And Frederick as soon as he landed, immediately fell down at Alexander's Feet, who was sitting in his Pontificalibus, amidst the Cardinals and other Prelates, in the Portico of the Church, and laying aside the Loftiness of Imperial Majesty, he threw off his Mantle, and prostrated himself before him, with his Body extended on the Ground, humbly adoring him: At which Action the Pope being mov'd, with Tears in his Eyes, rais'd him from the Ground, kiss'd and bless'd him; and then the Germans singing Te Deum, they both enter'd the Church; from thence, after having receiv'd the Pope's Benediction, he went to lodge in the Doge's Palace, and the Pope, with his Followers, return'd to his former Lodging.

THUS in the beginning of August of this Year 1177, the Truce betwixt Frederick and the Lombards for Six Years, and betwixt him and King William for Fifteen, was concluded, ratified and sworn to, not only by Frederick, but also by the Count of Dieffa, and Twelve Barons of the Empire, in the Name of Henry his Son. On the other Side, it was likewise sworn to by the Archbishop Romualdo, and Ruggiero Count of Andria, King William's Ambassadors, who promis'd that their Master should ratify it in two Months Time, and it was also sworn to by Twelve of his Barons: For which end Frederick sent Ambassadors to Sicily, who arriv'd at Barletta the Ninth Day of August this Year 1177, from thence they went to Palermo, and were honourably receiv'd by the King, who in his Name deputed Ruggiero dell' Aquila, and Eleven other Barons, to fulfil his Oath; and the Deputies of the Cities of Lombardy having taken the same Oath, the Congress broke up, and every one return'd joyfully to their own Lodgings.

THE Peace betwixt the Pope and Frederick being thus settled, the News of it soon reach'd the Anti-pope's Faction, who likewise yielding, came and threw themselves at Alexander's Feet, renounc'd the Schism, and were graciously receiv'd into his Favour: And John Abbot of Strumi, the Anti-pope, by his Faction call'd Callistus III. the Year following 1178, having left Monte Albano, whither he had retir'd, came to Tuscolo, whither the Pope had gone from Venice, and also prostrated himself at his Feet, and ador'd him as true Pope, which put an end to the Schism that had lasted for Seventeen Years running; and the Pope created John, Archbishop and Governor of Benevento, where soon after he died of Grief.

IN the mean time the Pope and Emperor had left Venice, the Emperor, who went first, had gone to Ravenna, and the Pope being conducted by four Venetian Gallies, Gallies, landed at Siponto, and from thence by the way of Troja and Benevento, went to Alagna: And shortly after, being invited by the Romans, on the Feast of St. Gregory, he made his Entry into Rome, and was receiv'd with great Pomp. And the Emperor, after a short Stay at Ravenna, went to Lombardy, and from thence to Germany.

THUS ended these Transactions, which are variously reported by the Modern Historians, and particularly by some Sicilians, who have so stuff'd their Volumes with innumerable fabulous Stories, that Agostino Inveges himself, a Palermitan, gives no manner of Credit to them. I could find no better Voucher for such Facts, than Romualdo Archbishop of Salerno, of Royal Norman Blood, and a Prelate of great Worth, who, as King William's Ambassador, was personally present at all the Transactions, and who, in his Chronicle, has transmitted them to Posterity, and deserves to be more credited than any other Writer on that Subject.

S E C T. I.

The Dominion of the Adriatick Sea.

ALL that Story then, of Alexander's going to Venice in the sham Habit of a Pilgrim, is Fabulous; and what is yet more ridiculous, is, that he continued there for a long Time disguis'd, and serv'd as a Cook. And what these Writers make Alexander say to Frederick, when he prostrated himself at his Feet, and Frederick's Answer, was no less absurd. The Sea-fight, which they have invented betwixt the Venetian Fleet, and that fictitious one of the Emperor, who, at that Time, had no Naval Forces, and their having made Otbo his Son Admiral, who, according to Sigonius, could be no more than five Years of Age, and a Thousand other forg'd Adventures, unhappily maintain'd by Cornelio Frangipane, in that Allegation, which is now printed in the sixth Tome of the Works of P. Paolo the Servite, are all Dreams.

AND what they have written of Pope Alexander's having granted on this Occasion to the Venetians, the Dominion and Keeping of the Adriatick Sea, from whence the Solemnity of marrying that Sea every Year on Ascension Day, has its Rise, is no less Romantick; as if it had been in Alexander's Power to give the Dominion of the Seas, as other Popes pretended to give that of the Land; such Extravagance is not to be credited of Alexander, who was very moderate, and knew very well the Bounds of his Power, and if Frederick was averse to him, and had often Disputes with him, it was only because he unjustly would not acknowledge him to be true Pope; and the Cities of Lombardy taking advantage of this Discord, gave Rise to so many Quarrels and Mischiefs wherewith the Church of Rome was miserably afflicted for Seventeen Years.

THIS Truth was well known to that most grave Historian *Guicciardini*¹, who likewise writes, that this Grant of Alexander's is not to be found in History, nor supported by any Testimony, but that of some Venetians, which, being in their own Cause, and of such Consequence to them, deserves no Credit. But the Venetians who are more wise, and knowing in the Transactions of past Times, have even rejected this false Opinion of their Country-men, and their famous Divine and Counsellor of State Fra. Paolo the Servite, in his Treatise of the Dominion of the Adriatick Sea, has endeavour'd at large to prove, that the Venetians are Lords of the Gulf, not by the Grant of Alexander, or other Popes or Emperors, but by a Title coetaneous with the Republick, and by the Lawyers call'd Pro de relicto; pretending, that the last Emperors of the West being diverted by various Undertakings, and wanting Naval Forces to defend the Gulf, abandon'd it, and did not trouble themselves about the Possession of it, whence it came to pass, that the Venetians growing afterwards powerful at Sea, and finding the Gulf without a Master, possess'd themselves of it, and have ever since maintain'd the Dominion of it against all Opposers.

BUT allowing the Dominion of the Sea, like that of the Land, to be acquirable, and not repugnant to Nature, as the incomparable Hugo Grotius argues at large in his Mare liberum; and granting what John Selden writes to the contrary in his Book, which in opposition to Grotius, he intitled Mare clausum; our Forefathers, surely on better Grounds, claim'd the Dominion of the Adriatick Sea, as belonging to the Kings of Sicily, and not to the Republick of Venice, by a much better Title than the Venetians pretend to; for no Prince ever abandon'd that Gulf, but always had it in his Head to recover it when lost, as soon as he found himself able to compass it; the Normans had conquer'd it from the Greeks, who, upon the declining of the Western Empire, were Masters of all those Gulfs that surrounded these our Provinces; and 'tis beyond all Controversy (as is clear from the preceding History) that to the Time of Charles the Great, the Greek Emperors were Masters of the Adriatick, and frequently sent their Fleets thither, to maintain their Dominion in Puglia, against the Invasion of foreign Nations; yea, the Venetians often join'd with the Greeks against Charles the Great, and Pepin his Son, who were seeking to wrest from them the Dominion of the Adriatick; and Pepin was once so inrag'd against the Venetians for assisting the Greeks with Men and Money, that after having chas'd them out of the Adriatick, and destroy'd their Fleet, he pursu'd them to the very furthest Creeks of the Gulf, and took a great Part of their City, which was then made up of many small Islands; and the Venetians would have been utterly ruin'd, and subjected to the Dominion of Pepin King of Italy, if Charles the Great, his Father, had not disapprov'd of it, given them Peace, and laid the Blame of their Confederacy with the Greeks on the Dukes, and not on the *Venetians*¹.

THIS War however prov'd very advantageous to the Venetians, for a great Part of those People that liv'd upon the Banks of the many Channels and Shores (which were subject to Venice, and were Parts and Members of that City) leaving their Habitations, came and settled upon Sixty small Islands about Rialto, which being join'd together by Bridges, in Time became a great and magnificent City, where the supreme Authority was lodg'd in the Dukes and Senate.

THE Normans having afterwards driven the Greeks out of Sicily, Puglia and Calabria, 'tis not to be doubted but our Princes, at their Pleasure, scour'd the Adriatick Sea with strong Fleets; for, not to mention a Hundred other Instances, in the Year 1071, when the famous Duke Robert Guiscard was invited by his Brother Roger to come to his Assistance, in the Siege of Palermo, he, as Lupus Protospata writes², went with a powerful Fleet of 58 Ships, and cross'd the Adriatick. And after all these Provinces came under the Dominion of the Normans, the famous King Roger I. not content with such great and boundless Conquests, became much more powerful at Sea than the Emperors of the East themselves, and carried his victorious Flag not only into Dalmatia, Thrace, and to the very Gates of Constantinople; but his powerful Fleet cross'd over to Africa, where he conquer'd both Cities and Provinces. There was not a Prince in the World in his Time, that was superior to him in Naval Forces, with which he had frequent Occasions to fight against those of the Emperor of the East (who was also powerful at Sea) and always came off victorious. His Power at Sea may likewise be known, by the many Fleets which he maintain'd; for one Admiral not being sufficient to have the Charge of them, he was forc'd to make many, over which he put one, who was therefore call'd Admiratus Admiratorum; such as George of Antioch, High Admiral in the Reign of Roger, and Majone in that of his Son William. And so great was the Power of these Norman Kings in those Days at Sea, that there was no Harbour in their Dominions, that (besides the Provincial Admiral) had not other inferior Officers subordinate to the Admirals, whose Business was to oversee the Building and Repairing of the Ships and other Vessels, and to assign them Stations for the Protection and Freedom of Commerce, and Security of the Sea Ports along all the Coasts of their Dominions; and there being many Harbours on the Coast of Puglia, which is of the greatest Extent on the Adriatick, (in which the Fleets from Sicily were wont to shelter themselves) that Gulf, in the Reigns of Roger, the Two Williams, and their Successors, was alwas guarded by the Ships and Fleets of these Kings; but the Ports most frequented in Time of Naval Expeditions, were those of Vesti, Barletta, Trani, Bisceglia, Molfetta, Giovenazzo, Bari, Mola and Monopoli, besides those of Brindisi, Otranto, Gallipoli and Taranto, almost all in the Adriatick; the Pilgrimages to the Holy Land, were often made from the Adriatick. The Fleets of the Emperors Frederick and Henry, stopp'd in the Ports of the Adriatick; and the Army for Syria was transported from thence, and in fine, all the Expeditions to Greece and the Levant, went from this Gulf.

AND though in the Reigns of the Princes of the Family of Anjou, the Power of the Kings of Sicily was not so great, yet the Two Charles's of Anjou, and the other Kings of that Race maintain'd powerful Fleets at Sea, insomuch that they had the Command of that Gulf at their Pleasure.

IN later Times, and particularly under the Kings of the Aragon Family, when our Sea Forces were much decreas'd, and on the contrary, those of the Venetians much increas'd; the Venetians having the Freedom of the Gulf, without being disturb'd by the Fleets of any neighbouring Prince, pretended to the Dominion of it, and took upon them to give Laws to those who navigated it; not to suffer arm'd Fleets to enter it; to claim all Prizes taken in it, and that none could carry on Commerce there without their Permission; and by the Weakness of the neighbouring Princes, they came to that Height of Boldness, as not to suffer other Fleets to navigate the Gulf, insomuch that to the great Reproach of the Spaniards, when Mary, the Sister of King Philip IV. was to be married to Ferdinand King of Hungary, the Emperor's Son, and came to Naples with a great Number of Gallies, and a Pomp suitable to such great Princes, in order with the same Spanish Fleet to pass thro' the Adriatick for Trieste; the Venetians, that it might not incroach upon their pretended Right to that Sea, oppos'd it so stiffly, as to tell the Spaniards, if they would not accept of their Offer, to convoy them with their Fleet, they might depend upon it, that the Queen must fight her Way through their Fleet to her Wedding; they were forc'd shamefully to submit, and the Queen, by the way of Abruzzo, went to Ancona, where she was receiv'd by Antonio Pisani with Thirteen light Gallies, and landed at *Trieste*¹. To this low Pass were our Sea Forces reduc'd in the Reigns of the late Kings of Spain; but with regard to the preceding Ages, and especially the Time of the Norman Kings, those of Sicily, on better Grounds, could boast of the Dominion of that Sea, than the Venetians. Whence with us, amongst the Manuscripts of the Royal Prerogatives, recorded by *Chioccarelli*², we find one of the controverted Points is, whether the Dominion of the Adriatick Sea belong'd to the Venetians, or to the Kings of Naples.

The Expedition of the Sicilians into Greece. The Marriage of Constantia to Henry King of Germany. The Death of King William, and his Laws.

BUT to return to our William, there are very few of this wise King's Actions remaining upon Record; for Archbishop Romualdo's History ending here, and there being no other Authors of these Times, excepting the Chronicle of the Anonymous Monk of Cassino, which is preserv'd in Monte Cassino, on which Camillus Pellegrinus made some Notes; and some short Passages written by Riccardo da S. Germano, Roberto del Monte, and Nicetas a Greek Author; all the other Actions of this glorious King, for the Space of Eleven Years, are almost buried in the Darkness of Antiquity. Some Things with great Care, have been search'd into by Capecelatro, and the most accurate Inveges, whom we shall follow as the best Vouchers.

I N the mean time Pope Alexander being fix'd in Rome, resolv'd in some measure to remedy the by-past Disorders, for which end, in the following Year 1179, according to the Anonymous Monk of Cassino, and *Pellegrinus*¹, he conven'd a Council in the Lateran Church, wherein were present Three hundred Bishops, besides Abbots, and a great number of other Prelates². In this Council many Heresies that had crept in amongst Christians, were condemn'd: Many Decrees were made for suppressing the Covetousness of those, who lent Money upon Usury, by fixing lawful Interest; and many others for remedying the late Confusions in the Church of Rome.

BUT the next Year 1180, Alexander bent his Thoughts upon a more glorious Enterprize: He wrote to all Christian Princes, Bishops and Prelates of the Church, exhorting them to go to Palestine, and recover the Holy Land from Saladin the Soldan of Babylon, a wise and gallant Prince, who had succeeded his Father Saracón, and was opposing the Christians of these Parts. Henry King of England, and Philip King of France, first prepar'd great and numerous Armies for this Expedition; but Alexander, who, to his Praise, had mov'd the Christian Princes to this Undertaking, did not see it put in Execution, for about the End of the following Year 1181, in the Month of September, he died in Rome, after he had been Pope for Twenty-two Years. He was succeeded by Ubaldo da Lucca, Cardinal of Ostia, who took the Name of Lucius III.

TH E Emperor Emanuel had died a little before in Constantinople, and was succeeded by Alexius his Son. In the mean Time our William, for Reasons recorded by *Roberto del Monte*³, having made a Truce for Ten Years with the King of Morocco, in the Year 1183, came from Palermo to our Provinces, where he visited Monte Cassino, and by the Way of St. Germano and Capua, return'd to *Palermo*⁴.

ABOUT this Time was born in Assisi, a City of Umbria, Francis, whose Father was Pietro Bernardone, a Man of a mean Condition; this Francis acquir'd the Fame of a great Saint, and founded the Order of Minor Friars, which prov'd so prolifick a Plant, that in process of Time it fill'd our Kingdom with so many Monasteries of that Order, that their Number was not inferior to that of the Order of S. Benedict, of which we shall have Occasion to discourse, when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity of this Century.

SHORTLY after, this same Year 1183. Queen Margaret died in Palermo, who being a Lady of great Wisdom, had had a large Share in the Government of the Kingdom, both during the Reign of her Husband, and that of her Son. She was by the Order of William buried with great Pomp in the Church of Monreale, lately built by him, close by her two Sons Roger and Henry. She was a Lady of extraordinary Piety, for she not only founded an Abbey on the Skirts of Mount Etna, but enrich'd it with many Possessions, and gave it to the Monks of S. Benedict; she also gave a kind Reception to the Adherents of Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury, who had been banish'd by the King of England.

IN the mean Time Saladin bore hard upon the Christians in Palestine, and with continual Wars had reduc'd them to a very miserable Condition; whereupon Baldwin, and the other Princes that were there, sent the Patriarch of Jerusalem, the Archbishop of Tyre, and other Ambassadors to Rome, to solicit a sudden and powerful Assistance against so cruel an Enemy. The Ambassadors were kindly receiv'd by Pope Lucius, who sent them to Henry King of England, and Philip King of France, who, together with William King of Scotland, and many great Lords and Barons of France and England, took upon them the Cross, and made every Thing ready for a Voyage to Syria. But while the Pope was daily pressing their Departure, he was seiz'd with a severe Sickness, and died in Verona the 7th of December in the Year 1185, and was honourably buried in the Cathedral of that City, and quickly succeeded by Lamberto Crivello, a Milanese, who call'd himself Urban III.

MEAN while great Insurrections and Tumults happen'd in Constantinople against the Latin Inhabitants, by the Means of Andronicus the Tyrant, who resolving to deprive Alexis of the Empire, enter'd the City with an Army, furiously attack'd the Latins, and with Fire and Sword, sparing neither Age nor Sex, he cruelly burnt them, together with their Habitations; and the Churches, Priests and Monks had the same Fate. This cruel and barbarous Usage of the Latins excited our William's Resentment; for the Tyrant, not content with these Barbarities, had caus'd the Youth Alexis to be strangled with a Bow-string, and had taken Possession of the Empire; therefore William, this Year 1185, assembled a great Army in Sicily, of which he appointed Count Tancred General, who was afterward the fourth King of Sicily, and sent it against the Greeks, in a Fleet commanded by Margaritone his Admiral, who took and pillag'd Durazzo, Thessalonica, and many other Places, where the inrag'd Sicilians committed all manner of Cruelty, without regard to any Thing, Andronicus not daring to come out to oppose them, and put a Stop to so much Mischief. The Greeks seeing themselves so barbarously treated by the Sicilians, and that Andronicus did not seem to be much concern'd about their Miseries, began to hate him to that pitch, that they rais'd a Mutiny in Constantinople, and immediately depos'd him; and the incens'd Mob, who never stop till they have gone to the utmost Excess, not content with having depos'd him, flew upon him, and put him to a shameful and cruel Death. Isachius Angelus immediately took Possession of the Empire, and having assembled the Greek Forces the best way he could, attack'd the Sicilians with such Fury, that, according to Nicetas Coniata, a Greek Writer, he put them to flight, and drove them out of Greece.

BUT the Want of Children very much afflicted King William; for being now nine Years married to Queen Joan, and she still barren, he began seriously to think of the Mischiefs his Kingdom would be expos'd to after his Death, if before-hand he did not provide a Successor. There was no lawful Issue of the Norman Kings left, but Constantia the posthumous Daughter of his Grandfather King Roger; as for Tancred, whom many Years before he had recall'd from Greece, and invested with the County of Lecce, which belong'd to Robert his Mother's Father, he made no account of him, but look'd upon him as a Bastard, tho' he was the Grandson of Roger; yet, as we have said, was not born in lawful Wedlock. Therefore this Princess was courted by many; and Sigonius says, that this same Year 1185, the Emperor Frederick, who in the Year 1177. had enter'd into a fifteen Years Truce with William, sent to demand her in Marriage for his Son Henry King of Germany. William, who had lost all Hopes of having Children, and being advis'd by Gualtieri Archbishop of Palermo, consented to the Match; the Archbishop hatching Mischief against against Matteo Vice-Chancellor of Sicily, by whose Means the Church of Monreale had been substracted from his Jurisdiction by King William, as we have said, thought this would be the only way whereby he might be able to crush Matteo his Rival, as Riccardo da S. Germano observes; for the Dominion of the Kingdom being to go to another Family with Constantia, it was his Business to have the Marriage, already agreed to, concluded with Henry of Suevia, King of Germany, who when he should come to be King of Sicily, would be thankful to him for the Favour, and turn out Matteo. In a Word, he brought Matters so about, that at last he got William to conclude the Marriage with Henry; and this Year 1186, being 32 Years of Age, she was conducted from Palermo to Milan, where Henry was, and where the Marriage was celebrated with great Pomp and Magnificence.

BUT this being a Piece of History which the Modern Historians have intermix'd with many Fables, in order to set it in a true Light, it will be proper to discover all their Errors. Some say that Constantia was many Years a Nun in the Monastery of S. Salvatore in Palermo, being put there by her Father Roger, by reason of a fatal Prophecy of the famous Abbot Giovachino Calabrese, who, while she was yet a Child, said, that on her account there should be a great Fire kindled in Europe, that would prove the Ruin of her Family.

OTHERS, considering that this Story clash'd with what the Authors of these Times with one accord have written, that Constantia was born after Roger's Death, so that the Abbot Giovachino could prophecy nothing concerning her at Roger's Desire before she was born, say, that the Prophecy was made at the Desire of her Brother William, and not of her Father; and that her Brother being afraid of the unlucky Prediction, in order to frustrate it, shut up the Child in the foresaid Monastery.

BERNARDO GIUSTINIANO² Nephew of S. Laurence, says, that the King married Constantia to Henry, by the Instigation and Command of Pope Alexander III. whereas Alexander died in the Year 1181. S. Antoninus Archbishop of *Florence*³, writes, that Constantia being grown old in the Monastery, Pope Clement III. in order to exclude Tancred from the Succession of the Kingdom, and to gratify Henry, caus'd her to be privately taken out of the Monastery, and dispensing with her Vows, married her to Henry, whereas Clement III. was not elected Pope till the Year 1188. Fazzello commits a greater Blunder, when he says, that the Instruments and Decrees of Pope Celestine for dispensing with Constantia's Vows of Virginity, are as yet to be read in the Roman Archives, and Publick Decrees; whereas Celestine was not elected Pope till the Year 1191, and this Pope always stood up for Tancred in Opposition to Henry, as we shall relate by-and-by. But these fabulous Stories deserve no Credit, since the Authors of these Times make no mention of such Facts, which they ought not to have conceal'd.

UGONE FALCANDO, having occasion twice to make mention of Constantia, one of the Times he speaks of her as being educated and brought up in the Royal Palace, not in a Monastery: Sic & Constantia primis a cunabulis in deliciarum tuarum affluentia diutius educata, tuisque instituta doctrinis, & moribus informata, tandem opibus suis barbaros ditatura ditescit. And in another Place of his History, telling, that when the People of Messina revolted against Odono Querello, and kill'd him, they believ'd that the Chancellor Parzio's Faction had a mind to marry Constantia to Gaufrido the Chancellor's Brother, to give him a handle to possess himself of the Kingdom, he says, Et Constantiam Rogerii Regis filiam uxorem ducere, inde sibi dandam occasionem existimans, ut videretur Regnum Justius occupare; he speaks nothing of her being a Nun, which he ought to have mention'd in both Places, if there had been any such Thing.

THE Abbot Arnoldo a contemporary Author, who gives us a particular Account of the pompous and magnificent Celebration of this Marriage in Milan, makes not the least mention of these Facts. Archbishop Romualdo, Nubricensis, the Appendix to the Abbot of Usserg, nor Pope Innocent in the third Book of his Letters, wherein he frequently mentions Constantia, speak nothing of her being a Nun; for had it been no more but the Indecency of the Action, and as a Thing not usual, that a Nun should marry, they were oblig'd to take some Notice of it. And 'tis plainly inconsistent to say, that this Marriage was made with the Pope's Consent; forasmuch as the Pope was for Tancred's having the Kingdom; and he was so far from disapproving of the Sicilians having crown'd him King, that he presently gave him the Investiture of it, as shall be related.

GOFFREDO DA VITERBO, an Eye-Witness, speaking of Constantia, on account of the Peace made betwixt the Emperor and the Lombards, says, she was the posthumous Daughter of her Father, and that she was married to Henry at thirty Years of Age: These are his Verses;

*Fit Regis Siculi filia sponsa sibi,
Sponsa fuit speciosa nimis, Constantia dicta,
Postuma post patrem materno ventre relicta,
Jamque tricennalis tempore virgo fuit.*

And reckoning that Roger, according to the Abbot Roberto and Fazzello, died in the Year 1154, and that she was born after her Father's Death; when she married, she could be no more than Thirty-one Years of Age. And according to Inveges, who says, that this Marriage was concluded in the Year 1185, she was only Thirty Years old.

AND in fine, Riccardo da S. Germano, whose Chronicle Baronius never saw, speaking of this Marriage, says plainly, that Constantia was brought up in the Royal Palace, and not in the Monastery of S. Salvatore, and makes no mention of her being a Nun; and says, that she was married to Henry by Means of the Archbishop Gualtieri, and not of the Pope: These are his Words, Erat ipsi Regis Amita quædam in Palatio Panormitano, quam idem Rex, de consilio jam dicti Archiepiscopi, Henrico Alamannorum Regi filio Federici Romanorum Imperatoris in conjugem tradidit. Which Author adds, that by the Advice of the same Archbishop, Constantia was appointed to be the undoubted Heiress of the Kingdom of Sicily: Quo etiam procurante factum est, ut ad Regis ipsius mandatum, omnes Regni Comites Sacramentum præstiterint, quod si Regem ipsum absque liberis mori contingerit, amodo de facto Regni tanquam fideles ipsi suæ Amitæ tenerentur, Et dicto Regi Alemanniæ viro ejus. Whereupon the King sent Constantia from Palermo to Rieti, accompanied with a great Train of Counts and Barons, where King Henry's Ambassadors with great Pomp receiv'd her, and conducted her to Milan, where she was receiv'd by the Emperor Frederick her Father-in-Law, and the Marriage was celebrated with great Splendor in the Gardens of S. Ambrose this Year 1186.

WILLIAM having thus concluded this Marriage with Henry, believ'd he had brought his Kingdom to a settled State; but it was soon disturb'd by the unhappy News of Saladin's Success in Syria; for having assembled a vast Army, he took the City of Tiberias in a trice, and then attack'd the Christian Army, which he defeated, and put to Flight, and made himself Master of the Holy Wood of the Cross. He made the King of Jerusalem Prisoner, and kill'd a great many of the Knights Templars and Hospitalers, and many Soldiers: Fr. Terrico Great Master of the Templars, the Count of Tripoli, and Rinaldo da Sidone, with a few Soldiers, escap'd with Difficulty by flight. By this Victory the Soldan was enabled to take Arcon, Cæsarea, Nazareth, Bethlehem, and all the neighbouring Places, and lay close Siege to the City of Tyre; and soon after having divided his Army, he march'd with a good Body of it to the Holy City of Jerusalem, which he took the fourth Day of October 1187. Such are the unspeakable Judgments of God; this City, which with so much Glory was reliev'd from the shameful Slavery of the Infidels by Godfrey of Boulogne, and other illustrious Italian, German, and French Captains, now, after the Space of Eighty-seven Years, returns again into the Hands of the Barbarians, without Hopes of ever being freed from their grievous and cruel Dominion.

THE Calamities of the East did not end here, but, to the great Detriment of the Christians, Saladin enter'd into a League with Isachius Angelus Emperor of Constantinople, who having got in a Present from Saladin all the Land of Promise, engag'd to assist him in the War with a hundred Gallies, and to stop all the Latins in their Passage to make War in Syria; Pope Urban upon hearing the fatal News of the Loss of Christ's Sepulchre, and the Holy Wood of the Cross, of the taking of Jerusalem, Jerusalem, and of Soliman's League with the Emperor of Constantinople, was so grievously afflicted, that these Things should have happen'd in his Time, that he was seiz'd with a violent Sickness, of which in a few Days he died in Ferrara the 16th of *November*¹, exactly forty Days after the taking of Jerusalem; and the next Day Alberto Cardinal di S. Lorenzo in Lucina, and Chancellor of the Holy Church, born in Benevento of the Family of Morra, was created Pope, and took the Name of Gregory VIII. This most religious Pope did nothing during his short Reign, but sollicite the Christian Princes to go to Palestine with a strong Army to assist the Christians; and while he was intent on so commendable a Work, he died in Pisa, having govern'd the Church not quite two Months; and twenty Days after his Death, in the same City, Paolino Scolari a Roman, of mean Parentage, Cardinal of Palestine, was elected Pope, and took the Name of Clement III.

THIS Pope, following the Footsteps of his Predecessors, wrought so effectually to get Relief sent to the Holy Land, by confirming the Indulgences granted for that end by Pope Gregory, that thereby, and his own Diligence, and that of William Archbishop of Tyre, who had gone to France, an Assembly met betwixt Gisors and Trie, in which were present Philip King of France, Henry King of England, with the Prelates and Barons of their Kingdoms, and Philip Count of Flanders, who having taken the Cross from the Hands of the Archbishop of Tyre, in the Year 1188. they set out upon so holy and glorious an Expedition; and for a Mark of Distinction among themselves, King Philip and his Frenchmen wore a Red Cross, and Henry and his Englishmen a White, and Count Philip with his Flemish took a Green. The Emperor Frederick no less willing to shew his Piety on this Occasion, was reconcil'd with the Pope, with whom he had had some Difference, and from the Hands of Henry Cardinal of Albano took the Cross, in order to go to Palestine, and made such Dispatch, that he was the first that went thither.

IT ought not to seem strange, that among so many Princes exhorted by the Popes to go to Jerusalem, our King William is not so much as mention'd, who, on account of the Richness of his Dominions, and their Vicinity to Greece, with which they had frequent Communication, and especially his powerful Sea Forces, was best enabled of all other Princes to go upon this Expedition; but (as Archbishop Romualdo, speaking of him to the Emperor at Venice, said) he was continually employ'd in so laudable a Work, by assisting with his Gallies the Pilgrims going to the Holy Sepulchre, and sending Relief to the Faithful, who were fighting there; so that there was no occasion to press him to a Work which was his constant Employment.

ON this Occasion 'tis said, that Frederick, before he went to Palestine, wrote that threatening Letter, full of serious and weighty Expressions, to Saladin, commanding him immediately to restore the Places unjustly possess'd by him in Syria; and that Saladin, with the like Haughtiness, answer'd all the Boasts and Menaces where-with his Letter was stuff'd, mocking both him and his Confederates. Both which Letters may be read in the Annals of England, written by Roger and Mathew Paris, and likewise inserted by Capecelatro in his History of the Norman Kings. Whatever Truth may be in these Letters, 'tis certain, that the Emperor having assembled an Army of a Hundred and fifty thousand Men, and a Fleet of Fifty-five Ships, the Year following set out for the Holy Land, but through the Treachery of the Greek Emperor (who, besides the League made with Saladin, was afraid that Frederick, by pretending to go to Palestine, might have a Design to take Constantinople, as had been falsely foretold by Dositheus the Monk) he was a whole Year in getting thither, having suffer'd grievous Hardships and Obstacles in passing through Greece, by the wonted Rapacity and Treachery of the Greeks.

BUT behold, a new, and unexpected Misfortune put William's Dominions in a terrible Convulsion and Disorder. This Prince, being scarcely come to the Age of Maturity, and who had govern'd his Dominions with so much Prudence and Justice, was seiz'd with a grievous Sickness in Palermo, in the Flower of his Age, not as yet Thirty-six Years compleat, and died in the Month of November this Year 1189², after he had reign'd Twenty-three Years. He was buried with great Pomp in the Church of Montreale, at the Foot of his Father's Tomb. 'Tis not possible to express the Grief of his Subjects, who by his many and excellent Virtues had enjoy'd Peace and Plenty. Every Man was at liberty to speak his Mind freely. The Taxes were not exorbitant, as in the Time of King William his Father; insomuch that not only Frederick II. but in later Times Charles II. of Anjou, in settling Peace and Tranquility in their Dominions, order'd that they should not be burden'd with Taxes, but be as easy in that Respect as they were in the Reign of this good King William. He not only exceeded in transcendent Virtues all the Kings of his Time, but likewise Robert Guiscard, and Roger his Grandfathers, Princes of great Renown. He, was according to Riccardo da S. Germano, the Flower of Kings, the Glory of Princes, the Mirror of the Romans, the Honour of the Nobility, the Support of Friends, the Terror of Enemies; the Life and Soul of the People; the Protector of the Poor and Strangers, and the Sanctuary of the Oppressed. His Reign was remarkable for the Regard that was had to the Laws and Justice; every Body was satisfied with his Lot, there was Peace and Security every where, the Traveller was not afraid of Robbers, nor the Seafaring Man of Pirates. But his Death proved very fatal and lamentable to his Dominions; for in the Reign of his Successor, Henry of Suevia, they suffer'd infinite Calamities, which serv'd as so many Foils to William's happy Reign. He having had no Children by Joan Daughter of Henry King of England, left his Aunt Constantia his Successor, to whom, and her Husband Henry, he had made the Barons take an Oath in an Assembly held for that Purpose in Troja of Puglia.

The Laws of King WILLIAM II.

ALTHO' Pietro delle Vigne has left us but few Laws of this Prince, in the Collection of our Constitutions, which he made by Frederick's Order, yet they are all good and prudent.

THE First is that which we read in the first Book under the Title De Usurariis puniendis, wherein he commands, that Points relating to Usurious Contracts shall be decided according to the Decrees lately made in Rome by Pope Alexander in the Lateran Council; so that this Constitution is not William I's but II's. as we have already observ'd in treating of his Father's Laws.

THE Second, which we find in the same Book under the Title Ubi Clericus in Maleficiis debeat conveniri, is the same William's. It was, as we have said, made at the Desire of the Archbishop of Palermo, by which he orders the Crimes of Ecclesiasticks, with regard to their Persons, to be judg'd by their Ordinaries according to the Canons and Canon Law, excepting the Crimes of Felony and such like, which are to be judg'd by the King and his High Court.

THE Third and last of that King's Laws, is that which we read in the third Book, under the Title De Adulteriis coercendis. This was likewise made by William at the Request of the Archbishop of Palermo. By it the Cognizance of the Crime of Adultery, if no Violence was us'd, is likewise referr'd to the Ordinary of the Place; which for a long Time was in Force, and observ'd in both the Kingdoms of Sicily; and in the Reign of Constantia we have a Writ, recorded by Ughellus, by which she orders the same. But in process of Time it has been disus'd and laid aside; and now, with us, the Crime of Adultery, whether by Violence or otherwise, is judg'd by the Secular Judges, and the Ecclesiasticks are not to look upon it as a Crime belonging to a Forum mixtum, as shall be shewn more at large, when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity of the later Ages.

THESE are the few Laws which are left us of this wise and good Prince, in whose Reign the Laws of Justinian's Pandects were of no Force or Authority, but the Longobard prevail'd, and Law Suits were decided according to them in the Courts of Justice. The most accurate Pellegrinus has left us a notable Instance of this, which he had dug out of the Rubbish of Antiquity, to wit, the Instrument of a Sentence given in the Time of this William in the Year 1171, in a Dispute betwixt the Citizens of Sessa, and the Bishop and Citizens of Teano, about a Watergang; which was decided in Favour of the Citizens of Sessa, according to the Longobard Laws, which Pellegrinus took the Trouble to mark on the Margin.

THE Death of William was soon after follow'd by that of the Emperor Frederick, who, after he had surmounted so many Obstacles thrown in his Way by the Greeks, and fought and defeated the Turks in many Engagements, took by Storm, and gave up to be plunder'd, the City of Iconium; but being come to the lesser Armenia, and incamp'd on a Saturday in the Evening in a Place call'd Faradine, the Sunday following, the fourth of June, he continu'd his March towards the River Calep, whither with great Difficulty in crossing terrible-high Mountains, he reach'd that Day; and after he had din'd upon the Bank of the River, in a pleasant Valley, tir'd with the Trouble of continual Battles, and a whole Month's March, he had a Mind to refresh himself a little by bathing and swimming in the River; therefore he strip'd himself naked and went into the River, which was both deep and rapid, and was unfortunately drown'd; his Body was taken up, and carried to Germany, where he was buried with his Ancestors. But the Archbishop of Tyre, follow'd by *Sanfovino*¹, gives a more probable Account of his Death; that in passing this River Frederick's Horse stumbled, and he being old and unweildy, was stunn'd with the Fall, but was catch'd hold of by his Servants, and carried ashore, where he soon died, and was buried in Tyre: 'Tis very unlikely that an Emperor stricken in Years, would indecently strip and throw himself into the River, and run the Hazard of being drown'd.

THUS died this glorious Prince, whose Death was a great Loss to the Christians of Palestine, and our Religion in those Parts; and here we see how incomprehensible the Judgments of God are; for as he had already begun by a successful Course of Victories, so he not only would have compleated the Recovery of all those Places, which Saladin had lately taken, but also have carried the Christian Religion to more remote Countries where the Cross of Christ was not known; but being a Supporter of the Schism against Alexander III. and a Persecutor of the other Popes, he became a Nuisance to the Church of God, and by a fatal and untimely Death, was snatch'd from the Faithful, even when he was engag'd in this Expedition, so pious and serviceable to the Christian Cause.

FREDERICK, (laying aside that Whim of his being Lord of the Universe, as the ancient Roman Emperors fancied themselves to be, which was owing to our Lawyers, and made his Government seem grievous and uneasy to the Cities of Lombardy, and the Popes) was a great and gallant Prince, and a Lover of Learning, and the learned Men of his Time. Whence the Study of the Law was then so much in Vogue, and so many Civilians appear'd in Italy, that being taken with the Novelty and Elegancy of the Pandects, and the other Books of Justinian, they began to explain them in the Academies; and *Ulricus Uberus*² writes, that Frederick Barbarossa was the first who not only granted to the Academies, Power to take Cognizance of the Causes, but likewise a Jurisdiction and Power over their Members and Students. And he had the Civilians in so great Esteem, that in imitation of the ancient Roman Emperors, he consulted them in his most weighty Affairs, and made them of his Council, and frequently made them Governors and Consuls of many Cities of Italy.

Of the Compilers of the Feodal Books, and of their Commentators.

AT this Time was made by the Civilians of Milan that Collection of the Feodal Books, which in process of Time acquir'd so much Authority and Force in Europe, and all the Academies and Tribunals in the Christian World, that it was look'd upon as a Part of the Civil Law: these Feodal Books, which, with the Novellæ of Justinian, make up what is now call'd Decima Collatio, were added to the Roman Laws; not that they are truly a Body of the Civil Law, as Giasone, Bartolus, and some others of our Doctors thought them to be, for which Molineus has censur'd them¹; but because their Authority was so great, that they deserv'd to be put on a Level with the Roman Civil Law.

BUT seeing this Part of the Law has not been handled by our Writers with that Care it deserv'd, forasmuch as an infinite Number of Disputes have arisen among them on that Head, by not knowing how to distinguish the Times when these Books acquir'd the Force of Laws in these our Provinces; therefore it will be necessary to handle this Subject in this Place, with all the Exactness our weak Parts are capable of, and to give an Account of the Fate of these Books in the latter Ages, and finish what we have to say on this Head.

IT may be easily gathered from the preceding Books of this History, that after Fiefs were introduc'd into Italy, there were no written Laws concerning them before Conrade the Salick. They were regulated according to the Usages and Customs of the Places; and seeing, as in other Things, the Customs of the Places were various and different, so it happen'd with respect to Fiefs, that in one Place of Italy they were regulated one way, and in another after a different manner. Thus in Cremona, Pavia, and Milan, a Vassal could alienate his Fief without the Consent of his Lord, but in Mantua, Verona, and some other Places they could not do so without the Consent of their Superior².

IN Placentia, if a Superior gave Investiture of a Fief to one, with this Condition, that it should descend to his Successor, during the Vassal's Life he could not invest another with the same Fief; but the Practice was different in Cremona and Milan.

IN the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puzlia, our Kings had particular Customs relating to Fiefs, different from those of the Cities of Lombardy. These Customs were set down in certain Books, which, by a corrupt Word, were call'd Defetarii, and were kept by the King in his Palace; and when Palermo mutinied in the Time of William I. and the Royal Palace was plunder'd, among other Losses which William lamented, that of these Books was one; and because Matteo Notajo was most expert in these Books, and had them almost all by Heart, among other Reasons that brought him out of Prison, one was, that he being well skill'd in the Affairs of the Court, and the Royal Chamber, he could easily make up the Loss of these Books, in which, as Falcando says, Terrarum, Feudorumque distinctiones, ritus, & instituta Curiae continebantur; which he actually did. And *Inveges*³, from the Authority of the same Falcando relates, that King William I.'s Favourites, who manag'd the Affairs of his Court, such as Riccardo Elect Bishop of Syracuse, Silvesiro Count of Marfi, and Errico Aristippo Archdeacon of Catania, being ignorant of the Distinction of the Lands, Fiefs, Usages, and Institutes of the Court, and of the Books of the Feodal Customs, which were call'd Defetarii, all which were now lost, persuaded the King to take Matteo Notajo out of Prison, and restore him to his former Office; for he being Old, and having always been a Favourite of, and Assistant to Majone, had great Skill in the Customs of the Kingdom, and could compose novos Defetarios.

Marfi,

AND in this manner had they gone on in the Cities of Lombardy, and the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia till the Time of Frederick I. To these Customs Conrade the Salick, and other Emperors, added Constitutions of their own concerning Fiefs, as we have formerly observ'd, which were not as yet collected into a certain Volume. Therefore in the Time of Frederick, some Lawyers of Milan, without any Command, resolv'd to collect these Customs and Constitutions, in order to transmit them to Posterity; and having, though confusedly, collected the Usages of divers Cities of Lombardy, they at first made up two Books of them; to which, according as these Customs came either to be approv'd of, or enlarg'd, or retrench'd by Imperial Constitutions down to their Time, they added the Heads and Contents of them, with their own Interpretations; but not the intire Constitutions.

AUTHORS differ about the Names of these Lawyers. Before Cujacius our Writers commonly believ'd that Oberto de Orto, Attorney General and Consul of *Milan*¹, was Author of this Collection, who, with the Assistance of Gerardo del Negro, alias Capagisto, likewise Consul of Milan, and a notable Lawyer, undertook this Work.

BUT the incomparable Cujacius has very well prov'd that Oberto was not the Author of the first Book, for in it we find some Opinions that displeas'd Oberto, and which he rejected. And because those Opinions are attributed to Gerardo del Negro, Cujacius takes him to be the Author of the first Book, and not Oberto. Some, and among the rest *Montanus*², not satisfied with Cujacius's Conjecture, maintain, that though Gerardo, or whatever Anonymous Person was Author of the first, yet 'tis certain that Oberto was Author of the second Book, which he compil'd for the private Instruction of his Son Anselmo.

BUT seeing this second Book, according to the antient Division, contain'd not only the Opinions of Oberto, but also of other Lawyers of these Times, which were contrary to those of Oberto, 'tis not credible that Oberto was the sole Author of all that Book; for which Cause we are much indebted to the Industry and great Care of Cujacius, who, to remove that Confusion, has divided it into more Books. Our antient Lawyers had some Thoughts of doing the same, but they forbore to do it, lest it should occasion Confusion in the Citations; for seeing this Work was divided into two distinct Books, the Citations would not have answer'd, if it had been divided into more.

BUT so trifling a Reason did not weigh with Cujacius, who very prudently divided the Second into four Books. Thus according to this Division, the first Book is Gerardo's; the Second, to the Twenty-fifth Title, is Oberto's. The rest of the Titles are divided into two other Books; the third Book begins from Title 23, where, Obertus de Orto, Anselmo filio suo salutem. The Fourth begins from Title 25, Negotiam tale est, and 'tis clear from this very 25th Title, that it has been compil'd by different and uncertain Authors, in which Cujacius and Montanus agree. And in the fifth Book, he adds all the Constitutions of the Emperors, relating to Fiefs, of which we shall have occasion to discourse hereafter.

S E C T. I.

Of the Use and Authority of these Books in our Provinces.

THESE Books compil'd by the Milanese Lawyers, had not the Force of Laws in our Provinces, nor any other Part of Europe, till in process of Time they were authoriz'd by the Custom of the People, rather than by the Constitutions of any any Prince ; and their Authority was never absolute, excepting in Cases not repugnant to the particular Laws and Customs of the Nations.

'TIS very certain, that with us they did not acquire this Authority in the Reign of William, nor any of his Norman Successors. They were compil'd about the Year 1170, as the most accurate Francesco d'Andrea ¹ very well proves, and not about the Year 1152, which was the first of the Empire of Frederick I. according to Arthur Duck ² ; when there was a cruel War betwixt our King William and Frederick ; and when all manner of Commerce was stopp'd betwixt us and the Lombards, on account of the intestine War, that from the Time of Lothaire, continu'd betwixt our Princes and the Emperors of Germany, and which was not at an End, till the Year 1177, when the Fifteen Years Truce, lately mention'd, was concluded betwixt William and Frederick ; and these Kingdoms having their proper and peculiar Customs set down in the Books call'd Desetarii, there was no Necessity to have recourse to the Longobard Usages, when they had their own, whereby Fiefs were regulated.

'TIS probable that these Books were not known to our Lawyers till after the Year 1187, when William the Good, for the Quiet of his Subjects, concluded the Marriage betwixt his Aunt Constantia and Henry King of Germany ; which remov'd all Ground of Quarrel with the Emperor of the West ; but was not sufficient to prevent more cruel and obstinate Wars ; for after William's Death, which soon follow'd, the Barons of the Kingdom, who hated Henry's Government, because he was a Foreigner, elected Tancred to be their King, who got the Investiture of the Kingdom from the Pope, as we shall relate. Wherefore we may reasonably believe, that these Books began to be known among us, when Henry, in the Year 1194, made himself Master of the Kingdom by Right of his Wife Constantia, after having driven out the Normans.

THEY were then well known among us ; but had not acquir'd any Authority as Laws ; nor even when Frederick II. his Son publish'd his Constitutions, which he order'd to be compil'd by Pietro delle Vigne ; nor when the Pandects and other Books of Justinian, were, by his Order, read in our Schools (after the University was resettled in Naples) as they were in other Cities of Italy ; for our Authors are in a Mistake, who, on the Authority of Odofredo ³, maintain, that these Books owe their Authority to Frederick II. as the first Emperor that approv'd of them, and sent them to the Professors of Law in Bologna, to be read publickly in the Schools, and that he commanded Ugolino to make the Decima Collatio.

OUR Writers are in the wrong to impute this to Odofredo, who never wrote, that Frederick sent the Feodal Books to Bologna ; and what occasion was there to send them to Bologna, seeing they had been known in that City for many Years, and the Bolognians not only read them, but Bulgarus had written his Glosses upon them there, where he was a Professor of Law in the Time of Frederick I. who made him Prefect of that City ? a Man well known in all the other Cities of Lombardy, as being a Native of that Country ; and many Italian Writers before the Time of Frederick II. besides Bulgarus, had already begun to comment upon them, such as Pileus, and others mention'd by Arthur Duck ⁴, and Andrea d'Isernia ⁵.

ODOFREDO in the Place quoted, writes only, that Frederick II. sent to the Doctors of Bologna, not the Feodal Books ; but his own Constitutions, and those of the Emperors of the West, after Justinian, that as Irnerius had inserted in the Code the Novellæ, that seem'd to be newly added or corrected ; so these Doctors were to do the same by these Constitutions, and to add them to the Code, not to the Feodal Books, under such Titles as should best suit them ; and accordingly they met at St. Petronio, and extracted many Things out of these Constitutions, which they added and adapted to the Laws of the Code under fit Titles : Whence we read in the Code, besides the Authenticæ of Irnerius, the Auth. Cassa, & irrita, C. de Sacr. Eccl. taken out of the Constitution of the same Frederick, de Statut. & Consuet. The Auth. Sacramenta puberum, C. si adver. vendit. taken out of the Constitution of Frederick I. de pace tuenda. The Auth. habita, C. ne filius pro patre, taken out of another Constitution of the same Frederick I. de privil. bonor. art. and some others ⁶.

And

And this was the sole Charge given by Frederick to the Professors of Bologna. But Odofredo adds, that afterwards Ugolinus, one of these Professors, out of a Whim of his own, to the Body of Justinian's Novellæ, already divided into novem Collationes, whence it was call'd Nona Collatio, added the Feodal Book, and having collected all these Constitutions of the Emperors concerning Fiefs, inserted them in that Book, according to the Order they are now in, and which our Forefathers therefore call'd Decima Collatio; and Odofredo likewise declares, that in his Time, few had dispos'd these Constitutions in the manner Ugolino had done.

HENCE those are in a Mistake, who believe, that Frederick II. gave Authority and the Force of Law to the Feodal Books, and that from his Time they had acquir'd such Authority in our Kingdom, and other Dominions: For the most part all our best Writers have demonstrated, that they were not receiv'd by any Constitution of Frederick, or any other Prince; but that it far'd with them as with Justinian's Books: All their Authority was owing many Years after to the Use and Custom of the People, and the Connivance of Princes, who allow'd them to be publickly taught in the Academies, commented by their Lawyers, and quoted in their Courts of Justice; as *Molineus*¹, who is look'd upon as the Papinian of France, well proves; but yet he censures Odofredo unjustly, as if he had led the rest into an Error, whereas this Author never said, that Frederick gave the Force of Law to these Books, nor that Ugolino collected them by his Order; as also he wrongfully blames *Bartolus*², as if he had been the first, that had call'd Ugolino's Collection, Decima Collatio. This Appellation is very antient, and was commonly in use more than a Hundred Years before Bartolus, who declares so himself, and that all other Writers call'd it so before him.

ITS being call'd the Decima Collatio, and in process of Time, by the Custom of the People, getting footing in the Dominions of other Christian Princes, did not gain it such Authority as to be able to overthrow, and derogate from the Institutes, and peculiar Laws of these Nations; for it was receiv'd and approv'd of in so far only, as it did not clash with their own Municipal Laws and Customs. So Cujacius attests, with regard to the Kingdom of France, where these Feodal Laws were receiv'd, as they were practis'd in Italy; but they were not repugnant to the Laws and Customs of that Kingdom; just so as the Romans made use of the Rhodian Laws, which, with respect to maritime Affairs they imbrac'd, Nisi qua in re juri publico Pop. Roman. adversaretur, as the Emperor Antoninus testifies. And in our Kingdom especially, though it was one of the largest and most famous Parts of Italy, this Collatio did not take Place, till after Frederick had publish'd his Constitutions, and caus'd them to be collected by Pietro delle Vigne, many of which regarded Fiefs, and all Things belonging to them. But Frederick did not receive, nor approve of them; but in so far as they were not repugnant to the Constitutions, or in Matters not provided for, or omitted in the Constitutions; so that with us the Authority of the Constitutions took Place first, and then that of the Feodal Books, as was the Case of the Longobard Laws, with respect to Justinian's Books; but we observe, that after the Constitutions were publish'd in the Year 1231, there was a great Debate in the High Court amongst our Lawyers, whether or not these Feodal Books had the Force of Laws with us, even in what was not repugnant to our Constitutions, as is at length taken notice of in the Gloss³; whence we may gather, that even in these Times, it was doubtful, whether these Books had acquir'd the Force of Laws, and if that was uncertain, they were not look'd upon to be on a Level with the Laws. And if *Roffredo*⁴ Beneventano, who flourish'd in the Time of Frederick II. speaking of these Feodal Customs, said, Servari in Regno Apuliæ, it was only because he was of that Opinion, contrary to the Sentiments of the other learn'd Men of the Kingdom; besides, 'tis not denied, but that in these Times they were observ'd, not as having the Authority of Laws, but of Reason, and in so far as they did not clash with our Constitutions.

BUT as that is true, so 'tis likewise most certain, that after Frederick's Time, under his Successors, and especially the Kings of the Family of Anjou, it was no longer disputed, it being evident, that they had acquir'd all their Force and Authority, in so far as they were not repugnant to our Constitutions ; and they acquir'd the same in all the other Dominions of Europe, with respect to their Constitutions ; and the Popes likewise gave them the same Force and Authority in their Ecclesiastical Tribunals ; but in process of Time, the Study of that part of the Jurisprudence was so much cultivated and esteem'd, that ours exceeded all the Lawyers of other Nations, both on this and the other Side of the Mountains ; and to this Day our Kingdom boasts, that the Laws concerning Fiefs never were, nor are yet so well understood, as by our Lawyers. We have an evident Testimony of this in the Dispute betwixt our Andrea d'Isfernia and Baldus, who, being call'd to Naples by Queen Joan I. to a Consultation with Andrea, he expos'd his Ignorance so much in Feodal Matters, that he lost his Reputation, and in order to recover it, was forc'd in his old Age, to apply himself to that Study ¹. And we have seen by Experience, since, that the most hard and difficult Questions that ever could arise concerning that Matter, have never been handled so subdely, and with such Nicety and Learning, as by our Authors. And no other Nation can boast of having had so many Writers on that Subject, as the Kingdom of Naples.

Authors, who have illustrated the Feodal Books.

THOSE that first began to illustrate these Books were, Bulgarus, Pileus, Ugo linus, Corradino, Vincenzo, Goffredo, and others ¹ ; but afterwards Giovanni Colombino out-stripp'd them all, insomuch that Jason says ², that none after him had the Boldness to comment upon these Books.

SOME have taken the Trouble to make Abridgements, and particular Treatises concerning Fiefs, and the first were Pileus, Giovanni Fasoli, Odofredo, Rolandino, the Two Giovannis, Blansaco and Blanco, Goffredo, Giovanni Lettore, Martino Sili mano, Giacomo d'Arena, Giacomo de Ravanis, Ostiensis, Pietro Quessueal, and Giacomo Ardizzone, and afterwards Zazio, Rebuffo, Ametone, Rosental, and an infinite Number of modern Authors.

BUT among all those, who have illustrated the Feodal Books with ample Commentaries, our Lawyers have excell'd. 'Tis true, Giacomo di Belviso was the first ; but our Andrea d'Isfernia, who, about the End of the Reign of Charles II. who died in the Year 1309, wrote such copious Commentaries upon Fiefs, that he not only eclips'd him, but also all those that before him had written on that Subject. Baldo da Perugia, after he had profess'd the Civil Law Forty-seven Years, likewise wrote Commentaries upon the Feodal Books, and shortly after Giacomo Alvarotto da Padova, Giacobino di S. Giorgio, and Francesco Carzio the Younger, did the same ; but our Matteo degli Afflitti obscur'd their Fame. He wrote his Commentaries upon these Books under Ferdinand I. when, for a publick Salary, and with universal Applause, he was teaching in our University the whole Feodal Books, with the Commentaries of Isfernia, which none other has ventur'd to do, neither before nor since ; and he began to write his Commentaries in the Year 1475, when he was Thirty-two Years of Age, as he himself testifies ³ : I take notice of this, to prevent People's being led into a Mistake by Camerarius, as our Writers were, by saying that Afflitto wrote these Commentaries in his extreme old Age, when he could not well understand Isfernia's Meaning ; a Failing very unjustly imputed to this famous Lawyer : For, besides that he wrote in the Flower of his Age ; if he had even written these Commentaries when he was Eighty Years old, no Fault could have been found in them. He died in the Year 1523, and was buried in Naples in the Church of Monte Vergine, where we read on his Tomb, That tho' he was loaded with Tears, yet his Judgment was so strong, that he was as capable of writing to the Day of his Death, as ever he had been. His Domesticks caus'd the Tomb to be erected, and this Inscription put upon it, to shew the Malice of his Enemies, who represented him to the King, as so old, that his Judgment had fail'd him, which made the King remove him from the Dignity of Counsellor of St. Clare, so that he died without the Gown, therefore in his last Will, he is not nam'd Counsellor, but simply Doctor. And as he exceeded all the Commentators on the Feodal Books, we must not here forget the Character which the incomparable Francesco d'Andrea gives him¹, who did not stick to say, that of all those that wrote Commentaries on Fiefs, both before and after him, few can be compar'd, but none prefer'd to him.

AFTER these great Men, some others appear'd among us, such as Camerarius, Sigismondo Loffredo, Pietro Giordano Ursino, Bammacario, Revertero, Pisanello, Montano, and a great many more, of whom it would be troublesome to make a longer Catalogue; so that no other Nation can boast of so many Writers on Feodal Matters, as the Kingdom of Naples.

BUT among the Foreigners, the incomparable Cujacius deserves all Praise. He was the first that encourag'd this Part of Learning, when others despis'd it as barbarous; and whereas formerly it was deform'd and unpolish'd, he, with the help of the most valuable Books and Writers of these Times, gave it a more noble and elegant Dress; insomuch that other learn'd Men, who before slighted it as barbarous, became now fond of imploying their Parts upon it, after his Example, such as Duarenus, Hottomannus, Utejus, and others of noble Genius; whence we now see it explain'd and illustrated, as well by the Professors of the Civil as of the Feodal Law.

CUJACIUS at first increas'd the Feodal Books with Fragments and Chapters, and divided them into Five, as we have already mention'd. Before him Antonio Minuccio di Prato Vecchio, a Lawyer of Bologna, at the Command of the Emperor Sigismund, about the Year 1430, had dispos'd these Books into another Form, and divided them into Six, which he offer'd to the University of Bologna, in order to have this his Work confirm'd by Sigismund; but it does not appear that the Emperor did so; for want of which Confirmation, it was not universally receiv'd, therefore the University begg'd anew of the Emperor Frederick III. to confirm it, which he did; whence these Books came to be read publicly in the Academy of Bologna; but they never acquir'd publick Authority: This Work was afterwards publish'd by *Joannes Schelterus*². Cujacius made another Collection altogether new, which he not only very carefully put into better Order, and restor'd the true Reading; but also with uncommon Erudition commented upon them, and explain'd their true Meaning. And, above all, he swell'd the fifth Book with many Imperial Constitutions, which had been neglected by Ugolino, and rang'd them into better Order.

Imperial Constitutions relating to Fiefs, and Frederick I's Laws.

THE first who publish'd Laws concerning the Succession to Fiefs, as we have often said, was Conrad the Salique. Henry IV. and Lothaire III. made some; but of all the Emperors none enacted so many as Frederick Barbarossa; and Cujacius ends his Book with this Emperor's Constitutions; so that tho' in the vulgar Editions we also find some of Frederick II. yet they have nothing to do there; for we have no Constitutions of Frederick II. as Emperor, concerning Fiefs, tho' there be very many of his as King of Sicily; but these not being Imperial, are not to our Purpose. Those Constitutions of Frederick II. which we read at the End of the second Book of Fiefs, according to the antient Collection, under the Title De Statutis, & Consuetudinibus circa libertatem Ecclesiae editis, &c. have nothing to do with Fiefs;

Fiefs; so that they are wrong plac'd there, and for that Reason *Cujacius*¹ says, he did not put them with the other Feodal Constitutions, as not being to the Purpose; for the same Reason those two of Henry VII. plac'd under the Title of Extravagant, ought not to be plac'd there.

OF all these Emperors, none made so many Feodal Constitutions as Frederick I. of which we have Eight.

THE first is under the Title De Feudis non alienandis, where three or four Causes are assign'd, whereby a Fief may be lost, and wherein the Alienation of Fiefs is more strictly prohibited than by that Constitution of Lothaire. The second, under the Title De jure Fisci, or de Regalibus, restores the Regalia in Italy, which were lost by Disuse, of which we have spoken in the foregoing Book. The third, under the Title De pace tenenda, belongs to the publick Peace of Germany, whence 'tis call'd by the Germans, Frid-brief; and it was publish'd in Ratisbon after the intestine Wars betwixt the Princes of Germany; for the Dutchie of Saxony and Bavaria, taken by the Emperor Conrad from Henry the Proud, were at an end; and seeing there are some things in it relating to Fiefs, Barons, and the publick Peace, it's reckon'd amongst the Feodal Constitutions of this Prince. The fourth, is under the Title De incendiariis, & pacis violatoribus, which Cujacius took from the Abbot of Usparg, and which likewise concerns the publick Peace of Germany, and orders something about Fiefs; besides, as Cujacius observes, our Forefathers were wont to join all those Constitutions relating to the publick Peace with the Feodal, though Fiefs were not mention'd in them, because they could not enjoy Peace, but by the Fidelity and Steadiness of the Vassals. The fifth, under the Title De pace componenda, & retinenda inter Subjectos, relates to the publick Peace of Italy, and was made in Roncaglia with the People of the Milanese, at the End of the first War which Frederick had with them, of which we have spoken in the preceding Book. The sixth, under the Title De pace Constantiae, likewise concerns the Peace of Italy. This last was publish'd in Constance in the Year 1183; for Frederick being now wearied of the so many Wars he had had with the Lombards, resolv'd to call a Diet in Constance, in order to settle all Matters there. Many Princes and Barons, with a Multitude of Deputies, mention'd in this Constitution, were present at this Diet, in which many Articles were agreed upon, and the Conditions, with respect to the Services to be perform'd by the Cities of Lombardy to the Emperor, stipulated, and none other were to be put upon them: Frederick by this Constitution yielded some Royalties to the said Cities, and kept others, especially Fodrum & Investituram Consulum, & Vassallorum, and honour'd Opizo with the Title of Marquis of Mala-spina.

LASTLY, two Constitutions of the same Emperor follow De Jure protimiseos, to which Right, in Cujacius's Opinion (whatever our Professor *Marinis*² may say of it) the Agnati had as good Pretensions, as the Lord of the Fief, therefore he inserted these Constitutions in the Fifth Book of Fiefs; to which he likewise added a Greek Novella of Romanus Lecapenus, Emperor of the East, which treats of the same Right, whence Frederick took what we see establish'd in his first Constitution concerning the Jus protimiseos. Here we must observe, that this Constitution Sancimus de jure protimiseos, by a gross Error in our Doctors, is believ'd to be Frederick II's, and upon that Supposition they dispute whether it ought to be reputed Imperial, or a Constitution of our Kingdom, made only for the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia; and some maintain that as such it has the Force of a Law in our Kingdom. The Mistake proceeds from seeing it join'd to the other Constitutions of our Kingdom³; and likewise because they have seen, that Matteo d'Afflitto, who commented on our Constitutions, has made a particular Comment upon the said Constitution, for the most part taken from one not printed, formerly made by Antonio Caputo di Molfetta, from which, as *Giovan-Antonio de Nigris*⁴ says, without telling from whom, Afflitto took so much, as greatly swell'd his Work; so that seeing it commented by our antient Writers, they took it for a Constitution of our Kingdom. The Error is most palpable, and inexcusable; and we cannot but wonder that the Cardinal of Luca ¹ fell into it, who believing that this Constitution was Frederick II's, starts a Thousand idle Questions, which for want of Foundation, fall to the Ground of themselves ; for it was not publish'd by Frederick II. but by Frederick I. who had no Power to make Laws in the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, consequently could not oblige King William's Subjects to accept it. Indeed it afterwards acquir'd the Force of Laws with us, not by the Authority of the Legislator, but by the Use and Custom of the People, who after a long Tract of Time receiv'd it, just so as it far'd with the Pandects and the other Books of Justinian, and likewise with these Feodal Books ; whence at present, 'tis in full Force in the Kingdom, but not in the City of Naples, where a particular and peculiar Custom relating to that Matter prevails. The other Laws of Frederick I. as well the Military, establish'd in Brescia in the Assembly of the Princes of the Empire, in the Year 1158 as Civil, since they have no relation either to Fiefs, or us, we willingly omit them, for every Body may find them in Goldastus ², who has collected them all.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of NAPLES.

BOOK XIV.

THE Death of William the Wicked, and the Accession of his Son to the Throne, quieted the Disorders and Mischiefs into which the Kingdom was involv'd, so the afflicting and lamentable Loss of William II. brought greater and more cruel Disasters upon it. Our Country never saw more wretched Times than those which happen'd from the Death of this good Prince, to the Reign of Frederick II. who, by his Virtue and Greatness of Soul, was able to crush the Disturbers of the Kingdom, and restore it to a more peaceable and settled State.

WILLIAM having died without leaving any Issue, made way for many Pretenders to the Crown, though in his Life-time he had declar'd his Aunt Constantia Heiress of the Kingdom; and in an Assembly held for that Purpose in Troja, had caus'd his Vassals to take an Oath of Fealty to her and her Husband Henry; nevertheless the Sicilians abhorring the Dominion of Henry, as a foreign Prince, and he being at a great Distance in Germany, with his Wife Constantia, they began to look out for another to succeed to the Throne, and had all their Eyes upon Tancred Count of Lecce. The Barons of the Kingdom, and the Friends of the Royal Family, were altogether by the Ears on that account; for all those who were of the Blood Royal, or had great Baronies, not yielding to one another, aspir'd to the Crown^a; and those of lower Degree adhering to the most powerful, turn'd the Kingdom upside down ; so soon was the Oath of Fealty sworn to Constantia and Henry in Troja forgotten.

T H E R E are some who write ¹, that Pope Clement III. seeing the lawful Issue of the Normans fail'd, pretended that the Kingdom, as his Fief, had devolv'd to the Church of Rome, and for that end had assembled his Troops, in order to reduce it to his Obedience. But that is a very ill-contriv'd Story ; for at this Time the Popes had set up no such Claim ; they went on by short and leisurely Steps, and were at this Time satisfied with the Investiture, for they well knew, that in process of Time, and as lucky Opportunities should happen, they would reap greater Advantage, which accordingly fell out in the Reigns of Innocent IV. and Clement IV. which these two Popes improv'd. The present Situation of Affairs would not allow of it, because the Power of the Pretenders, such as Henry, was great ; the Minds of the Sicilians were altogether bent on Tancred, and the Chief Barons aspir'd all at the Kingdom for themselves. The Pope had none to assist him, and of himself he was not able, wanting both Men and Money, so that Clement could undertake nothing. And the Pope was so far from such Thoughts, that he no sooner heard that the Sicilians had advanc'd to the Throne, and crown'd Tancred, than he immediately dispatch'd the usual Investiture ; for he look'd upon it to be more for his Purpose to have Tancred to be King of Sicily, than Henry, who was King of Germany.

B U T the Sicilians, and especially those who were of Matteo the Vice-Chancellor's Faction, in Opposition to the Archbishop Gualtieri, freed from the Fear of the Friends of the Royal Family, proclaim'd Tancred King ; and the Vice-Chancellor's Faction having join'd them, in order to crush the Archbishop and his Party, who were for Constantia, they set Tancred on the Throne, and immediately he came to Palermo, where with great Acclamations he was publicly proclaim'd King, and in the Beginning of this Year 1190 ², with great Solemnity crown'd. The Sicilians, not content with this, forthwith sent an Express to the Pope, who, in order to fix him the better on the Throne, sent him the wonted Investiture ; which Neubrigenfis, Riccardo da S. Germano, and the Chronicle of Monte Cassino assert for Truth. The grateful King made Matteo High Chancellor of the Kingdom, and his Son Riccardo Count of Ajello.

T A N C R E D, as we have said, was the bastard Son of Roger Duke of Puglia, eldest Son of Roger the Elder, first King of Sicily, begot on a Daughter of Robert Count of Lecce ; for Duke Roger frequenting Count Robert's House, and seeing his Daughter young and handsome, they fell in Love with one another ; and it was not long before they tasted the Sweets of their Love, and went on in that manner till she became twice with Child, and brought forth Tancred and William ³. But Roger exceeding in the Embraces of his beloved Mistress, fell grievously sick, which made his Father call him Home, and finding the Cause of his Illness, he was highly offended with the Count, believing it was all his Doings ; and Roger dying soon after, the King so persecuted the Count, that he was forc'd to fly to Greece, and the King kept the two Children shut up in his Palace like Prisoners, where they continued till Bouello's Conspiracy against William I. when they went to Greece, where William the younger of the two died, and Tancred was afterwards recall'd by William II. who receiv'd him very graciously, and invested him with the County of Lecce, which was his Grandfather's by the Mother.

S O M E have written ⁴, that Duke Roger at last obtain'd leave from the King his Father to marry his beloved Mistress, but was prevented by Death, and that there was nothing wanting to make it a lawful Marriage, but the Ceremony of the Church, for mutual and lawful Consent had preceded ; whence Tancred ought not to be reputed a Bastard, but lawfully begotten ; and therefore King William the Good invested him with the County of Lecce, which was his Grandfather's, and Pope Clement gave him the usual Investiture of the Kingdom. But these Accounts, as having no solid Foundation, are look'd upon by the most grave and exact Writers as fabulous ; and Clement gave him the Investiture, not on account of his Legitimacy, but in Opposition to Henry. Whence Frederick II. always reckon'd the Acts of these Princes, to wit, Tancred and William III. his Son, as null and unlawful, and as made by Usurpers and Invaders of the Kingdom, which after the Death of William II. by Right of Succession, and the last Will of William II. belong'd to his Mother Constantia.

CONSTANTIA's being a Woman was no Bar to her Succession; for tho' in Italy before Frederick II.'s Time, Women as well as the Dumb and Deaf were excluded from the Succession of Fiefs, to which only Males had a Right, to prevent the Fiefs going from the Lance to the Distaff; nevertheless the Normans (notwithstanding the different Opinion of the Longobards) did not look upon Women as incapable of succeeding to the Crown; so much the rather, because the Succession being regulated by the Pope's Investiture, in which both Male and Female are comprehended, the Investiture is given to the Heirs and Successors indifferently; therefore the Normans allow'd both Males and Females to succeed; and the first Investiture given by Innocent II. to Roger runs thus, Rogero illustri, & glorioso Siciliae Regi, ejusque hæredibus in perpetuum; and that given by Adrian IV. to William I. is more clear, Hæredibus nostris, qui in Regnum pro voluntaria ordinatione nostra successerint; and so of all the rest since. Therefore Frederick II. was always wont to call the Kingdom of Sicily his Hereditary Dominion, by the Right of his Mother Constantia; for the Succession of Kingdoms was never regulated by the same Maxims and Laws with Fiefs, as the incomparable Francesco d'Andrea in his learned Treatise about the Succession of Brabant has sufficiently prov'd; whence Males and Females without Distinction have succeeded in the Kingdoms of Sicily, excepting, that in latter Times in the Reigns of King Alphonfus, and the other Arragonian Kings, because of the Mischiefs occasion'd by the two Queen Joans I. and II. it was design'd to have been altered, as shall be taken notice of in its Place. Such has been the Custom not only of Sicily and Puglia for many Ages, but almost of all the other Kingdoms of Europe, which, on that account, is call'd by the People of Asia, and other Eastern Nations, the Kingdom of Women; not only because the Europeans honour and adore them like Idols, contrary to the Custom of the Orientals, but also because they see them rais'd to the Thrones of the greatest Monarchies and Kingdoms. But tho' the Normans excluded Women from the Succession of Fiefs, yet their Kings frequently invested them with Baronies and Counties, as in Ugo Falcando, we find that Clementina the natural Daughter of Roger I. was invested by her Father with the County of Catanzaro.

TANCRED then had no other Title to support him but the Voice of the People, who had proclaim'd him King, and set him on the Throne of Sicily; but many Barons, by the Means of the Archbishop Gualtieri did not acknowledge him, and especially those of the Kingdom of Puglia; so that Tancred was forc'd to use his utmost Efforts to gain them to his Interest. He had married Sibila, Sister to Riccardo Count of *Cerra*¹, to whom he sent a great Sum of Money, to raise Men for suppressing those that stood out against him; and at the same Time by fair Means and Rewards endeavour to win the Favour of the Natives. Riccardo manag'd Matters so well, that in a short Time he rais'd a good Army, with which he subjected the Barons of Principato and Terra di Lavoro, plunder'd and ruin'd the Castles belonging to the Monastery of Monte Cassino, and made the Abbot Roffrido take an Oath of Fealty. But the Cities of Capua and Aversa defended themselves. And Roger Count of Andria, and High Constable (the same whom William sent Ambassador to Venice) by no means would yield to Tancred; but being provok'd that he had been prefer'd to the Crown before him, went, with Riccardo Count of Calvi, and many of his Followers, and a good Body of arm'd Men, to observe Riccardo Count of Cerra and his Army, and to prevent his taking Possession of Puglia; and wrote to Henry in Germany to come and take Possession of the Kingdom of Sicily, which by Right belong'd to his Wife, but was unjustly possess'd by the Count of Lecce. The Archbishop Gualtieri wrote likewise to Henry, giving him account of what had pass'd in Sicily; but Henry delaying to come or send an Army, Tancred came to our Provinces, and successfully subjected the greatest Part of Puglia, notwithstanding the Opposition of Count Roger.

IN the mean Time Henry sent Henry Testa, Marshal of the Empire, with a strong Army into Italy, who arriving after Tancred had made himself Master of the greatest Part of Puglia, by the Way of Aquila enter'd Terra di Lavoro, where he burnt and destroy'd all the Places he took; and having join'd Count Roger, march'd immediately to Puglia, where he likewise demolish'd many Castles, and among the rest Corneto belonging to the Abbot of Venosa, because he was of Tancred's Faction. But the King's Army, not willing to venture a Battle in the open Fields, fortified themselves in the City of Ariano, and some neighbouring Castles, and very wisely spun out the Time, till the Enemy's Army dwindled away to nothing; for Henry Testa having for some Time laid Siege to Ariano, in the very hottest Time of the Summer, what with the scorching Heat, and the Want of Provisions, his Soldiers fell sick and died, and at last, to prevent the total Ruin of his Army, he was forc'd to raise the Siege, and, without having done any Thing remarkable, return to Germany.

BUT Roger Count of Andria, trusting too much to his own Strength, would keep up the War; and having garrison'd the Castle of S. Agata, retir'd to Ascoli, where he resolv'd to defend himself against the Count of Cerra, who, upon the marching off of the Germans, had ventur'd to take the Field, follow'd him close at the Heels, and besieg'd him there; but not able to win him over, either by fair Means or Force, he had recourse to Fraud, and one Day having given him his Parole of Honour, desir'd to speak with him without the City, where he laid a Snare for him, made him Prisoner, and cruelly murder'd him. Then he march'd and besieg'd Capua, whose Citizens being terrified at the Death of Roger, too rashly surrender'd; for Henry King of Germany, whose Interest they had espoused, was now enter'd Italy with a great Army, in order to conquer the Kingdom.

IN the mean while, after the Death of Henry King of England, Richard his Son and Successor, and Philip King of France, with strong Fleets had left their Dominions in order to go to Palestine; and tho' by different Courses, about the End of September both of them arriv'd at Messina, where, the Winter coming on, they were forc'd to remain till the following Spring. Besides, King Richard had a mind to stay to make up some Differences that had happen'd betwixt Queen Joan his Sister, Widow of King William, and Tancred King of Sicily, which he agreed, and Tancred promis'd to give in Marriage one of his Daughters, as soon as she was of proper Age, to Prince Arthur, the King of England's Nephew, Richard having no Issue of his own, with Twenty thousand Ounces of Gold for her Portion¹.

AT this Time the Fame of Giovacchino Calabrese, a Cistercian Monk, Abbot of Curatio, and reputed a Prophet, was spread over all Europe; for which Cause Richard was curious to converse with him, but by his Discourse the King found him to be only a prating Fellow, and the Issue of this Expedition was the Reverse of what he had prophesied. However, he was a Man of great Vivacity, subtle Wit, and very sly, and the most knowing of the Age in the Holy Scriptures; and from the Skill he had in them, with his ready Wit, impos'd upon the People, and pass'd for a Prophet. From the infinite Number of Books which he wrote, and all of them with specious and extravagant Titles, it may be seen, that among the Divines of these Times, he was reputed a Man of great Penetration and Learning². Tho' he attack'd Peter Lombard, a Man likewise famous in these Times, call'd Magister Sententiarum, whom he treated very unhandsomely, and in one of his Books which he wrote against him, did not stick to call him a Heretick and Fool; yet, because Peter's Opinions were all Catholick, and did not deserve to be so branded by Giovacchino, Innocent III. in the Lateran Council condemn'd the Abbot's Book, and pronounc'd them Hereticks who should dare to defend that part of the Book which was levell'd against Peter.

NEVERTHELESS, on account of his great Penetration and Parts, he was look'd upon by learned Men to be very ingenious, and gifted with a Spirit, if not of Prophecy, at least of Knowledge, which was the Opinion of William Bishop of Paris, who flourish'd about the Year 1240. And *Dante*³ makes no Difficulty in placing him in Paradise, and making him a Prophet.

And he was likewise reckon'd a Prophet by Matteo Palmieri in his Chronicle, and by Sisto Sanese, Henricus Cornelius Agrippa, Paleotto, and many others recorded by the Author of the Appendix to the Library of Toppi.

IN the mean time Henry King of Germany, on the News of the Death of Frederick Barbarossa, his Father, who, as we have said, died in the lesser Armenia, desirous to gain the good Will of the Germans, restor'd to Henry Duke of Saxony, and to every other Person, whatever his Father had taken from them; and after he had thus settled the Affairs of Germany, he sent Ambassadors to Rome to Pope Clement, and the Senators of the City, acquainting them, that he had resolv'd to come to Italy, in order to receive the Imperial Crown the Easter following; but while they were looking for him, Pope Clement died the Fourth Day of April 1191, and Henry arriv'd soon after, when Giacinto Bubone, a Roman, nobly descended, and 85 Years of Age, had succeeded Clement, and taken the Name of Celestine III. who, with the usual Solemnity, in St. Peter's Church, crown'd Henry Emperor, together with his Wife Constantia.

KING Tancred went again from Palermo to Puglia, where he call'd a Parliament of his Barons, and settled the Affairs of his Kingdom, and then went to Abruzzo, where he defeated Count Rainaldo, and forc'd him to submit. From thence he went to Brindisi, and concluded a Marriage betwixt his eldest Son Roger, and Irene, sometimes call'd Urania, Daughter of Isaac Emperor of *Greece*², and soon after, the young Lady came from Constantinople to Brindisi, where the Marriage was celebrated with great Pomp. Tancred likewise caus'd Roger to be crown'd King of Sicily in that City; whence Inveges observes³, that this was the first King of Sicily that had been crown'd any where but in Palermo; and after the Coronation was over, and the Castles of Evandro and Guglielmo were given to Roffredo Abbot of Monte Cassino, Tancred return'd joyfully to Palermo.

BUT the Emperor Henry was no sooner crown'd in Rome, than he assembled his Army, and accompanied with Constantia, by the Way of Campania, he attack'd the Kingdom in order to conquer it; but Celestine us'd his utmost Endeavours to disappoint him, and was very much offended, that he should make War upon Tancred, who had been invested with the Kingdom by his Predecessor *Clement*⁴. But Celestine's Endeavours were all in vain, for the Germans, being come to the Castle of Acre, a very strong Place on the Borders of the Ecclesiastick Estate, took it in an Instant by Storm: Which Action, as it hearten'd and encourag'd the Emperor's Army, so it put a Damp upon the Courage of the Natives; for Sorella, Atino, and Colle, were so terrified, that they surrender'd without being attack'd; and Roffredo Abbot of Monte Cassino, who was lying sick, and the Inhabitants of St. Germano, took an Oath of Fealty to the Emperor, who, with Constantia, soon after, went to visit that Monastery. As they advanc'd further, the Counts of Fondi and Molise, submitted, and in Terra di Lavoro, William Count of Caserta, and the Cities of Teano, Capua and Aversa, likewise submitted; they found no Resistance, till they came to Naples, whither the Count of Cerra had retir'd, and the Citizens continuing firm in their Allegiance to Tancred, were prepar'd to make a bold Defence. Naples was at this Time govern'd by Aligerno; and though the Neapolitans own'd Tancred for their Lord, as they had done all the Norman Kings his Predecessors, yet they still retain'd the same Form of Government which they had, before Roger made their City free. Henry having sent the Empress Constantia to Salerno, which had now come under his Obedience, closely besieg'd Naples on all Sides, but by no Means was able to take it, because it was not only bravely defended by the Count of Cerra, and the Neapolitans, but likewise the Germans, in the excessive Heat of the Season, by eating Fruit, and the unhealthful Air of these marshy Places, began to die in great Numbers, and among the rest, the Archbishop of Cologne, whose Body was carried to be buried in Germany; and at last the Emperor himself fell sick, and finding he was not like to succeed in his Undertaking, order'd all the Neighbourhood to be pillag'd, all the Fruit-Trees to be burn'd, and the Siege to be rais'd. And having left Constantia in Salerno, and a Captain, nam'd Mosca in Cervello, Governor of the Castle of Capua, Diepoldus a German, Governor of the Castle of Acre, and Corrado di Marlei of the Town of Sorella, and taken Hostages from the Citizens of St. Germano, whom, with the Abbot Roffredo he took with him, he set out for Lombardy on his Way to Germany.

THE Count of Cerre having heard of Henry's Departure, immediately with his Soldiers, and many Neapolitans, march'd out of Naples and went to Capua, which presently surrender'd, where he kill'd a great Number of Germans, and laid Siege to the Castle, which, for want of Provisions, Mosca in Cervello not being able to maintain, surrender'd, and with all his Garrison was allow'd to march out¹. Then the Count took Atino, Aversa, Teano and S. Germano, with all the Villages belonging to the Abbacy of Monte Cassino; and having solicited Adenolfo de Caserta, the Dean of the Monastery to surrender, he could, neither by Intreaties nor Force, prevail with him. He afterwards subjected Riccardo Mandra Count of Molise, and gave the Government of S. Germano and S. Angelo, to Teodico Masnedam. Riccardo Count of Fondi, who had bought Sessa and Teano from the Emperor, terrified at these prosperous Successes, deserted his Dominions, and fled to Campagna di Roma; and Tancred having a Mind to gratify Aligerno for his good Service, in defending Naples, gave him the County of Fondi, forfeited by Riccardo.

BUT this Run of good Fortune no ways frightened Adenolfo Dean of Cassino, who, notwithstanding that Pope Celestine had excommunicated him, and likewise interdicted his Monastery², obstinately stood out, and adher'd to the Emperor's Party. On the contrary, the Salernitans, in order to curry Favour with Tancred, deliver'd up the Empress Constantia, whom he very generously and honourably receiv'd in Palermo, and not long after, at the Desire of the Pope, he set her at Liberty, and with many Presents, accompanied with Egidio Cardinal of Aragon, sent her to Germany to her Husband³.

NEVERTHELESS the War was long carried on with doubtful Success in Terra di Lavoro; for Adenolfo Dean of Monte Cassino, having assembled some Troops of his own, with a few Germans, recover'd all the Places belonging to his Monastery; and the Emperor having sent back the Abbot Roffredo, with Count Bertoldo, and a good Body of German Soldiers, they join'd the Dean, and made notable Progress; and Count Bertoldo having enter'd the Kingdom with many German and Florentine Soldiers, put all Campania and the County of Molise in terrible Confusion, demolish'd the City of Venafro, and the Castles in the Neighbourhood, and made many of Tancred's Soldiers Prisoners.

WHILE our Kingdom was thus ravag'd, Richard King of England, who with Philip King of France had gone to Palestine, and taken Acon, having fallen out with King Philip, was the first that capitulated with Saladin, and made a Truce for Three Years, which they concluded in the Year 1190; and having given the Title of King of Jerusalem to his Nephew Henry, and to Guido of Lusignan, to whom that Kingdom of right belong'd, the Island of Cyprus in place of it, he sail'd with his Fleet from that Coast, in order to return to his own Country; but being overtaken with a terrible Storm in the Adriatick Sea, he had like to have been drown'd, and with difficulty got ashore with a few Followers. And travelling privately thro' Germany for England, near to Vienna he was betray'd by some of his own Domesticks, and made Prisoner by the Duke of Austria, and deliver'd to the Emperor his Enemy, who, notwithstanding all Means us'd for his Redemption, kept him a Year and near Two Months Prisoner, at last for a great Sum of Money, set him at Liberty, to return to his own Kingdom. In the mean time Pope Celestine had excommunicated both the Emperor and the Duke of Austria for this Fact, and pretended that he could not absolve them until they had restor'd the Money extorted from the King for his Liberty; so that they, by no Means willing to part with it, died thus excommunicated.

BUT to return to our own Kingdom, Count Bertoldo pursuing his Conquests in Terra di Lavoro, and the County of Molise, and multitudes of the Natives, who long'd for the German Government, joining him daily, oblig'd Tancred, lest the whole Kingdom should revolt, to leave Palermo, and return to Puglia, where he assembled a strong Army, and march'd to engage the Count¹; and meeting one another under Montefusco, they were just going to engage; but the King being advis'd, that it was not fit to risk his Royal Person in Battle with Bertoldo, shunn'd fighting²; upon which the Count, whose Army was inferior in Number to that of the King, was overjoy'd, left Montefusco, and return'd to the County of Molise, where he besieg'd the Castle of Monte Rodano, and during the Siege, was kill'd by a Ball thrown out of the Castle from a Machine, which was all the Artillery us'd in these Times; and in his Place the Germans chose Mosca in Cervello their Leader. And Tancred likewise march'd from Montefusco, and re-took the Castle of S. Agata, and all the Places of that Province, and from thence he went to Terra di Lavoro, where the Count of Caserta, and the City of Aversa, with some other Places, soon submitted to him. And having thus reduc'd to his Obedience, the Borders of Puglia and Campania, he return'd to Sicily; but before his Departure, he left no Stone unturn'd to bring over Roffredo the Abbot of Cassino to his Party, though in vain, for, as if he had foreseen what was to happen, neither the Intreaties of the King, nor the Threats of the Pope, were able to make him desert the Emperor.

BUT Tancred's Prosperity was very short-liv'd, for soon after his Return to Palermo, Roger his eldest Son, fell sick, and in the Vigour of his Youth was snatch'd away by untimely Death, without leaving Issue. This grievous Loss struck the King his Father to that degree, that shortly after, having caus'd his second Son William, to be crown'd³, he likewise, by the Violence of his Grief, fell so ill, that no Remedy being found equal to his Distemper, he departed this Life in the Year 1193, according to Riccardo da S. Germano, a Contemporary Writer, and with great Pomp was buried in the Cathedral Church of Palermo, under the same Tomb with his Son Roger, as he had order'd before his Death.

THIS Prince's Reign was so very short, and full of Troubles and Commotions, that he had not Time to settle his Kingdom with good Laws; for he was so involv'd in the Affairs of War, that he had not Leisure to think of those of Peace; therefore we have none of his Laws; and if he had made Laws, Frederick II. would not have suffer'd them to be join'd with those of Roger and the Two Williams. For he look'd upon Tancred and his Son William, who succeeded him, to be Usurpers, and would not allow any of their Grants, Privileges or Donations, as done by Tyrants, to be of Force, or to take Effect⁴; as the Emperor Justinian did by the Gothish Kings, for he approv'd of all the Acts and Deeds of Theodorick and Athalarick his Son, but not of those of Theodatus, Vitiges, and the other Kings their Successors, whom he took to be Tyrants, and Usurpers of the Kingdom of Italy.

TANCR ED, by Sibilia da Medania, the Daughter of Robert Count of Cerra, Brother Uterine of Ruggerio da Sanseverino, the Son of Trigiso Normanno, had the Two Sons above-mentioned, and some Daughters; of which only Albirnia and Mandonia, surviv'd the Father, and who, with their Brother William, and their Mother Sibilia, were long kept Prisoners in Germany by Henry, as shall be related; and according to *Inveges*⁵, he had another nam'd Constantia, the Wife of Pietro, who was Uncle to the Doge of Venice.

C H A P. I.

William III. King of Sicily, succeeds to his Father Tancred. The Emperor Henry makes War upon him, dethrones him, and takes him Prisoner.

TANCR ED was succeeded by his Son William III. whom his Father, after the Death of his Brother Roger, had caus'd to be crown'd King of Sicily; upon the News of which, Henry resolv'd to return to Italy, in order to conquer the Kingdom, for he judg'd (Tancred being dead) that there was nothing could prevent his Success in the Undertaking.

For which end he sent his Army to the Sea Coast of the Kingdom, and he himself, with his German Friends, the Count of Fondi, and many native Barons, who met him on the Borders of the Ecclesiastick State, by the way of St. Germano, went to Monte Cassino, where he was honourably receiv'd by the Abbot Roffredo.

FROM thence having enter'd Campania, and all the neighbouring Places surrendering to him, except Atina, Rocca Guglielmo, Capua and Aversa, which neither surrender'd, nor were attack'd, he went towards Naples. Before Henry came, the Neapolitans had agreed with the Pisans, whom he had taken care to send with a good Fleet, to surrender, so that upon his Arrival, the Gates were open'd to him.

FROM Naples he march'd and laid Siege to Salerno; the Citizens, conscious of their Villany in delivering up Constantia, and afraid that Henry, out of Revenge, would ruin their City, resolv'd to defend themselves; but not able to resist so great an Army, the City was taken by Storm, and cruelly plunder'd; as for the Inhabitants, some of them were kill'd, some put in Prison, and the rest banish'd; thus was this noble City left desolate. Such was the Fate of the most magnificent Cities of this Kingdom; Benevento, when it came under the Government of the Church of Rome, lost all its ancient Splendor and Glory; and whereas formerly it was the Head of a vast Principality, afterwards its Territories reach'd only a few Miles without the Walls. Bari, by the Indignation of William I. was destroy'd; and Capua, upon the declining Hand, had lost its antient Lustre. It ought not then to seem strange, if from the Decay of these renown'd Cities, we shall shortly see Naples start up, and, by the Favour of Frederick II. and yet more by that of Charles I. of the Family of Anjou, become the Head, and Metropolis of so vast and noble a Kingdom.

THUS did Henry triumph in these Provinces, and with the like Success enter'd Puglia, which, without any Resistance, he totally subdued: From thence he sent his most trusty Friend the Abbot Roffredo into Sicily, and gave him Power, in his Name, to receive all the Places that were willing to submit. As the Abbot pass'd through Calabria, the Cities and Castles of that Country strove which of them should open their Gates to him first, and when he cross'd the Straits, Messina, Palermo, and almost all the other Cities of that Island, without making the least Opposition, submitted.

QUEEN Sibilia seeing the Disloyalty of the Sicilians, and afraid of herself and Children, left the Royal Palace, and retir'd to the Castle of Calatabellotta, a very strong Place, and able to make a good Defence; and in the mean Time the Palermians invited the Emperor, who had now come over to Sicily, to make his Entry into their City. But Henry not willing to lose Time in besieging Calatabelotta, resolv'd to gain his Ends by Fraud, whereupon he sent Messengers to the Queen, to tell her, that if she would give up the Kingdom, she should have the County of Lecce to herself, and the Principality of Taranto to her Son William; the Queen seeing herself deserted by every Body, accepted the Offer; and the Emperor soon after, having with great Pomp made his Entry into Palermo, the poor unfortunate William came, and at his Feet surrender'd the Crown of Sicily, as the Chronicle preserv'd in Monte Cassino, and Riccardo da S. Germano relate.

THUS did these Kingdoms go from the Normans to the Suevi, not by Conquest, as the Normans had taken them from the Greeks and Longobards, but by Succession, in the Person of Constantia, the last of the lawful Race of the Normans. 'Tis true, this Title would have been of no stead to Henry, if he had not back'd it with his Arms; but it cannot be denied, that his Son Frederick, in his Constitutions frequently declares, that he held the Kingdom by no other Right but that of Succession. Therefore he calls the Kingdom of Sicily, *Hæreditarium Regnum*¹; and in another Constitution, *Hæreditas pretiosa*².

HENRY having triumph'd over his Enemies, and subjected the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, in order to fix himself in them; very imprudently, had recourse to Cruelty and Rigour; for after he had rewarded the Abbot Roffredo, and given to his Monastery the Castle of Malveto, and restor'd to it Atino, and Rocca Guglielmo, he caus'd a General Assembly to be conven'd on Christmas Day, in the Royal Palace of Palermo, where having signified to those present, that by Letters from Pietro Count of Celano, he had been advertis'd of a Conspiracy hatching against him, contrary to the Articles agreed on, and the Protection given, he imprison'd William the late King, Queen Sibilia and her Daughters, Niccolo Archbishop of Salerno, with Riccardo Count of Ajello, and Ruggiero his Brothers, all three Sons of Matteo the High Chancellor, whom he hated mortally, because, as we have said, it was he that perswaded the Sicilians to make Tancred their King; but Matteo being now dead, he vented his Passion upon his Sons. He likewise caus'd the Bishops of Trani and Ostuni, with many other Prelates and Barons, to be seiz'd; and persisting in his Cruelty, he barbarously caus'd many of them to be burn'd, some hang'd, and the Eyes of others to be put out, and the unfortunate William's Testicles to be cut off. Pope Celestine upon hearing of this Cruelty, and likewise at the Desire of Eleonora Queen of England, the Mother of our Queen Dowager Joan, who wrote to the Pope for that Purpose³, sent an Apostolick Legate to expostulate this unheard-of Cruelty with him; but the Emperor undervalu'd all these Advices: And Roger Howenden, in his Annals, adds, that not content with having wreak'd his Barbarity upon the Living, he did not spare the Dead; for he caus'd the Bodies of King Tancred and his Son Roger to be rais'd, and the Royal Crowns with which they had been buried, to be taken away, saying, that they wore them by Usurpation. The Emperor Henry his Son, was of the very same Opinion; and therefore annul'd all the Acts, Privileges and Donations, and all other Contracts made in the Names of these Princes, looking upon them as Tyrants and Usurpers, and not lawful Princes, but he always call'd Roger and William his Predecessors.

BUT this Year 1195, while Henry was thus employ'd in Sicily, Constantia left Germany, and on her way to Sicily, in the City of Esi in Marca d'Ancona, brought forth a Son, who, perhaps, as a Presage of what was to happen, or rather an Inducement to Virtue, was call'd after his two Grandfathers, Frederick Roger, by some, Roger Frederick. This Hero, according to the Chronicle of Monte Cassino, Riccardo da S. Germano, and Albertus Abbot of Stade, was Born this Year 1195⁴, and in this obscure City of Marca d'Ancona; so that the Place of his Nativity had a great Resemblance with that of his Death, which was Florentino, likewise an obscure Place of Puglia. *Inveges*⁵, who by all means will have him to have been born in Palermo, follows the Opinion of the Moderns, contrary to that of Riccardo da S. Germano, and the most antient Writers; and upon a false Supposition, that Constantia and Henry had been crown'd in Palermo in the Year 1194, it appears incredible to him, that she could be brought to Bed in Esi the Year following. And he is certainly in the Right on it, but Constantia did not go to Sicily till this Year 1195, as these antient Historians relate. He was born when his Mother Constantia was but 37, or at most 39 Years of Age; and being born amidst the Inconveniencies of a Journey, that he might not be expos'd to greater Dangers, his Mother gave him to be nurs'd by the Dutcheſs of Spoletto, and the Care of him was committed to her and Alberto, by some call'd Corrado, Duke of Spoletto, and Count of Aſſiſi, her Husband¹, who three Years after caus'd him solemnly to be baptiz'd in the City of Aſſiſi, in the Presence of fifteen Bishops, and many Cardinals, and he was nam'd Frederick Roger, after his Great-Grandfathers. This Solemnity in Presence of so great a Number of Cardinals, and other Prelates, after so long a Delay, and the idle Story spread amongst the Common People, of his being a Supposititious Child, gave Rise to that fabulous Story written by Granzius, in a Book which he compos'd concerning the Metropolis of Saxony, from whom other Modern Writers have taken it, that the Empress, by reason of her old Age, being past Childbearing, and according to these Writers 55, or as some of them will have it, 60 Years of Age, was brought to Bed of Frederick in a Tent on the Middle of the Market-Place, in Presence of all the Women of the Town, that had a mind to see her; and that in order to remove all Suspicion, on her way to Palermo, she travell'd with her Breast naked, and expos'd dropping Milk, as the Author of the Preface to the Capitula of the Kingdom of Sicily does not stick to write. For removing the Suspicion the Vulgar had conceiv'd, that the Child was Supposititious, Pope Celestine, before he would invest Frederick with the Kingdom of Sicily, was forc'd to make Constantia swear, that he was begotten by her Husband Henry; and the Reason of this Oath, was not that she was look'd upon as past Childbearing for old Age, but to smother the Report of the Imposture spread among the Vulgar; and when Marcovaldus d'Amenuder, was making War against Frederick in Sicily, he wrote to Pope Innocent, who had succeeded Celestine, that he would clearly prove the Imposture; the good Pope, who thought the Mother's Oath sufficient Proof, would give no Ear to Marcovaldus, but rejected his Offer. Whence proceeded the Story afterwards of Constantia's being so old, that she was past Childbearing when she brought forth Frederick, and of her being bred up from a Child in the Monastery of the Greek Nuns of S. Basil in Palermo, with other fabulous Stories, which we have already disprov'd.

IN the mean Time the Emperor Henry, after he had invested Mosca in Cervello with the County of Molise, which had been taken from Mandra, who, being expell'd the Kingdom, died soon after, resolving to return to Germany, went to Puglia, and call'd an Assembly, where Constantia was present, who shortly after return'd to Sicily, and Henry set out for Germany, and carried William and all the Prisoners abovenam'd along with him, whose Liberties Pope Celestine had in vain solicited. He likewise took with him all the Gold and Jewels he could lay hold of; and robb'd the Treasure and Furniture of the Royal Palace, consisting of Vessels of the purest Gold and Silver, Foot-stools, Bedsteads, and Tables of the same Metal, and Cloth of Gold and Purple, amass'd by the former Kings; with which he loaded a Hundred and fifty Beasts of Burden. Thus did the Sicilians see the Spoils of their Kingdom carried off like those of a conquer'd People, by a foreign and rapacious Enemy. These and greater Miseries which the Sicilians suffer'd by the Germans, and Henry their Master, Ugone Falcando, in the Preamble to his History dedicated to Pietro Archbishop of Messina, laments and describes at large.

AFTER Henry was gone for Germany, Riccardo di Medania Count of Cerra, Brother-in-Law to the late King Tancred, on his way to Campania di Roma, whither he was going to shun Henry's Cruelty, being betray'd by a Fryar, was made Prisoner by Diepoldus Alemannus, who kept him closely shut up in the Castle of Arce, till the Emperor should return to Italy in order to deliver him up to him. In the mean Time Henry sent the Bishop of Worms his Ambassador, who was no sooner arriv'd at the City of Naples, accompanied with the Abbot Roffredo, and many Soldiers, both Natives and Germans, than he caus'd the Walls of the City to be levell'd with the Ground; and according to *Riccardo da S. Germano*¹, Capua had the same Fate. And the Emperor having assembled a vast Army in Germany, consisting of Suevians, Bavarians, Franconians, and other Nations, to the Number of Sixty thousand, under pretence to send them on an Expedition beyond Sea, but in reality, according to Arnoldus Lubecensis, to exterminate all the Normans, and particularly those, who had sided with King Tancred against him, he came into Italy, and after some Days stay in Ferentino, he march'd to Capua, where having caus'd all the Barons to be conven'd to hold a General Assembly, Diepoldo Alemanno deliver'd up to him Count Riccardo, whom he shamefully caus'd to be tied to a Horse's Tail, and dragg'd through all the most dirty Streets, and at last hung up by the Feet; and after he had liv'd for two Days in this Torment, the Emperor order'd a German Buffoon to tie a Rope, with a great Stone made fast to it, about his Neck, and in this manner he was cruelly strangled². Then the Emperor held his Parliament, and laid a Tax upon all the People of the Kingdom, and made Diepoldo Alemanno Count of Cerra, and sent Oddo, Diepoldo's Brother, to besiege Roccaficca, to which Rinaldo and Landolfo, two Brothers of the Family of Aquino, had fled to defend themselves against so cruel an Enemy, and then he went to Sicily, where he caus'd all the Normans to be put to Death after cruel and different manners, not sparing the very Children; and to be reveng'd of those Normans of the first Rank, and Royal Blood, who had had a hand in the Crowning of King Tancred, he caus'd Crowns to be nail'd to their Heads, till in that cruel manner they died. He likewise imprison'd Margaritone a famous Captain, Duke of Durazzo, Prince of Taranto, and High Admiral, and order'd his Eyes to be put out, and his Testicles to be cut off.

THE Empress Constantia seeing her Husband treating her Normans in this barbarous and cruel manner, and his wicked Inclination bent to extinguish her Royal Race, not able to bear such malicious Doings, revolted from him³; and having combin'd with the Chief Men of the Kingdom, and laid hold of the Royal Treasure, she rais'd an Army against him; whereupon the Barons became more bold, openly revolted, and kill'd all the Germans that fell in their way, and they would not have spar'd the Emperor himself, if he had not fled and taken shelter in a strong Castle. But he resolving to go to a more secure Place, was so besieg'd on all Sides by the Sicilians, that, not able to make his Escape, to extricate himself from the Danger he was in, he agreed to whatever Conditions his Wife should be pleas'd to impose upon him; she order'd, that upon his being set at Liberty, notwithstanding the Marriage Contract, he should immediately repair to Germany. But he, unwilling to put a Stop to the foreign Expeditions which he intended, order'd Matters so, that at last he was reconcil'd to his Wife and the disaffected Barons; whereupon he imbark'd his great Army in a numerous Fleet for Syria, which struck great Terror into Alexius Angelus, who had dethron'd his Brother Isaac, and was now Emperor of Constantinople; for having sent Ambassadors to tell Alexius, that he must restore all the Country which King William had formerly conquer'd in Greece, which reach'd from Epidaurus to Thessalonica, or pay him what Tribute he should impose upon him; the Greek Prince, terrified at the Power of the Emperor Henry, durst not refuse the Condition offer'd; but only begg'd to have the yearly Payment moderated; and sent some Persons well skill'd in such Matters over all his Empire, to collect all the Gold that could be got, not only from private Men, but also from the Churches, and not to spare the Sacred Vessels, and the Sepulchres of the Dead, in which, according to the Custom of those Times, great Sums of Money were laid in Honour of the Persons buried therein; till they had made up fifteen Talents, the Sum demanded by Henry.

WHILE these Matters were transacting in Greece, the Imperial Army set sail for the East, and was commanded by Conrade Bishop of Idelma, and Chancellor of the Empire, who in the Emperor's Absence had govern'd in Sicily, and after a prosperous Voyage landed at Acon in Palestine.

ABOUT the same Time, when the Emperor was besieging Castel Giovanni, which had revolted, being taken ill, he retir'd to Messina, where his Sickness increas'd to that Degree, that soon after, on the 29th of September 1197, he departed this Life¹; his Cruelty made the News of his Death not only acceptable to the Emperor of Constantinople, who dreaded him much, but likewise to all the People of Sicily and Puglia.

HENRY, according to Goffredo da Viterbo, was a Man of a genteel and noble Appearance, but his wicked Actions shew'd him to be of a faulty Disposition of Mind, cruel, perjur'd, and faithless, most covetous of Money, and an Enemy to the Popes, by whom he was excommunicated for making Richard King of England Prisoner, and taking Money for his Ransom, and for seizing Niccolo d' Ajello Archbishop of Salerno; and dying under the Censures of the Church, he was not buried in holy Ground. But from his last Will, which was afterwards found, and as soon as he fell sick, his having sent the Bishop of Bethune to King Richard, with the Money he had paid for his Ransom², it's evident that he repented him of his by-past Misdeeds.

AFTER his Death, the Empress Constantia immediately sent the Archbishop of Messina to the Pope, to beg of him to allow her to bury his Body in the Church; and likewise, that he would give Orders to raise the Siege of Marca di Guarniero, wherein Marcwaldus of Menuder, a German, and Chief Justice of the Empire, was closely besieg'd by the Romans; and that moreover, he would cause her Son Frederick to be crown'd King of Sicily, and give him the usual Investiture³. To the first Request, the Pope answer'd, that the Emperor's Body could not be buried till all Matters were accommodated with the King of England. To the Second, that Marcwaldus could not be reliev'd without the Consent of the Romans; and to the Third, that Frederick should be crown'd King of Sicily, provided his Brethren the Cardinals would likewise give their Consent: When they consented, the Coronation was order'd to be perform'd, upon Payment of a thousand Marks of Silver to the Pope, and as much to the Cardinals; and besides, the Pope oblig'd Constantia to swear upon the Holy Evangelists, that Frederick was born in lawful Wedlock contracted betwixt her and Henry.

THE Emperor before he died made a Will, part of which is recorded by Baronius in his Annals, which he says he gathered from the Life of Pope Innocent sent him by Cardinal Carlo de Conti, found by him in the Archives of Avignon, while he was Legate there, written in a very antient Character; and it bears, that this Will was found among the Baggage of Marcwaldus after he had been defeated by the Romans, not in Marca d' Ancona, but in a Battle which we shall have occasion to mention in the following Book. And this Testament, full of Piety, shews that he repented him of his by-past Faults, and since he could make no other Reparation for them at the Point of Death, it lets us see that he was willing they should at least be mended by his Heir. By Virtue of which Will, according to Roger Hovenden's Annals of England, the greatest Part of Tuscany, which he and the preceding Emperors had taken, to wit, Acquapendente, Santa Crispina, Monte de Falisci, Radicosano, and S. Quirico, with all their Territories and Jurisdictions, and many other Places depending on the Pope, were restor'd to the Church by Constantia.

MATHEW PARIS likewise relates, that Henry left to the Friars of the Cistercian Monastery, Three thousand Marks of Silver out of the Money paid by King Richard of England, in order to make Censers for all that Order, but that the Abbot refus'd the Present, as unjustly acquir'd.

AT last Matters being adjusted with England, the Pope consented that Henry's Body should be buried, which was accordingly done in the Cathedral Church of Palermo, under a rich Tomb of Porphyry, which is to be seen at this Day. His Army, which not long before his Death arriv'd in Palestine, under the Command of Bishop Conrade, hearing of his Death, and that Saladin's Son was come into Palestine against them, were so struck with the bad News, that though the Soldiers were dispos'd to stand their Ground and fight gallantly, yet all the principal Officers, except the Bishops of Verdun and Mentz, shamefully fled; the Bishop of Mentz, by Order of the Pope, went afterwards and crown'd the King of Armenia, who had earnestly desir'd it.

BUT now, after all these Transactions, Pope Celestine, after he had govern'd the Church Seven Years, died in Rome the Sixth Day of January, in the Year 1198, and Giovanna Lotario, Cardinal of St. Sergius, of noble Birth, not above Thirty Years of Age, of a most courteous Behaviour, and the greatest Scholar and Lawyer of his Time, was elected in his Place, and call'd Innocent III.

C H A P. II.

*The Empress Constantia takes the Government of the Kingdom.
Her Death ; and an End of the Royal Race of the Normans.*

IN the mean time the Empress Constantia, seeing how much the German Soldiers, and their Commander in Chief Marcovaldus, a Man of a dissolute Life, extreamly Cruel and Rapacious, were hated by her Subjects, for the Quiet of her Kingdom, dismiss'd them, with Orders to march forthwith out of Puglia and Sicily, and never to return without her Liberty¹ ; whereupon they all march'd away, and Marcovaldus went to the County of Molise, which Henry had given him on the Death of Mosca in Cervello, and that he might not be molested by the inrag'd Natives, or stopp'd by Pietro Count of Celano, or the Cardinals, who stay'd in the Kingdom, the Empress gave him a safe Conduct or Pass ; and having left Castellains in the Forts of the said County, he went to Marca d'Ancona, of which he had been made Marquis by Henry, where he remain'd till Constantia died, and then return'd to Puglia, where he did much Mischiefe, as shall be told.

AS soon as Innocent III. was crown'd Pope, he left no Stone unturn'd to get Queen Sibilia, her Son William, and her Daughters, Niccolo Archbishop of Salerno, his Brothers, and the other Sicilian Barons and Natives, set at Liberty ; for though the Emperor was dead, yet they were still kept Prisoners in Germany ; and for that end he sent Three Letters, the first directed to the Archbishops of Spires, Strasburg and Worms, wherein he enjoin'd them to excommunicate all those who had a Hand in keeping the Archbishop of Salerno Prisoner, if they did not forthwith set him at Liberty, and send him honourably to Rome ; and likewise to excommunicate the whole Province in which he was Prisoner : the Second was to the Bishop of Sutri, and the Abbot of St. Anastatius, ordering them to absolve Philip Duke of Savoy, Henry's Brother, from the Excommunication he had incurr'd, for having invaded and possess'd the Estate of the Church, provided he would procure the Liberty of the foresaid Prelate : and the Third was to the said Bishops and Abbot, injoining them, that if Queen Sibilia, William and his Sisters, and all the other Prisoners were not reliev'd from Prison, to excommunicate all those that should detain them, and interdict their Baronies². Therefore Duke Philip, who had married Irene the Greek, Widow of young Roger King of Sicily, mov'd with Compassion for these unfortunate Ladies, and also in Obedience to Pope Innocent, set them at Liberty, and sent them to the Pope in Rome, except William, who had died a little before in Prison ; but what became of them afterwards, and of Walter Duke of Brenna, who married one of these Ladies, and with arm'd Force enter'd Terra di Lavoro, shall be related in the following Book of this History. The Archbishop of Salerno, and the Counts Riccardo and Ruggiero his Brothers, likewise got their Liberty, return'd to Salerno, and liv'd long after.

I N the mean time the Empress caus'd her Son Frederick, who was still in the Hands of the Duke of Spoletto, to be conducted to Sicily by the Counts of Celano and Loreto; and shortly after she demanded of the Pope the Investiture for herself and Frederick, which he stiffly refus'd, not willing to give it in the same Manner that Pope Adrian gave it to William I. and though Constantia offer'd to reward him liberally, yet he was unmoveable, unless Four Articles, of which we shall speak hereafter, formerly stipulated with King William, were annull'd, to which the Queen consented, and got the Investiture of the Kingdom for herself and Son, from the Hands of the Cardinal of Ostia, who went to Palermo as Legate of the Holy Church, where he crown'd them both, and took their Oath of Fealty, and a Promise of a yearly Quit-rent of 600 Schifati for Puglia and Calabria, and of 400 for Marfia. Baronius has recorded this Investiture, wherein are the following Words: Quoniam Regnum Siciliae in Apostolicae sedis fide adhuc permansit, & Rogerius quondam pater tuus, & Willielmus frater, & Willielmus nepos Reges Apostolicam Sedem, & Praedecessores nostros summa constantia coluerunt, &c. contedimus Regnum Siciliae, Ducatum Apuliae, & Principatum Capuae, Neapolim, Salernum, Amalfim, Marfiam, cum iis quae ad horum singula pertinent. 'Tis likewise recorded by *Chioccarelli*¹ and *Rainaldo*², and related by Innocent III. himself in one of his Letters³. Innocent also wrote a Letter or Brief, prescribing to her the Method she was to observe in the Election of Bishops over all her Dominions, much restricting that Authority, which by virtue of the antient Privileges and Agreements, made betwixt William I. and Pope Adrian, the Kings of Sicily had in these Elections; of which we shall have occasion to discourse, when we come to treat of the Ecclesiastical Polity: Wherefore Frederick II. was wont to complain, that Innocent had trick'd his Mother when he was a Child; but that he would not in the least suffer the antient Rights and Privileges of the Kings of Sicily to be diminish'd; which made him odious to the Popes, and was one of the Causes of the many Jars and Wars, with which Europe was long afflicted, as shall be related in the following Books of this History.

B U T the Empress Constantia, the last of the lawful Heirs of King Roger, falling sick in Palermo, departed this Life on the Fifth Day of December 1198. She was buried in the Cathedral Church of the same City, under a Tomb of Porphyry, close by her Husband, and the Inscription, according to *Baronius*⁴, ingraven by the Direction of a certain Ruggiero Paruta, a Canon of Palermo, not well acquainted with the Truth of her History, contains the fabulous Story of her being a Nun, and old when she was married to Henry.

C O N S T A N T I A, by most wicked and pernicious Advice, in her last Will, which she made Two Days before she died, left the Care and Guardianship of her Son and his Kingdom to Innocent III. This Deed not only occasion'd terrible Disorders, and pav'd a Way for the Popes in many Things, to incroach upon the Kingdom, as may be seen in the following Book; but likewise was the Foundation of their other pretended Claim of their being Administrators of the Kingdom, during the Minority of the Kings, even though they were not appointed Guardians by the preceding Prince, they pretending that it belongs to them by Right, as direct Lords, which Clement IV. actually made a special Condition in the Investiture which he gave to Charles of Anjou; and in the Course of this History we shall find many Disorders and Debates in this our Kingdom, on account of these Pretensions.

T H U S in Constantia, ended the Royal Race of the Normans, which, from the Year 1130, when Roger assum'd the Crown in Palermo, had gloriously govern'd the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily with Royal Title, the Space of Sixty-eight Years: Princes, who, for their noble and commendable Actions, are worthy of glorious and immortal Memory, who, in the middle of Two Empires, establish'd in Italy the most powerful and noble Kingdom that was in these Times in all Europe; and under Roger, and the Two Williams, made both the West, and the utmost Parts of the East to tremble. However, the Norman Blood was not quite extinguish'd in these our Provinces. There remain'd many Barons and Norman Counts, who, for a long Series of Years transmitted their Counties and illustrious Blood to their Posterity ; and on good Grounds, some of our Barons at present boast of their Descent from so renown'd and noble a Stock. And at the same Time we see how so famous a Kingdom, after the Death of Constantia, the last of that illustrious House, pass'd from the Normans to the Suevi. With the Death of Constantia, after we have related the Ecclesiastical Polity of this Century, we shall put an End to this Book, for the great and glorious Actions of Frederick her Son, calling us to more noble and famous Enterprizes, will furnish very ample and bright Matter for the following Books of this History.

C H A P. III.

The Ecclesiastick Polity of these our Provinces throughout all the Twelfth Century, to the Reign of the Suevi.

IN this Century the Ecclesiastick State made a more shining and bright Figure than ever. The Popes, exalted above all the Kings of the Earth, extended their Power over all Kingdoms and Provinces ; and the very Kings thought it their greatest Honour to own themselves their Vassals, and render their Kingdoms tributary to the Apostolick See ; for the Popes had made themselves Sovereigns in Rome, and disclaim'd all Dependence upon the Emperors ; and they made good their Pretension of making Emperors. Rome was become the general Court, to which not only all Ecclesiastical, but also Civil Causes, from all the Dominions of Europe were carried, and the Princes, with great Submission, were at the Beck of the Roman Pontiffs ; and in the Time of Innocent III. the Papacy was at its highest pitch of Grandeur. For the most part Councils were call'd by the Popes, or their Legates, wherein they made such Regulations, as they judg'd most conducive to their Grandeur ; and the Bishops were only to give their Consent. Appeals of all kinds, and from all Persons, were become so frequent, that there was no Affair whatsoever, but was immediately carried to Rome. The Popes had, for the most part, ingross'd the conferring of Bishopricks, because they were Judges of the Validity of Elections, though these belong'd to the Clergy, as the Ordinations did to the Metropolitans. For this end they exalted the Dignity of the Cardinals to that degree, that they were look'd upon not only as superior to Bishops, but also to Patriarchs and Primates ; and especially they confin'd the Power of electing the Pope to them. In order to demonstrate their unlimited Power, and at the same time to make advantage by it, there was nothing could happen, for which Dispensations were not easily obtain'd at Rome, which so enervated the Ecclesiastical Discipline, that it provok'd St. Bernard to declaim against the Abuse of these Dispensations, as one of the great Corruptions introduc'd into the Church.

BUT above all, what rais'd the Papacy to the Pinacle of its Glory, was, that all Disputes that happen'd betwixt the Princes of Europe, and Controversies among the greatest States, were referr'd to Rome, to be decided by the Pope, of which the many Letters and Decretals of Innocent III. are flagrant Proofs. The Kings of England, France and Spain, paid most profound Obedience to that See. The most important Affairs of their Kingdoms were manag'd by Prelates. In the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, the Archbishops of Palermo, Salerno, Messina, Catania, and many other Ecclesiasticks, had the Direction of the most weighty Affairs of the Crown. The most conspicuous Embassies were intrusted to them; and they had the Charge of the King's Household. They were of the King's Council, and gave their Advice in Matters of the greatest Consequence.

THEFORE they neglected the spiritual Government of their Churches, and only minded the Affairs of State, and acquir'd to their Churches Jurisdictions, Prerogatives and Honours, but especially temporal Riches; and by the Favour of Princes, their judicial Power was enlarg'd; for the Bishops being commonly of the King's Council, was the Cause of a vast Addition to the Authority of the Episcopal Courts; and we have seen, that the Archbishop of Palermo obtain'd from King William, that the Ecclesiastical Judges should take Cognizance of the Crime of Adultery; and the Empress Constantia Queen of Sicily, directed an Edict to the Counts, Justices, Barons, Chamberlains and Bailiffs of the Diocess of Penne, in which she expressly prohibits them to take Cognizance of the Crimes of Adultery, but to leave them to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction; and if there had been Violence made use of in committing the Crime, the Ecclesiastical Judge was to take Cognizance of the Adultery, and the secular Magistrate of the Violence, which we read in the Edict dated in Palermo, in the Year 1197, and recorded by Ughellus in his *Italia Sacra*¹. Besides, the Ecclesiasticks as more learn'd than the Laicks, were look'd upon as more fit, and better qualified to administer Justice, whence the People were easily induc'd to submit to them as Judges, and moreover, the Church not having the Power to condemn to Death, nor even to Fine, every body, in order to be more gently treated, did not only not decline, but desir'd to be subject to her Judgment. But what most contributed to the Increase of their Power, was, that Kings, Princes and Judges did not mind their judicial Power, looking on it rather as burdensome than lucrative; because they officiated Gratis, and could exact no Emoluments from the Parties, as now a Days. And more than that, when there happen'd any Struggle about Jurisdiction, the Ecclesiasticks fulminated Excommunications, as may be inferr'd from a Custom then among us, of excommunicating all those who oppos'd the Jurisdiction of the Church, every Sunday at Mass.

THUS the Authority of the Spiritual or Episcopal Courts arriv'd at its Height: The Bishops at first, charitably interpos'd their good Offices, in making up Differences among the Faithful, by way of amicable Composition; afterwards, by the Favour of Princes, they acquir'd Jurisdiction, and a Privilege to administer Justice to contending Parties: In process of Time, to ease themselves of this Trouble, they appointed Officers to administer Justice, and erected Tribunals with proper Judges, and constituted Clerks or Notaries to ingross their Proceedings; and in fine, thinking it too burthensome to teach the Mysteries of the Christian Faith, or administer in holy Things themselves, they establish'd Professors of Theology, to teach in the Cathedral Churches; and thus freeing themselves from the Performance of their sacred Offices; they gave themselves up intirely to Secular, Political and State Affairs. Hence it was necessary to provide the Episcopal Court with a new Body of Ecclesiastical Laws; this gave Rise to Gratian's Decree, for the better establishing the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and the Papal Grandeur.

New Collections of Canons, and Gratian's Decree.

THE Collections, which were made in the preceding Century, were the first, wherein the Canons are distributed according to the Subjects; but were almost all polluted with the many fabulous Stories of Isidore inserted among them. Burcardus Bishop of Worms, compos'd one divided into Twenty Books, which he intitled intitl'd Magnum Canonum Volumen ¹. There's another attributed to Anselm Bishop of Lucca; but though it bears his Name, yet another must have been Author of it; for it contains some Decrees of Urban II. and of other Popes his Successors, who liv'd after Anselm ². There's another of Adiodatus Cardinal of St. Eudoxia, made about the Year 1087, at the Command of Victor III. ³. The other of Gregory the Priest, intitl'd Polycarpus, and that of Bernardo di Pavia, intitl'd, Populetum, have never been printed, but are preserv'd in Manuscript in the Vatican Library ⁴. But that which Ivo of Chartres compil'd about the End of the preceding Century, eclips'd all the others. He divided it into Seventeen Parts, and intitl'd it Decretum. As for the other, intitl'd Pannomia or Pannormia, attributed to the same Ivo, there are some, who make Hugo a Catalan, Author of it ⁵. These were the most famous Collections in these Times, and which our Churches made use of, till that so noted one of Gratian appear'd, which obscured all the rest, and was receiv'd with such Applause by the Canonists, that it was publicly taught in the Schools, and in a short Time had so many Commentators, that it was look'd upon as the principal Part of the Canon Law.

GRATIAN was a Monk of the Order of St. Benedict, who, in the Pontificate of Alexander III. taught Divinity in Bologna. He was born in Chiufi, a City of Tuscany, and it was reported that he was begotten in Adultery, and Peter Lombard, call'd Magister Sententiarum, and Peter Comestor, a Writer of Scholastick History, were said to be his Brothers, begotten the same Way; 'tis likewise said, that their Mother could never be brought to repent her of the Adulteries committed in begetting them, but said she was well pleas'd, that she had brought into the World Three famous great Men; and though her Confessor rebuk'd her, yet not able to prevail upon her, he at last injoin'd her, at least to express her Sorrow for her want of Repentance. But Guido Pancirolus ⁶ confutes all this Story as fabulous, especially, because they were not of the same Country, for Gratian was born in Chiufi, Peter Lombard in Novara, and Comestor in France.

GRATIAN compil'd this Collection in Bologna, in the Monastery of St. Felice, about the Year 1151, in the Pontificate of Eugen III. ⁷, and intitl'd it Concordia discordantium Canonum, and divided it into Three Parts. The first contains the Principles, and what regards the Canon Law in general, and the Rights and Privileges of Ecclesiastical Persons, under the Title of Distinctiones. The second contains the Decision of fundry particular Cases, by the help of which, many Questions are solv'd; and it's intitl'd Causæ. The third has for Title, De Consecratione, because it treats of what belongs to the Ecclesiastical Ministry, the Sacraments, Rites, Ordinations, and Consecrations. He presented it to Pope Eugen, but it does not appear that he confirm'd it; yet though it was not approv'd of by a publick Law of the Popes, it had both Authority and Force. It was receiv'd with so great Applause, that the Popes themselves made use of it, and tacitly promoted it, in order to raise their own Authority, and pull down that of the Emperor and other Princes; whence, in the Time of Frederick Barbarossa, arose the Decretists of the Guelf Faction, who stood up for the Pope, in opposition to the Ghibellins ⁸. Though this Work be so erroneous, immethodical, and confus'd, that the Industry and Care of many famous Professors have not been able to polish and clear it altogether ⁹; yet for all that, it gain'd so much Authority, that it engag'd all the learn'd Men, and greatest Divines of these Times to comment on it, and explain it; and its Authority was of great Weight in the Courts of Justice; insomuch that Gratian was commonly call'd the Master; and his Decree was publicly taught in the Academies, and those who taught it, were adorn'd with the Title of Doctor, which Dignity was conferr'd by the means of a Rod, whence they were first call'd Batchelors ¹⁰. The Opinion which the Academy of Bologna had of it, likewise added to its Authority, which Academy in those Times, was more noted than all those of Italy or France; besides, the great Number of Glossators made it famous.

THE first of these were Lorenzo da Crema, Vincenzo Castiglione, a great Canonist of Milan, and Ugone de Vercelli. These were follow'd by Tancredi da Corneto, Archdeacon of Bologna, who about the Year 1220. made his Glosses there; Sinibaldo Pieschi, who was afterwards Pope under the Name of Innocent IV. and Giovanni Semeca, call'd Teutonico, who improv'd all the former Glosses, and adding his own, did by the Decree, what Accursius did by the Pandects¹. There appear'd afterwards a vast Number of other Glossators, such as Bernardo Bottone, Goffredo, Egidio da Bologna, and others; among which Bartolomeo da Brescia, a Disciple of Vincenzo Castiglione, excell'd, who about the Year 1256, added his own Glosses to those of Giovanni Teutonico, which he corrected, improv'd, and in many Parts alter'd. When Gregory XIII. order'd Gratian's Decree to be reform'd, the Roman Expurgators had a great deal of Work upon their Hands, not only in purging the Body of the Decree, but likewise in clearing it from the Multitude of Absurdities, which these Canonist Glossators had added to it; whence the Proverb, *Magnus Canonista, magnus Asinista*².

IT was thought in these Times, that Gratian's Decree was sufficient to raise the Pontifical Authority to the highest Pitch it was capable of; but in process of Time, as Things alter'd, this Work fell short of their Expectation; so that the Decretal succeeded the Decree, which likewise came short of the Design; but from Time to Time as the Authority of the Popes increas'd, new Rules were made; whence, in Emulation of the Body of the Civil Law, they made the Decree answer to the Pandects; the Decretal to the Code, &c. and that nothing might be wanting, Paul IV. order'd Gio. Paolo Lanceletto, in Imitation of Justinian's Institutions, to compile the Canonical Institutions, which he did. Thus we see how, and in what manner one Empire was founded in the Heart of another.

The Election of Bishops and Abbots.

IN this Century the Power of the Popes with respect to the Creation of Bishops and Abbots was at its Zenith; for tho' the Election was left to the Clergy and Monks, and the Right that Princes had to give their Assent was not openly disputed, yet the Popes having made themselves Judges of the Validity of all Elections, the Court of Rome contriv'd Means, by which the Collations of Bishopricks and Abbacies were often given in Rome. For which end, many Conditions were made necessary before the Election; others in the Time of Election, and an infinite Number of Qualities were requisite in the Person elected; to which was added, that when any of these Conditions was not observ'd, the Electors were to lose their Power of electing, which devolv'd to Rome. On which account, and for diverse other Reasons and Considerations, it frequently happen'd, that Difficulties were started about the Validity of the Elections, and one of the Parties appeal'd to Rome, where both were generally cast, and the Election made void, and the Bishoprick or Abbacy for that Time was dispos'd of by the Pope.

BESIDES, when it was known at Rome that any fat Bishoprick or Abbacy was vacant, an Order was immediately dispatch'd, by which it was injoin'd, that the Election should not be made till the Pope was acquainted; and under a specious Pretence of assisting and preventing Disorders that might happen, a Person was sent to be present, and preside in the Election, by whose Means and Management, the Election fell to him who was most for the Interest of Rome. For these Reasons few Elections to Bishopricks or Abbacies pass'd, that were not examin'd in Rome; by which Means the Popes had a Hand in almost all Elections, under the plausible Pretence of Devolution for the Good of the Publick; because the Ordinary Electors had fail'd in their Duty. These Measures made use of according to the Exigency of Cases, were not in these Times so establish'd, as to have the Force of Law, but were rather Customs that might be born with, till Gregory IX. having collected all the Rescripta which serv'd for the Grandeur of Rome, and applied to general Use, what was intended for one particular Place, and, perhaps, one special Case, publish'd his Decretal, which laid the Foundation of, and establish'd the Roman Monarchy.

THE Popes pretended to exercise this very same Superiority over our Churches and Monasteries, and to intrench upon the Share which our Princes had in Elections, and endeavour'd to exclude them from their Assent requisite in Elections. But William I. in the Peace made with Pope Adrian, secur'd this Prerogative by Stipulation; by Virtue of which, as we have elsewhere observ'd, the King's Assent was made absolutely necessary in all Elections, insomuch, that if the King was not pleas'd with the Elected, and did not give his Assent, he could neither be inducted nor consecrated¹.

BUT they did not fail to say in Rome, that this Agreement betwixt William and Adrian, was extorted by Force, while the Pope was over-aw'd by William's Army; so that upon any favourable Opportunity, taking Advantage of the good Nature, or Weakness of some Prince, under the specious Pretence of preventing Disorders, or that our Princes made a bad use of this Prerogative, the Popes exerted themselves, and pretended, that this Prerogative was only a Courtesy granted by the Apostolick See, and that they had e'en best make a good Use of it, otherwise it would be taken from them. And in the Reign of William the Good, when this Prince made use of this Right in the Election of the Bishop of Agrigentum, he was blam'd, as having gone out of his Sphere, and we find a Letter among those of *Peter of Blois*², directed to the King of Sicily's Chaplain, wherein the Pope complains, that the King had made a Brother of the Count of Loritello Bishop of Agrigentum, contrary to the Voice of the Chapter, and enjoins him, as in Duty bound, to admonish the King not to impose an unworthy Person on that Church.

BUT when the Kingdom of Sicily fell into the Hands of a Woman, Queen Constantia, then Innocent III. thought it was a proper Opportunity to get the Agreement betwixt Pope Adrian and William I. alter'd: In the first Place he declar'd, that he would not give the Investiture of the Kingdom, if these Articles were not moderated, and Constantia was actually forc'd to please him; and though, in the Investiture which he gave her and her young Son, he left them their Right of Assent, yet he in a manner tied them down to give it, whenever it was sought, and the Election canonically made³.

BUT Innocent not content with this, thought fit to give Directions, and prescribe Rules concerning the Elections in these Kingdoms, and by a particular Brief, dated the 19th of November 1198. and directed to Constantia, he orders the Method of proceeding in the Elections thus, That upon the Vacancy of a See, the Chapter shall acquaint the King with the Death of the Prelate, and afterwards being met, shall proceed to the Election of a qualify'd Person, and after the Election, the Person shall be declared to the King, and his Assent requir'd; and before the King's Assent is requir'd, the Elect shall neither be inducted, nor the Song of Thanksgiving sung; neither must he presume to intermeddle with the Administration⁴ till he be confirm'd by the Pope. He afterwards sent the like Briefs to all the Archbishops, Bishops, Prelates, and Clergy of the Churches of the Kingdom, to inform them of what he had

Sed antequam Assensus Regius requiratur, non inthronizetur Electus, nec decanetur laudis solemnitas, quæ inthronizationi viderur annexa: Nec antequam auctoritate Ponteficali fuerit confirmatus, administrationi se ullatenus immiscebit. settled with Constantia concerning Elections; which Brief we likewise find among Innocent's Letters ¹.

WHEN Constantia died in the Year 1199, and left the same Innocent Guardian both of her young Son and the Kingdom, the Regal as well as Papal Power was lodg'd in his Person, so that he could manage Elections as he thought fit; but however, during his Guardianship, the Assent was no ways prejudic'd, for Innocent gave it in all Elections, and declar'd that he did it Vice Regia, or as Guardian of the young King, which is clear from his Letters directed to the Chapter and Canons of Capua, for the Election of their Bishop: to the Chapter of Reggio: to the Chapter of Peune; and others ². And the same Method was observ'd, not only during the Guardianship of Innocent, but also when Frederick first began to take the Administration upon himself, and was in Friendship with Innocent; and in Rainald ³, we read a Diploma of his directed to Innocent, drawn up in Messina in the Year 1211, whereby he prescribes the Method of Elections, and it is much the same with what Innocent had prescrib'd to Constantia.

BUT when Frederick was grown up to Man's Estate, and better inform'd than the Popes wish'd, he began to find out the Alterations made in the Agreement betwixt Pope Adrian and William I. by Innocent, and complain'd of the Injury done to his Prerogative; and that Innocent, having to do with a Woman, and a Minor, had reduc'd the Assent necessarily requir'd in all Elections, to a meer Ceremony, which must be given upon Demand, seeing he set himself up as Judge of all the Reasons that were alledg'd for the other Side.

THE Stiffness of Innocent and his Successors in asserting their Claim, and the Steadiness of Frederick in denying it, and maintaining, that he could refuse his Assent when he pleas'd to all Elections, and render them null when he thought fit, gave Rise, not only to the Contentions and bitter Disputes which arose afterwards betwixt this Prince and Gregory, Honorius, Celestine, and especially Innocent IV. Successors of this Innocent, but likewise to the grievous Disorders of our Churches; for Frederick often making a bad Use of this Prerogative, rejected the Elections, and was never satisfied till the Person he had nam'd was elected. The Popes on the other Hand rais'd against such Incroachments, and inveigh'd bitterly against Frederick for disposing of the Ecclesiastical Dignities of the Kingdom as he thought fit, whereas the Elections ought to be free, and not forc'd; and some openly resisting the King's Will, oppos'd him so strenuously, that our Churches were often long without Pastors: Some Popes more bold, did not stick, in spite of the Emperor, to make void his Elections, and without asking his Advice, to provide the Churches. In the Pontificate of Innocent III. the Church of Policastro being vacant, Frederick rejected all Elections, in order to have Giacomo his Physician elected, which the Electors, tir'd and importun'd, were forc'd to grant him. But Pope Innocent being apply'd to, he declar'd Giacomo's Election void, and confirm'd the first in favour of another, for which end he wrote to the Bishop of Cappaccio, and the Abbot of the Monastery of Carva, to see it put in Execution ⁴. For the same Reasons Pope Gregory IX. check'd the Emperor very severely, and was constantly inveighing against him ⁵. But the Jars on this account betwixt him and Honorius III. were exasperated; for many Churches of these Provinces being vacant, such Quarrels were the Cause of their being long without Pastors, wherewith Frederick by all Means would provide them; at which the Pope was so nettled, that he wrote to him and reprimanded him in a very tart and bitter manner; but the Emperor, with equal Spirit and Boldness, disdain'd his Letters ⁶; whereupon Honorius, without minding him, or his Assent, provided the vacant Sees; he made the Bishops of Patti and Famagosta Archbishops of Capua and Salerno; the Abbot of S. Vincenzo a Vulturno Bishop of Brindisi; the Prior of S. Maria della Nova of Rome, Bishop of Consa; and the Archdeacon of Amalphi Bishop of Aversa ⁷. Frederick obstinately rejected these new Prelates, and would neither suffer them to get Induction nor Possession of these Sees. Upon which the Pope and the Emperor were more bitterly incens'd against one another: The excessive Disorders and Calamities that follow'd thereupon, shall be treated of at large in the subsequent Books of this History.

THE
CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of NAPLES.

BOOK XV.

THE Suevi, a People of Germany, who inhabited that Part of it on this Side of the Rhine, betwixt Franconia, Bavaria, and the Valley of Eno, and from whom the Dukedom of Suevia took its Name; came not to us by Way of Aggressors, like the Longobards; or as Pilgrims, in small Numbers, like the Normans, who had no other Right to conquer us, than what the Sword, and the Law of Arms gave them; but the Suevi came with their Duke the Emperor Henry, who had married Constantia, the last of the lawful Race of the Normans, and settled the Succession to these Kingdoms on his Son Frederick. This invincible Hero was descended of Frederick Stauffem, of a most noble Family, and a gallant Captain among the Suevi, to whom, on account of his noble Extraction and Bravery, the Emperor Henry IV. did not think it below him to give his Daughter Agnes in Marriage, and the Dukedom of Suevia for her Portion. 'Tis said, that Suevia of old was a Kingdom, but was since reduc'd to a Dukedom; and in our Time it likewise lost that Title; for at present no Prince of Germany has the Title of Suevia, because part of it is annex'd to the House of Austria, and part of it is possess'd by the Duke of Wittenberg; and many of its Cities are Free and Imperial, and many of them subject to the Duke of Bavaria. It reaches to the Alps, and borders upon Bavaria, Franconia, and Alsatia. Frederick, on his Wife Agnes, begot the Emperor Conrade II. who was Father of Frederick I. call'd Barbarossa, who was Father of Henry, who married Constantia, the Daughter of King Roger, by whom he had Frederick II. who, by Right of his Mother, became King of Sicily and Puglia. Wherefore, of all Nations, the Suevi boast of having the most lawful and just Title to these Kingdoms; and they justly complain, that by the Power and bad Offices of the Popes, they were taken from them, and transferr'd to the French of the House of Anjou.

P O P E Innocent III. following the same Foot-steps with his Predecessors, by his exquisite Management, had gain'd ground wonderfully upon these Kingdoms; for besides the Right of Investiture, he claim'd to be acknowledg'd direct Lord of them, in the same Manner as other Princes are Lords of the Fiefs of their Barons and Vassals; and consequently to exercise in them the Supreme Royal Prerogatives. He openly declar'd in his Letters, that the Property of these Kingdoms belong'd to the Apostolick See; and therefore, laying aside Constantia's Will, he reckon'd that the Guardianship of the young King and his Kingdom, of Right belong'd to him. But at first, by reason of Marcovaldus and the Sicilians, he conceal'd his Sentiments, and pretended to take the Charge as Guardian, by virtue of Constantia's Will; and therefore upon the News of the Empress's Death, and of her Will, he gladly accepted of the Guardianship, and immediately began to exercise it, by writing to the Archbishops of Palermo, Reggio and Monreale, and to the Bishop of Troja, who had the Care of the King's Person, that he had accepted of the Guardianship left him by the Empress Constantia, not only in Word, but in Deed¹. But the Deeds were such, as after Constantia's Death made it evident, that non tam tutelæ nomine, as Naucerus says², quam sui juris tuendi causa, Siciliam, & Apuliam administrabat.

I N the mean Time, Innocent sent Gregorio da Galgano Cardinal of St. Maria in Portico, his Legate to Sicily, to take the Government of the Island upon him; who, on his Arrival, tender'd the Oath of Fidelity to the abovesaid Archbishops, Bishops, &c. in the Name of Innocent. But that did not go well down with the Great Chancellor, and those of his Party, who would have no Superior in that Matter, so that they were soon at open Enmity with the Legate, and minded their own Conveniency more than the King's Advantage, which made the Cardinal Legate send Orders over all Sicily and Puglia, for every Person to acknowledge the Pope as their Governor, and the young King's Guardian, and then return'd to Rome.

O N the other Hand, Marcovaldus, who, as we have said, with all his Germans, was banish'd the Kingdom by Constantia, hearing of her Death, forthwith assembled a numerous Army of his Friends and Followers, and others whom he enlisted into his Service; and being aided by some native Barons, and by Guglielmo Caparone, Frederick and Diapoldus, and other Germans, to whom Henry had given Estates and Baronies in Puglia and Sicily, in a hostile Manner enter'd the Kingdom, and first attack'd the County of Molise (where he had many Castles still kept for him) and without the least Resistance, made himself Master of it. Then he sent to require Roffredo Abbot of Monte Cassino, to join him, and acknowledge him for Frederick's Guardian, as the Emperor Henry (so he pretended) had constituted him: But the Abbot perceiving that Marcovaldus's Intention was not to preserve, but to seize upon the young King's Inheritance, rejected his Message, excusing himself, that he had already sworn Obedience to the Pope as Guardian: Upon which Marcovaldus declar'd War against the Abbot, and this Year 1199, enter'd the Lands of the Abbey, and in an Instant took and burnt many Places belonging to it, and then laid Siege to St. Germano, whither the Abbot had gone to stand on his Defence³. Mean while Innocent sent Giovanni Galloia, a Roman, and Cardinal of St. Stefano in Montecelio, and Gerardo Allucingolo da Lucca, Cardinal of St. Adrian, into Terra di Lavoro, with Six hundred Soldiers under the Command of Landone da Montelongo, Governor of Campagna di Roma, who hearing, that Marcovaldus design'd to besiege St. Germano, conven'd another Body of Soldiers from Capua, and the neighbouring Castles, in order to oppose him; and having join'd the Abbot Roffredo, they were fully resolv'd to defend the Place. But soon after, Diopoldus, with a good Number of Germans, coming to Marcovaldus's Assistance, possess'd themselves of the Hill that overlooks the City, and forc'd the Besieg'd to abandon it, and retire to the Monastery of Monte Cassino; whereupon Marcovaldus having enter'd the deserted City, us'd the Inhabitants, both Men and Women, in a most barbarous and cruel Manner, burnt the Place, and then went to plunder the other Places belonging to the Order of St. Benedict; they afterwards laid close Siege to the Monastery of Monte Cassino, and the Fort in which Landone had fortify'd himself and the Inhabitants, and endeavour'd to take them by Storm, in attacking the Walls and Trenches, but in vain, for they were gallantly repulsed with great Loss on their Side.

*RICCARDO da S. Germano*¹, an Eye-witness, relates, that on the Feast of St. Maurus, the Air being very clear, on a sudden became cloudy, and so great a Storm of Rain mix'd with Hail, Lightning, and terrible Thunder, accompanied with a boistrous Wind, arose, and came pouring down upon the Germans that were incamp'd in the craggy Cliffs of the Hill, that it threw down and broke their Tents, and forc'd them in all haste to raise the Siege; but for all that, Marcovaldus did not give over his Barbarity, but in going down the Hill burnt the Castle of Plumbarola, and St. Elia, and returning to St. Germano, he threw down the Walls, Gates, and the best Houses, and made a great Slaughter over all the Neighbourhood, allowing the Germans even to pillage the Churches, without any Respect or Fear of God, and the Saints to whom they were dedicated.

THESE Calamities so much afflicted Pope Innocent, that to remedy them in some Measure, he first excommunicated Marcovaldus and all his Followers², and then he wrote to the Archbishops of Reggio, Capua, Monreale, and Troja, to assemble an Army sufficient to oppose Marcovaldus, and put a Stop to the Mischiefs he was committing, in which Letters the Pope sets him out in his true Colours. And he wrote to the same Purpose to the Clergy, Barons, Judges, Knights, and the People of Capua, telling them besides, that he had sent his Legates with a great Sum of Money to Pietro Count of Celano, of the Race of the Counts of Marsi, to Riccardo Count of Teano, and other native Barons, to raise Soldiers for that end; and if there was Occasion, he would publish a Crusade against Marcovaldus, that all those who would take up Arms against him, should have a general Pardon for all their Sins, as if they had gone beyond Sea to fight against the Turks; and he wrote the same to the Bishops, Abbots, and Priors of Calabria; likewise ordering them, every Sunday and Holy-day, publicly to curse Marcovaldus and his Adherents; and in like Manner he wrote to the Bishops, and other Prelates of Sicily, and to all the Barons, Counts, and People of both Kingdoms.

BUT Marcovaldus's Soldiers still continued to destroy the Places belonging to Monte Cassino, and to pillage the Churches, and rob the Ornaments of the Altars; therefore when the Abbot Roffredo, unable to bear so great Calamities, offer'd him a round Sum of Money, he made Peace with him, and upon Receipt of the Money, Marcovaldus march'd out of the Territories of the Monastery, without doing any more Damage, and went to make War elsewhere.

AT the same Time Riccardo dell' Aquila Count of Fondi, not able by any other Means to protect his Estate, agreed with the Germans, notwithstanding that Innocent had wrote to him to the contrary, and married one of his Daughters to a Brother of Count Diopoldus, nam'd Sigisfred, to whom Marcovaldus had intrusted the Command of Pontecorvo, S. Angelo, and Castelnovo, important Places on the Borders of the Kingdom. But shortly after, while Diopoldus was running up and down the Country, gaining Friends to Marcovaldus, not minding sufficiently the Security of his own Person, he was made Prisoner by Guglielmo S. Severino Count of Caserta, who, as the Pope had desir'd him, as long as he liv'd, would never set him at Liberty; but he dying shortly after, his Son likewise nam'd William, by Agreement with Diopoldus's Friends, gave him his Liberty, and married one of his Daughters, which was of great Detriment to the Kingdom, by the Mischiefs that Diopoldus committed afterwards.

IN the mean Time Marcovaldus (according to the Chronicle of an uncertain Author, preserv'd in the Library of the great Church of Foix in France, printed and bound with the Collection of Innocent's Letters) endeavour'd to make Peace with the Pope, by the Means of Conrade Archbishop of Mentz, (who, in returning from the Holy Land had disembark'd in Puglia) and promis'd, provided the Pope would not disturb him in the Conquest he had resolv'd to make of the Kingdom, to give him Twenty thousand Ounces of Gold, and to swear the usual Oath of Fealty which the Kings of Sicily were wont to take to the Popes, and besides, he gave him to understand, that his having taken Frederick under his Protection, ought to be no Obstacle, because he would convince him to a Demonstration, that that Child was spurious, and none of Constantia's or Henry's.

BUT the prudent Pope knowing the pernicious Designs of Marcovaldus, and his Thirst after Government, gave no Credit to his Lyes; therefore Marcovaldus, without insisting on the former Proposal, endeavour'd by other Means to be at Peace with Innocent, and be absolv'd from the Excommunication. The Pope sent to him Ottaviano Cardinal of Ostia, Guidone di Papa Romano Cardinal of St. Maria Trastevere, and Ugolino de Conti, his Nephew, Cardinal of St. Eustach; to command him in his Name to comply with all the Orders he had sent relating to the Facts, for which he had been excommunicated, and to take his Oath for performing the same, and then to absolve him from the Censures, and receive him into the Bosom of the Church; but this German, who had other Designs in his Head, by the Means of Lione da Montelongo, a Cousin of the Cardinal of Ostia, endeavour'd, both by Intreaties and Menaces, to divert the Cardinals from laying such Commands upon him, but all in vain; for Cardinal Ugolino publicly order'd him, in Name of the Pope, not to molest the Inhabitants of the Kingdom any more, nor to concern himself with the Government thereof; to restore all the Places that he had made himself Master of in Puglia and Sicily, and make up the Damages he had done to the Church of Rome, and the Abbot of Monte Cassino; and moreover not to disturb the Prelates and other Ecclesiastical Persons: To which he answer'd, That at present he could not take such an Oath, but that he would appear in Person before the Pope, and swear to observe all; and having courteously taken his Leave of the Cardinals, he return'd to his former wicked Practices, and did what he could by his Messengers, to make the People believe that he had made up Matters with the Pope, who had confirm'd him Administrator of the Kingdom.

BUT the News of this coming to the Pope, he, by his particular Letters made it appear to be a Lye, and a Fetch of Marcovaldus; who, seeing all Hopes of putting his Designs in execution in Puglia vanish'd, resolv'd to go over to Sicily, where he thought, with less Difficulty and Opposition, to bring about his wicked Purposes. But before he undertook this Voyage, he laid Siege to Avellino, which he found was not to be taken easily, because of the gallant Defence of the Citizens, who, to be rid of him, gave him a good Sum of Money, upon which he rais'd the Siege. He afterwards took Vallata by Storm, and gave it up to be plunder'd by his Soldiers, and as he was going on to do more Mischiefe, he was met by Pietro Count of Celano, with a good Body of Soldiers which he had assembled in the County of Marfi, and being afraid to fight him, he return'd to the County of Molise, where, because he was not able to defend the City of Isernia, then in his Possession, he robb'd the Citizens of all their Goods, and from thence march'd to Teano, to vent his Fury against that City, but was repuls'd. At last he left Diopoldus, Otbo, and Sigisfred his Brothers, Corrado di Marlei Lord of Sorella, Ottone di Laviano, and Federico di Malento, to preserve his Friends in Terra di Lavoro, and other Parts of Puglia in his Interest, and with a good Body of German Troops march'd to Salerno, which sided with him, where he embark'd and sail'd with a Fleet ready for that Purpose, and landed in Sicily.

THE Governors of the Kingdom of Sicily, hearing of Marcovaldus's Voyage for that Kingdom, by several Messengers, begg'd Assistance of Soldiers from the Pope, and a Person of Worth to command them; the Pope sent them at this Time Cintio Cincio a Roman, Cardinal of St. Lorenzo in Lucina, and Giacopo his Counsellor, Cousin and Marshal, with 200 Horsemen hired at his Charges, and with them Anselmo Archbishop of Naples, and Angelo Archbishop of Taranto, Men of great Wisdom, to be assisting with their Advice. These having gone to Calabria, drove out Frederick the German, who was miserably harrassing that Province, and having afterward cross'd the Straits of Messina, they arriv'd in that City, which was most faithful to the young King, and steady in his Interest during all these Commotions rais'd by Marcovaldus.

C H A P. I.

The Expedition of Walter Count of Brenna against the Kingdom of Sicily, on account of the Pretensions of his Wife Albinia.

U'T tho' Marcovaldus quitted our Kingdom, yet it was not free from other Calamities; for a new Pretender started up, who, with foreign Forces likewise endeavour'd to conquer it. This was Walter Count of Brenna a Frenchman, whose Pretensions were founded thus; Queen Sibilia, as we have said, by the Means of Pope Innocent was deliver'd from Prison in Germany, by Philip of Suevia, and had gone to France with Albinia and Mandonia her Daughters, and had there married Albinia the Eldest to Walter, of noble Descent, great Courage and Wisdom. About the End of this Year 1199. he, with his Wife big with Child, and his Mother-in-Law, came to Rome, and threw himself at the Pope's Feet, begging that he would do him Justice with respect to the Kingdom which belong'd to Albinia. He insisted upon it, as a Thing known to every Body, that the Emperor Henry had given to William, in Lieu of the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, which he renounc'd, the County of Lecce, and the Principality of Taranto, which he afterwards took from him without any Reason. This Request much perplex'd the Pope, who thought it would be of dangerous Consequence to allow the Count to enter the Kingdom, lest he should revenge the Injury done his Mother-in-Law and Brother-in-Law by the deceas'd Emperor, on the Son, whose tender Age afforded a fair Opportunity, and which would turn the Kingdom upside down; and on the other hand he foresaw, that if he should shut his Ears to the Demand, it would so irritate the Count, that he would be ready to join the King's Enemies, and thereby kindle a cruel and bloody War; therefore he judg'd it convenient to give him the County of Lecce, and the Principality of Taranto, but first he was to make him take an Oath in the publick Consistory, on no other Pretence to disturb the Kingdom, nor do any Prejudice to Frederick; but before this was to take Effect, he resolv'd to acquaint the Governors of Sicily, who had the Charge of the young King, to whom he wrote that Letter which we find in the Register of his Letters; which begins thus, Nuper dilectus filius noster nobilis vir, &c.

BUT Gualtieri Archbishop of Palermo, being more afraid for himself, than for the King, on the Receipt of this Letter was exceedingly vex'd; for he and all his Adherents having been bitter Enemies to Tancred, and great Friends to Henry in the Conquest of the Kingdom, he thought, that if the Count should once enter it, he would endeavour to revenge the old Offence; for which Cause he publicly inveigh'd against the Pope, who being only Guardian of the King, and Administrator of the Kingdom, pretended to dispose of Principalities and Counties at his Pleasure, as if he were Lord of it, to the great Detriment and Diminution of the Crown; he assembled the People of Messina, and with all his Might oppos'd this Grant, blam'd Innocent, and stirr'd up the Sicilians to resist such an outrageous Incroachment. The Count being appriz'd of this, and finding that the Pope's Interest alone would be of no Service, but that he must have recourse to Arms, he left his Mother-in-Law and Wife in Rome, and return'd to France, in order to raise Soldiers for invading the Kingdom.

IN the mean Time Marcovaldus, who, upon his landing in Sicily, had quickly brought over the Saracens of the Island to his Party, with their Assistance had made himself himself Master of many Cities and their Castles, and marching to Palermo, he laid close Siege to it for Twenty-two Days; whereupon the Cardinal Legate, and the Archbishop Gualtieri resolv'd, in all haste to march to the Relief of that City with the Soldiers they had already drawn together; where being arriv'd, they incamp'd in the magnificent Garden which King William I. had made, with design to give Marcovaldus Battle the next Day, who, smelling out their Intent, thought fit to raise the Siege, and keep them in suspense, without risking a Battle; and knowing that the Pope's Troops were suffering for want of Money and Provisions, he sent Ranieri Menente with proper Instructions to propose a Peace. But the Soldiers perceiving his treacherous Intentions, unanimously rejected the Message. Notwithstanding which, the King's Counsellors were for hearing his Demands, and inclin'd to make Peace with him; but Bartolomeo, a Domestick of the Pope's, a cunning Man, and zealous for the Honour of his Master, resolving to put a Stop to this disadvantageous Agreement, in the Midst of the Meeting presented Letters from the Pope, whereby he expressly forbids to make any Agreement or Peace whatsoever with Marcovaldus. Whereupon Gualtieri the Archbishop of Messina, Caro Archbishop of Monreale, and the Archbishop of Ceffalu, who were with Ranieri drawing up the Articles of Peace, being appriz'd of the Pope's Mind, and that the Army and the Palermians would not hear of a Peace, but were ready to mutiny, and fly in their Faces, broke off the Treaty, and gave liberty to fight the Germans. The Battle began betwixt Palermo and Monreale, which had been taken and garrison'd by Marcovaldus, and was fought with incredible Bravery, from Three a Clock of the Day till Nine; but at last, after a great Slaughter on both Sides, the Pope's Troops, by the Valour of Giacopo his Marshal, carried the Day; for he twice rally'd his Men, and repuls'd the Germans and Saracens, who had oblig'd the first Squadrons of his Army to give way, and he shew'd himself no less a brave Soldier, than a skilful Commander, and to whom the Victory was chiefly owing. Marcovaldus lost a great Number of the best Soldiers of his Army, and among the rest the abovemention'd Ranieri Menente; his Camp was likewise plunder'd, wherein was found a rich Booty; Monreale was also besieg'd and soon taken, and the greatest Part of the Garrison put to the Sword. Marcovaldas having lost all his Riches, fled, and was not heard of by his own People for some Time. Amongst his Baggage was found the last Will of the Emperor Henry, seal'd with the Golden Seal, part of which is recorded by Baronius in his Annals. Anselm Archbishop of Naples, who was then in the Army, wrote a particular Letter to the Pope, acquainting him with all that had pass'd; the Governors of the young King and Kingdom, willing to reward the Bravery of Giacopo the Marshal, in the Name of Frederick gave him the County of Andria, which he possess'd for a long Time: Thus did these Governors believe that it was in their Power to give Investiture, and the Pope as Guardian did not fail to make use of his Authority, by investing his own Brother with the County of Sora, of which we shall have occasion to speak in a more proper Place.

BUT the Pope's Soldiers, partly by the Heat of the Season, and partly by the Fatigues of War, began to fall sick, and die in great Numbers, so that Count Giacomo thought fit to return to Puglia. Soon after the Archbishop of Palermo died, and Gualtieri della Pagliara, Chancellor of Sicily, and Bishop of Troja, got the Canons of that City to elect him Archbishop (they made no Difficulty in these Times to give two Bishopricks to one Person) and the Cardinal Legate to allow of the Election, and he took the Badges and Possession before he receiv'd the Pallium, and the Pope's Confirmation, for which the Legate was severely reprimanded¹; whereupon Gualtieri was so disgusted, that he wrote more freely to the Pope concerning the Affair of the Count of Brenna, as we shall afterwards take notice of.

WHILE these Matters were in Agitation, and the new Year 1200 already begun, Diopoldus committed a great deal of Mischief in the Kingdom; for tho' he had made Peace with the Abbot Roffredo, and had sworn upon the Evangelists in Venasfro, not to molest the Inhabitants of the Lands of the Monastery, yet one Night on a sudden he attack'd those of S. Germano, and took the Place without Resistance, pillag'd and ruin'd it; and the Abbot Roffredo, with Gregory his Brother, who liv'd there, fled to Atino, from whence they went to the County of Marsi to beg Assistance from

Pietro Count of Celano, but in vain; but Sinibaldo and Rinaldo, of the same Family of the Counts of Marfi, who are now call'd Counts of Sangro, sent them all the Plate and ready Money they had, with which the Abbot enlisted some Soldiers, and march'd with them privately in the Night-time to Monte Cassino. As soon as Diopoldus heard of the Abbot's Arrival, fearing that he had brought a greater Number of Soldiers along with him, he immediately march'd off, and left S. Germano void of Inhabitants, and the Abbot went and fortified it with new Walls and Towers. Diopoldus soon after engag'd near Venafro with the Count of Celano, whom he defeated and put to flight, and made Berardo his Son Prisoner, and with the other Prisoners of S. Germano, shut him up in the Castle of Arce.

IN the Year 1201. the Count of Brenna, who had gone to France to levy Soldiers, return'd to Rome; and tho' he brought but a small Number with him, yet all of them had given Proof of their Bravery; with these resolving to enter the Kingdom, he was look'd upon as a Fool and a Mad-man, to undertake such an Enterprize with a Handful of Men. And Count Diopoldus being appriz'd of his coming, assembled a numerous Army of Germans to meet him, and drive him out of the Kingdom. The Pope, fearing that if any Misfortune should happen to the Count of Brenna, it would animate the Germans, gave him Five hundred Ounces of Gold, to enable him to raise more Soldiers¹, and likewise wrote many Letters directed to the Counts, Barons, and People of the Kingdom, to receive him into their Cities and Castles, and assist him against Diopoldus. With this Supply the Count with his Wife Albinia boldly enter'd Terra di Lavoro, and being join'd by the Abbot Roffredo, who with a good Number of Men came to his Assistance, he besieg'd Teano, and quickly took it; and thereafter, by the Favour of Riccardo Archbishop of Capua, who was a Son of the Count of Celano, he likewise got the Castle of the City of Capua: While he was making some stay near that City, Diopoldus came upon him with a great Army, and thought to gain an easy Victory, because of his superior Strength; but it fell out quite otherwise, for Walter and his Soldiers fighting with unusual Bravery, gave the Germans such a Shock, that after a great Slaughter they broke them and forc'd them to fly; and after the Victory, they, together with the Capuans, who came out to partake of the Booty, plunder'd their rich Tents. After the Battle the Count of Celano join'd Walter, and together with the Abbot, and the Archbishop Riccardo, march'd to besiege Venafro, which they quickly took and burnt; and after some more fortunate Steps, Walter became Master of the greatest Part of the County of Molise, and the Abbot Roffredo likewise recover'd Pontecorvo, Castelnovo, Frattura, Places belonging to his Abbey, from Diopoldus.

THE Germans upon this were so terrified, that they shut themselves up within their Forts; whereupon, in the Beginning of the Year 1202, Count Walter, with the Count of Celano, the Abbot Roffredo, and the Cardinal Galloccia, who exercis'd the Office of Legate in Puglia, march'd in order to conquer the Principality of Taranto, and the County of Lecce, which, with Brindisi, and other Places of that Principality presently surrender'd; and shortly after Lecce with its Castle, Melphis, and Montepiloso follow'd their Example; but Monopoli and Taranto standing it out, were besieg'd.

BUT this Success of the Count of Brenna in Puglia was very displeasing to the Sicilians, especially to Gualtieri Archbishop of Palermo, who had usurp'd all Authority and the Government of that Island, and gain'd the rest of the King's Friends over to his Party, by givingt hem Counties, Baronies, and the Government of Cities and Provinces, and other Offices and Dignities in order to strengthen his Faction. Besides he dispos'd of the Royal Treasure and Revenues at his Pleasure, notwithstanding the Pope's Order, that nothing should be done without the Consent of all the King's Governors, and in some most weighty Affairs, he even reserv'd his own Consent; and Gualtieri, for the more easy compassing his own Ends, sent for his Brother Gentile della Pagliara Count of Manopello, and had so great a Mind to raise his Fortune, that, according to the Chronicle of Foix, he had resolv'd to dispatch the young King out of the way, and make Gentile King of Sicily; and, according to the same Chronicle, Marcovaldus twitted him with this, when, being bitter Enemies, they reproach'd one another with their Villanies.

GENTILE was immediately made one of the King's Council, and began to treat of Peace with Marcovaldus, tho' excommunicated, and an Enemy to the Pope, which took Effect, and Gualtieri made him Chief of all the Counsellors, and divided the Government of the Kingdom betwixt them two, that the one might govern in Sicily, and the other in Puglia. They cemented their Friendship by Alliance, Gentile's Son marrying Marcovaldus's Niece. Gualtieri in the Name of the young King commanded all the Subjects to pay Obedience to his Orders; and leaving the Charge of the King's Person, and the Royal Palace in Palermo to his Brother, he went to Calabria and Puglia, where with incredible Rapacity he robb'd the Churches of all the Sacred Vessels and precious Ornaments, and impos'd Taxes on Cities, Castles, and private Men, and then as lavishly squander'd away what he had thus plunder'd, being as covetous to scrape together a Sum of Money, as he was prodigal to throw it away. He likewise exclaim'd against the Pope, and said, that in place of Guardian of the King and Kingdom, he had become a cruel Enemy to both, by assisting the Count of Brenna, who was ravaging Puglia in order to take it from the King; and that instead of opposing him, he had furnish'd him both with Men and Money. And in the mean Time was soliciting the Barons of the Kingdom to enter into an Association against the Count of Brenna and the Pope, to drive the one out of Puglia, and deprive the other of any Share in the Administration.

P O P E Innocent, who was appriz'd of all his Steps, did not neglect to provide a Remedy, for having often admonish'd him to forbear such Enterprizes, tho' in vain, at last he excommunicated him, and depriv'd him of the Archbishoprick of Palermo, the Bishoprick of Troja, and the Office of Chancellor of Sicily, and gave the Churches to others, and order'd all the Subjects not to obey him in any Thing under Pain of Excommunication. This Thunderbolt hit the Bishop so home, that in an instant he lost all Credit with the People, who generally hated him, and for fear of Excommunication would no more obey him, so that he became the Laughing-stock of every Body. Therefore the other Counsellors, who were of his Faction, began to be terribly afraid of themselves, which made them write very submissively to the Pope in the King's Name, interceding for Gualtieri, and excusing themselves; which Innocent answer'd by that Letter taken out of the abovemention'd Chronicle, and to be found in the Collection of his Letters¹, which deserves to be read, because it gives a particular Account of the Count of Brenna's entering the Kingdom, which has been very confusedly related by the Writers of our Annals.

GUALTIERI being disheartened, sought to make up the Difference betwixt the Pope and him, and going to Puglia, on his Knees he swore to the Cardinal Legate to obey whatever he should command; but when the Legate order'd him not to oppose the Count of Brenna in the Conquest of the Principality of Taranto, and the County of Lecce, he answer'd him boldly, that if the Apostle Peter was sent by Jesus Christ with such Orders, he would not obey them, tho' he was sure to be condemn'd to the Fire of Hell; and blaspheming, and cursing the Pope to the Legate's Face, transported with Fury, he left him, and went to join Count *Diopoldus*².

M E A N while Diopoldus, with the Count of Manieri his Brother, and the Count of Laviano, having gone to Puglia, had assembled a great Army to drive the Count of Brenna from the Places which he had made himself Master of in that Province, and spirited up all the other Barons to go upon that Expedition against the Count, who, as he said, was an Enemy to the King, and had a Mind to usurp his Kingdom. But when they came to join Battle, on the sixth Day of October, in the famous Field of Canne, where Hannibal the Carthaginian gave Flaminius and M. Varro, Roman Consuls, that memorable Defeat; tho' the Count of Brenna was catch'd napping, and the Number of his Army much inferior to that of Diopoldus, yet for all that, he and his Men fought so gallantly, that after a great Slaughter, and many Prisoners taken, he gain'd the Victory; among the Prisoners were found Sigisfred, Diopoldus's Brother, and Count Ottone di Laviano; with great Difficulty Riccardo with the Count of Manieri escap'd to the City of Salpe, and Diopoldus to the Castle of *S. Agatha*³.

COUNT Gentile, who had the Charge of young King Frederick in Palermo, brib'd with a great Sum of Money, made Marcovaldus Master not only of the City of Palermo, but of all the Island of Sicily, except Messina; and had it not been for fear of the Count of Brenna, who, by Right of his Wife, would have pretended to the Crown, he could easily have put the King to death, and usurp'd the Kingdom, which he deferr'd till a more fit Opportunity; mean while, notwithstanding the Repulse he had formerly got, he was endeavouring, by the Power of Money, to take off the Pope from protecting Frederick, and to get the Count of Brenna to return to France, and quit his Pretensions. But behold all his Designs were blasted by Death, which confounds and overthrows all human Devices; for not long after, being troubled with a Stoppage of Urine, occasion'd by a Stone in the Reins, he was so tormented with severe Pains, that, not able to bear them longer, he caus'd himself to be cut; but the Operation had no Effect, for about the end of this Year 1202, he died suddenly under the Sentence of Excommunication, which put an End to his vast Ambition, and Thirst after a Crown. The Author of Innocent's Acts makes him die of this Operation; but Riccardo da S. Germano says, it was of a Dysentery¹.

COUNT Diopoldus was now tied up from doing any more Mischief in Puglia, and in the Year 1203, by the Means of the Count of Brenna's Faction, he was made Prisoner by the Castellain of the Castle of St. Agatha, whither he had fled for Shelter; nevertheless his Imprisonment was of no Service to the Count, for soon after the same Castellain, brib'd with Money and Promises, set him at Liberty.

THE Death of Marcovaldus occasion'd new Revolutions in Sicily, for William Caparon, a German Captain, no sooner heard of it, than he went to Palermo, and took Possession of the Royal Palace, and the King's Person, and took the Title of The King's Guardian, and Governor of Sicily: Which displeas'd Marcovaldus's Followers, who refus'd to obey him, and form'd another Party, to the great Detriment of the Affairs of the Island.

GUALTIERI della Pagliara thinking this a fit Opportunity to recover his former State, wrote to the Pope, desiring to be absolv'd from Excommunication, and that he was willing to obey him in whatever he should command, and employ all his Power for the Service of the Holy See: Innocent readily granted his Request, whereupon he went over to Sicily, and reassum'd the Office of High Chancellor without Opposition, and wrote Letters to Innocent, in which he declar'd that he would, to his utmost, promote Frederick's Interest, and requested him, for the Good of the Child, to send a Cardinal Legate to Sicily, to take the whole Command upon him, in order to put an End to the Authority of so many Tyrants². To this the Pope consented, and forthwith sent Gerardo Allucingolo da Lucca Cardinal of St. Adrian, a Man of great Worth, and the Pope's Nephew, from whose Hands William Caparon having taken an Oath in Messina, to acknowledge Innocent for Guardian of the Kingdom, and him as his Legate, and that he would obey him in all Things, he was absolv'd from the Excommunication, which, as a Follower of Marcovaldus, he had incurr'd.

THEN the Legate went to Palermo, whither William had also gone a little before, but when they came to treat of the Affairs of the Kingdom, they broke out into open Quarrels, for William made a Mock of the Legate, and did not mind what he said, whereupon the Legate, not thinking fit to stay in Palermo to be thus despis'd, acquainted the Pope with what had pass'd, and return'd to Messina.

MEAN while the Chancellor went to Puglia, and sent Letters and Messages to the Pope, by Persons of great Power and Interest, by all Means possible, endeavouring to get himself restor'd to the Archbishoprick of Palermo, or at least to the Bishoprick of Troja; but Innocent was positive not to take the Archbishoprick of Palermo from Paristo Bishop of Messapa, nor the Bishoprick of Troja from another Prelate, to whom he had given it.

ON the other hand, Diopoldus being still in Puglia, kept these Provinces in continual Alarm, so that the Pope sent Giacomo Count of Andria his Marshal, to assist the Count of Brenna, and likewise made the Marshal Chief Justice of Puglia, and Terra di Lavoro; and the following Year 1204, Walter Count of Brenna, Giacomo

Count of St. Severino di Tricarico, and Ruggiero Count of Cbieti, join'd their Forces, and after some Enterprizes of little Moment, they laid Siege to Terracina di Salerno, of which at present there's no Vestige remaining, and soon were Masters of it¹; but Diopoldus with his Army, and the Assistance of the Salernitans of his Party, besieg'd the Count of Brenna in Terracina, and attack'd him so vigorously, that the Count was wounded in one of his Eyes with an Arrow, insomuch that he lost the Sight of it; but the Counts of St. Severino and Cbieti coming to his Assistance, Diopoldus was shamefully forc'd to raise the Siege, and quit the Territories of Salerno, and was besieg'd by the Count of Brenna in Sarno.

BUT in the beginning of the Year 1205, the Count of Brenna did not guard himself sufficiently against the Dangers of War, but expos'd his own Person and Army, without the Circumspection that was requisite, and Diopoldus being appriz'd of his Negligence and Security, one Morning early made a Sally unawares upon his Army, and finding them unguarded and careless, he attack'd and broke them in an Instant²; great Numbers were kill'd, and the Count, while he was defending himself gallantly with his drawn Sword in his Hand, receiv'd many Wounds, and was made Prisoner, and carried to Sarno, where, shortly after, according to Riccardo da S. Germano, and the Author of the Chronicle of Foix, Co-temporary Writers, he died of his Wounds³.

THE unfortunate Albinia, now left a Widow, and big with Child, soon after married the above-mention'd Giacoimo S. Severino Count of Tricarico, who forbore to bed with her till she brought forth a Son, who after his Father was call'd Walter, and was afterwards Count of Lecce; of whom was descended Queen Mary, and Brenna, Wife of Ladislaus II. as shall be told hereafter.

THE Death of the Count of Brenna so animated Diopoldus's Faction and his Germans, and put the Count of Celano and his Party into so great Consternation, that Innocent himself was at last forc'd to make Peace with Diopoldus and his German Followers, and intrust them with the Administration of the Kingdom; wherefore the Year following 1206, he receiv'd them into Favour, and having made Diopoldus take an Oath from the Hands of Rinieri a Friar (according to the Chronicle of Foix) and Maestro Filippo the Apostolick Protonotary, who, for that Purpose, went to Terra di Lavoro, faithfully to obey the Pope, as Guardian of the Kingdom, and his Legates, he was absolv'd from the Censures; and Marcovaldus of Laviano, and Corrado di Marlei Lord of Sorella, with all their Followers and Vassals, swearing in the same Manner, were likewise receiv'd into the Pope's Favour, as also all the Germans that liv'd in Puglia and Sicily. Diopoldus went afterwards to Rome, and threw himself at the Pope's Feet, and was honourably receiv'd, and after having discours'd together about the Affairs of the Kingdom, with the Pope's Consent he return'd to Salerno, and from thence with some Ships prepar'd for that Purpose, he sail'd to *Palermo*⁴.

DIOPOLDUS was no sooner arriv'd in Palermo, than he made himself Master of the King's Person and Palace; which Gualtieri della Pagliara the Chancellor, took in so ill Part, that in the Night Time, having call'd a Meeting of his Friends, he caus'd Diopoldus and his Son to be put in Prison; but not being sufficiently guarded, they soon after made their Escape by favour of the Night, imbarc'd and landed in Terra di Lavoro, where they fought with the Neapolitans, and made a terrible Slaughter⁵.

Cuma destroy'd, and its Church united to that of Naples.

IN this Place we must not pass over in Silence, what an antient Neapolitan Writer, and the Author of the Primer of St. Juliana, which is very antient, written on Parchment, and preserv'd in the Monastery of Donnaromita, relate this Year concerning the Destruction of Cuma, and some Battles which the Neapolitans had with the Germans and Aversans, which other grave Authors, and Cotemporary Writers do not so much as mention.

THEY say¹, that in these Times the City of Cuma being in a manner destroy'd, by Reason of the Wickedness of the Inhabitants, had lost the Name of a City, and was become a Receptacle for Robbers and Pyrates, who both by Sea and Land, infested Travellers, and the neighbouring Countries: Add to this, the continual IncurSIONS of the Germans, who, sheltering themselves in the Castle of this City, plagu'd Terra di Lavoro, and particularly the Territories of Naples and Aversa; therefore in order to prevent these Mischiefs, in a Meeting of the Gentry and Commonalty of Naples, it was unanimously agreed to post Detachments of Soldiers at all the Passes through which these German Robbers us'd to come: The neighbouring Counts and Barons hearing of this Resolution, much encourag'd the Neapolitans in so commendable a Work, and offer'd to assist them with their Persons and Fortunes. Having put their Design in Execution, and posted Guards in several Places, they were expecting the Enemy to come and attack them. While Matters were in this State, Goffredo di Montefusco, a Captain of great Courage, and a bitter Enemy to the Germans, it being now the Month of March, went one Evening with some of his Friends to Cuma, where he was courteously receiv'd by the Bishop of Aversa, who then liv'd in the Castle. The coming of Goffredo thus in the Night-time, made the Aversans suspect that the Bishop had a mind to betray them, and that he had receiv'd Goffredo, in order to fortify the Castle to their Prejudice, as had been once done before. But the Aversans not being fully assur'd of this, sent some of their Citizens to Cuma to get Information, and with all haste and secrecy, to possess themselves of the Castle, to prevent Goffredo's doing it. Goffredo in the mean time seeing that they were come, began to suspect that the Bishop had sent for them to make him Prisoner; therefore he was upon his Guard, and fortified himself and Followers in a particular Apartment. While both Parties were thus afraid, and upon their Guard, Goffredo, because of his small Number, fearing that at last he might be surpriz'd by the Aversans, sent immediately to Naples for Assistance, and to intreat the Neapolitans to make all Haste to relieve him from the Danger he was in, and to dispose of the Castle as they should think best. Upon this Message, Count Pietro di Lettere, a Kinsman of Goffredo, mounted his Horse and went immediately to Giugliano, and took with him the Detachment of Soldiers that was posted there for defending the Neapolitans against the Germans, and march'd directly to Cuma; Goffredo overjoy'd, went out to meet him, and made him swear, that if the Castle should be taken, he would deliver up to him both the Men, Goods and Chattels that were in it, to which he agreed, and they enter'd the City together. Soon after, upon Goffredo's Message, a good Number, both of the Gentry and Commonalty of Naples likewise came to Cuma; whereupon Goffredo seeing himself out of Danger, held a Council with the Neapolitans and Count Pietro, wherein it was resolv'd at any rate to make themselves Masters of the Castle, and to level the City with the Ground, whereby they would for ever be freed from being infested by the Robbers and Germans. Therefore they desir'd the Aversans and their Bishop to quit the Castle; but the Aversans refus'd to comply: Thus, after a hot Dispute, the Neapolitans and Goffredo, resolving not to dally any longer, attack'd the Castle both by Sea and Land, and batter'd the Walls so furiously, and set Fire to the Castle, that with great Difficulty the Bishop and Aversans made their Escape by flight; and after the Neapolitans had destroy'd the City and demolish'd the Castle, they return'd in Triumph to Naples; so that Cuma being intirely ruin'd, its Church, formerly Suffragan to the See of Naples, was now annex'd to it, with all the Rights and Revenues thereof¹.

WHEREUPON, as the above-mention'd Author of St. Juliana's Primer relates, Anselm Archbishop of Naples, and Leo Bishop of Cuma, resolv'd to remove from the great Church of Cuma, the Bodies of the Holy Martyrs St. Maximus, to whom the Church was dedicated, and St. Juliana, and an Infant of Three Months old, whom, 'tis said, Maximus made miraculously to speak, in Presence of Fabianus the Prefect; to prevent their being carried off by Foreigners: To which they were likewise solicited by Brienna, then Abbess of the Monastery of Donnaromita, who, with all her Nuns, was very earnest to have the Body of St. Juliana; therefore the said Leo, Pietro Frezzarnolo, Sub-Dean of the Cathedral of Naples, And the Abbots of St. Peter ad Ara, and St. Mary a Capella, with a great Number of the Gentry and Commonalty of Naples, went and open'd the Shrine wherein the Relicks were kept, and with great Reverence and Honour, they took them out, and carried them to the Church of St. Maria a Piedi Grotta, where they were receiv'd with great Joy by the Abbess and Nuns of the said Monastery of Donnaromita, and a great Number of other Ladies. The next Morning Bishop Leo, with many Gentlemen belonging to the *Seggio di Nido, and a vast Multitude of other Neapolitans, with Olive Branches in their Hands, singing Psalms and Hymns, took the Relicks and carried them to the Church of the Island St. Salvatore, where now the Castle dell' Uovo stands; where being join'd by the Archbishop Anselm, with all the Canons and Clergy, they went in Procession to the City, and plac'd the said Relicks in the Church of the Monastery of Donnaromita, where they still remain, and are ador'd.

THUS say these Authors: But out of regard to History, I must not pass over in Silence, what grave and credible Writers have said on this Subject. Riccardo da S. Germano, and the Author of the Chronicle, which is kept in Monte Cassino, tell us, That Count Diopoldus, this very Year 1207, in which these Things are said to have happen'd, came from Salerno to Terra di Lavoro, where he ingag'd the Neapolitans, and after a terrible Slaughter, routed them²; Riccardo also adds, that he took Goffredo di Montefusco Prisoner, and carried him with him to one of his Castles, without so much as mentioning the Destruction of Cuma. Nevertheless these Accounts may be both true, for, perhaps, Diopoldus, being intrag'd at the Ruin of Cuma, which is said to have been in the Month of March, or because his Germans had been ill us'd by the Neapolitans, who were posted to watch them, came to insult Naples, and the Neapolitans, with Goffredo di Montefusco, fallying out, were defeated, many kill'd, and Goffredo made Prisoner; but I leave the Decision to the judicious Reader.

C H A P. II.

Pope Innocent makes a Voyage to Sicily, where he concludes a Marriage betwixt King Frederick and Constantia, the Daughter of Alphonfus II. King of Aragon; and defends the Kingdom against the Invasion of the Emperor Otho IV.

IN the mean time Gualtieri the Chancellor, had rais'd great Disturbance in the Royal Palace, for by all Means possible, endeavouring to get the Charge of the King's Person and Palace from William Caparon, but in vain, he put all in Confusion; and the chief Ministers of the Kingdom being divided into Factions, gave a fair Opportunity to the Saracens of the Island, without fear of Punishment, to rise in Arms, and they not only shook off all Allegiance to the King, but did a great deal of Damage to the Christians, by taking the Castle of Coriglione by Storm, and threatening greater Mischiefs.

THE Disorders were no less in the Kingdom of Puglia, occasion'd by Corrado di Marlei, whom the deceas'd Emperor had made Count of Sora, who not only infested Terra di Lavoro, and the other neighbouring Places; but also the Pope's Dominions. Innocent, mov'd with Compassion for the miserable Condition of both Kingdoms, determin'd to go to Sicily, and on the 30th Day of May, of the Year 1208, he arriv'd in Palermo with many Cardinals, Archbishops, and other Prelates; and finding that King Frederick was now grown up, and Thirteen Years of Age, he perswaded him to marry, and propos'd Constantia, Sister to Peter King of Aragon, which Frederick agreed to; whereupon the Pope began to treat of the Marriage with Sancia, Constantia's Mother; and then left Palermo, and arriv'd at St. Germano the 23d of *June*¹.

UPON his Arrival, he call'd a Meeting of the Barons, Justices, and Governors of the Cities and Castles; wherein it was resolv'd, that they, at their own Charges, should furnish King Frederick Two hundred Horsemen, to be sent to Sicily, and there to continue a whole Year. He likewise appointed Pietro Count of Selano, and Riccardo dell' Aquila Count of Fondi, to be Justices and Governors of the Kingdom of Naples, and committed the Charge of Puglia and Terra di Lavoro, to the Count of Celano, and that of the City of Naples and its Territories, to the Count of Fondi. Besides, he restor'd what was amiss in the Administration of Justice, which, by the continual Wars, and the Insolence of the Germans, had been little minded, and made other Regulations for the better Government of the Kingdom, as Riccardo da S. Germano, and the Chronicle of Foix relate. He recommended Peace and Unanimity, and if any Person should be injur'd, he was to have recourse to the above-mention'd Counts, and lay his Complaints before them; and whoever should dare to oppose what he had ordain'd, or disturb the Peace of the Kingdom, should be declar'd an Enemy to the Commonwealth, and severely punish'd².

² Idem, Qui autem ordinationem istam recipere noluerint, vel recusaverint, tanquam hostes publici habeantur, & a cæteris impugnentur.

INNOCENT, not content with what had been ordain'd in the Meeting, after it was over, wrote to all the Counts, Barons, and People of the Kingdom, who had not been present in the Assembly, exhorting them to observe what had been therein ordain'd, and to obey whatever Gregorio Crescenzio Romano Cardinal of S. Theodore, his Legate in Campagna di Roma, and Riccardo his Cousin (whom he had this Year 1208. invested with the County of Sora, as a Reward for his having defeated and taken Corrado di Marlei, who was divested of the said County ¹) in his Name should command them to do; all which may be seen in one of this Pope's Letters ².

INNOCENT, having thus settled the Government of this Kingdom, went up to Monte Cassino to visit that holy Place, to which he confirm'd all the Privileges granted to it by the Popes his Predecessors, and added new ones. While he was there, he had Advice, that Philip King of Germany, King Frederick's Uncle, had been murder'd by his own People; whereupon, in order to be nearer at Hand, to give what Assistance he could in the Affairs of the Empire of the West, he left Terra di Lavoro, and by the Way of Sora and Atino, with all his Cardinals, return'd to Campagna di Roma ³.

AFTER the Death of the Emperor Henry, though the Empire belong'd to his Son Frederick; for, according to the Abbot of Usparg ⁴, Henry in his Life-time had got almost all the Princes of Germany to elect him King, and swear Fealty to him; yet Henry was no sooner dead, than two opposite Factions about the Election of a Successor started up, and the Majority of the Electors elected Philip Duke of Suevia, Brother of the deceas'd Emperor, and in the Year 1197. he was crown'd King of Germany in Mentz, by his own Party; the other Electors, inferior in Number, elected Otbo Duke of Saxony, and crown'd him in Aix la Chapelle. But, though Innocent III. had favour'd Otbo's Party, and confirm'd his Election ⁵; yet Philip's Party prevail'd, and he held the Empire ten Years, and at last, Otbo himself, after a bloody War, yielded to him, and made Peace with him, and in the Year 1207. Philip gave his Daughter Beatrix to Otbo in Marriage, with this Condition, that after Philip's Death, Otbo should succeed in the Kingdom of Germany. But when Philip was thus settled in the Empire, the Year following 1208. he was treacherously kill'd in his own Palace, in the City of Bamberg, by Otbo Count Palatine, his bitter Enemy; whereupon Otbo Duke of Saxony aspir'd anew to the Empire, and was this second Time favour'd by Innocent, who, the Year following, when Otbo came to Italy, crown'd him in Rome, and he was call'd Otbo IV.

BUT after the Pope left Terra di Lavoro, new Troubles arose in that Province, for Riccardo dell' Aquila Count of Pondi, joining with Count Diopoldus, lorded it over the City of Capua, whither he had been invited by the Capuans themselves, who had turn'd out Pietro Count of Celano ⁶, who then govern'd that City, because they mortally hated Riccardo his Son, their Archbishop.

IN the mean Time Pope Innocent had concluded the Marriage betwixt King Frederick and Constantia Widow of Albericus King of Hungary, and Daughter of Alphonfus II. King of Arragon, and Sancia his Wife. Zurita, the judicious and impartial Writer of the Annals of Arragon, says, that Queen Sancia, after the Death of the King her Husband, sent her Secretary, nam'd Columbus, to Rome, promising Innocent, in case the Marriage was concluded, to send Two hundred Horse at her own Charges to Sicily for assisting her Son-in-Law; or if it should be thought proper, she herself would conduct her Daughter, with 400 Horse, provided she was secur'd that the Charges of the War should be repay'd her, in case the Sicilians, who were Masters of the King's Person, should put a Stop to the Marriage; requiring besides, that if Frederick should die before the Consummation of the Marriage, her Son Don Ferdinand, Constantia's Brother, whom the Father had educated for the Church ⁷, should be invested with his Kingdoms. After this Message Innocent sent his Ambassadors to Arragon, who, in Conjunction with Ambassadors likewise sent by Frederick, after diverse Conferences, concluded the Marriage. But before Constantia left Arragon, Queen Sancia died; and afterwards in the Month of February 1209. Constantia imbarc'd in Catalan Gallies, accompanied by D. Alphonfus Count of Provence, her Brother, and a great Number of Spanish and Provensale Gentlemen, and landed in Sicily; but whilst this Marriage was celebrating with great Pomp and Magnificence, all their Mirth was converted into Grief, by the Death of D. Alphonfus, and many of his Retinue; for through the Badness of the Air Palermo was afflicted with a contagious Distemper, which prov'd mortal to many; insomuch that the young King, who was only 14 Years old, in the Midst of Joy and Grief, was forc'd to leave Palermo, and go wandering up and down from one City of the Island to another.

WHILE this contagious Distemper oblig'd King Frederick to leave Palermo, Pietro Count of Celano, by Means of his Son the Archbishop, got Possession again of Capua; and at the same Time Otho King of Germany, by the Death of Philip his Father-in-Law, breathing after the Empire of the West, came into Italy with a powerful Army, and arriving in Rome, was receiv'd by Pope Innocent, and on the 7th of September this Year crown'd with the Imperial Crown, and Riccardo da S. Germano, says, that the Pope crown'd him præstito Juramento de conservando Regalibus S. Petri, & de non offendendo Regem Siciliae Fredericum. But whilst Otho and his Army continued in Rome, there happen'd a terrible Quarrel betwixt his Soldiers and the Romans, who taking up Arms, kill'd a great many Germans; whereupon Otho in great Wrath left Rome, and march'd into Marca, where he laid waste, and took by Force the Lands and Cities of the Church, notwithstanding the Oath he had taken.

IN the mean Time the Abbot Roffredo, having for many Years govern'd the Abbey of Monte Cassino, on the last Day of May ended his Days in *S. Germano*¹; after whose Death Count Diopoldus, and the Count of Celano being reconcil'd, and the one being Master of Capua, and the other of Salerno, both of them perswaded Otho, who was then in Tuscany, to come and take Possession of the Kingdom, and Diopoldus promis'd to deliver up Salerno to him, and the Count of Celano Capua, which Invitation and Offer, the Emperor, notwithstanding his Oath he had sworn to the Pope not to disturb Frederick, gladly accepted, and having assembled his Army, he enter'd Abbruzzi by the Way of Rieti and Marisi, from whence he march'd into Terra di Lavoro, whither Pietro Abbot of Monte Cassino, who had succeeded Roffredo, afraid for the Lands of his Abbey, contrary to the Opinion of his Monks, sent Messengers to beg Peace of him, and shortly after went himself with all Submission to wait upon him, and to be at his Mercy; for which Cause, neither the Territories nor Goods of the Monastery suffer'd in the least by the Germans.

OTHO having gone to Capua, created Count Diopoldus Duke of *Spoletto*², who, besides having given him Salerno, had join'd him with all his Followers. From Capua both of them went to besiege Aquino, but they were repuls'd with great Loss by Tommaso, Pandolfo, and Ruberto Lords of that City. Naples out of spite to the Aversans surrender'd to Otho; who at the Request of the Neapolitans march'd to lay siege to Aversa; but the Aversans having given him a good Sum of Money, and receiv'd him kindly into their City, subjected themselves to him, and suffer'd no other Damage³. From thence Otho march'd into Puglia, where the Puglians, partly through Fear, and partly by Force, for the most part surrender'd to him, and Calabria follow'd their Example, and the Places that made any Resistance were pillag'd and ruin'd.

POPE Innocent, seeing the finest Provinces of this Kingdom thus lost, endeavour'd all he could to divert Otho from his Undertaking; for which end he sent the Abbot of Usperg, as he himself relates, five Times from Rome to Capua, to treat of an Agreement with the Emperor, but all to no Purpose; for Otho looking upon all these Provinces, as well as all the rest of Italy, as belonging to the Empire, by no Means would part with what he had conquer'd from the King of Sicily, but endeavour'd to be Master of all Italy.

IT had been already the Custom of the Popes in those Times, not only to excommunicate, but likewise to depose the Emperors, by absolving their Vassals from their Oaths; and this they did, not only on account of Heresy, but also for Things merely Temporal, such as incroaching upon the Possessions of the Church, or those of other Princes her Friends and Confederates. Innocent on this Occasion, finding that Otbo was obstinately resolv'd not to part with what he had possess'd himself of in Marca of the Church Lands, and what he had conquer'd from King Frederick ¹, excommunicated him, and declar'd him an Enemy of the Holy Church. He likewise interdicted the Church of Capua, because the Clergy thereof had dared to celebrate Divine Offices in the Emperor's Presence; he also excommunicated all his Adherents: And having call'd a Council in Rome, he depriv'd him of the Empire; but because these Thunderbolts are thrown in vain, if they are not back'd and supported by the Electoral Princes, therefore this same Year 1210. Innocent wrote Letters to the German Princes, wherein he exaggerated the Damage Otbo had done to the Church contrary to the Tenor of the Agreement, and the Oath he had given, when he was crown'd in Rome; therefore, seeing Otbo was perjur'd, excommunicated, and had forfeited the Empire, he exhorted them to elect another in his Room. This mov'd many of these Princes to take up Arms against the Emperor, which occasion'd a new War and Revolutions in Germany; as soon as Otbo was appriz'd of these Com-motions, he immediately left Puglia, and return'd to Germany; but that did not hinder the Election to go on, for the Archbishops of Mentz and Triers, the King of Bobemia, Herman Count of Thuringia, the Dukes of Austria, Saxony, and Bavaria, and many other German Lords, who, besides being his declar'd Enemies, call'd to mind that Frederick had been elected King of the Romans, while he was but a Child in his Father's Life-time, and that they had sworn to him, elected King Frederick Emperor, who was but fifteen Years old.

C H A P. III.

King Frederick being elected Emperor, goes to Germany, and is crown'd in Aix la Chapelle; and Innocent summons a General Council to be held in the Lateran Palace.

AFTER the Princes of Germany had elected Frederick, they presently sent two Ambassadors, Anselm and Henry, to notify the Election to him, and conduct him to Germany; the Ambassadors being come to Verona, Henry stopp'd there in order to induce the Lombards to espouse the new Emperor's Interest, and especially those of the Veroneze ¹; and Anselm came to Rome, where, with the Pope's Consent, he us'd his utmost Endeavours to get the Romans to approve of Frederick's Election. From thence he went over to Sicily, and it was with great Difficulty, that he got Constantia and the Sicilian Barons to consent to Frederick's going to Germany, for fear that his Enemies should murder him treacherously. But at last, despising all Dangers, and encourag'd by Innocent, he left Constantia in Sicily, with a Son she had born to him, nam'd Henry after his Grandfather, and imbark'd in Gaetan Ships, and after a prosperous Voyage landed at Gaeta; where he took shipping again, and in the Month of April 1211. arriv'd in Rome ², where he was joyfully receiv'd by the Pope, the Senate and the People of Rome, from whence he went likewise by Sea to Genoa, where he was heartily welcom'd by the People of that City, who, lest he should be attack'd by those of the Milaneze, great Favourers of Otho, escorted him to Padua; and in the same manner, the People of Padua and Cremona joining together, conducted him through the Valley of Trent, and the steepest Parts of the Alps, to avoid any Ambushes that Otho might have laid in the Way, and he arrived safely in the Country of the Grisons, and being honourably entertain'd by the Bishop and the Abbot of S. Gall, and accompanied by them, he arriv'd at Constance.

BUT Otho, who in the mean Time had carried on a cruel War against those of Frederick's Faction, hearing of his Arrival, presently left Thuringia, and came to Uberlingen near Constance, in order either to dispatch Frederick out of the Way, or take him Prisoner before he should gather more Strength in Germany; but being deserted by many of his Followers, who went over to his Enemy, his Designs were blasted. And while Frederick was in Constance, he was join'd by a good Body of the Suevians, besides a great Number of German Barons, who, out of Respect to the Memories of his Father and Grandfather, lov'd him dearly. Otho seeing his Forces daily dwindling away, in the Beginning of the Year 1212. went to Brisac situated on the Banks of the Rhine, where he left no Stone unturn'd to augment his Army, but the Citizens being grievously oppress'd by the Soldiers, with unanimous Consent fell upon them, and drove them out of the City, killing and dispersing the whole Army; whereupon Otho, seeing no other way to make his Escape, with a small Retinue, fled to Saxony. The News of this being spread among the Germans, they went all over to Frederick, who march'd down the Banks of the Rhine, and was favourably receiv'd in Hainault; but some of these People continu'd faithful to Otho, shut their Gates, and began to dispute his Passage, but in a few Days they were likewise forc'd to submit, and he march'd to Aix la Chapelle, whither the greatest Part of the German Princes went, and, contrary to Frederick's Expectation, cheerfully embrac'd his Interest; and in the Year 1213. the Twentieth of his Age, according to the Abbot of Usparg, Baronius, and Bzovius, but the Eighteenth according to Inveges, he was crown'd by the Archbishops of Mentz and Triers ¹.

OTHO, seeing himself thus deserted by the Princes of the Empire, turn'd his Arms against Philip King of France, who beat him, and put him to flight, and Philip, to humble him the more, made a Truce with the Emperor Frederick ², who taking Advantage of this favourable Opportunity, forthwith attack'd the Imperial Cities that favour'd Otho, and harra's'd them in such a manner, ut urbes ad dedicationem, & Othonem ad veniam petendam impulerit, as Gordon has it.

POPE Innocent finding Otho crush'd, and Italy and all other Christian Dominions now at Peace, and the Affairs of the Empire of the West in a fair Way to his liking, and at the same Time having receiv'd the agreeable News of the famous Victory gain'd by D. Pedro II. King of Castile and Arragon, the Empress Constantia's Brother, and Sanctius King of Navar, in the Fields of Toledo, over the King of Maroco, and his Moors, bent his Mind to a more noble Undertaking; he saw that the Turks both in Spain and the Holy Land grievously molested the Christians, therefore he wrote Letters to all Christian Princes, exhorting them to lay aside their private Quarrels, put on the Cross, and go to the Holy War; and he sent two Cardinal Legates to assemble what People they could to go to Palestine. He likewise wrote to Saladin Soldan of Babylon and Damascus, to restore Jerusalem to the Christians, and set at Liberty all the Prisoners, promising to set at Liberty all the Turks that were Prisoners in Christendom; but his Labour was lost, for that Prince neither minded the Pope's Letters nor his Messengers. Innocent likewise summon'd a General Council to be held in Rome in the Lateran Palace the following Year 1215. which began to be celebrated the first Day of November the same Year, in which were present 70 Archbishops, 412 Bishops, and 800 Abbots and Priors. Ambassadors from all Christian Princes were likewise at this Council, and Berardo Archbishop of Palermo was sent by Frederick ³. The People of the Milaneze, who were great Partizans of Otho, did not fail likewise to send one of their Citizens to defend his Right in this Assembly; in which many Points were examin'd and hotly debated.

³ Ric. S. Germ.

THE chief Point was the Expedition to the Holy Land, to recover Palestine from the Infidels, and make up the Differences betwixt Christian Princes, to which the Ambassadors promis'd the utmost Assistance of their Masters.

Otho's Deposition, and Frederick's Coronation in Aix la Chapelle, were also strongly debated, and the Milaneze Deputy made a long Speech in favour of Otho, and told the Council, That he was willing to become an obedient Son of the Church, and therefore ought to be restor'd to his former Imperial Dignity, and Frederick's Election declar'd void: But the Marquis of Monferrat stood up for Frederick, and made a Speech, wherein he said, That no Person ought to be heard that spoke in Otho's Name, and produc'd Six Articles of Accusation against him¹. The first was the Breach of his Oath to the Church of Rome, whereby he swore not to invade her Lands, nor Frederick's Dominions. II. That he had not restor'd these Lands for which he was excommunicated, and had sworn to restore them. III. That he favour'd an excommunicated Bishop. IV. That he imprison'd a Bishop Legate of the Holy See. V. That in Contempt of the Church of Rome, he call'd King Frederick, King of Priests². VI. That he destroy'd a Monastery of Nuns, and made a Fort of it. Then turning towards those of the Milaneze that were present, he inveigh'd against them, as Frederick's Enemies; but they, no ways afraid, were going to answer him, when the Pope made a Sign with his Hand, rose from the Throne, and went out of the Church. This weighty Affair of Frederick and Otho, according to Riccardo, was debated in the Council with great Warmth, from the Feast of St. Martin to that of St. Andrew; on which Day the Pope approv'd of the Election made by the Princes of Germany in Aix la Chapelle, and confirm'd Frederick Roman Emperor, and it was resolv'd that he should be invited to Rome to take the Crown, according to the Custom of his Predecessors.

IN this Council the Sacraments of Penance, and the Eucharist, were narrowly examin'd into, and especially the Condemnation of the Heresy of the Albigenses was closely debated; this Heresy being favour'd by the Count of Toulouse, and many great Men in France, had taken deep Root there.

C H A P. IV.

The Origine of the Inquisition against Hereticks; and the Death of Pope Innocent III.

THE Tribunal of Inquisition against Hereticks, had its Rise at this Time. The Apostles apply'd no other Remedy to this Evil, than Admonition; if the Heretick, after being once or twice admonish'd, continu'd obstinate, he was excommunicated, and all Catholicks were enjoyn'd to have no Fellowship with him. And this was all, till Constantine imbrac'd the Christian Religion. Among the Instructions which the Fathers of the Church gave to Constantine and his Successors; one was, that seeing they were Christians as well as Princes, they were oblig'd to serve God in both Capacities. As Christians, by observing God's Holy Commandments, as much as any private Person; as Princes, by making good Laws, directing their Subjects to lead godly, righteous and sober Lives; by punishing the Transgressors of the Divine Divine Precepts, and especially of the Decalogue : And since, 'tis a more heinous Crime to transgress the first Table, which regards the Honour of God, than the Second, which regards Justice betwixt Man and Man, therefore Princes are more oblig'd to punish Blasphemy, Heresy, and Perjury, than Homicide and Theft. For which Cause, many Laws were made against Hereticks, with severe Sanctions against the Broachers and Teachers of Heresies, and those who by such Doctrine rais'd Disturbance and Sedition in the Commonwealth. Constantine the Great made Two such Laws ¹. Constans his Son made none, because he was a Heretick. Valentinian the Elder made one ². Valens made none, because he was likewise a Heretick. Gratian publish'd Two ³. Theodosius the Great publish'd Fifteen ⁴. Valentinian the Younger Three ⁵. Arcadius Twelve ⁶. Honorius Eighteen ⁷. Theodosius the Younger Ten ⁸; and Valentinian III. Three ⁹.

THE Punishment inflicted on those Hereticks, was not always the same; but according to the Circumstances, sometimes more severe, sometimes more mild: Neither was there any Law that punish'd Hereticks in general with Death. The Manichees, the Priscillianists, and their Doctors, and those who rais'd Disturbance, were the most severely punish'd. They were commonly banish'd, declar'd infamous, render'd incapable of military Employments, and all Honours and Dignities; to make Wills, to make Donations, to Buy or Sell, or make any kind of Contracts; they were fin'd, and their Goods, either in part, or in whole, confiscated, according to the Circumstances of their Crimes: Capital Punishment, in some singular Cases, was only threatned by the Emperors, as against the Manichees, the Stirrers-up of Sedition and Commotions; and against other Hereticks, according to the Heinousness of the Crimes, or their Obstinacy in the Cases recorded in the Theodosian Code ¹⁰, and enumerated by Jacobus Gothofredus.

BUT since, in criminal Processes, three Points are to be consider'd; the Cognizance of the Validity of the Crime; the Cognizance of the Fact, and the Sentence; therefore in Trials of Heresy, the Cognizance of the Validity, that is to say, whether such an Opinion be heretical or not, was always reputed to belong to the Ecclesiastical, and in no respect to the secular Magistrate; whence in these Times, when any Difficulty arose concerning any Opinion, the Emperors had recourse to the Judgment of the Bishops, and, if need was, they call'd Councils. But to take Cognizance of the Fact, whether the Person was Innocent or Guilty, and to impose the Punishment ordain'd by the Law, or to absolve or condemn, belong'd to the secular Magistrate.

SEEING then that it belong'd to the secular Magistrate to take Cognizance of the Fact, the Emperors made many Laws, whereby they prescrib'd Means for proving the Fact. They declar'd Heresy to be a publick Crime, therefore allow'd all Persons to be Accusers, especially when the Process was taken out against the Manichees, the Phrygians, and the Priscillianists. They allow'd of Informers; and in some Cases in order to discover conceal'd Hereticks and their Doctors, they appointed Inquisitors. And Gothofredus observes ¹¹, that Theodosius the Great was the first that appointed Inquisitors, and was afterwards imitated by Arcadius and Honorius; but this same Writer adds, that they were not commonly employ'd against all Hereticks; but only in weighty Cases, where Severity and Rigour were necessary, as against the Manichees, the Authors of new Sects and their Doctors, the Eunomians, and others of the Clergy, Authors of abominable Superstitions and Heresies. For the more easy Proof of this Crime, Servants were allow'd to accuse their Masters ¹²; yea, their very Wives and Children were admitted; and in fine, Processes were framed by the secular Magistrate, according to the Prescription of the Laws of the Emperors; and after the Bishops had declared the Opinions heretical, and excommunicated and anathematiz'd those that held such Opinions; they meddled no more, nor durst they so much as acquaint the Magistrates with these Opinions, for fear of being guilty of a Breach of Charity.

BUT others finding, that the Fear of the Magistrate overcame the Frowardness of the Obstinate, and was more powerful than the Love of Truth, thought, that they were in Duty bound to accuse Hereticks, and give Information of their wicked Practices to the secular Judges, that thereby they might spur them on to put the Imperial Laws in execution. But seeing it sometimes happen'd, that the secular Judges were oblig'd to proceed against some heretical Doctor, who, by his wicked Doctrine, occasion'd Disturbance and Sedition, the Punishment of which, because of the Heinousness of the Crime, might be extended to Death; in such Case, the Ecclesiasticks forbore to appear before the Magistrates, but always did what they could to divert them from capital Punishment. St. Martin excommunicated a Bishop in France, because he had accus'd certain Hereticks to Maximus, who had got himself to be proclaim'd Emperor, which Hereticks were, by his Order, put to Death; and though St. Augustine, out of Zeal for the Purity of the Church, very often and strenuously sollicitated the Proconsuls, Counts, and other Imperial Ministers in Africa, to put the Laws of the Princes in execution, and inform'd them of the Places, where the Hereticks kept their Conventicles; yet when he saw that the Judges were inclin'd to punish with Death, he always begg'd and conjur'd them, for the Love of God and Jesus Christ, not to punish them with Death; and in a Letter to Donatus, Proconsul of Africa, he told him plainly, that if he should go on to punish Hereticks with Death, the Bishops would forbear to accuse them, and seeing none others did accuse them, they would go unpunish'd, and the Imperial Laws would not be put in execution; but if he proceeded mildly, without shedding Blood, they would be vigilant to discover them, and inform against them, both for the Service of God, and the Execution of the Laws.

IN this Manner were Processes against Heresy carried on under the Roman Empire, till the Year 800 of our Redemption; when the Empire of the East was separated from that of the West. And the same Form was continu'd in the Empire of the East as long as it lasted, as is clear from Justinian's Code, and the Novellæ of the other Emperors of the East his Successors.

BUT in the West every thing was alter'd, either because Princes had no occasion to make Laws against Heresy, or they little minded it; for during the Space of Three hundred Years, from the Year 800 to 1100, there appear'd few Hereticks in these Parts; and when any such did appear, the Bishops made themselves Judges; for through the Indolence of Princes, the Bishops having much extended their Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, assum'd the Power of judging Hereticks, and as they proceeded in other Ecclesiastical Crimes, such as not observing Festivals, not keeping Fasts, and the like, judging and punishing in those Places, where Princes had granted them Power to exercise Jurisdiction, and where they had not Jurisdiction, they had recourse to the secular Magistrate, who punish'd them: So likewise they proceeded in the same Manner against Hereticks in the Crimes of Heresy.

AFTER the Year 1100, by the continual Dissensions and Wranglings, which for Fifty Years before had been betwixt the Popes and the Emperors, and by those which lasted all the following Century to 1200, accompanied with frequent Wars, and Scandals, and the licentious Lives of the Ecclesiasticks, a Multitude of Hereticks started up, whose Heresies generally struck at the Ecclesiastical Authority, some attacking their Looseness of Manners, some their Power and Wealth, maintaining with the Arnaldists, that Ecclesiasticks ought to possess nothing in Property; and some carrying Matters farther, condemn'd the Baptism of Infants, and re-baptiz'd adult Persons; threw down Churches and Altars, broke the Crosses; and others did not approve of the Celebration of Mass, and taught, that Alms and Prayers did not avail the Dead: So that the Number of Hereticks in these Times was become very great, and they either took their Names from their Doctors, who broach'd the Heresies, or from the Places where they flourish'd most; but in the main they all agreed in Manicheism. And as under the Roman Empire, from Constantine the Great, to Valentinian III. their Number was prodigious, and went under the Names of their Authors; such as the Arians, the Macedonians, Pneumatomachi, Apollinarists, Novatians, Eunomians, Valentinians, Paulianists, Papianists, Montanists, Marcionists, Donatists, Photians, and many other Sects, which may be seen in the Theodosian Code: So likewise in these Times they were call'd Arnaldists, from Arnaldo da Brescia their famous Head, the Leonistæ, the Insabbathi, the Waldenses, the Speronistæ, the Publicani, the Circumcisi, the Gazari, and the Patareni, who, being prepar'd to suffer all Indignities and Affliction, by affecting an incredible Constancy, would be call'd Patareni, in opposition to Catholics, who, for the sake of Religion, suffer Slaughter; and after Death, are call'd Martyrs; so they, for their Belief, with the same Constancy, exposing themselves to the like Danger, would be call'd Patareni. But the most considerable in these Times, were the Albigenses, so call'd from Alby, the Place to which they retir'd, and being protected by the Count of Toulouse, spread their Doctrine in many Provinces of France.

BUT on the other hand, in these very Times, for the Support of the Church of Rome, there appear'd two bright Lights, Dominick and Francis, who, for their Sanctity, became famous every where, and founded the Orders of Preaching Friars, and Minors Friars, which were such fruitful Plants, and multiplied to that degree, that in a short time all Europe was full of gallant Champions, who, neither sparing Fatigue, nor other Inconveniencies, expos'd themselves to all Dangers, and fought boldly for the Roman Pontiffs. Francis embracing severe and rigid Poverty, in imitation of our Saviour, endeavour'd to bring his Order, and those that embrac'd it, to the antient Discipline, and his own Principles, and seeing his Order was founded on Humility and Poverty, he resolv'd, in imitation of the primitive Times, to clothe them after the antient Manner; and thus, more by exemplary Lives, than by Preaching and Sermons, to remove Error. On the other hand, Dominick, a Spaniard by Nation, of the City of Calahorra, of the renown'd and noble Family of the Gusmans, with those of his Order, went another way to work for suppressing the growing Heresies. The Bishops were not sufficient for such a Work, as well because of the great Number of Heresies, as that neither they nor their Vicars were so well qualified nor so careful as the Popes wish'd, and was requisite; therefore Innocent III. perceiving the Zeal of these rising Heroes, gave them in charge to go and preach the true Faith to the Hereticks, in order to convert them; to exhort Princes and all good Catholics, to prosecute the Obstinate, and to inform themselves of the Number and Quality of the Hereticks in all Places where-ever they went, and of the Zeal of the Catholics, and the Diligence of the Bishops, and to bring an account of all to Rome; whence they got the Name of Inquisitors. Dominick labour'd so heartily, and with so much Zeal against the Albigenses, that Pope Innocent declar'd him Inquisitor General against these Hereticks: Dominick perceiving that Sermons and Disputes made no Impression upon the Minds of obstinate Hereticks, thought that the best way to extirpate them, was to have recourse to the Assistance of the Count of Monfort, and other Spanish, German and French Lords, who being joyn'd with a great Number of Bishops, enter'd into a Crusade, and in the Province of Narbonne, and other Places, defeated and destroy'd them. But like so many Hydras, they still multiply'd, and Dominick came to Rome, and in the Council, which was this Year held in the Lateran, declaim'd against the Albigenses, and got their Doctrine to be condemn'd as heretical. The Books which the Abbot Giovacchino had written against Peter Lombard, Magister Sententiarum, were likewise condemn'd in this Council, and Peter's Doctrine concerning the Mystery of the Trinity, was approv'd of. And Care was also taken in this Council, for reforming the Manners of the Ecclesiasticks, who, by their Rival Hereticks, were cry'd out upon as abominable and sacrilegious Persons, and thus ended the Council; which having greatly encourag'd the new Inquisitors, with much Alacrity and Intrepidity they carried on their Work. However, they had no Tribunal at this Time; but they often stirr'd up the secular Magistrates to banish, and otherwise punish the Hereticks; they frequently excited the People, and fix'd a Cross of Cloth upon their Garments, and led them on to destroy and extirpate Hereticks.

THESE Inquisitors were afterwards much encourag'd in their Undertaking by the Empero: Frederick II. who, in the Year 1224, while he was in Padua, publish'd four Edicts on that Head, and took the Inquisitors under his Protection, and condemn'd obstinate Hereticks to the Fire, and the Penitent to perpetual Imprisonment, committing the Cognizance to the Ecclesiasticks, and the Condemnation to the secular Judges. And this was the first Law, whereby Hereticks in general were condemn'd to die, of which we shall have occasion to discourse elsewhere; but though Frederick took the Inquisitors under his Protection, yet they had no Tribunal. But Pope Innocent IV. upon the Death of the Emperor Frederick, having made himself Umpire in Lombardy, and some other Parts of Italy, erected a Tribunal, and apply'd himself wholly to the Extirpation of Heresy, which had much spread during the late Troubles. And considering the Pains which the Dominican and Franciscan Orders, without Respect of Persons, or Regard to Dangers, had hitherto taken in this Service, he thought the best thing he could do, was still to make use of them, and imploy them, not as at first, by Preaching and Crusades only, but by giving them an establish'd Authority, and erecting a fix'd Tribunal solely for that Purpose. Such was the Rise of the Tribunal of the Inquisition; but how, and in what manner afterwards, it got footing in these Provinces, and how at last it came to be so detested and abhorr'd among us, as that the very Name of it durst not be mention'd, shall be inquir'd into at large in a more proper Place.

IN the mean time Pope Innocent, after he had put an End to the Council, went from Rome to Perugia, where he fell sick, and after he had govern'd the Church of Rome for Eighteen Years, and this our Kingdom during the Minority of Frederick, died the Sixteenth Day of July 1216. For Reasons which we shall by and by relate, it was a most deplorable Death to the Church of Rome, and very afflicting to the Emperor Frederick, who was very unfortunate, as his Successors were. Innocent was a Pope, to whom the Church of Rome is much indebted, for by his Cunning and Learning, he rais'd her to the highest Pitch of Grandeur, and had the Art to subject to her, almost all the States and Princes of Europe, who regarded him as an Oracle. And such Respect was paid to him, that he oblig'd Alphonfus King of Aragon, to make his Kingdom Tributary to, and himself Liege-man of the Church of Rome, and would have himself crown'd by him in Rome, and other Princes follow'd his Example. He was so consummate a Lawyer, that the greatest Persons came to Rome, and made him Umpire of their Differences, which he determin'd to their Satisfaction: Whence the most weighty Disputes both in Church and State, were decided in Rome. Whence we have so many of his Decretal Letters, of which at this Time there was a Collection made, and given to the Students of Bologna to read, whence Gregory IX. was enabled afterwards more firmly to establish the Roman Monarchy. Innocent studied the Roman Laws, and especially the Pandects with great Application; and he was reckon'd one of the ablest Lawyers of the many that flourish'd in these Times in many Cities of Italy, and particularly in Bologna, famous above all the rest for its Academy of Law, and for Ugolino and Azone, who were then renown'd Lawyers there. However he over-did in imitating the antient Lawyers, and in endeavouring to found his Decretal Letters upon the Laws of the Pandects, he often committed great Errors, many of which were afterwards found fault with by Cujacius, Hottomanus, and others learn'd in the Law. He had a very high-flown Notion of the Papacy, and, like Gregory VII. and many others of his Predecessors, thought that he had Power to depose and make Emperors, which he put in Practice, by deposing Otho, and advancing Frederick to the Imperial Throne.

DURING the Minority of Frederick, he govern'd the Dominions of Sicily with more absolute Sway and Authority than became a Guardian, which Constantia by her Will had made him; and 'tis recorded in the Register of the Vatican, that by this Authority he invested his Nephew with some Fiefs, and the County of Sora in our Kingdom; though the Author of the Acts of Innocent writes, that he was invested by Frederick's Governors and Ministers of Sicily. By the same Authority, Innocent in his Decretals, speaking of Capua, Reggio, and some other Cities of our Kingdom, says, that he had the Government of them as well in Temporal as in Spiritual Matters, which Innocent meant, when, in confirming, and assenting to the Election of Bishops, made by the Clergy and People of our Kingdom, he said, he did it vice-regia, which our Writers, through Ignorance of History could not conceive; for though, as we have said elsewhere, this same Pope in Constantia's Life-time, had made great Alterations in the Agreement made betwixt Adrian IV. and William I. concerning the Election of Bishops, yet it was not disputed at that Time, that the King's Assent must be sought to the Elections of Prelates; and while Innocent was Guardian, he observ'd it punctually; whence, writing to the Chapter and Canons of Capua, to elect a proper Person for that See, he likewise says, that after he is elected, they must send to him, for his Assent, Vice-regia ¹. We read, that he did the same when the Bishops of Penne and Reggio were to be elected ².

AFTER Frederick came to be of Age, this Pope had no Disputes of any Moment with him, but was still for advancing his Interest, in opposition to Otho, and Frederick, for his part, was very obsequious and obliging to him and the Church of Rome, for which his Rival Otho us'd to call him a King of Priests. Thus it far'd with Frederick during the Pontificate of Innocent; but he was not so well us'd by the succeeding Popes, for there happen'd such strange Turns and Vicissitudes of Fortune betwixt him and them, that produc'd the prodigious Effects, which shall be related in the Two following Books of this History.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XVI.

U P O N the Death of Pope Innocent in Perugia, the College of Cardinals met immediately in that City, and elected Cincio Savella, Cardinal of SS. John and Paul, his Successor, who had been formerly Chancellor of the Holy Church, and in the Minority of Frederick. had been his Tutor four Years in Palermo, and was call'd Honorius III. It has been observ'd by the most careful Searchers into Human Actions, and confirm'd by antient and modern Instances, that those, who have been the Domesticks, and greatest Favourites of Princes, became their greatest Enemies as soon as they were made Popes. Innocent IV. while Cardinal, was Frederick's great Friend, but after his Election was his greatest Enemy. Callistus III. prov'd such to Alphonfus King of Arragon, and the Emperor Charles V. and our Frederick had the same Fate; for Honorius was no sooner elected and return'd to Rome, where, as their Citizen, the Romans receiv'd him with great Honours, than the first Thing he did, was to intimate to Frederick by his Letters, that though he was Emperor and King of Sicily and Puglia, yet he must not think, that these Kingdoms depended on the Empire, and not on the Church as Fiefs thereof, notwithstanding the Claim of the Emperors of the West, and of the late Otho among the rest, that at least the Kingdom of Puglia depended upon the Empire.

T O this Frederick answer'd with the greatest Honour and Respect, that in order to obey him, if he thought fit, he would yield the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia to his his Son Henry, which would remove all Grounds of Jealousy ; and he sent his Ambassadors to Rome for that Purpose. Honorius receiv'd the Ambassadors very honourably, and seeing he could not but accept of Frederick's just and reasonable Offer, told them, that he had appointed a Legate to go to Sicily to finish that Affair ; and in the mean Time, Frederick must be faithful and obedient to the Church.

MEAN while Otto, after the Victory which Philip King of France had gain'd over him, fled with the miserable Remains of his Army into Saxony, and having given over all Hopes of recovering his lost Grandeur, he was taken ill of a Fever in Brunswick, and died there in the Year 1218. Frederick, now freed from his Rival in Germany, caus'd an Assembly of all the Princes and Prelates of the Empire to be conven'd in Mentz, and after he had settled Peace in that Country, he began to treat with Honorius about his Coronation in Rome. But the Pope, who was resolv'd to be well paid for his Pains, was not easily persuaded to consent, and this Ceremony actually cost Frederick very dear ; for, as Fazzellus says, the Pope would not allow of his coming to Rome to be crown'd, till he had first promis'd him the County of Fondi : This Affair being adjusted, Frederick was allow'd to come, and accordingly assembled a sufficient Army to go into Italy ; and in the mean Time he wrote to the Count of S. Severino, to imprison Dicpoldus his Father-in-Law, who had rais'd new Commotions and Disturbances in the Kingdom, and accordingly the Count shut him up in close Prison. He likewise wrote to the Empress Constantia his Wife, to come to Germany, who, having left Sicily, went by Sea to Gaeta, from thence to Lombardy, and was receiv'd in Verona and other loyal Cities, with great Marks of Respect, and join'd her Husband in Germany in the Beginning of this Year 1219.

DURING these Transactions, Honorius, having Advice that there was great want of Succours in the Holy Land, wrote to Frederick, and all the other Princes and People engag'd in the Crusade, presently to make ready to go to Palestine. Frederick upon his receiving these Letters, confirm'd the Oath he had made to go to the Holy Land, and wrote to the Pope, that after his Coronation in Rome he would undertake that Voyage. Therefore Honorius sent to require Henry Count of Brunswick, and the Duke of Saxony (who under pretence that Frederick was not lawfully crown'd, still kept the Crown, the Launce, and the other Imperial Ensigns) forthwith, under the Pain of Censure, to deliver them up. Frederick leaving his Son Henry, a Boy of eleven Years of Age, in Germany, under the Care of Conrade his Cup-bearer, arriv'd in Italy with the Empress Constantia, and having in vain requir'd of the People of the Milanese, antient Enemies of the House of Suevia, and great Partisans of the deceas'd Otto, to be crown'd in Monza with the Iron Crown, according to the Custom of the antient Emperors ; he pursued his Journey, and was met at Mantua by the Pope's Legate, who had Orders, not to slip so favourable an Opportunity, but before he allow'd him to proceed further, to extort from him what he could ; First he made him swear to defend the Rights of the Church of Rome, and to obey her and her Ministers, and to yield the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily to his Son Henry ; then he made him annul all the Constitutions and Laws against the Liberties of the Church ; in the next Place he made him restore the Dukedom of Spoleto, the Towns belonging to the Countess Matilda, such as Ferrara, Villamediana, Monte Fiascone, and the Cities in Tuscany belonging to St. Peter's Patrimony. He likewise made him give strict Orders for apprehending the Inhabitants of Spoleto and Narni, who were Rebels to the Church, and effectually to give up the County of Fondi, which he had promis'd to do in the Year 1218. From Mantua he pass'd through Modena, and accompanied by Deputies from all the Cities, he made his Entry into Rome, and on the 22d of November this Year 1220, in St. Peter's Church, with great Pomp and Magnificence was crown'd Emperor, and at Mass took an Oath from the Hands of the Pope, to defend the Rights and Estate of the Church, and go with a powerful Army to conquer the Holy Land ; and at the same Instant was sign'd with the Cross by the Hands of Hugo Cardinal and Bishop of Ostia, who in the Year 1227. was elected Pope, and call'd Gregory IX. There were present at this Coronation many Prelates and Barons of our Kingdom, such as Stefano Abbot of Monte Cassino, Ruggieri dell' Aquila Count of Fondi, Giacomo Count of S. Severino, Riccardo Count of Celano, and other Barons mention'd by Riccardo da S. Germano.

FREDERICK, after the Solemnity of his Coronation, in order to gratify Honorius, publish'd in Rome those his Imperial Constitutions, which we now read in the second Book of Fiefs, according to the vulgar and antient Division, under the Title De Statutis, & Consuetudinibus contra libertatem Ecclesie, &c. divided into many Chapters: in the first he revokes all the Statutes and Customs introduc'd against the Liberties of the Church; the Second enjoins severe Punishment to be inflicted upon the Gazari, the Patareni, and other Hereticks; and in the rest Care is taken of Hospitality, last Wills of Strangers, and the Security of Husbandmen, which we find confirm'd by Honorius. And 'tis not to be doubted, that on this Occasion, and in this Year, those Constitutions were publish'd in Rome by Frederick; for besides Riccardo da S. Germano's Testimony¹, Frederick himself in the Proem tells us, that he had publish'd them in die qua de manu sacratissimi Patris nostri summi Pontificis (meaning Honorius) recipimus Imperii Diadema. Three Chapters of which were afterwards inserted in the Justinian Code, under the Title *De Hæreticis*²; and one under the Title De sacr. Eccles.; from which was form'd the Auth. Cassa. & irrita, which we have taken notice of, that these Imperial Constitutions may not be confounded with others which Frederick afterwards publish'd solely for the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, such as that which begins Inconsutilem, and the others which we find amongst the Constitutions of our Kingdom. These are Royal, and not Imperial Constitutions, and were publish'd for these Kingdoms, when the Patareni had crept into our Provinces, and especially into Naples, where in the Year 1231. Frederick caus'd many of them to be imprison'd and punish'd, as shall shortly be related.

BUT though Frederick, so much to his own Detriment, and the Diminution of the Rights of the Empire and Kingdom, had endeavour'd to please the Pope, yet all that did not serve to make him his Friend; for, as Orlando Malavolta in his History of Siena writes, while Frederick was yet in Rome, he observ'd, that the Orders he had given for settling the Affairs of Lombardy, were not executed by the Cities of the Guelf Faction, that sided with the Church; and that this was owing to the Pope, who was unwilling that his Adherents should pay any regard to Frederick's Orders, that he might keep these Factions divided, and render them irreconcilable, lest if these Cities should side with him, Frederick would be too hard for him.

Of the Guelf and Ghibelline Factions.

IN order to the better Understanding of this History, it will be necessary here, to give a brief Account of the Rise and Reason of the Quarrels betwixt the Guelfs and Ghibellines, whom we shall have frequent Occasion to mention, because our Kings were often imbroil'd in these Disputes.

THESE famous Factions did not arise in the Time of Frederick, as some have believ'd, nor was he the Author of them, as Fazzellus unjustly makes him, but they are of a much older Date; Frederick found them already fix'd in Italy, where they had taken deep Root. They began in Germany in the Year 1139, in the Time of the Emperor Conrade III. and in the Reign of Roger I. King of *Sicily*¹. The Ghibellines, who were always Imperialists, took their Names from Gibel, a City where Henry the Son of Conrade was born. The Guelfs, who were always Papists, took their Name from Guelf Duke of Bavaria. These Appellations came afterwards from Germany into Italy, by an Accident that happen'd in Florence, which propagated the Factions in Italy; for a Gentleman of that City, whose Name was Messer Buon-delmonte, of the Family of the Buondelmonti, young, handsom, and genteel, had promis'd to marry a young Lady of the noble-Family of the Amadei; but as he was riding through Florence one Day, and passing by the Palace of a Lady of the Family of Donati, the Lady, taken with the genteel Carriage of the young Gentleman, resolv'd to give him her Daughter in Marriage, who being her Father's only Child, was the Heiress of an opulent Fortune. Therefore the Mother standing at her Door as Messer Buonalmonte return'd, saluted him in a friendly Manner, and began to jest him with the Lady he was to marry, saying, that she did not deserve so worthy a young Gentleman as he was; and adding, I have kept this Daughter of mine for you, a more suitable Match than she whom you have chosen; upon hearing of which Words, and seeing the young Lady of a noble Mien, and wonderful Beauty, he immediately fell in Love with her, and answer'd, That he should be a very great Fool if he refus'd such a generous Offer, and forthwith took her and married her. The Amadei hearing the News of this Marriage, were terribly incens'd against Buondelmonte, who had thus affronted them in breaking his Promise; whereupon they consulted among themselves how to be reveng'd on him, whether they should fight him or beat him; one Messer Mostadi Lamberti, a passionate Man, said he knew better than any of them how to be reveng'd; and soon after, taking some of his Kinsmen along with him, in the Morning of Easter Day, meeting Messer Buondelmonte a Horseback on the old Bridge of the Arno, he attack'd him, dismounted and kill'd him, at the Foot of the Pillar, on which Mars, the antient Idol of the Florentines, stood. The News of which being spread over the City, all betook themselves to their Arms, and the Nobles dividing themselves into two Factions, took the Names of Guelfs and Ghibellines; the Family of the Buondelmonti, with many others, headed one of the Factions, and call'd themselves Guelfs; and the Uberti joining with the Amadei, and many other Families, call'd themselves Ghibellines; which cruel Contagion soon spread itself over the greatest Part of the other Cities of Italy, to their Ruin and Destruction. For in the Disputes betwixt the Popes and the Emperors, those of the Emperor's Party were call'd Ghibellines, and those of the Pope's Guelfs; and the Popes did what they could to keep up the Factions, in order to depress, or at least ballance the Power of the Emperors. Honorius meant to serve Frederick the same way, notwithstanding his so great Condescension. But this Prince taking no notice of it, left Conrade Bishop of Spires, and Imperial Chancellor of Italy, in Tuscany, to keep his old Friends firm to him, and gain over new ones, and departed from Rome for Terra di Lavoro, where his Presence was necessary to prevent any Commotions amongst the factious Barons of the Kingdom; and coming to S. Germano, he was receiv'd with great Honour and Respect by the Abbot Stefano, and then took Sessa, Teano, and the Castle Mondragone from the Count of Fondi, who had possess'd himself of them during the late Troubles.

Of the Capuan Court.

FREDERICK left S. Germano, and went to Capua, where he call'd a general Parliament, in which he took great Care of the Quiet and common Good of the Kingdom. It was at this Time, that by the Advice of Andrea Bonello da Barletta, a famous Lawyer, and Attorney-General, he establish'd a new Tribunal in Capua, call'd Corte Capuana, in which he order'd the Barons, the Corporations of Cities and Towns, and all other Persons, to produce the Grants and Privileges of their Castles, and other Things which they held of him and his Predecessors (excepting the Grants of Tancred and his Children, whom he look'd upon as Usurpers) to be inspected whether they were valid, or had been illegally granted in Time of Troubles; declaring, that those who did not produce them should forfeit their Grants and Privileges, which should return to the Crown; and besides, he revok'd some of them that had been surreptitiously obtain'd: Of which, besides what Riccardo da S. Germano has written ¹, we have among our Constitutions an intire Title, De Privilegiis a Curia Capuana revocatis. We have taken notice of this, that it may not be believ'd, that Frederick instituted this Court in Naples, as Camillo Salerno ², and Tutini ³ have written; for it was erected in Capua, and therefore call'd Capuana. This Prince rais'd Naples afterwards above all the other Cities by founding an University there, and by the Tribunal of the High Court, of which we shall have occasion to discourse hereafter.

^a Camil. Salern. in præfat. ad consuet. Fr. And. pag. 156. disp. Feud.

BUT Bonello, the Contriver of this Court, was much blam'd, because it was very prejudicial to many, whose Privileges were either revok'd, or for not being produc'd in Time, were reckon'd not valid afterwards; which made our Commentators upon that Constitution have a bad Opinion of that Institution, and speak of it with Contempt, as founded neither on Law or Justice, and favouring of Tyranny; but Marino da Caramanico, an antient Glossator, defends it against all their Calumnies.

FREDERICK in this general Parliament likewise ordered all the Castles and Forts, which any of the Barons had lately built in the Kingdom, to be demolish'd; of which Frederick makes mention in another Constitution, under the Title De Edificiis novis ⁴; and after having made other Regulations, which, according to Riccardo da S. Germano, were contain'd in twenty Chapters, he put an End to the Parliament, and in the Beginning of the Year 1221. he went from Capua to Sessa, where he divested Riccardo Brother of the deceas'd Pope Innocent, of the County of Sora, which the Governors of the Kingdom had given him while Frederick was under Age, as we have above related ⁵. He likewise order'd Ruggiero dell' Aquila to besiege the Castle of Arce, which was held out by Stefano Cardinal of S. Adrian, who surrender'd it; and at the Request of the Germans he set Count Diopoldus at Liberty, who had been in Prison since the Year 1218.

AT the same Time he gave the County of Cerra to Tommaso d' Aquino, and made him Chief Justice of Puglia, and Terra di Lavoro ⁶. Thereafter he went to Bojano, accompanied by many Barons, in order to curb the Insolence of the Count of Molise, and some other Barons; and after having humbled them, and restor'd Peace to that Province, he made a Progress into Calabria and Puglia, where there were likewise Commotions; for many Prelates and Barons, who, during his Minority, had been accusom'd to live under no Restraint, had resolv'd not to obey him, but when they thought fit; therefore he immediately resolv'd to chastise their Insolence, whereupon some Barons being driven out, and others forc'd to fly, they all retir'd to Rome under the Protection of Pope Honorius; Frederick complain'd, that Honorius protected his Enemies and Rebels, and fomented Rebellion in his Dominions, by instigating the rest of the Bishops to do the same; so that for the Security of the State, he was forc'd to drive many of them out of Puglia, and appoint other Bishops in their Place; and for supporting his Army, to tax indifferently both Churches and Clergy ⁷.

C H A P. I.

*The first Rise of the Discords betwixt the Emperor Frederick II.

TH E S E were the first Seeds of Enmity betwixt Frederick and Honorius. Frederick complain'd of Honorius, that besides encouraging the Cities of the Guelf Faction to stand out against him, he receiv'd his Enemies and Rebels under his Protection, and likewise stirred up many Prelates of the Kingdom to foment Rebellion. On the other hand Honorius, seeing the Bishops expell'd, and others put in their Places by Frederick, and the Churches tax'd, complain'd loudly of him, for violating the Immunity and Liberty of the Church, which after his Coronation he had sworn to maintain, and for that end had establish'd many Constitutions. He likewise exclaim'd against him for assuming the Authority to give Induction to Prelates, and turn out those he had made; whereupon he sent his Legates to him, to get them restor'd to their Sees.

BU T Frederick answer'd them, That it had been always in the Power of Princes to drive such Prelates as they suspected and could not trust, out of their Dominions; and that from the Time of Charles the Great, it had been lawful for the Emperors to give the Investiture of Bishopricks with the Ring and Mace, and that it was an antient Prerogative of the Kings of Sicily, likewise to give Investiture, and their Assent; that this Prerogative could not be impair'd by Innocent III. though he had done so during his Minority, and the Reign of his Mother Constantia; and that he would sooner part with his Crown, than quit a Jot of his Right.

ON the other hand the Pope wrote a very smart Letter, recorded by Pirro, to all the King's Ministers in Sicily, not to suffer Taxes to be levied upon the Clergy and Ecclesiastical Persons, but to let them enjoy the same Immunity that they had in the Time of William II. Some write, that amidst these Disputes, Frederick, before he went to Sicily, held another Parliament in Melphis, and that he caus'd the Volume of his Constitutions, by his Order, collected by Pietro delle Vigne, to be publish'd there. And indeed by the Date, they would seem to be in the right; for in the vulgar Edition, the Date is thus, Actum in solemn Consistorio Melfiensi, Anno Dominice Incarnationis M. CC. XXI. But because Riccardo da S. Germano makes no mention of this Parliament held in Melphis this Year, but says, there was one held in that City in the Year M. CC. XXXI. where these Constitutions were establish'd, therefore we forbear to speak of this Collection till the Time assign'd by Riccardo, when we shall clearly prove, that it was not made this Year, and that by an Error of the Printer, 1221 has been put for 1231.

TH I S true, he publish'd some of his Constitutions this very Year, but not in the Parliament of Melphis, but in that which he held at Messina, after he had settled the Affairs of Puglia, which were likewise inserted afterwards in that Volume by Pietro delle Vigne, together with those he publish'd in Capua, and others establish'd elsewhere on various Occasions, of which we shall treat at large, when we come to discourse of this Collection.

rent, sed immunes eos haberent, ut olim sub Willelmo II.

AFTER Frederick had put an end to this Parliament in Messina, he went to Palermo, where he order'd a general Tax, viz. The Twentieth Part of the Revenues of Ecclesiasticks, and the Tenth of those of Laicks to be levied over all his Dominions, not out of Avarice, as has been unjustly laid to his Charge, but for the Relief of the Holy Land, especially Damiata, which was closely besieg'd by the Soldan of Egypt. He sent the Money thus collected by Guallieri della Pagliara, and Errico Count of Malta, High Admiral of Sicily, but after they had arriv'd at Damiata, that City, which had cost so much Labour to conquer it, by the ill Conduct of the Cardinal Pelagius, and all the other Princes of the Christian Army, was lost, and shamefully restor'd to the Soldan of Egypt, which so inrag'd Frederick against the High Chancellor and High Admiral, who had consented to so ignominious a Surrender, that he imprison'd the Count, and stripp'd him of all his Lands and Offices, and the Chancellor fled to Venice, where, perhaps, he died in Exile, since there's no more mention made of him in the Writings of these Times. Dominico di Gusman, who was afterwards Sainted, died at this very Time in Bologna.

IN the Month of February of this Year 1222, while Frederick kept his Court in Catania, the Pope receiv'd the News of the Loss of Damiata, upon which he left Rome and went to Anagnia, and, according to his ordinary Custom, began to inveigh bitterly against Frederick, that he had, contrary to the Rights of the Church, tax'd the Ecclesiasticks, turn'd out the Bishop of Aversa, lawfully elected, and put in another of his own Head, and had done the same in Salerno and Capua: That by his delaying to go to the Holy Land, as he had vow'd, the Christians had lost Damiata, whereas if he had been there, that City would not have been so disgracefully lost. Frederick resolving to clear himself from these Accusations, left Sicily, and went to meet with the Pope, who had gone to Veruli, where they conversed together for Fifteen Days running, and after they had made up Matters betwixt themselves, they appointed a general Meeting of all the Princes in Verona, in order to concert how to send Relief to the Christians in Palestine; Frederick promis'd anew to go thither in Person with a powerful Army, betwixt that and a certain prefix'd Day, without fail.

MATTERS thus settled with the Pope, Frederick went to Puglia, and after he had settled the Affairs of that Province, he was forc'd to return in all Haste to Sicily, where the Saracens had rebell'd; and while he was gallantly defeating these Rebels, the Empress Constantia died in the City of Catania, after she had born Two Sons to him, Henry, and another nam'd Giordanus, who died young¹.

THE Emperor Frederick, who, at this Time, was only 25 Years of Age, being left so young a Widower, got his only Son Henry, then in Germany, to be declar'd his Successor, and crown'd King of Germany in Aix la Chapelle; and Bzovius says, that Frederick hasten'd this Coronation, because Damiata being lost, the Pope was very pressing upon him to go to the Holy Land; and therefore he made haste to have his Son married to Margaret, Daughter of Leopold Archduke of Austria.

AFTER Frederick had triumph'd over the Saracens, and Mirabet their Leader, he return'd to Puglia, where he receiv'd fresh Complaints from the Pope, because the Officers rais'd Contributions from the Churches and Ecclesiasticks; which so offended Honorius, that he sent the Prior of St. Maria la Nuova to the Emperor, to forbid it. Frederick mov'd by the Pope's Request, wrote to his Officers, ordering them to tax the Churches and Ecclesiasticks no more.

CHAP. II.

The Union of the Crown of Jerusalem to that of Sicily.

AMONG other Titles wherewith Frederick was adorn'd as King of Sicily (under which Name all the Provinces of the Kingdom of Naples, as well as the Island of Sicily, were comprehended in these Times) that of King of Jerusalem was one; whence his Successors, as Kings of this Realm, claim that specious Title, and have the Patronage of the Temple of that City, and the Sepulchre of our Saviour; the only and poor Remains that are left us, since that Kingdom became subject to the Turks. And seeing this Subject has not been handled with that Dignity and Clearness it deserves, it will be necessary to treat of it in a particular Manner.

OUR Writers have mention'd two Unions of the Crown of Jerusalem with that of Sicily. The first was in this Year 1222, in the Person of the Emperor Frederick II. King of Sicily, by Right of Jole his second Wife; which has the better Foundation of the Two, as we shall presently shew. The other in the Year 1272, in the Person of Charles I. of the Family of Anjou, by the Surrender of Mary Daughter of the Prince of Antioch, which, as we shall shew in its Place, as its Foundation is not very clear, is not much regarded.

THE Kingdom of Jerusalem, after the Death of Baldwin, Brother of the famous Godfrey of Boulogne, who was the first that was elected King thereof, in the Year 1119, came to Baldwin II. his Cousin German, who having no Male-Issue, in order to secure the Succession of that Kingdom to his eldest Daughter Milfinda, married her to Fulk Count of Anjou, who got the Title of King of Jerusalem in the Year 1135.

BALDWIN III. his Son, succeeded him, and afterwards his Brother Amoricus. This last left a Son, nam'd Baldwin IV. Thirteen Years of Age, who reign'd Twelve Years; Raimond Count of Tripoli being Regent.

THIS Baldwin had two Sisters, but no Children. The elder Sister was nam'd Sibilla, and the younger Isabella. Sibilla was married to William Marquis of Monferate, and brought him a Son nam'd Baldwin. After William's Death, Baldwin IV. her Brother, King of Jerusalem, gave Sibilla in Marriage to Guido of Lusignan, and likewise appointed him his Successor; but afterwards doing Justice to his Nephew, he chang'd his Mind, and caus'd his Nephew, call'd Baldwin V. to be crown'd King, and made the Count of Tripoli his Tutor.

BALDWIN V. died soon after Baldwin IV. his Uncle, and left no Issue; whereupon the Count of Tripoli, and Guido of Lusignan contended for the Crown; and Sibilla had the Interest to get it for her Husband Guido; which so disgusted the Count, that he kept a secret Correspondence with Saladin, Calif of Egypt, who, by his Conquests, having made himself Master of Egypt, Africa and Syria, and declar'd War against the Christians of Syria, came and laid Siege to Tiberias. Guido King of Jerusalem came to relieve it; but Necessity forcing the Christians to come to an Engagement, and the Count of Sicily deserting them, they were defeated. The King of Jerusalem was made Prisoner, and the Christian Army intirely routed. The Result of this Defeat was the Loss of almost all the Kingdom of Jerusalem: Tiberias and the other neighbouring Cities were taken: Acre, Berytus,

Berytus, and Ascalon were surrender'd, on Condition that King Guido should be set at Liberty. At last Saladin besieg'd Jerusalem, and took it by Capitulation, so that the Christians had nothing left them in Asia, but three Places, to wit, Antioch, Tripoli and Tyre. All these Misfortunes happen'd to the Christians in the Year 1187.

CONRAD Marquis of Monferate, after Sibilla's Death, without Children, married Isabella her Sister, in whose Right he claim'd the Kingdom of Jerusalem, now lost, and resolv'd to defend the City of Tyre to the last; for Tripoli had been given to Baldwin Prince of Antioch, upon the Death of the Count, who died of Grief, because Saladin had betray'd him, in not making him King of Jerusalem as he had promis'd.

The Pope and Princes of Europe, seeing the deplorable State to which the Christians of the East were reduc'd, prepar'd to go thither to their Relief; and in the Year 1188, the Crusade being resolv'd upon, the Kings of France and England in the Year 1190, set out with their Armies, and after a prosperous Voyage, arriv'd in Palestine, fought Saladin, and took the City of Acre. But the King of France being much afflicted with a grievous Distemper, resolv'd to return home, and leave a Part of his Army in Palestine; and before he departed, he, together with the King of England, made up the Differences, which, to the great Prejudice of the Christians, had arisen betwixt Guido of Lusignan, and the Marquis of Monferate, about the Kingdom of Jerusalem. According to some Writers, it was decided thus; that Guido, during his Life-time, should enjoy the Title of King of Jerusalem, and that after his Death, the Marquis of Monferate, or his Children, should have the Crown. It was likewise determin'd that the Cities of Tyre, Sidon, and Berytus should remain to the Marquis.

THE Marquis of Monferate had no Sons by his Wife Isabella, but only four Daughters. The Eldest was Mary, who was married to John Count of Brenna: Alisia, the Second, according to Summontes, was married to Hugo King of Cyprus: Sibilla the Third, to the King of Armenia; and Melisina the Fourth, according to the same Writer, was married to the Prince of Antioch, to whom she bore Mary, who, by Right of her Mother, claim'd the Kingdom of Jerusalem.

THUS were the Rights to the Kingdom of Jerusalem, transmitted to the Posterity of Isabella Daughter of Amoricus, and Sister of Baldwin IV. King of Jerusalem, and each of them set up for these Rights, but none of them for the Possession, because the Kingdom was under the Dominion of Saladin. Among all the Pretenders, John Count of Brenna, was thought to have the best Title, who, by Right of his Wife Mary, Isabella's eldest Daughter, took the Title of King of Jerusalem; and by her had a Daughter nam'd Jole, or, as some call her, Joalanta or Violanta, who, on the Death of her Mother, had the best Right to that Kingdom.

AFTER the Surrender of Damiata, the Christian Army return'd from Palestine to Puglia, and together with them came Hermanus Salza, Great Master of the Teutonic Order, and went to wait upon the Emperor Frederick, and persuade him to go to the Conquest of the Holy Land, and in order to get him to consent, he propos'd to him, that now being a Widower, he ought to marry Violante, commonly call'd Jole, a beautiful and genteel young Lady, and only Daughter of John Count of Brenna, and the deceas'd Mary Queen of Jerusalem, his Wife, whose Heiress Violante was, and inherited the Right to that Kingdom; which, with his own Forces, he would be able to recover from the Soldan, and likewise conquer all the other most fruitful Provinces of Egypt, possess'd by a dastardly People. The Emperor lik'd the Proposal mightily, and said, That he would gladly have the Marriage concluded: Whereupon the Great Master took upon him to manage the Matter, and went to Rome to wait upon the Pope, who receiv'd him courteously, and after various Discourses about the Affairs of Palestine; Honorius ask'd him what was proper now to be done for the Recovery of those Holy Places from the Bondage they were in? The Grand Master, who wanted to have such a Question ask'd, presently answer'd, That the best way was to get the Emperor to be interested in these Dominions, by which Means, he would not only perform the Promise he had given, but for his own Interest and Honour, would go thither to make War; and when Honorius ask'd, How that could be brought about? he

answer'd, by marrying him to King John's Daughter, and getting that King to surrender the Right he had to the Kingdom of Jerusalem, by virtue of his Wife, to the Emperor as a Portion with his Daughter : This Answer highly pleas'd the Pope, who ask'd what Methods could be fallen upon to get both Parties to consent to this Marriage ; the Grand Master answer'd, That he might write to the King, and Fr. Guerino de Montagu, with whom the King advis'd in all his Affairs, and invite them to come to Rome, for that he had an important Matter to impart to them ; concerning the Conquest and Defence of those Countries ; and upon their coming he might persuade them to consent to the Marriage, and that he himself would infallibly get the Emperor to agree to it. This at first startled the Pope, lest the Absence of Two such Personages might be of dangerous Consequence to Palestine ; but the Great Master assur'd him that no such thing could happen, because of the Peace lately concluded with the Soldan, whereupon the Pope wrote immediately to the King and Fr. Guerino to come to Rome, because he had Matters of great Consequence to impart to them concerning the Holy Land. Upon Receipt of these Letters, King John, in Obedience to the Pope, presently imbark'd, together with the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and the Bishop of Betlehem, and in a short Time arriv'd at Rome, and waited on the Pope, who receiv'd him graciously, and after some Discourse about the Marriage, the King consented to it ; of which the Great Master having acquainted the Emperor, he forthwith left Sicily, and came to St. Germano ; from thence at the Invitation of some Cardinals, he went to Campagna di Roma, whither the Pope came shortly after, and they met in Ferentino, where all Differences were made up, and the Marriage concluded, the Emperor solemnly promising, in presence of the Pope, the Cardinals, and the Great Masters of the Hospitallers and Teutonicks, to take Jole to Wife, with the Rights to the Kingdom of Jerusalem as her Portion, and within two Years to go with a powerful Army in order to conquer the Holy Land. That this Marriage was thus concluded, not only Bzovius, and Riccardo da S. Germano, but likewise Honorius, in one of his Letters to Philip King of France, exhorting him also to go to the Conquest of the Holy Land, witnesseth.

THE Marriage being thus concluded, it was immediately order'd, that Jole should be conducted from Palestine to Italy, and King John went to Spain to visit the Church of the Apostle St. James in Galicia, where he married Berengaria Daughter of Alphonfus IX. King of Leon, and return'd through France, where he had great Possessions, to Vienna his native Country ; and Frederick left Ferentino, and return'd to our Kingdom, and by the Way of Sora went to Celano, from thence to Puglia, and after a short Stay in Bari, he sail'd again for Sicily.

THUS then did King John of Brenna, who, for 27 Years, by Right of Queen Mary his Wife, had enjoy'd the Title of King of Jerusalem, but without Dominions, (for the Holy Land was already subjected to the Soldan of Egypt) give with his Daughter Jole the Title and Rights of that Kingdom to the Emperor, and his lawful Heirs, whence the Kings of Sicily are also call'd Kings of Jerusalem. 'Tis true, Frederick did not begin the same Year that the Marriage was concluded, to intitle himself in his Diplomas and other Writs, King of Jerusalem, but in the Year 1225, when Jole came to Italy, and the Marriage was celebrated with great Pomp, and consummated in Brindisi, he began to take that Title, and would be crown'd with the Crown of that Kingdom ; and besides, he would have the Lord of Tyre, and many other Barons of Palestine, who had accompanied King John, to swear Fealty to him, and he sent the Bishop of Molfetta with two Counts, and 300 Sicilian Soldiers to Ptolemais, to receive in his Name the wonted Homage and Oath, and confirm Hugo de Montbeliard a French Gentleman, Viceroy and Governor of that Kingdom, whom King John had left in the same Station ; so that, according to Inveges, Frederick in his Diplomas took the Title of Rex Hierusalem. But it is not true, as the same Author says, that Frederick, for two Reasons, always preferr'd this Title to that of Sicily, first for the Honour of that Holy City ; and secondly, because the Crown of Jerusalem was more antient, than that of Sicily ; in which he's in the Right (if we go not so far back as the Times of the antient Tyrants of that Island) for Jerusalem had the Title of Kingdom from the Time of Urban II. in the Year 1099, when Godfrey of Boulogne conquer'd it ; and Sicily got that Title in the Year 1130, in the Time of Roger the first Norman King, as we have told in the Eleventh Book of this History ; but we see the contrary in many Diplomas, wherein wherein the Title of King of Sicily is plac'd before that of Jerusalem ; particularly in the Proem to our Constitutions, where the Titles are read thus: Italicus, Siculus, Hierosolymitanus. Whence our Kings quarter the Cross of Jerusalem in their Arms, and justly value themselves upon that Prerogative.

BUT Stephen, a Monk of Lusignan, in his Chronicle of Cyprus, sets up the Kings of Cyprus in opposition to those of Sicily, and will have it, that the Rights to the Kingdom of Jerusalem belong to those as nearest Heirs ; and says, that for that Reason, the Kings of Cyprus were wont to be first crown'd Kings of Cyprus in Nicosia, and afterwards Kings of Jerusalem in Famagusta ; but he is very widely mistaken, for 'tis very clear from the Genealogy of the Kings of Jerusalem, that Queen Mary the Mother of Jole, was the nearest Heiress, as the eldest Daughter of Isabella the Daughter of Amoricus King of Jerusalem.

S E C T. I.

Frederick transports the Saracens out of Sicily to Lucera of Puglia; and Lucera de Pagani.

THE Emperor Frederick, taken with the pleasant Situation of Naples, resolv'd to raise that City above all the others of the Kingdom of Puglia. Those who will not have King William to have built Castello Capuano in Naples, say, that Frederick was the Founder of it in the Year 1223, and pretend, that Castello dell' Uovo, and Castello di S. Eramo only, were built by the Normans. This Prince was the first that laid the Foundation of the Growth of Naples, whence in process of Time, it became the Head and Metropolis of a noble Kingdom, and rais'd itself above all the other Cities ; for the Year following 1224, he founded an University there, and invited Scholars to it, not only from the other Provinces, but even from Sicily, which, as we shall shew by and by, contributed much to the Increase of the Inhabitants.

THIS Year 1223, Frederick was at War again with the Saracens of Sicily, besieg'd and fought them in several Places, for disturbing the Quiet of the Kingdom, and after he had subdu'd them, he did not think fit to let them continue any longer in that Island, as being too near to Africa, from whence they frequently got Succours, but transported a great Number of them to Puglia, and assign'd them the City of Lucera for a Habitation, and this was the first Colony of Saracens that came from Sicily to Lucera. The second came in the Year 1247, when Frederick caus'd the miserable Remains of them to be transported from Sicily, to the other Lucera, on that account call'd de Pagani ; the first Colony, in process of Time, having possess'd themselves of all Japygia, now call'd Capitanata, oppress'd the People of that Province, by their licentious Way of living ; Frederick, and after him Manfred, wink'd at them, because, as brave Soldiers, they made use of them frequently in their Wars with the Popes, and other Lords and Cities of Italy ; till Charles I. of Anjou, after he had got Possession of the Kingdom, by a long War, and powerful Armies, expell'd them altogether, as we shall shew in the Progress of this History.

C H A P. III.

Of the University of Naples, instituted by Frederick.

*N*APLES being a Greek City, had Schools from the Time it was first founded, where good Learning was taught; Frederick this Year 1124, restor'd these Schools, and turn'd them into the Form of an Academy. He was not the first Founder of Schools in Naples, as some have believ'd: He only enlarg'd them, and put them into a more noble Form, and of private Schools, for the Use of the City alone, made them an University for all the Kingdom of Sicily, and chose Naples for a Nursery to all the Youth, both of our Kingdom and that of Sicily.

SEVERAL Reasons mov'd this wise Prince to erect this famous University in Naples, as he himself in his Letters, which we read in Pietro delle Vigne, his Secretary and Counsellor, testifies¹. First, because that City was always esteem'd the antient Mother and Nursery of Learning; secondly, because of the Sweetness of its Climate; and lastly, because it was situated in a convenient Place, in the Neighbourhood of the Sea, where both by the Fertility of the Country, and Commerce by Sea, all Things necessary for human Life were in Plenty, and whither Youth could be brought either by Sea or Land.

RICCARDO da S. Germano, a Contemporary Writer, tells us, that Frederick, in the Month of July in the Year 1224, instituted this University, and for that End dispatch'd Letters over all the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia: Mense Julio, says he, pro ordinando Studio Neapolitano Imperator ubique per Regnum mittit literas generales. We read some of these Letters in the Six Books of Letters, written by Pietro delle Vigne, in which we have an Account of the Form of this University, and of the many Privileges bestow'd on it. First he chose the brightest Men to be Professors in all Faculties, and appointed them large Salaries, and he invited Professors from remote Parts, and forbid them to teach in any private School, either within or without the Kingdom, but only in this University². Among others, he invited, and settled large Salaries upon two notable Men Masters (for Master at that Time was the same as Doctor now a-days) Petrus d'Ibernia, and Robertus di Varano, whom Frederick himself calls, Civilis Scientiæ Professores, *Magnæ Scientiæ, notæ virtutis, & fidelis experientiæ*³: And that nothing might be wanting, he likewise invited other Professors of all Arts and Sciences, as he says in his eleventh Letter: In primis, quod in Civitate prædicta Doctores, & Magistri erunt in qualibet facultate.

BESIDES Professors of Law, he also appointed Professors of Divinity; and those he chose either from among the Monks of the Monastery of Monte Cassino, at that Time famous for Learning, or from those of the Orders of St. Dominick, or St. Francis, Two Orders lately sprung up, which had acquir'd great Fame both for their Sanctity and Learning. And when, by reason of the Factions, which, in the Year 1240, these Monks kept up against Frederick, on account of the Differences betwixt him and Gregory IX. he was oblig'd to banish them all out of the Kingdom, as Disturbers of the publick Peace; in order to make up the Loss of these Professors of Divinity, he wrote a Letter to Erasmus a

Monk of Cassino, and Professor of Divinity there, inviting him to come to Naples to supply that Want. This Letter is still preserv'd in the Library of Cassino, and is recorded by the Abbot of *Nocce*¹, and bears this Inscription: Honestissimo, & peritissimo viro Magistro Herasmo Monacho Casinensi Theologicæ Scientiæ Professori: Universitas Doctorum, & Scholarium Neapolitani Studii Salutem, & optatæ felicitatis augmentum.

THIS University had likewise Professors of the Canon Law; and Summontes says, There is a Writ in the Royal Archives of Naples, in the Register of the Emperor Frederick II. which mentions the Institution of this University, which begins thus: Scriptum est Clero, Baronibus, Militibus, Bajulis, Judicibus, & Universo Populo Neapolitano; wherein, among other Things, 'tis ordain'd, That no Person born in the Cities of Lombardy, that had lately rebell'd against him, should be receiv'd in this University. Among the other Doctors which he invited, Bartolomeo Pignatello of Brindisi, a famous Canonist, was one.

FREDERICK likewise provided this University with Professors of Physick; so that Naples began to vie with the College of Physicians of Salerno, and he ordain'd by a Constitution², that none should presume to teach Physick or Chirurgery, in any part of the Kingdom, except in Naples or Salerno; and that none should receive a Degree in Physick or Surgery, before they were examin'd by the Physicians of these Two Universities; and that after these Physicians had given their Letters of Approbation, they should not practise Physick till they were presented to his Officers and Professors of that Art, deputed by him for that Effect; and however qualified and fit they were declar'd to be, they should not practise without the express Licence of the Prince, or in his Absence, of his Viceroy³. Whence Luca di Penna, and Agnello Acramone have written, that formerly our Kings alone licens'd Physicians⁴. According to *Andrea d'Isernia*⁵, this was alter'd by the succeeding Kings, who order'd, that those who had a mind to take the Degree of Doctor, should present themselves before the Person appointed by the King to have the Inspection of the Universities; and at this very Day in Naples, the Power of conferring the Degree of Doctor of Physick, or of other Professions, is lodg'd in the High Chancellor of the Kingdom; but in Salerno, the Power of conferring the Degree of Doctor of Physick belongs to the College of Physicians; whence the University of Naples, has not, like other Universities of Europe, Power to confer the Degree of Doctor, but only to give Letters of Approbation, the King having reserv'd that Prerogative to himself, and deputed the High Chancellor, to exercise it in his Name.

FREDERICK, besides having provided this University with Professors of all Faculties, and granted them Power to give Letters of Approbation to those who had a mind to take Degrees, likewise endow'd it with many noble Privileges, both with respect to the Persons of the Professors, and Scholars.

IN order to render this University more famous and numerous, he ordain'd that none but Professors should teach there, and that no Scholars should go to any City, either of this Kingdom or of Sicily to be taught, but to Naples only⁶. He was so nice and positive in that Point, that when by the severe Prohibition of all Schools in any other Part of the Kingdom, the Justice of Terra di Lavoro doubted, whether Grammar Schools were comprehended in the Edict; Frederick in a Letter, which we likewise find in the Six Books of Letters of *Pietro delle Vigne*⁷, declar'd they were not.

HE also granted to this University, and to the Doctors and Masters thereof, Jurisdiction and Power to take Cognizance of the civil Causes of the Scholars, as we read in that Letter, which he directed to the Scholars themselves, inviting them to this University: *Item omnes Scholares in civilibus, sub eisdem Doctoribus, & Magistris debeant conveniri*⁸. And in order to make it the more numerous, he commanded all the Governors of Provinces, to oblige, under severe Penalties, all the Scholars within their Jurisdictions, to come and study in Naples, and not to go to any Place else, either within or without the Kingdom ¹. He likewise sent express Orders to the Lieutenant of Sicily, to invite all the Youth of that Island to come and study in Naples, where they should enjoy many Privileges, Franchises, and Immunities ². And in the Year 1226, when Bologna rebell'd against him, he order'd, that all the Scholars there should go to study in Naples or Padua; and in the Year 1233, this University having suffer'd very much, by reason of the Broils that happen'd in the Kingdom on account of the Differences betwixt Frederick and the Pope; which Frederick made up, and restor'd them to their former State ³.

THIS Prince, in order to encourage Youth in the Study of Learning, granted the Scholars many Privileges. He declar'd that he would take them under his particular Care and Protection, and that both on their Journey to, and Stay in Naples, they should be well treated, and no wise molested in their Persons or Goods; that they should have the best Lodging in the City at easy Rates; that Money should be lent them for their necessary Occasions; that they should be furnish'd with Grain, Wine, Flesh, Fish, and all other Necessaries of Life, at the same Price with the Neapolitan Citizens; and besides these Privileges, which we read in one of his Letters recorded by Pietro delle Vigne in his third Book ⁴, Frederick made many other Provisions for this University, of which, as occasion offers, we shall make mention. Manfred his Son followed his Example, and we read some of his Letters in Baluzius ⁵, where he shews how much he had at Heart to provide this University with able Professors, in order to make Learning flourish.

AFTER Frederick had instituted so illustrious an University in this City, and brought the Scholars of both the Kingdoms of Sicily to it, Naples began to raise its Head above all the other Cities of these Provinces; and this was the first Step towards its becoming the Metropolis of the Kingdom.

THIS renown'd Prince, during his frequent Residence in Naples, added many other Advantages to it; for his High Court, in these Times the supreme Tribunal, where the most weighty Cases are decided, made this City to be much frequented; and though in his Time this Court had not acquir'd that Superiority over all the other Courts of the rest of the Cities of these Provinces, as that all Pleas could be brought before it by way of Appeal, yet it had the Power of judging Criminal and Feodal Causes, High Treason, &c. (as we see establish'd in his Constitutions) of which the other Courts were not competent Judges.

THIS Prince likewise gave more Judges to Naples than to the Cities of other Provinces; for in them there were only three Judges, and one Notary, but Naples and Capua in this Kingdom, had five Judges, and eight Notaries, as Messina in Sicily had.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Lawyers who flourish'd amongst us in these Times.

NAPLES became likewise famous by the knowing and learned Lawyers and Judges of the High Court; particularly Pietro delle Vigne, Taddeo da Sessa, and Roffredo Beneventano, famous Lawyers in these Times, added much to its Glory. Among Frederick's Letters we have one written to Roffredo, inviting him to go immediately to Naples, to take the Charge of his Court, of which he had chosen him Judge¹. And *Riccardo da S. Germano*² says, that Frederick employ'd this Lawyer in his most weighty Affairs, he having sent him to Rome to bear him out against the Censures which Gregory IX. had thunder'd out against him. Thus from this Time Naples, on account of the Excellency of its University, its famous Professors, the Tribunal of the High Court, and its learned Judges, began to be distinguish'd above all the other Cities of the Kingdom; and Charles I. of the Family of Anjou, chose to fix his Royal Seat there; so that being the Head and Metropolis of all the other Cities, in process of Time it came to be what we now look on with Admiration.

HERE we have the Reason, why, in our Kingdom, the Longobard Laws began to give way to the Roman, and by Degrees, in the following Centuries, to be dis-us'd and forgotten; for the Pandects, and the other Books of Justinian had already got footing in the other Universities of Italy, such as Bologna, Padua, and others, and were publickly taught there; and the Professors, enamour'd with the Elegancy of the Stile, and the Wisdom of the Laws, slighted the Longobard Laws as barbarous, and applied themselves to the Study of the Roman Law; (besides those Lawyers who flourish'd in the Time of Frederick I. Accursius a Florentine, and many others were famous in the Time of Frederick II.) the same was our Case after Frederick establish'd the University in Naples, for the Professors thereof explain'd Justinian's Books in the Schools; from whence they crept into the Tribunals, and the Judges being bred up in these Schools greedily espoused these Laws, and thus by piece-meal the Roman Laws began to get Footing, and have the Authority and Force of Laws in the Courts of Justice. Nevertheless the Longobard Laws were not quite laid aside, for Andrea Bonello da Barletta, Attorney-General to Frederick II. compos'd a Treatise concerning the Difference betwixt the Longobard and Roman Laws, of which we have treated at large in the Tenth Book of this History.

THESE flourish'd with us in this Age, besides Andrea Bonello, other famous Lawyers, according to the Times, and we have yet the Remains of some of their Works; but as for Petrus d' Ibernica, Roberto da Varano, and Bartolommeo Pignatello, Professors of the Civil and Canon Laws in the University of Naples, we have no other account of them than what Frederick himself gives us, that they were *Civilis Scientiæ Professores, magnæ Scientiæ, notæ virtutis, & fidelis experientiæ*³.

EVERY Body knows, that the famous Pietro delle Vigne of Capua, was a noted Lawyer in these Times; and that for his great Learning, Wit, and Eloquence, though born of mean Parents, he was rais'd by Frederick to the first Honours of the Kingdom, such as Privy-Counsellor, Secretary of State, Judge of the High Court, Protonotary of the Empire, and Lieutenant of both the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily; and, which is more, was let into all the Secrets of his Prince. The Germans have endeavour'd to rob us of this famous Lawyer, by making him a German, and not a Capuan (as the French afterwards claim'd Luca di Penna as their Countryman) and Joannes Tritemius is positive in it¹; perhaps he was deceiv'd by his Surname, which he believ'd was taken from Vigna, a famous Monastery of Suevia, near Ravenspurg. But nothing is more clear, than that he was born in Capua, as is manifest from his own Letters², and from one written to him by the Chapter of Capua, which is inserted in the six Books of his Letters³.

HE was most skill'd in the Roman Laws, and altogether intent on restoring them to their ancient Splendor, whence in these Provinces the Study of the Pandects and the Code began to be lik'd, and the Laws contain'd in them to be quoted in the Courts of Justice. Frederick himself speaks thus of them⁴: Nam legis armatus peritia, Digesta digerit, & Codicis Scrupulositates elimat. Whence, by our modern Authors, he is reputed one of the most learned and able Lawyers of the Times, which Character Matteo d' Afflitto and others give him⁵.

ON this account, Frederick intrusted him with the Collection of the Constitutions of our Kingdom, of which more hereafter; and he employ'd him in the most weighty and difficult Affairs of State, whence Dante in his Comedy introduces him speaking thus:

Of Frederick's Heart both the Keys I keep, &c.

BESIDES the Books of our Constitutions, he compos'd six Books of Letters, both in his own, and his Master's Name, written in a very elegant Stile, according to the Age in which he liv'd; these Letters contain many useful and valuable Things, and give great Light into the History of these Times; and Joannes Cuspinianus, an excellent Historian and Poet, says, that almost all Frederick's Actions, and the History of these Times may be very distinctly gather'd from these Books; whence the most accurate and careful Historians, such as Theodore of Nismes, Nauclerus and others, not only quote them in describing Frederick's Exploits, but likewise in giving account of other Points of History. These Books lay long neglected, till Simon Schardius brought them to light, and in the Year 1566. caus'd them to be printed in Basil, which Copies are now become very scarce.

THIS Lawyer likewise wrote an Apology, intitled, De potestate Imperatoris, & Papæ, in Defence of the Rights of the Empire against the Popes; and 'tis said, that Innocent IV. took in Hand to confute it⁶. He made many Orations in Defence of Frederick against the Excommunications which the Popes thunder'd out against him, and among the rest a very learned and elegant one in Padua, on the Excommunication fulminated by Gregory IX. against the Emperor. He also compos'd some pretty Italian Songs, which we read as yet with those of Frederick, and Entius his Bastard Son, King of Sardinia.

SOME believ'd him to be the Author of the Book De tribus Impostoribus; but that is false, and so far was Frederick from employing him to compose that Book, that 'tis doubted whether ever such a Book appear'd in the World.

BUT the unhappy End of this renown'd Lawyer, is a clear Instance of the Instability of worldly Things, of which we shall take notice hereafter in the Year 1243.

IN these Times flourish'd likewise Taddeo da Sessa, who distinguish'd himself so much in the Council of Lyons, and was also a famous Lawyer, and Judge of the High Court, and as well as Pietro, was employ'd by Frederick in the Affairs of State; but he left nothing to transmit his Memory to Posterity: Which cannot be said of Roffredo Epifanio da Benevento, who was a most renown'd Doctor, and Judge of the High Court under Frederick, and the most learned of all that ever had bore that Office. He compos'd many Treatises, which in these Times much illustrated the Law; he compos'd one De libellis, & ordine Judiciorum, and divided it in this manner: I. De Prætoriiis actionibus. II. De Interdictis. III. De Edictis. IV. De Actionibus

V. De Officio Judicis. VI. De bonorum possessionibus. VII. De Senatus consultis. VIII. De Constitutionibus. In the late Editions there are added, Libellorum opus in jus Pontificium, ac quinquaginta quatuor Sabbatinæ quæstiones. Besides these Works, Bishop Liparus ¹ in his Commentaries on Odofredo, tells us, that Camerarius the famous Lawyer had twelve large Volumes on the Civil and Canon Laws, compos'd by Roffredo, and were thought to be written with his own Hand, which Camerarius was resolv'd to publish.

ROFFREDO, when a Youth, went to study the Law in Bologna, whither the Fame of its University drew all the Youth of Italy; and he had for his Masters the chief Doctors of these Times: The First, according to Odofredo, was Ruggieri, one of the first Glossators of the Pandects: He afterwards had Azo, Kilianus, Otho Papiensis, and Cyprianus, all of them famous Lawyers, as he himself in many Places declares. After he had made a wonderful Progress in this Study, in the Year 1215. (as he says in the first of his Quæstiones Sabbatinæ) he was invited to Arezzo to explain the Laws. And finding that the Quæstiones of Pileus, which were read in Bologna to teach the Youth to plead, were of little use, he laid them aside, and resolv'd to explain to his Scholars such Questions as daily occur'd in the Courts of Justice, and because he made them to be recited every Saturday, he call'd them Quæstiones Sabbatinæ. Upon his Return to our Kingdom, in the Year 1227. Frederick chose him for his Advocate, and sent him to Rome on occasion of the Dispute between him and Gregory IX. His Fame became so great in After-times, that upon the Faith that Papinian was of Benevento, he got the Name of the second Papinian. He was buried in Benevento, where, according to a late Writer of Sannio ², his Tomb is to be seen in the Church of S. Dominick.

IN the latter Part of Frederick's Reign Andrea di Capua his Attorney-General flourish'd, and was Father of Bartolommeo the great and famous Doctor of his Time, who, by his Virtue and great Parts, rais'd his Posterity to that Grandeur which they now possess.

CHAP. V.

Pope Honorius III. presses the Emperor Frederick to undertake the Expedition to the Holy Land, but this Pope dies before it was put in Execution.

AFTER Frederick had adorn'd Naples with so famous an University, he was employ'd in a War in Sicily, in order to extirpate the Saracens out of that Island; for supporting which War, he laid a Tax upon the whole Kingdom, whereby he rais'd a vast Sum of Money; for a certain Urbano da Teano, his Collector, brought him 300 Ounces of Gold from the Lands belonging to the Abbey of S. Benedict alone, a considerable Sum in these Times for one Monastery; and because Honorius was grievously offended, that the Churches and Ecclesiasticks should be tax'd; Frederick, with a Design to pacify him, and have him for his Friend, dispatch'd Letters to the Justice of Terra di Lavoro, ordering him to exempt the Monks and Clergy, their Lands, Lands, Castles, and Goods from all Taxes whatsoever, as they were in the Time of William the Good, his Cousin ¹.

BUT the War against the Saracens still requiring more Subsidies, he was forc'd to lay another Tax upon the Kingdom: and to avoid giving Honorius Offence, he order'd the same Sum of 300 Ounces of Gold to be levied out of the Lands of the Abbey of S. Benedict, but under the Name of a Loan, and not of a Tax. This cunning Shift has been practis'd since by many Princes, in order to shun Disputes with the Popes, who, according to the Maxims then lately introduc'd, pretended that Princes, even for the most pressing Occasions of their States, could not impose Taxes upon Churches or Ecclesiasticks, as being contrary to the antient Discipline of the Church, and not within the Regalia of Princes.

THE Year following 1225. King John of Brenna, with Berengaria his Wife, big with Child, came from France to our Kingdom, and by the Emperor's Order were honourably receiv'd in Capua, where, in the Month of April Berengaria brought forth a Daughter, and from thence they both went to Melpbis in Puglia to wait on Frederick, who was shortly expected from Sicily.

FREDERICK, having left a great Army to carry on the War against the Saracens, came over to Puglia; and at the same Time gave the Duke of Bavaria the Charge of the Affairs of Germany, and of his Son Henry, who had been created King of the Romans, and married to Agnes of Austria, and to whom his Father, according to his Promise made to the Pope, had yielded the Kingdom of Sicily.

IN the mean Time Honorius being tormented with the Tumults and Revolutions in Rome, occasion'd by Parenzo a Senator, left that City, and retir'd to Tivoli ², whither Frederick sent King John, and the Patriarch of Alexandria, to ask a longer Time than what had been allow'd him for going to Palestine, because the Affairs of the Kingdom, and the Rebellion of the Saracens requir'd it, and likewise because he was afraid, that the People of the Milaneſe and the Bologneſe in his Absence would raise a Rebellion in Lombardy. The King and the Patriarch got a favourable Answer from the Pope, which they signified to Frederick, who, on the 22d of July, together with the Prelates of the Kingdom, went to S. Germano ³, whither the Pope sent Pelagio Calvano Cardinal of Albano, Giacomo Gualla di Bicchaeri da Vercelli Cardinal of S. Sylvester, and Martino, to take his Oath anew, that he should go to the Holy Land: These Cardinals made him likewise read the Articles set down by Honorius for that Expedition, which among other Things contain'd, that two Years thereafter, which would be ended in the Month of August 1227, he should go and make War in Palestine, and at his own Charges carry with him, to remain there for two Years, a thousand Soldiers, a hundred Chelandri ⁴, a Name of Ships us'd in these Times, and fifty Gallies well-arm'd, and provided with all Necessaries; and that he should transport in his Vessels other Two thousand Soldiers with their Families, reckoning three Horses for each Soldier, according to Riccardo da S. Germano. Frederick having heard these Articles, promis'd punctually to observe them under the Pain of Excommunication, in Presence of many Prelates, German Lords, and native Barons ⁵, and caus'd Rinieri Duke of Spoletto, to swear in his Name, and then he was absolv'd by the Cardinals from his former Oath, which he had taken at Veroſi; and soon after he return'd to Puglia, from whence he dispatch'd Letters to the German and Italian Lords, ordering them to come to Cremona the Easter following ⁶, where he design'd to hold a General Assembly. Thereafter he collected anew a great Sum of Money under the Name of a Loan; and Pietro Lord of Evoli, and Niccolo di Citala Justice of Terra di Lavoro, receiv'd from the Lands belonging to the Monastery of Monte Cassino 1300 Ounces of Gold.

SHORTLY after there arose some Heart-burnings betwixt Frederick and Honorius, because, according to Riccardo da S. Germano ⁷, the Churches of Conſa, Salerno, Aversa, and Capua, and the Abbey of S. Vincent in Volturno being vacant, Honorius, inſcio & irrequisito Imperatore, sent five Prelates from Rome to take Possession of these Churches and Abbey: These Prelates were the Prior of S. Maria della Niccolo da Colle Pietro*, made Abbot of S. Lorenza in Aversa the same way, though he had brought particular Letters from the Pope; and at the same Time sent Ambassadors to the Pope to complain of the Wrong done him².

IN the mean Time the new Empress Jole, having imbark'd in the Gallies, after a prosperous Voyage, landed at Brindisi, whither the Emperor had gone from Sicily to wait her coming, and where on the 9th of Septēber the Marriage was solemniz'd with great Pomp and Magnificence; and as a Remembrance of this Solemnity, he caus'd a new Coin to be struck, call'd Imperiali, and cry'd down the old³.

ENTIUS, Frederick's bastard Son, was born this Year 1239. whom he afterwards crown'd King of Sardinia; and this same Year the Emperor one Day hunting in Puglia, and having kill'd a wild Boar of a prodigious Size, order'd a Supper to be dress'd on the Spot, where a Castle was afterwards built, which to this Time is call'd Apricena.

IN the Beginning of the Year 1226. Honorius sent to press Frederick, who, after the Solemnity of his Marriage, had gone to Troja in Puglia, to make ready for the Expedition to the Holy Land; whereupon the Emperor order'd his Barons to meet him at Pescara, in order to accompany him to the Dyet of Cremona, which had been summon'd the preceding Year. From Troja he went to Terra di Lavoro, and left the Empress in Terracina, a Castle near Salerno, now demolish'd, and return'd to Puglia, and having committed the Government of the Kingdom to Errico di Morra Lord Chief Justice, he went to Pescara, and from thence with all his Army he march'd to Spoletto, and order'd the Spoletians to take Arms and follow him to *Lombardy*⁴; the Spoletians refusing to obey without they had the Pope's Orders, he commanded them a second Time to obey upon their Perils; but they sent his Letters to the Pope, who for other Reasons was grievously offended with Frederick, both on account of the Prelates, whom he kept out of Possession of their Churches, and because he had combin'd with Ezzelino, and publish'd a Constitution, whereby he ordain'd that Monks and Priests that had committed Homicide, or other enormous Crimes, should be punish'd by his Secular Magistrates, and because he had infring'd the Ecclesiastical Immunities in taxing the Clergy: All these had so exasperated the Pope, that he wrote most bitter Letters to Frederick, complaining heavily of these Things. Frederick looking upon these Letters to be too arrogant, answer'd them with the like Boldness; whereupon Honorius, more furiously inrag'd, wrote again in a more haughty, insolent, and threatening manner. Frederick, unwilling to quarrel with the Pope, in order to soften him, wrote him a most submissive Answer, in omni subjectione, as Riccardo says: Whereupon they were again reconcil'd, and the Pope sent Cinzio Savello Cardinal of Porto, to adjust their Differences, that the Expedition to the Holy Land might not be retarded, and the Affairs of Lombardy might be settled. Then Frederick left Spoletto, and went to Ravenna, where he kept his Easter, and wrote to his Son Henry to assemble a strong Army, and march from Germany to Lombardy, where he would meet him; and Faenza not being in his Interest, he did not take that Rout, but march'd with his Army to S. Giovanni in the Territories of Bologna, and from thence to Imola; when he enter'd Lombardy, only Modena, Reggio, Parma, Cremona, Asti, and Pavia sent him Ambassadors, and offer'd him their Service. The other Cities not only did not shew him any Civility, but enter'd into a Confederacy against him; these were, according to Riccardo, Milan, Verona, Piacenza, Vercelli, Lodi, Alessandria, Triviggi, Padua, Vicenza, Torino, Novara, Mantua, Brescia, Bologna, and Faenza: These Cities joining with Goffredo Count of Romagna, and Bonifacio Marquis of Monferrato, and other Cities of Marca Travigiana, form'd an Army, and march'd to take the Pass at the Foot of the Alps, and prevent Henry's entering Italy. In the mean Time the Emperor march'd to Cremona, where he was honourably receiv'd by the Citizens, and held the appointed Dyet, but a very thin one, without a Baron, or Ambassador from any of the confederated Cities.

AFTER the Dyet was over the Emperor left Cremona, and march'd to Parma, where he was waited upon by many Counts and Knights of that Country, and of the Territories belonging to Lucca and Pisa, and particularly the Marquis of Malespini, and he Knighted many of them with his own Hand, which was look'd upon as a great Honour in those Days; from thence he went to meet with the Pope's Legate in the Village of S. Donnino, to get him to facilitate his Coronation with the Iron Crown, which was kept in Monza by the People of the Milanese, who, mindful of the Injuries they had receiv'd from his Grandfather Barbarossa, by no means would consent to his Coronation in their City; therefore Frederick finding that neither Intreaties, nor mild Usage were able to regain these People, nor any of the other confederated Cities to his Interest, in great Wrath he put them all under the Ban of the Empire, declar'd them Rebels, and got the Legate to interdict them, and removing the University from Bologna, he transferr'd it to Naples and Padua, and order'd all the Scholars to leave Bologna, and go to these two Cities to study; but Sigismus says, that none obey'd his Orders.

THE Emperor not having Success in Lombardy, left it, and went to wait on the Pope in Rieti; and after he had complain'd to the Pope of the Obstinacy of the Lombards, he came to Puglia, from whence he sent a fresh Recruit of Soldiers to the Holy Land; and Pietro Lord of Evoli, and Niccolo di Cicala having laid down their Offices of Justices of Terra di Lavoro, Ruggiero di Gallura, and Marino Capece were put in their Places. Frederick being now Friends with the Pope, gave Possession of their Churches to all those Prelates whom the Pope had made, to wit, the Archbishops of Capua, Consa, and Salerno, the Bishop of Aversa, and the Abbot of S. Lorenzo.

THE Pope was very earnest with the Emperor to go upon the Expedition to the Holy Land, which had been diverted and delay'd by the Broils betwixt the Emperor and the confederated Cities; and Frederick had publish'd an Edict, whereby he signified, that the Dissentions of Italy had put a Stop to the Expedition to the Holy Land; and having sent Ambassadors to the Pope to intimate the same, Honorius wrought so effectually, that he made up all Differences; whereupon the Emperor, to please the Pope, promis'd to send immediately a Reinforcement of 1400 Soldiers to the Christians in Palestine. The Emperor and Empress Yole went then to Sicily; and the Pope seeing, that King John of Breima, by reason of the Misunderstanding betwixt him and his Son-in-Law, whose Dominions he had been forc'd to leave, was in great Want, gave him the Command of all that Tract of Land, from Viterbo to Montefiascone; in the mean Time the Emperor, by the Means of Errico Morra his Lord Chief Justice, publish'd new Laws and Ordinantes for the Peace and Tranquility of his Subjects, recorded by Riccardo da St. Germano. This Year Francis, famous for his Miracles and holy Life, who founded the Order of Minors Friars in Affisi, the Place of his Nativity, died, and in process of Time was Sainted.

POPE Honorius, according to Riccardo's Chronicle, died in Rome in the Month of March this Year 1227. after he had govern'd the Church ten Years, seven Months, and thirteen Days, and was buried in Rome, in the Church of S. Maria Maggiore, under a very plain Tomb.

ALTHOUGH the Differences which this Pope had with Frederick, were weighty and frequent, yet they were not such as to oblige this Pope to excommunicate him, as some have unjustly written. The first that fulminated these Thunderbolts against Frederick, were Gregory XI. and Innocent IV. his Successors, as we shall shortly relate.

Frederick's Expedition to the Holy Land.

THE Day after the Death of Pope Honorius, the Cardinals elected Ugolino of the Family of Conti, Son of Tristano d'Alagna, Brother of Innocent III. who was of the Conti's of Segna, and gave him the Name of Gregory IX. who, immediately wrote Letters to all Christian Princes, notifying the Death of his Predecessor, and his own Election, and sent Fra. Guglielmo, a Dominican Monk, to the Emperor to give him an account of his Promotion, and to exhort him to honour and defend the Church of God, to provide for the good Government of his Subjects, and to undertake the Holy War; and besides, he desir'd that Frederick would be pleas'd to order his Subjects to send Provisions and other Necessaries for the Gallies which he design'd to send to Palestine, which Errico Morra Chief Justice, by Frederick's Orders, immediately caus'd to be done¹. Simon Sobardius mentions a Letter full of Encomiums and high Praises, which Gregory wrote to this Prince the first Year of his Pontificate, upon which he assembled all the Justices of the Provinces of his Kingdoms of Sicily, to whom he imparted the Contents of the Pope's Letter, that they might make every Thing ready for the Expedition to the Holy Land; and for that end he laid a general Tax upon all his Vassals, and wrote to his Son Henry to call a Dyet in Aix la Chapelle, and give an Account to his German Barons, that he design'd to set out for the said Expedition in the Month of August next, on the Day of our Lady's Assumption, that all who had a Mind to go along with him might be ready, and come to Puglia, where he had prepar'd Ships for their Embarkation. And sent the Archbishop of Reggio, and Hermanthus Saltza, Great Master of the Teutonic Order, to acquaint the Pope that he was ready to embark, and to send Victuals and Provisions necessary for the Gallies.

IN the mean Time Henry, according to his Father's Orders, had caus'd a Dyet to be conven'd at Aix la Chapelle, to invite the Germans to accompany his Father in the Expedition, whither a great Number of Lords and Prelates came, among the rest Sifridius Archbishop of Mentz, Theodorus Archbishop of Triers, Henry Archbishop of Cologne, with the Archbishops of Saltzburg, Magdeburg, and Breme, with all their Suffragans. There were likewise present the Dukes of Austria, Bavaria, Carinthia, Brabant, and Lorraine: Henry Count Palatine of the Rhine, Lewis Landgrave of Thuringia, and Ferdinand Count of Flanders, who had been taken Prisoner by King Philip in the Battle of Tournay; and after he had been twelve Years Prisoner in Paris, at the Intercession of the Pope and others of his Friends, had been at last set at Liberty. All these mov'd by Henry King of Germany, and their own Christian Piety, were ready to undertake so pious an Expedition; so that reckoning these, and others prevail'd upon by divers Monks and other Ecclesiasticks, sent over all Christendom by the Pope, to encourage the People to take the Cross, at the appointed Time, an infinite Number of Christians met at Brindisi, and its Neighbourhood, insomuch, that, according to the Abbot of Usserg, from the Island of Britain alone there came Sixty thousand. But when the great Heats of the Summer in these barren Parts of Puglia came on, the Northern People, not accusom'd to them, and labouring under all sorts of Inconveniencies, began to die by Thousands, and among others, the Bishops of Angers and Soissons, and the Landgrave of Thuringia were carried off, whereupon these People thus afflicted, set out in order to return to their own Countries; but most of them died by the Way¹.

M. E. A. N. while Frederick, with the Empress Jole, in the Month of August came from Sicily to Otranto, where he left the Empress, and went to Brindisi to join the Army, which, though, by Death and Desertion, reduc'd to a small Number, he caus'd to be embark'd on the Feast of the Assumption, the Day appointed; and returning to Otranto to take his Leave of the Empress, he was taken ill there²; notwithstanding which he went back to Brindisi and embark'd; and after three Days Sailing, not able to bear the Sea, he return'd to Brindisi. Fazzellus says, That Frederick had reach'd the Islands of the Morea and Candia, and that by contrary Winds and his Indisposition, he was oblig'd to return to Brindisi, with those that had rendezvous'd in Lacedemon, and Forty thousand of his Army, if we may credit Sigonius.

WHILE Gregory IX. was in Anagna, he had an Account that Frederick was return'd, which the Pope attributing to his Unwillingness to go upon the Expedition, transported with Rage, on the 29th of September the Feast of St. Michael the Archangel, he declar'd, That Frederick had incurr'd the Excommunication, which Honorius had threatned in St. Germano, if he did not go to Palestine, and accordingly did excommunicate him³, which Sentence is recorded by Bzovius, and Sigonius, it begins thus; Imperatorem Fredericum, qui nec transfretavit, &c.

BZOVIVS adds, that Gregory, besides Frederick's returning from the design'd Expedition, had many other Grounds of Quarrel with him; for he not only had forc'd the Ecclesiasticks of his Dominions to pay Taxes, but on account of a private Grudge he bore the Bishop of Aversa and Roger Count of Celano, he compell'd them to go to Palestine, and put the Count's Son in close Prison, and other such Grievances, which Villani gives us against Frederick; but seeing this Author brings no Voucher but himself for what he says, he deserves no Credit; for Villani, either through Ignorance of the Transactions of our Kingdom, and especially those of Frederick, or as a Guelf, and consequently his Enemy, or for want of Judgment, or out of Partiality, has committed a vast many Blunders, and related Things that never fell out, of which the Authors, who liv'd at the same Time, such as Riccardo, and other careful Recorders of the Transactions of their own Times, make not the least mention.

FREDERICK taking this Sentence of Excommunication as a grievous Affront, left Puglia, and, as a convincing Proof of his Illness, according to Riccardo, went to the Baths of Pozzuolo to be cur'd, and from thence he sent the Archbishops of Reggio and Bari, with Rinaldo Duke of Spoletto, and Errico di Malta his Ambassadors, to the Pope then at Rome, to excuse his not going upon the Expedition, and to represent the Cause of his Delay; but all was to no Purpose, for the Pope gave no Credit to any thing they said in his Vindication, and convening all the Ultramountain Bishops in Rome, and as many as he could get of our Kingdom, on the Eighth Day after the Feast of St. Martin, he again publicly pronounc'd him excommunicated, interdicted his Dominions, and sent Letters to all the Princes of Christendom, to inform them with what he had done. Whereupon Frederick likewise wrote to Lewis King of France, giving him an account of the Injury Gregory had done him, which Letter is among those of Pietro delle Vigne, and in Sigonius, in these Words; Gregorius IX. Sub ea occasione quod nos in termino nobis dato, infirmitate gravati, transire nequivimus ultra mare, contra justitiam primitus excommunicationi subjecit. Whence 'tis evident, that Gregory was the first that excommunicated Frederick, and that what Villani, and others have written, as if he had before been excommunicated by Honorius, contrary to what Riccardo relates, is an idle Story. He also wrote to the Cardinals, complaining heavily that no Credit was given to what his Ambassadors said. He also wrote to all the Princes of Germany, and sent Letters to all the Kings and Princes of Europe, complaining of his being excommunicated, and excusing the Faults laid to his Charge, by giving an Account of the Reasons why the Pope had excommunicated him, and of the Causes of his delaying to go to Palestine, and blaming all the Prelates and Ministers of the Church, and more especially the Romans, for not opposing such a Sentence. He likewise order'd all the Justices of Sicily and Puglia, to oblige the Priests and Monks of their Provinces to say Mass, and not to allow them to go out of the Kingdom, nor to travel from one Place to another without a Licence from them; all which Letters were written by Pietro delle Vigne his Secretary, and, as we have said, a Man of great Wisdom and Learning, and much belov'd by the Emperor, as may be seen in the Book of his Letters.

AFTERWARDS he call'd a general Meeting of all the Barons of the Kingdom in Capua, wherein he oblig'd them to pay a Tax of eight Ounces of Gold for each Fief they held, and for every eight Fiefs, to furnish a Soldier, in order to make up an Army against the Month of May following, when he design'd to go to the Holy Land without fail. For the same End, he order'd another Assembly to be conven'd in Ravenna in the Month of March, whither he summon'd all the Cities and Lords of Italy; and from thence he sent Roffredo Epifanio da Benevento, a famous Lawyer of these Times, to Rome, with his Vindication, which Roffredo caus'd to be publickly read in the Capitol, with the Consent of the Senate and People of Rome.

IN the beginning of the following Year 1228, Frederick assembled in Puglia all the Prelates and Barons that were resolv'd to accompany him to Palestine, and celebrated Easter with great Pomp and Mirth in Barletta, where he had got the News, that Tommaso d'Aquino Count of Acerra, his Marshal in Palestine, had defeated and slain in Battle Conradin Soldan of Damascus, and upon the Count's returning to the Kingdom, Frederick sent Riccardo di Principato to the Holy Land, with a fresh Recruit of Five hundred Soldiers, who embark'd at Brindisi and arriv'd safely in that Country.

AT this very time Gregory, after he had celebrated the Feast of Easter in the Lateran, went to St. Peter's Church to renew the Censures against Frederick; but the Frangipani, and others of Frederick's Faction in Rome, while the Pope was about it, stirr'd up the People to mutiny, and rebel against him, and after having insulted him with opprobrious Language, they drove him out of the City, and forc'd him to fly to Perugia for shelter, where he remain'd for some time.

IN the mean time Frederick, after he had collected a vast Sum of Money for his Expedition, from the Churches and Ecclesiastical Persons, notwithstanding the Pope had, by his Letters, order'd them not to pay any; set out for Barletta, where he design'd to hold a general Meeting; and when he came to Andria, the Empress was brought to Bed of a Son, who was nam'd Conrade, and was more belov'd by his Father than any of his other Children; but Jole never recover'd of the Hardships she suffer'd in this Birth, and died soon after.

THE Death of this Empress is describ'd by Villani, and other modern Authors his Followers, with so many Fables and Stories, that they deserve no Credit; for Riccardo, the faithful Chronologer of these Times, says nothing of it, but that the Empress died of Child-birth; and Corio, in his History of Milan, Sigonius, and the Monk of St. Giustina, say the same; and no Author, that with due attention has written the Transactions of these Times, makes mention that she died in Prison of Blows she had receiv'd from the Emperor, according to Villani; and certainly these Authors, who have not pass'd over in Silence the other Misdeeds of this Prince, would likewise have recorded this, if it had been true; besides, 'tis next to impossible, that he should have had such a Love for the Son Conrade, as will be seen in the Course of this History, if he had so hated the Mother, as to be the Occasion of her Death.

AFTER the Death of Jole, Frederick held his Parliament at Barletta, and being bent on the Expedition to the Holy Land, before he set out, resolv'd to provide for his Kingdoms in case he should die; whereupon, in Presence of the Prelates and great Men of the Kingdom, and an infinite Number of others, he caus'd the following Articles drawn up by himself, by way of last Will, as recorded by Riccardo, to be read with a loud Voice. First, it was his Will, that all his Subjects, Prelates and Barons, and their Vassals, should live in the same Peace and Tranquility which they enjoy'd in the Time of the good King William II. therefore he left as his Vicar and Guardian of the Kingdom, Rinaldo Duke of Spoleto. Secondly, if he should happen to die in the War, which he was going to make in Palestine, his eldest Son Henry should succeed him in the Empire and the Kingdom, and if Henry should die without Issue, his second Son Conrade should succeed him, and if he should likewise die without Children, his own other Children born of lawful Wedlock, should succeed, causing Rinaldo Duke of Spoleto, Errico Morra, and others of the most considerable Men present to swear, That, if he should die, and make no other Will, they should see what he had thus ordain'd, punctually put in Execution. Thirdly, That no Person in the Kingdom should be oblig'd, either by way of Tax, or Collection, to pay any thing, except for the Good of the Kingdom, or on some emergent Occasion.

AFTER these Articles had been thus read, and in Frederick's Name sworn to by the Duke of Spoleto, and Errico Morra his Lord Chief Justice, &c. according to Bzovius, and the Abbot of Ussperg, on the Eleventh Day of August, he set sail from Brindisi with Twenty Gallies, and having before order'd all the transport Ships to rendezvous at St. Andrea dell' Isola, he join'd them there, and touching at Otranto, from thence in a short Time he arriv'd in Palestine, and prepar'd himself for noble Undertakings.

GREGORY IX. who was still in Perugia, hearing of the Emperor's Departure, without being first absolv'd by him from the Censures, as he pretended, in great Indignation wrote to the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and to the Master of the Holy Sepulchre, strictly charging them to beware of Frederick, and give him no Assistance, for he had gone away under the Sentence of Excommunication, and might be of great Detriment to them; besides in Italy the Pope stirr'd up the People of the Milanese, Enemies of Frederick, to enter into a Confederacy with himself against him, and divided Italy into Factions, whence the Number of Guelfs increas'd; and in the mean time he resolv'd upon a new Expedition into the Kingdom of Puglia, with a Design to rob this Prince of it, at the same time that he was at a Distance, and intent on the Expedition of the Holy Land.

ON the other hand Rinaldo Duke of Spoleto, as Frederick's Vicar of the Kingdom, in order to put a Stop to the Pope's Designs, and to involve him in a War in his own Dominions, invaded la Marca, and his Brother Bertoldo, assaulted the Territories of Norcia, and demolish'd the Castle of Brusca, which had stood out against him, and deliver'd up the Inhabitants to the Mercy of the Saracens he had brought with him from Puglia, who put them all to a cruel Death¹.

THESE Things being told the Pope, and that the Duke in a hostile Manner, had enter'd the State of the Church, where he had done great Damage, he admonish'd him to be gone, and leave his Subjects in Peace; but the Duke had no regard for that Order, and the Pope inrag'd, excommunicated him with all his Followers: And seeing the Censures stood him in no stead, with the Assistance of the People of the Milanese, and all the confederated Cities of Lombardy, call'd the Militia of Christ, he assembled a strong Army, gave the Command of it to John of Brenna, formerly King of Jerusalem, and Frederick's Enemy, and Gio. Colonna, the Cardinal Legate, and sent them against Duke Rinaldo.

C H A P. VII.

Pope Gregory IX's Expedition into Puglia.

POPE Gregory finding, that these Forces were not sufficient to stop the Duke's Progress, who had already subjected la Marca, as far as Macerata, to the Dominion of the Emperor, resolv'd to make War in the Kingdom of Puglia, and to turn his Arms against these Provinces, that by putting them in Confusion, the Duke might be oblig'd to come to their Assistance, and leave his Dominions. Therefore, having assembled a new Army, he gave the Command of it to Pandolfo d'Alagna his Legate, Ruggieri dell' Aquila Count of Fondi, and Tommaso Count of Celano, Rebels and Enemies to Frederick.

ON the 18th Day of January this Year 1229, these Commanders with their Soldiers, who were call'd Chiavesegnati, by the way of Cepparano, enter'd Terra di Lavoro, and on a sudden attack'd and took the Castle of Ponte Solarato, which was then the Key of the Kingdom, and the first strong Hold on that side of the Borders of the State of the Church, and was commanded for the Emperor by Adenolfo Balzano. The Loss of this Castle struck such a Terror in Bartolommeo di Supino Lord of S. Gio. in Carrico, and Roberto dell' Aquila Lord of the Castle of Pastena, that without making the least Defence, they likewise yielded; from thence the Pope's Army cross'd the River Teleso, and march'd towards the County of Fondi.

IN the mean time Errico Morra Lord Chief Justice, upon the News of this War, forthwith assembled a good Body of Troops, and march'd to St. Germano, to dispute the further Passage of the Pope's Troops. But this Opposition was not sufficient to put a Stop to the Pope's Army, which over-run many Places of this Province, and took many Forts and Castles as far as Gaeta. Though many Places were daily submitting to the Pope's Legate, yet this City stood it out, and continued faithful to the Emperor, and prepar'd for a vigorous Defence, for which Cause the Cardinal Pelagio Bishop of Albano, the Pope's Legate, interdicted it. Pontecorvo, with all the other Towns belonging to Monte Cassino, the Castle of Evoandro, Trajetto and Sugio, yielded to the Legate, and at last the City of Gaeta was forc'd to surrender; and its Castle, which the Emperor, at a great deal of Charges, had caus'd to be built, was demolish'd and levell'd, and many of the Inhabitants, who were faithful to Frederick, rather than be subject to the Pope, chose to quit their Habitations; and the Beneventans hearing of the good Success of the Pope's Army, began the War on that Side, made an Inroad into Puglia, carried off the Oxen and other Cattle, and in their Return put the Count Raone di Valvano, who had come against them, to flight; for which Cause the Lord Chief Justice, with all the loyal Barons, march'd against the Beneventans, and laid waste and destroy'd many of their Farms on the Side of the Gate Somma, where the Castle is situated.

THE Minors Friars, and the Monks of St. Benedict, were busy in carrying the Pope's Letters and Messages to many Barons, Prelates, City Corporations and Castles, inviting them to rebel, and come over to the Pope, and falsely giving out that Frederick was dead, and would never return to Puglia; which Report being credited by many of these Cities, they rebell'd, and put to Death all the Germans that liv'd in them, and, according to the Abbot of Ussperg, all the other Cities would have done the same, if they had not been prevented by the Discovery of the Cheat, and that Frederick was soon to return to the Kingdom; for which Reason the Duke of Spoletò expell'd all the Minors Friars, and all the Monks of Cassino out of the Kingdom: some of them accordingly left it, others quitting the Habits of their Order, liv'd hiddenly as Laicks.

MEAN while King John, and the Cardinal Colonna, after diverse Skirmishes, had oblig'd the Duke of Spoletò to quit la Marca, and retire to Abruzzo, whither they follow'd him, and besieg'd him in the City of Sulmona. As soon as the Cardinal Pelagio heard of this Siege, he sent to desire King John to come and join him, that they might carry on the War more vigorously in Terra di Lavoro; whereupon King John rais'd the Siege of Sulmona, and by the Valley of Sangro, march'd into the County of Molise, and on his March took Alfidena and its Castle, he also took Paterno and other Places, and burnt the Castle of Sangro; and at the same time the Count of Campagna with a good Body of Horse and Foot, lately rais'd by the Pope for reinforcing his Army in Puglia, surpriz'd and took Sora, but the Imperialists kept Possession of the Castle; from thence he march'd, and with the same Ease took Arpino, Fontana, and the Valley of Sora, with all the Country of the Marsi; and on the other hand King John and the Cardinal Colonna, being join'd in Terra di Lavoro, and passing the River Volturno, join'd the Army of Cardinal Pelagio near Telesse, and thus united, they march'd and incamp'd near Cajazza.

WHILE Gregory was thus harassing Puglia, Frederick was employing his Arms in the Conquest of the Holy Land; for soon after his Departure in the Month of August, he arriv'd at Acone, from thence he sail'd to Cyprus, and after sundry Expeditions, landed in Palestine, and join'd the Army of the Crucesignati at Joppa the 15th of November, and fortify'd that City, which had been dismantled; in which Work he spent all the Time of Lent, and was like to be forc'd to give it over, and go over Land to Ptolemais, for want of Provisions, because the Vessels appointed to bring them were hinder'd by tempestuous Seas; but fair Weather coming on, he had Necessaries in Plenty. After he had fortify'd Joppa, he march'd to Ptolemais, from thence to the Castle of Cordana, where he halted, and sent Baglianus Lord of Tyre, and the Count of Lucerna his Ambassadors to the Soldan of Egypt, who, with his Army, and his Brother, was incamp'd near Neopolis: After the Ambassadors had deliver'd to the Soldan some rich Presents from the Emperor, they deliver'd their Embassy thus; That Frederick was desirous to have him for a Brother and Friend, if he thought well of it, and that he was not come to Palestine to rob him of any of his Dominions, but only to recover the Kingdom of Jerusalem with Christ's Sepulchre, which had been already in the Possession of the Christians, and now by Right of Jole his Wife, who was his lawful Queen, belong'd to Conrade their Son. To whom the Soldan reply'd, That after he had consider'd of it, he would send his Ambassadors to the Emperor with his Answer; and after he had charg'd them with some suitable Presents, dismiss'd them. At this very nick of Time, the Letters, which Pope Gregory had sent by two Minors Friars to the Patriarch of Jerusalem, arriv'd, whereby he order'd him to declare Frederick excommunicated and perfidious, for not having gone to the Holy Land at the appointed Time, nor sufficiently provided for such an Expedition; and commanded the Knights Hospitalers and Templars, and the Germans not to obey him in any thing.

ALTHOUGH the Soldan knew very well that the Emperor was in Want of Provisions, and that by reason of the Discord betwixt him and the Pope, he had been newly excommunicated, and that he was but ill obey'd by the Pilgrims (under which Name the Soldiers, who constantly serv'd in the Wars in Palestine, went) yet, being much afraid of the Bravery of the Christian Army, he sent Ambassadors with fair Words, many Elephants, Camels, and Arabian Horses, and other rich Presents, without coming to any Agreement, but only told the Emperor, That if he would send anew some of his Barons, he would not fail to conclude an Agreement upon just and reasonable Terms; whereupon the Emperor sent some of the chief Men of his Court, who, being arriv'd at Neapolis, found that the Soldan was gone from thence, and had left Orders for them to follow him to Gaza, which they would not do, but return'd to the Emperor. Frederick finding himself thus deluded by the barbarous Cunning of the Soldan, who had given him fair Words, in order to spin out the Business, conven'd the chief Men of the Cities, the Pilgrims, and Soldiers in Ptolemais, and told them, that in order to be nearer Jerusalem, he was resolv'd to attack Sappho, whither they might likewise come. To which the Masters of the Hospitalers and Templars, in Name of all the rest, answer'd, That notwithstanding they had been forbid by the Pope, whom they were oblig'd to obey, to have any Commerce with him, or assist him, nevertheless for the Good of the Holy Land and Christianity, they were ready to join with him in that Undertaking; but they would have the Watch-word, and the Orders for the Army to be given in Nomine Dei, & Reipublicæ Christianæ, without making the least mention of the Emperor; this so provok'd Frederick, that by no means he would consent to it, but left them, and march'd forward to the River Monder, which runs betwixt Cæsarea and Artus; whereupon the Knights Hospitalers and Templars, and the Pilgrims, consulting what they had best do for the publick Good, and afraid that the Emperor might be over-power'd by the Soldan, who had assembled a prodigious Army, began to follow Frederick at some Distance, and incamp always in Sight of him, that if they should see Occasion, they might be at hand to assist him; but the Emperor, sensible of the Danger he run by this Division, out of cruel Necessity, was forc'd to yield, and allow, that all Orders whatsoever, should be given in Nomine Dei, & Reipublicæ Christianæ, without taking notice of him; so that he join'd them at a ruinous Castle, while they were about repairing it.

AT this very Time, being the middle of Winter, Frederick had the News brought him by a light Vessel, that the Pope's Army had over-run the Kingdom of Puglia, and taken Possession of many Places thereof, and that the rest were also in danger of being lost.

THIS unlucky News put the Affairs of Palestine into the utmost Confusion; for Frederick was immediately for clapping up a Peace with the Soldan, that he might return to Italy for the Relief of his own Dominions; whence Riccardo da S. Germano justly writes: Veresimile enim videtur, quod si tunc Imperator cum gratia, & pace Romanæ Ecclesiæ transisset, longe melius & efficacius prosperatum fuisset negotium Terræ Sanctæ, sed quanta in ipsa sua peregrinatione adversa pertulerit ab Ecclesia, cum non solum ipsum Dominus Papa excommunicaverit, verum etiam quod ipsum excommunicatum scirent, & tanquam excommunicatum vitarent eundem Patriarcho Ierosolimitano mandavit. And the Abbot of *Usperg*¹ could not forbear crying out against such doings: Quis talia facta recte considerans non deploret, & detestetur, quæ indicium videntur, & quoddam portentum & prodigium ruentis Ecclesiæ!

ALTHOUGH the Peace with the Soldan was made at a critical Time, yet it was as advantageous as could be expected for Frederick; these are the Articles, That there should be a Truce for Ten Years, by virtue of which the Soldan restor'd the City of Jerusalem, with all its Territories, to the Emperor; that Christ's Sepulchre should be kept by the Saracens, because they had been long in use to pray there, nevertheless the Christians should have free Access to go and perform their Devotions there; the Cities of Bethlehem and Nazareth, and all the Towns on the High-way to Jerusalem, with the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, and some other Castles formerly possess'd by the Knights Templars, were likewise restor'd to the Emperor, with liberty to fortify Jerusalem with Walls and Towers as he should think fit; as also to fortify the Castles of Joppa, Cæsarea, Monteforte and New Castle. That every thing should be restor'd to Frederick that had been possess'd by Baldwin IV. and had been taken from him by Saladin; and that all Prisoners should be set at Liberty without any Ransom.

THUS did Frederick conclude this Peace, for which some have blam'd and condemn'd him, because he left Christ's Sepulchre, the first Ground of the War, in the Hands of the Saracens: There are likewise some modern Authors that treat him very scurvily, calling him Coward and Silly, and say, That he suffer'd a Thousand Indignities from the Soldan and his Soldiers. But the Chronicle of Riccardo da S. Germano, a Cotemporary Writer, clearly evinceth all these to be nothing but Forgeries and Calumnies: Neither ought we to give Credit to our Italian Writers, nor to the Letters of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, because they were for the most part Guelfs and Partisans of the Pope. And the same Riccardo shews us the Necessity Frederick was under to leave the keeping of Christ's Sepulchre to the Saracens, Quia, speaking of the Saracens, diu consueverant orare ibidem, & ut liberum introitum, & exitum habeant illuc accedentes orationis causa: But it was likewise stipulated, that the Christians should have the same Liberty, & Christianis similiter orationis causa sit expositum; whence we may see how impudent a Lyar and Flatterer Bossius is¹, who in his History of the Knights of Malta, says, That the Christians were not allow'd to enter the Sepulchre. And to charge Frederick with Cowardize and Silliness, is repugnant to all History, for he was a great and gallant Prince, of a high Spirit, which his many noble Exploits clearly testify; neither is it likely, but rather impossible that he would have born with those Affronts and Abuses of the effeminate Egyptians, and despicable Arabians, which he could neither bear of the Lombards, Germans, nor any other brave Nations, over whom he gain'd many Victories.

NOW that the Peace was settled, Frederick resolv'd to return to the Relief of his Dominions of Italy and Puglia, but before he would leave Palestine, he had a Mind to take Possession of the Crown and Kingdom of Jerusalem; therefore he order'd Hermanus Saltza to write to the Patriarch of Jerusalem to come and accompany him to that City, in order to crown him there; but the Patriarch, who was a Partisan of the Pope, answer'd, That he could not do it, till he had first seen the Articles of the Peace concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Soldan. Hermanus immediately sent them to him by a Dominican Monk. When the Patriarch saw the Articles, he refus'd to come, saying, that he could not trust himself in the Hands of these Barbarians, seeing the Clergy were not mentioned in the Treaty, neither had the Soldan of Damascus, to whom that Kingdom of Right belong'd, sworn to it, and therefore the Peace was neither safe, nor could it be durable. And under pretence that the Temple, and the Sepulchre of Christ were in the keeping of the Saracens, to prevent Frederick's being crown'd there, he sent the Archbishop of Cæsarea as his Legate, who by his Order interdicted the Holy City of Jerusalem, and the very Sepulchre of Christ, forbidding the Celebration of Divine Offices there; so that instead of a Blessing on this Expedition, Frederick got a Curse, as Riccardo expresseth it; Primitas recuperationis ipsius, non benedictione, sed anathemate persecutus; but the Emperor little minding the Interdiction, on the 17th of March made his Entry into Jerusalem, and the next Morning, with suitable Pomp, accompanied by the Great Master Hermanus, and all his Courtiers, went to the Church of the Sepulchre, and after he had pray'd for a long Time, and given Thanks to God, finding, that because of the Interdiction, none would venture to celebrate Mass, nor any other proper Office, nor would even the German Prelates be present, though he had invited them, but said, they had no mind to be excommunicated by the Pope; with his own Hands he took the Crown from the Altar, and crown'd himself; and the Great Master of the Teutonicks made a long Oration in Praise of Frederick, enlarging, that it was by his Conduct and Valour that the Kingdom and City of Jerusalem had been restor'd to the Christians²; and after his Coronation, Frederick gave Orders to fortify Jerusalem, and repair the Walls, which had been thrown down by Conradin Soldan of Damascus; and forthwith upon the News of Puglia's being invaded by the Pope, he set forward and came to Sappho and Ptolemais, where he appointed Two Governors to command the Places that had been conquer'd; and made the Great Master of the Teutonicks Commander of the Germans that were to return with him to Puglia, and after having suffer'd and surmounted many Acts of Hostility done by the Patriarch of Jerusalem and the Masters of the Hospitalers and Templars, at last, after a prosperous Voyage, he arriv'd at Brindisi.

FREDERICK was no sooner landed at Brindisi, than he sent the Archbishops of Reggio and Bari, with the Great Master Hermanus, his Ambassadors to Pope Gregory, who went first to Cajazza, which was then besieg'd by the Cardinals of S. Praxides and Albano, from whom they got Letters to the Pope, and from thence went to Rome; and after they had given his Holiness an Account of what had pass'd in Palestine, they besought him in the Name of the Emperor, that he would be pleas'd to absolve him from the Excommunication, and be at Peace with him.

BUT the Patriarch of Jerusalem having written to the Pope, that the Treaty which the Emperor had made with the Soldan, was prejudicial to the Christians, Gregory was so inrag'd, that he would condescend to nothing the Ambassadors desir'd of him; for which Cause the Great Master remain'd in Rome, and the two Archbishops return'd to Puglia.

IN the mean while, by the Means of Adinolfo and Filippo d'Aquino, the Castles of Atino and Celio surrender'd to the Emperor, who with his Army of Crucesignati, march'd to Terra di Lavoro against King John and the Cardinal Legates, who were besieging Cujazza with the Army of Clavesignati; Frederick's Approach struck such a Terror in the Besiegers, that they rais'd the Siege, burnt the Machines, and in great haste retired to Teano, from whence Cardinal Colonna went to Rome to seek Money from the Pope to pay the Army.

RICCARDO likewise writes, that Cardinal Pelagio not having wherewithal to subsist the Army, took all the Treasure and costly Furniture of Gold and Silver that were in Monte Cassino, to make Money of them, and resolv'd to serve the Church of S. Germano the same Way, had not the Clergy of that Church compounded for a certain Sum: In the mean Time the Emperor return'd from Naples to Capua, and from thence march'd to Calvi, which he took by Storm, and caus'd many of the Pope's Soldiers, who defended it, to be hang'd; and though King John endeavour'd to interrupt his March, yet he advanc'd by the Way of Riardo to S. Maria della Ferrata, where he halted three Days, during which Time Vairano, Alife, Venafro, and all the Territories belonging to the Sons of Pandolfo submitted to him; this prosperous Success so dishearten'd King John and Cardinal Pelagio, that in all haste they march'd to Mignano, and from thence to S. Germano; but finding that the Emperor was pursuing them close at the Heels, they presently disbanded the Pope's Army, and made what haste they could to Campagna di Romagna, and King John with all the Prelates of the Pope's Faction retir'd to Rome.

MEAN while the Emperor with his Army enter'd the Lands of the Monastery of Monte Cassino, took, and deliver'd up to be plunder'd by the Soldiers, the Town of Piedmonte, and gave its Castle to the Lords of Aquino. Then he made an Attempt upon Monte Cassino, but was repuls'd; and while he was there, by the Means of Taddeo di Sessa, Judge of his High Court, the City of Sessa submitted to him. Presenzano, the Castle of Evandro, Isernia, Arpino, and Foutana, with all the other Towns belonging to S. Benedict, likewise submitted; and at last S. Germano with its Castle also yielded. Frederick, being now resolv'd to settle his other Affairs of Italy, and to treat of a Peace with the Pope, caus'd all the Magistrates and Corporations of the Cities of Lombardy to be conven'd; and by a Letter written from S. Germano, notified to them his Return to Puglia, and his Victories in that Kingdom, which Letter is recorded by Riccardo, and among others contains these Words: Nos de Ultramarinis partibus prospere per Dei gratiam redeuntes, de inimicis nostris, qui Regnum nostrum invaserant feliciter triumphavimus, dum audientes nos contra eos in manu valida, & potenti venturos, non expectatis, aut expertis viribus nostris, in Campania finibus, fugæ sibi præsidium elegerunt. Sicque Domino cooperante, & nos comitante Justitia, qui de Carlo prospexit, quod ipse in Regno nostro, nobis absentibus, per anni dimidium occupaverant, nos brevi dierum spatio recuperavimus, & revocavimus ad demanium, & dominum nostrum.

THE City of Teano was the next that surrender'd, upon Condition, that its Bishop should have it in his Choice either to depart, or remain in the City. From S. Germano the Emperor sent Two hundred Soldiers into the Country of the Marsi, commanded by Bertoldo Brother of the Duke of Spoletto, who easily subdu'd all that Country; and after Frederick had halted seven Days in S. Germano, he march'd to Aquino, from whence he wrote to all the Princes of Christendom, to clear himself from the bad Opinion which had been conceiv'd and propagated concerning the Treaty made with the Soldan, and gave them an Account of the Affairs of the Holy Land, and that what the Patriarch of Jerusalem had represented was not true Matter of Fact, taking the Bishop of Winchester, the Great Masters of the Knights Hospitallers and Teutonicks, and many other Knights of these Orders, and also the Preaching Friars, who were present at the Treaty, to witness the contrary. Some Ambassadors from the Senate and People of Rome came to Aquino to wait upon the Emperor, and congratulate him upon his safe Return, and to treat about other Affairs, and at the End of three Days they return'd to Rome. After he had added some new Works to the Fortifications of S. Germano, he left Aquino, and march'd to besiege Sora, which, because it made a shew of Resistance, he took by Storm, burnt it, and kill'd and ruin'd the Citizens.

HERMANNUS SALTSA, who had remain'd in Rome to treat of a Peace with the Pope, went from thence, accompanied by Giovanni Cardinal of S. Sabina, and Tommaso Cardinal of Capua, the Pope's Legates, to wait on the Emperor in Aquino, whither he had return'd from Sora the fourth Day of November, and after they had had an Audience of him, the same very Evening they went to Monte Cassino, and perswaded Cardinal Pelagio to retire from that Place with his Men. And the Bishops were allow'd to return to their Sees without any Molestation. Frederick likewise restor'd all the Places taken from the Abbot Adenolfo, and put them under the Command of the Great Master Hermannus, till the Peace should be settled with the Pope; and Hermannus being oblig'd to return to Perugia with Cardinal Pelagio to settle some Articles of the Peace, he substituted in his Place Fra. Lionardo a Teutonic Knight, till he should return. And Frederick having gone to Capua, where he kept his Christmas, set many of the Citizens of Sora, that had been made Prisoners after the taking of that City, at Liberty.

IN this prosperous Situation were Frederick's Affairs at the Close of the Year 1229. In the Month of January 1230. he order'd the said Fra. Lionardo, Deputy-Governor of Monte Cassino, to pick out some of the best Soldiers that he could light on, in order to garrison the Monastery, and made him swear to guard it with all the Effects and Monks within it, and not to deliver them to any Person but the Great Master Hermannus. After the Archbishop of Reggio, the Great Master of the Teutonic Order, and Cardinal Pelagio had made several Journies to and again, betwixt Rome and Puglia, about the Treaty of Peace, at last they met in a Congress held in S. Germano, where were likewise present the Patriarch of Aquileja, the foresaid two Legates, Giovanni Cardinal of S. Sabina, Tommaso Cardinal of Capua, Bernard Archbishop of Saltzburg, Sifridus Bishop of Ratisbone, Leopold Duke of Austria and Stiria, Bernard Duke of Moravia, and Fra. Lionardo Knight of the Teutonic Order; and after various Speeches the Treaty was begun, and in a short Time was concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Pope, as shall be told. And in the mean Time some Cities of Puglia, which in the late Troubles had revolted, submitted to the Emperor, such as Civitate, Larino, S. Severo, Casalmuovo, and Foggia. We ought not to give Credit to the Author of a small Treatise intitled Itinerario dell' Imperador Federico, for it begins with an impudent Lye, and is full of fabulous Stories and Dreams; for Frederick was not three Years, but only three Months in the Holy Land; he did not besiege Jerusalem, because the Soldan soon deliver'd it up; he did not touch at any Port of Sicily as he return'd, but landed at Brindisi, which did not want Relief, because it was not besieg'd, neither had he Occasion to hire Saracens in the Island of Zerby, while he could have had plenty in Sicily and Puglia.

WHILE the Emperor was keeping his Easter in Foggia, on Holy Thursday Gregory excommunicated Rinaldo Duke of Spoletto, and his Brother Bertoldo, for having invaded La Marca, and other Places belonging to the Church.

ALL the Prelates, Dukes and others, who after the Congress in S. Germano had gone to Rome, return'd from thence with the Cardinal Legates, in order to absolve the Emperor from the Excommunication, and the Legates desir'd the Great Master of the Teutonic Order to acquaint the Emperor to come to Capua, where they with all the Prelates that had fled the Kingdom for fear of him, were to wait on him; but when they were inform'd, that he had caus'd the Walls of Foggia, S. Severino, and Casalmuovo to be demolish'd, and that he was on his Way from Puglia to Capua, with Design to have Gaeta and S. Agata secur'd to him by the Articles of Peace, and that they should not continue subject to the Church as the Pope claim'd, they made all the Bishops of the Kingdom return to Cepparone, and they themselves, with the Abbot Adenolfo went to Capua, where Frederick arriv'd the 30th of May, with whom the Cardinals had an Interview; but when they could not agree about the Article concerning Gaeta and S. Agata, they went to Sessa, and after treating with the Gaetans, they brought over Pietro delle Vigne, and Filippo di Citro Constable of Capua; but new Difficulties still arising, the Peace could not be agreed upon, therefore the Archbishop of Reggio, and the Great Master of the Teutonic Order, were

were oblig'd to make several Journies betwixt Rome and Capua; till at last, by the Means of Fra. Qualdo, of the Order of Preaching Friars, the Pope coming to the Monastery of Grotta Ferrata, and the Emperor to S. Germano, to be near one another, the Peace was concluded to the great Joy of every Body, and was publish'd with universal Acclamations and Rejoycings at S. Germano and all the neighbouring Places; and, to crown the Work, on the 9th Day of July, the Cardinal Legates, the Patriarch of Aquileja, the Archbishop of Saltzburg, the Bishops of Ratisbone and Reggio, the Dukes of Carinthia and Moravia, the Archbishops of Palermo, of Reggio in Calabria, and of Bari, the Abbot of Monte Cassino, and many other Prelates that had fled to Rome, Rinaldo Duke of Spoletto, Tommaso d'Aquino Count of Serra, Errico di Morra Lord Chief Justice, and a great Number of Barons and Ministers of the Empire, met in the great Church of S. Germano, in Presence of whom the Emperor promis'd to satisfy the Holy Roman Church in all the Points for which he had been excommunicated, and made Tommaso Count of Cerra, and all these German Prelates and Lords, who drew up the Instrument and Articles of Agreement, as they are recorded by Riccardo in his Chronicle, to swear to his Performance; the chief Articles follow.

I. THAT within the Space of a Year common Umpires shall be chosen to agree on the Form and Manner of restoring Gaeta and S. Agata to the Emperor, and securing the Inhabitants of the Kingdom; and that in the mean Time the Emperor shall not molest the Cities he had lost, nor suffer them to be molested by his Officers.

II. That the Emperor shall pardon all the Germans, Lombards, and Tuscans, and generally all the Sicilians and French, who have sided with the Church of Rome against him, and shall not suffer them to be molested on that account.

III. The said Emperor shall repeal all Decrees, Constitutions, and Proclamations publish'd against them on account of the late War.

IV. THE Emperor likewise promises, that the Lands of the Church in the Dukedom of Spoletto, La Marca, and other Places of her Patrimony, shall not be invaded, or laid waste by him or his.

THE said German Princes promise to be Guarantees of the above Articles agreed upon.

THEN the Archbishop of Saltzburg made a long Speech on the Emperor's good Inclinations towards the Church of Rome, and apologiz'd for the by-past Misunderstanding; and the Cardinal of S. Sabina made an eloquent Speech in answer to him: And the same Day the Cardinal Legates, in the Name of the Pope, made the Emperor swear to restore all that he had taken, or caus'd to be taken in La Marca, and the Dukedom of Spoletto, or in any other Part of the Patrimony of the Church, and all the Territories and Castles of Monasteries or Abbies, and particularly of the Monastery of S. Ciricus d'Introducco, and all the Possessions of the Knights Templars, and Hospitalers, and of all Barons or other Noblemen of the Kingdom whatsoever, who have been Adherents and Partisans of the Pope, and to restore to their Sees the Archbishop of Taranto, and all the other Bishops and Prelates that had been banish'd the Kingdom. And besides made him swear; Ut de cetero nullus Clericus in civili, vel in criminali causa conveniatur, & quod nullus talleas, vel collectas imponat Ecclesiis, Monasteriis, Clericis, & viris Ecclesiasticis, seu rebus eorum; & quod Electiones, postulationes, & confirmationes Ecclesiarum, ac Monasteriorum libere fiant in Regno secundum statuta Concilii Generalis.

THEN, by Order of the Pope, Friar Gualdo took off the Interdiction under which Cardinal Pelagio had put the Churches of S. Germano, and other Places belonging to the Monastery of Monte Cassino, and allow'd them to celebrate the Divine Offices, but excluded from hearing them, the Duke of Spoletto and all those that with him had made War in Marca. And in pursuance of the Treaty, the Emperor soon after restor'd Trajetta and Suggio, with the County of Fondi to Ruggieri dell'Aquila, and Castle Fanola, to Adenolfo Abbot of Monte Cassino, on Condition however, that the said Castle should be kept by Rinaldo Belenguino di Santa Elia, till the Emperor should be absolv'd from the Censures. Frederick having gone to the Castle of Arce, caus'd the Lords of Aquino, who had the Charge of Ponte Corvo, Piedmonte, and Castel Nuovo, to restore them to the Abbot Adenolfo; and from thence, with a good Body of Troops, he march'd to Cepparano, where, on the Feast of S. Augustine in the Month of August in the Chapel of S. Giusta, he was absolv'd from the Excommunication by the Cardinal of Capua Bishop of Sabina, and on the last Day of the said Month went to meet with Gregory in Alagna, having sent at the same Time Letters over all the Kingdom concerning the Immunity of Churches, Monasteries, and Ecclesiastical Persons, and their Goods and Possessions, ordering the Counts, Barons, Justices, Chamberlains, and Bailiffs of the Kingdom of Sicily, ne ullus Monasteriis, Ecclesiis, Personis Ecclesiasticis, aut rebus eorum talleas, vel collectas præsumat imponere, salvo illis servitiis, ad quæ certæ Ecclesiæ, vel personæ tenentur nobis specialiter obligatæ, according to his Diploma transcrib'd by Riccardo in his Chronicle.

FREDERICK incamp'd without the Walls of Alagna, and the first Day of September made his Entry into it, where he was met and receiv'd with all Marks of Honour by the Cardinals, and all the other Prelates and Ministers of the Pope, and was invited to eat with him, and for three Days running they continued together conversing on their weighty Affairs, in Presence only of the Great Master of the Tenionick Order. And after reciprocal Marks of Kindness, he took leave of Gregory, and return'd to the Camp; and while he was there, he gave to Giovanni di Poli the County of Albi in exchange for the County of Fondi, and restor'd it to Ruggieri dell' Aquila; and at the Emperor's Desire the Pope absolv'd the Abbot of S. Vincenzo, and the Prelates that had been excommunicated for adhering to the Emperor. And in the mean Time the Bishops of Tiano, Alife, and Venafro, and all the other Prelates that had fled the Kingdom, return'd to their Sees, and the Prelates, and Princes of Germany to their own Country. Bzovius in his Annals adds, that some German Authors write, that the Emperor, in order to be Friends with the Pope, paid him a Hundred and Twenty thousand Ounces of Gold for the Losses he had sustain'd by the War. Girolamo dalla Corte, in his History of Verona, says, there were only Twelve thousand Ducats paid; but Riccardo, who gives a particular Account of these Transactions, makes not the least mention of any Sum paid.

THIS Peace being thus concluded, the Emperor decamp'd from Alagna, and march'd back to S. Germano, and from thence, by the Way of Capua, march'd into Puglia, and halted in Melphis; and being disingag'd from this War, and the Kingdom in Peace, he resolv'd the Year following 1231. to put it upon a better Footing, and with new Laws to settle Peace and Tranquillity, and repair the by-past Losses.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the Constitutions of the Kingdom.

OUR Professors, being ill versed in History, have treated no part of the Laws of our Country so confusedly and carelessly, as that concerning the Body of our Constitutions. There is no-body but knows, that the Emperor Frederick committed the Work to Pietro delle Vigne, and that he did it by his Command; but how, and when it was publish'd, of what Constitutions, and of what Princes it consists, and of what Authority it was with us, and how the Laws contain'd in it have been explain'd and commented on by our Writers, they are profoundly silent. Therefore many have confounded the Constitutions, and attributed those of one Prince to another, as has been observ'd in the preceding Books of this History, where many of Roger's Laws have have been ascrib'd either to the two Williams or Frederick; and, on the contrary, many Constitutions of that Emperor have been father'd upon Roger. Many through Ignorance of the Scope and Design of them, and of the Customs of these Times, have put strange Constructions upon them, and others have reckon'd some of them Impious and Sacrilegious.

FREDERICK then, a most prudent Prince, who would imitate the wisest Kings of the Earth, both in Arms and Laws, having this Year 1231. made Peace with Pope Gregory, and quieted his Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, turn'd his Thoughts to the Laws, in order to settle a more durable and lasting Tranquillity among his Subjects. Not that he publish'd all the Constitutions this Year, which we read in this Volume, divided into Three Books. The Collection was made this Year, but the Laws were made, some before, and some after this; for many other Constitutions were added afterwards, whence they bear this Inscription, nova Constitutio. He would have the Constitutions of the Kings of Sicily his Predecessors inserted in this Code, among these he picked out many of King Roger I. his Grandfather; some of William I. his Uncle, and a few of William II. his Cousin-German, of which we have treated at large in the preceding Books. He had no Regard for what had been made by Tancred and William III. whom he did not look upon to have been lawful Kings, but Usurpers, as we have observ'd elsewhere. Besides the Constitutions of these Princes his Predecessors, he would have his own, publish'd at different Times, on various Occasions, and in sundry Cities of his Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, to be inserted, and he abrogated and repealed the antient Laws and Customs that any ways clash'd with these Constitutions, and ordain'd that these alone should be observ'd, and have all Force and Authority in the Kingdom of Sicily, which he calls *Hæreditas pretiosa*¹. And it must be observ'd, that by the Kingdom of Sicily, he means not only that Island, but likewise our Kingdom, which was sometimes call'd Puglia, and sometimes Sicily on this Side the Phare, and at last was call'd the Kingdom of Naples; so that they are widely mistaken, who reckon the said Constitutions to have been made for the Island of Sicily only; neither is Ramondetta to be pardon'd, for writing, that these Laws were not made for the People of that Island, but for those of the Kingdom of Naples only; which is so manifest an Error, that there is not one Constitution but what proves it to be such.

FREDERICK had establish'd many Constitutions for the Government of these Realms before this Year 1231²; and from the very Beginning of his Reign, after the Guardianship of Innocent III. in several Parliaments held in Puglia, and other Parts of the Kingdom, he began to enact Laws. Besides these Laws which he made in Rome after his Coronation by Honorius, whereof we have spoken in the preceding Book, and which have no relation to ours, after his Coronation, when he came from Rome to Capua in the Year 1220. he held a general Parliament for the Good of the Kingdom, and publish'd his Ordinances contain'd in twenty Chapters, according to *S. Germano*³: Et se recto tramite Capuam conferens, & regens ibi Curiam generalem pro bono statu Regni suas assisas (that is to say, Regulations which were wont to be establish'd in General Courts for the publick Good, and the Benefit of the Vassals⁴) promulgavit, quæ sub viginti capitulis continentur.

THERE are some who write, that in the following Year 1221. he call'd a General Meeting in Melphis, and publish'd other Constitutions; but seeing Riccardo makes no mention of them, we will not take upon us to affirm it; those, who have written so, have been deceiv'd by the Date, for, in the vulgar Editions, instead of 1231. by an Error of the Press, we read 1221. These other Constitutions, which we likewise find inserted in this Volume, according to Riccardo, were not publish'd this Year in Melphis, but in Messina: Imperator per Apuliam, & Calabriam iter habens, feliciter in Siciliam transfretat, & Messanæ regens Curiam generalem, quasdam ibi statuit assisas observandas contra lufores, &c. which we also find in the Third Book, under the Titles De his qui ludunt ad dados, &c. De blasphemantibus Deum, &c.

THE same Riccardo says, that in the Year 1222. Frederick sua statuta per Regnum dirigit in singulis Civitatibus & Villis; and in the Year 1224. many Laws were publish'd concerning the Establishment of the University erected in Naples, as we have observ'd elsewhere ; and in the Constitution *nihil veterum*¹ there is mention made of Frederick's Expedition into Lombardy to curb the rebellious Lombards, and of his sudden Return to Puglia, which, according to *Riccardo*² and *Errico Sterone*³, both of them Contemporary Writers, fell out in the Year 1226 ; and thus from Time to Time after Frederick return'd from Palestine in the Year 1229. he publish'd other Constitutions on various Occurrences⁴ ; and in the Beginning of this same Year 1231. Riccardo says⁵, that Frederick sent his Ordinances concerning the Concessions and Privileges granted by himself, and Rinaldo Duke of Spoleto, after he went to Palestine, to Stefano d' Anglone his Chief Justice of Terra di Lavoro, ordering him to lay them before his Imperial Court by a certain Time, otherwise they were to be reputed void, and of no Force ; as we read in this Code under the Title De Privilegiis in the Second Book.

AT the same Time, according to Riccardo, he forbid his Barons to build new Walls and Towers in their Towns and Castles, as we also read in the Third Book under the Title De novis Edificiis : He likewise made other Laws concerning the Subsidies which the Counts, Barons, and Prelates, who held Fiefs, were oblig'd to pay, of which there are some Vestiges remaining in the Three Books of these Constitutions. And we have good Grounds to believe, that the so famous and remarkable Constitution Inconsutilem, full of Rigour and Severity against the Patareni, and other Hereticks of these Times, was publish'd by Frederick in the Month of February this very Year 1231. to prevent the Mischiefs, which their daily growing Number might occasion in these Kingdoms. Riccardo says, that the Number of the Patareni increas'd to that Degree in Italy, as even Rome itself, the Seat of Religion, was defiled and infected, and great Rigour was us'd in order to extirpate them ; insomuch that many, who continued obstinate in their Errors, were burnt, and others more tractable, were imprison'd in the Monasteries of Monte Cassino and Cava, to remain there till they had abjur'd their Errors, and done Penance for them : And their Number grew so great, that they spread further than Rome, and also began to infect the Cities of our Kingdom, and especially Naples, where they grew to such Numbers, that Frederick sent thither the Archbishop of Reggio, and Riccardo di Principato his Marshal, to punish them with Severity, and accordingly many of them were found and imprison'd, and this was the Reason that mov'd Frederick to publish the following Constitution⁶ for punishing Hereticks, those that harbour'd them, and their Abettors with the utmost Severity ; these are the Words of the Constitution : Et tanto ipsos persequamur instantius, quanto in evidentiorum injuriam fidei Christianæ, prope Romanam Ecclesiam, quæ caput aliarum Ecclesiarum omnium judicatur, superstitionis suæ scelera latius exercere noscuntur. Adeo quod ab Italiæ finibus, & præsertim a partibus Lombardiæ, in quibus pro certo perpendimus ipsorum nequitiam amplius abundare, jam usque ad regnum nostrum Siciliæ, suæ perfidiæ rivulos derivarunt. Quod acerbissimum reputantes, statuimus, &c.

RICCARDO likewise writes, that in the Month of June this very Year Frederick made other new Constitutions in Melphis : Constitutiones novæ, quæ Augustales dicuntur, apud Melfiam, Augusto mandante conduntur. And at the same time Inquiry was made De campangiis, falsariis, aleatoribus, tabernaris, homicidis, vitam sumptuosam ducentibus, prohibita arma portantibus, & de violentiis mulierum ; and the Guilty suffer'd the Punishments prescrib'd in his different Constitutions, which, under their respective Titles, we now read in this Code.

OF all these Constitutions hitherto establish'd by Frederick in the preceding Years, on various Occasions, and of those of the Kings of Sicily his Predecessors, Pietro delle Vigne this Year compil'd that new Volume, which is now call'd the Constitutions of the Kingdom ; and in the Month of August of the said Year 1231. in a solemn Assembly held in Melphis, all these Constitutions, thus collected, were publish'd to the People, that now the antient Constitutions being repealed, these were to be observ'd. Frederick speaks thus of them : *Accipite gratanter, O Populi, Constitutiones istas, tam in judiciis, quam extra judicia potituri. Quas per Magistrum Petrum de Vineis Capuanum magnæ Curie nostræ Judicem, & fidelem nostrum mandavimus compilari*⁷.

RICCARDO in his Chronicle witnesseth, that this was done in the Month of August 1231, Constitutiones Melfiæ publicantur. And the old correct Editions, agree with him in the Date; Actum in Solemni Consistorio Melfiensi, anno Dominicæ incarnationis M. CC. XXXI. mense Augusti, indictionis quartæ. And the reading was the same in the old Edition, of which our Matteo dell' Afflitti made use, when he made his large Commentary upon these Constitutions, not doubting that they were publish'd that Year; as Matteo himself writes: Ex quo istæ Constitutiones editæ fuerunt mandante dicto Imperatore per doctissimum virum Petrum de Vineis in anno Domini 1231. Whence 'tis evident, that in the new and vulgar Editions, which are handed about, there is a manifest Error, in dating them in the Year 1221.

'TIS likewise to be observ'd, that after this Work was publish'd, Frederick made other Constitutions at different Times in the following Years, and which Taddeo di Sessa, Roffredo Beneventano, and lastly, Andrea, and Bartolommeo di Capua, inserted in this Code under their proper Titles, whence they are call'd Novæ Constitutiones. Thus did Frederick cause to be publish'd in the Month of February, the following Year 1232, his Constitutions De Mercatoribus, Artificibus, Medicis, Aleatoribus, Damnis, Militibus, Notariis, &c. as we read in Riccardo's Chronicle, where we must advert, that Ughellus, who caus'd this Chronicle to be printed in the third Volume of his Italia Sacra, was in the wrong, after the Words; Post Mundi machinam providentiâ Divina firmatam, &c. to add these; Harum aliquot Richardus Author Historiæ ponit, sed nos remittimus lectorem ad librum Constitutionum Regni Siciliæ; whence 'tis clear, that these Words have been foisted in by some Student, and are no Part of the Text. We likewise find these Constitutions inserted in the Volume of our Constitutions, as is clear from the Titles De Mercatoribus: De fide Mercatorum: De Medicis: De Aleatoribus; or, De his qui ludunt ad dados, and others, which we read in the third Book. And in the Month of October of this same Year, and in the same Place, he publish'd others concerning the Annona, Weights and Measures, and others which we read in the said Chronicle, and whercof we have still some Vestiges in the Books of our Constitutions: Mense Octobri in S. Germano hujusmodi sunt Imperiales Assisæ publicatæ. And Frederick about the End of the following Year 1233, having gone to Sicily, held a general Parliament in Syracusa, and made that famous Constitution; Ut nulli, according to Riccardo, liceat de filiis, & filiabus Regni matrimonia cum externis, & adventitiis, vel qui non sint de Regno, absque ipsius speciali requisitione, mandato, seu consensu Curie suæ contrahere, videlicet, ut nec aliquæ de Regno nubere alienigenis audeant, nec aliqui alienigenarum filias ducere in uxores, pœna apposita omnium rerum suarum amissione. Which Constitution we read under the Title De Uxore non ducenda sine permissione Regis, then follows that, which begins Honorem nostri Diadematis, wherein we find the same Words of Riccardo, and because it was publish'd this same Year after that in Melphis, it bears this Inscription, Nova Constitutio. Frederick had good Reason for making this Constitution, for seeing he had establish'd by Law, that Women could succeed to Fiefs, he did not think fit to allow them to marry into strange Families, and perhaps Enemies to him, without the Consent of his Court, of which Constitution we have spoken sufficiently, when we had occasion to treat of King Roger's Laws, where we censur'd Andrea d' Isernia's Error, who look'd upon it as a Restraint upon the Freedom of Marriage. After this Constitution had been for a long Time in Force, it was reform'd in our Kingdom by Charles II. and intirely abolish'd in Sicily by King James.

FREDERICK, in order to settle Peace and Tranquillity in his Dominions of Sicily and Puglia, made other Laws in the following Years; and after he had, in the Year 1243, appointed Fairs to be held in some Cities, of which in their Place, so far as we can gather from Riccardo, who ends his Chronicle that same Year, we find that he publish'd diverse other Constitutions; and in the Month of September of the same Year, we see, that in Grosseto quasdam edidit Sanctiones, according to Riccardo, contra Judices, Advocatos, & Notarios, quas per totum Regnum publicari præcepit, & tenaciter observari, quarum initium tale est, nihil veterum auctoritati detrahitur, &c. which are his last Constitutions, and are likewise inserted in the first Book of the Volume of our Constitutions, under the Title De Officio Magistri Justitiarii, & Judicum Magnæ Curie, which therefore bears the Inscription of

Nova Constitutio; and under the Title De Advocatis ordinandis, with the Two following. As all these Constitutions related to the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, there's no occasion, as we have observ'd elsewhere, to confound them with the Imperial ones establish'd in Rome, or with those publish'd in Germany, to wit, in the Year 1213 in Egra, and in 1234 in Francfort, and in 1235 in Mentz, and elsewhere, whereof Goldastus ¹ has made a Collection, which may be read in his Volumes; these Constitutions not being design'd for our Kingdoms, had no Force or Authority in them.

Of the Use and Authority of these Constitutions during the Reign of the Suevi; and of their Expositors.

WHEN these Constitutions of the Emperor Frederick were publish'd, and as long as he liv'd, and during the Reign of the House of Suevia, they were universally esteem'd as most prudent, most just, as proceeding from consummate Wisdom, and not exceeding the Power of a Prince. It did not appear strange then to have inserted in these Volumes, the Constitutions of Roger and William I. of which we have treated in the preceding Books. Nor was it then thought amiss for this Prince to have renew'd many Constitutions concerning Matrimony, and the Goods of the Churches, forbidding the Acquisition of Immoveables to Ecclesiasticks, as by one of his Constitutions, which we read in the third Book, under the Title De rebus stabilibus Ecclesiis non alienandis, and such like. But when afterwards, by the Intrigues of the Roman Pontiffs, mortal Enemies to the House of Suevia, the Kingdom went to that of the Dukes of Anjou, and Counts of Provence, as we shall relate, though Charles I. and II. order'd these Constitutions to be observ'd in the Kingdom ¹; nevertheless our Professors, who flourish'd in the Reigns of the Kings of the House of Anjou, being Time-servers, and Sticklers for the Popes, to whom these Princes ow'd the Kingdom, began to revile some of Frederick's Constitutions, looking upon them, according to the Maxims of these Times, as contrary to the Interest of the Court of Rome, and therefore impertinent, wicked, unjust and prejudicial to the Ecclesiastical Immunity, the Freedom of Matrimony, and such like Things, insomuch, that none of them would comment upon the Constitution De rebus Stabilibus Ecclesiis non alienandis, as being Sacrilegious, and, as was thought, prejudicial to the Ecclesiastical Immunity; and Matteo d' Afflitto, who makes a short Commentary upon it, in the very beginning says, Hæc Constitutio nihil valet, quia Imperator non potuit contra libertatem Ecclesiæ, & personarum Ecclesiasticarum prohibere, quod non reliquantur res Stabiles Ecclesiæ inter vivos, vel in ultima Voluntate; as if Frederick had been the first that establish'd it; though he declares in the Constitution, that he did no more than renew what his Predecessors had done, and what was, and ought to be allow'd to all Princes in their Kingdoms and Dominions.

MARINO di Caramanico, the most learn'd Glossator, who flourish'd under Charles I. of the House of Anjou, and wrote his Glosses a little after the Constitutions were publish'd, under the Government of the Suevi ², was the most moderate of all the Glossators. In the Year 1269, in the Reign of Charles I. he was Judge under the Governor of Naples ³. His Glosses are modest, and learn'd, insomuch, that with Posterity he acquir'd the Name of an approv'd Glossator, as Matteo d' Afflitto calls him ⁴: These Constitutions of this Prince did not appear so strange and extravagant to him, as they did to those that succeeded him. He started no Difficulty, whether they, as being promulg'd by Frederick, who was dethron'd, ought to be observ'd, and have the Force and Vigour of Laws; he is for the Affirmative; and though it be by the by, and only speaking of Frederick's having made and caus'd them to publish'd, *Antequam imperio privaretur, & de Regno*¹; yet he speaks of the Power of our Princes, if not as he ought to have done, at least as much as he durst venture upon, at a Time when it was necessary to humour the Popes, by whose Means the reigning Family had got Possession of the Kingdom: Bartolommeo di Capua, and Sebastiano Napodano; who succeeded Marino; confin'd themselves in commenting on these Constitutions, to the same or the like modest Way, and Andrea da Barletta, who was the first that commented on them, was yet more reserv'd, as may be gather'd from *Andrea d'Isernia*², who liv'd under Frederick, and Francisco Telese Attorney General, in the Year 1282, who likewise wrote upon the Constitutions of the Kingdom, and with whom Gesnerus and Toppi agree.

BUT in the following Times, when the new Maxims of the Court of Rome had taken deeper Root, Andrea d'Isernia, in his Commentaries upon these Constitutions, as if he had been Frederick's mortal Enemy, revil'd the Memory of that Prince, and condemn'd many of his Constitutions, and among the rest, that forbidding Barons to marry without the King's Permission, and does not stick to say, That it had brought Destructionem animæ istius Federici prohibentis per obliquum matrimonia instituta a Deo in Paradiso.

ISERNIA screw'd up the Pretensions of the Popes to the highest Pitch, and look'd upon this Kingdom as a true Fief of the Church³; and having imbib'd the Maxims of the Ecclesiasticks, he stuff'd his Commentaries with Errors most prejudicial to the Supreme Regalia of our Kings, the true and independent Monarchs of this Realm.

LUCA di Penna, Pietro di Monteforte, Diomede Mariconda, Biaggio di Morcone, Pietro Arcamone, Giacopo, and Niccolo Ruffo, Sergio Domini Ursonis, Argentino, Pamfilo Mollo, Niccolo Caposcrofa, Pietro Piccolo di Monteforte, Lallo di Toscana, Giovanni Grillo, Cesare de Perinis, Giovanni Crispiano the Bishop, and Niccolo Superanzio, and others, were more moderate, and contented themselves with making some short Glosses and Notes on these Constitutions, till under the Government of the Kings of Arragon, Matteo d'Afflitto, in his declining Days, though very uprightly, in the Year 1510, undertook to illustrate them with more ample and voluminous Commentaries, which he very surprizingly finish'd in three Years Time.

THOUGH, for the most Part, these Constitutions had been repeal'd, and many of them in desuetude, because of the new Capitula made by the Kings of the House of Anjou, yet in the Time of the Kings of the House of Aragon, they were in full Force and Vigour; and Ferdinand I. of Aragon, by a particular Constitution dated in Foggia the 25th of December 1472, order'd them to be observ'd in his Kingdom⁴; therefore Matteo d'Afflitto thought his Pains would be well bestow'd in illustrating them with a larger Commentary. And, as he himself says, in the Course of more than Forty Years, from the Time that Andrea d'Isernia had made his Comments, to his own Time, there had occur'd to him, while he was first Judge of the High Court of the Vicaria, and afterwards Counsellor, Nine other Questions not treated of by Andrea.

BUT through the deprav'd Taste of the Age, Matteo could not depart from the common beaten Path, for he stuff'd his Commentaries with idle and useless Questions; such as, Whether Frederick, though he had publish'd these Constitutions before his Deposition, could give them the Force and Vigour of Laws, so as to oblige his Subjects to observe them, seeing he had been before excommunicated by Gregory IX. and the Laws of an excommunicated Person are of no Force?

THESE Disputes are altogether frivolous, not only because the Laws were binding on the People by their accepting of them; but likewise because in the Year 1231, when Frederick publish'd them, he had been absolv'd by Gregory, and was in Peace with the Church of Rome, as we have said. But there is no occasion to lay any Stress upon that Reason, because Frederick was a second Time excommunicated by Gregory in the Year 1239, and though the Volume of his Constitutions had been publish'd ever since the Year 1231, yet, as we have said above, he publish'd some others after the said Year 1239, to wit in 1243, and the following Years, when he lay under Gregory's second Sentence of Excommunication, which Constitutions were inferred in the said Volume. Whence the most judicious Men look upon it as impertinent, and quite foreign to the Purpose, to inquire whether Laws made by a Prince under Sentence of Excommunication, be binding or not; without inquiring into the Validity of the Censures against Frederick: 'Tis certain, Excommunication has nothing to do with a Prince's legislative Power, an essential Part of the Regale; and inseparable from the Crown, which cannot be affected by Excommunication; which has no other Force or Effect, supposing it ever so just, than to separate a Person from the Communion of the Church, by rendering him incapable of receiving the Sacraments and Prayers thereof, or whatever else she can bestow on the Faithful; but not to unman People, and exclude them from civil Society, much less can it deprive Princes of their Dominions, the Administration of Justice, and Power of making Laws; of which in another Place.

OUR Doctors, who treat of Frederick's Deposition by Innocent IV. in the Council of Lyons, and say, That if these Constitutions were made by him after his Deposition in the Year 1246, they were of no Force nor Authority, are to be excus'd; seeing at that Time no body doubted of the Pope's having Power to depose Emperors from the Empire, and Kings from their Kingdoms, and absolve their Vassals from their Oaths, according to the Maxims with which the Minds of Men were then besotted; but now it has been clearly prov'd by able Divines and Lawyers, that neither the Pope nor the Church herself have Power to depose Princes, and much less Emperors, or to absolve Vassals from their Oaths; for the Power of the Church is restricted to spiritual Matters only, and she can take nothing away, but what is in her Power to give; whereas Princes hold their Dominions neither of the Church nor the Pope, but of God, the only and sole Lord; which, among others, has been at large demonstrated by that famous Divine of Paris, *Dupin*¹, and shall be handled by us, when we come to treat of Frederick's Deposition.

AFTER these ample and voluminous Commentaries of Matteo d'Afflitto upon the Constitutions, our Professors, who succeeded him, contented themselves with reading them, and making some short Notes on them, and a few Additions to the Commentaries of Andrea d'Isfernia, as the Counsellor Giacopo Anello de Bottis, Giov. Angelo Pisanello, Pablo Giordano, Bartolommeo Marziale, Marc' Antonio Pulverino, and others did. But when the House of Austria succeeded to that of Aragon, these Constitutions were in a great Measure alter'd by their new Laws and Pragmaticks; insomuch that our Professors wrote no more upon them, as shall be told in a proper Place; neither were they any more studied, but remain'd as Matteo d'Afflitto, and those few who succeeded him, left them; and now such of them as are not repeal'd or in desuetude, have with us all Force and Authority of Laws; but 'tis quite otherwise with the Longobard Laws, which have no Authority, and are altogether forgotten.

BOOK XVII.

AS the Peace lately concluded with Pope Gregory, was not expected to be of long Duration, so there happen'd new Grounds of Quarrel, which broke it; and a cruel and obstinate War was again begun, which long afflicted Italy, the pernicious Effects whereof also reach'd our Provinces, though they were not the Seat of it. Notwithstanding the Peace made with Gregory, Frederick was still jealous that he intended to make War anew in our Kingdom; therefore this Year 1232, he caus'd all the Castles on the Borders of Campagna to be fortify'd and provided; and in the beginning of the Year 1233, he order'd Lucera in Puglia, to be fortify'd, and garrison'd with a greater Number of Saracens, and on the contrary, he made the Walls of Troja to be levelled, because during the late Troubles, that City had been more favourable to the Pope, than faithful to him. He likewise caus'd the Castles of Trani, Bari, Naples and Brindisi to be fortified; and the Year following, he order'd Castello Capuano in Naples, to be enlarg'd, and sent Niccolo Cicala to Capua, to oversee the building of a new Castle there, the Plan of which he had drawn with his own Hand upon the Hill. And after he had suppress'd the Rebellion of Bertoldo, Brother to the Duke of Spoletto, who had advis'd Bertoldo to fortify and defend Introdocco, he banish'd them both to Germany. He likewise recover'd the City of Gaeta, which took an Oath of Fidelity, both to him and his Son Conrade; and afterwards he sent thither Ettore di Montefusculo, Justice of Terra di Lavoro, who, by his Orders, appointed a Custom-house, and depriv'd that City of the Consulship, which hitherto it had enjoy'd, and after he had taken away the Power of creating Consuls, he sent Officers to command there in his Name, and fortify'd the Place with Thirty Towers.

BUT though, with so much Precaution, he had stor'd and fortify'd the Kingdom, yet he was afraid that the Pope, by some Means or other, might frustrate his Design of subjecting Milan, and the other rebellious Guelf Cities of Italy to his Obedience. He had been taught by long Experience, that all the Designs of the Popes were to keep these Cities divided, and stir up the Guelfs against the Ghibellines, lest the Emperors, by subjecting all Italy, should have an itching Desire also to subject Rome and the State of the Church, which had been dismembred from the Empire. And though Gregory, on Frederick's first Motion against the rebellious Cities of Lombardy, by means of his Legate, made up the Differences, and out of seeming Zeal for Peace, was many times at great Pains to reconcile them; nevertheless all these Intrigues came to nothing, for in settling the Articles of Agreement, the Pope was still bias'd in Favour of the Cities that were Enemies to the House of Suevia, so that nothing could be concluded. Frederick, with good Reason, made heavy Complaints of the Pope, who made a very ungrateful Return for what he had done for him, in making up the Differences betwixt him and the Romans, who had often mutiny'd against him in Rome, and forc'd him ignominiously to leave that City: he not only manag'd a Peace betwixt the Pope and the Romans, and those of Viterbo, but likewise reduc'd the Romans to the Pope's Obedience, and made them receive him, and the Cardinals with all Marks of Respect and Submission.

CHAP. I.

Henry King of Germany rebels against the Emperor Frederick his Father: But being overcome, is humbled; and Frederick makes War against the Lombards in Italy; Pope Gregory opposes him, and at last excommunicates him.

THESE Steps of Gregory, who was too much inclin'd to favour the Cities that were Enemies to Frederick, made the Emperor suspect that he had encourag'd his Son Henry this Year 1234, to rise in Rebellion; and Bernardino Corio, follow'd by the modern Writers, asserts it for a Truth, and says, That Henry the eldest Son of Frederick, by Constantia of Aragon, who, while a Child, had been created King of the Romans by his Father, and afterwards married to Agnes of Austria, Daughter of Duke Leopold, by the Means of Gregory, enter'd into a League with the People of the Milaneſe, and the other confederate Cities of Lombardy, against his Father, and that the People of the Milaneſe had promis'd to crown Henry with the Iron Crown, as soon as he should arrive in Italy.

SIGONIUS and *Riccardo da S. Germano*¹, relate the Matter otherwise, and say, That Henry's Rebellion did not begin in Italy, but in Germany, where, with some Barons, he conspir'd against the Emperor, and partly by Affection, partly by Force, brought over many Cities of that Country to his Interest; whereupon those of the Milaneſe, and the Confederate Cities of Lombardy, willing to catch at ſo favourable an Opportunity, ſent to offer him the Iron-Crown (which they had deny'd to his Father) and a good Body of Troops, and Store of Arms, if he would come in Perſon and make War in Italy.

CAMP O, in the History of Cremona, adds, that the Marſhal Anſelm, and Valcherius Tanvembrus, Archdeacon of Wurtzburg, came to Italy in the Name of Henry, as King of the Romans, to receive the Oath of Fealty; and that when they came to Milan on the 19th of December, they call'd an Aſſembly, wherein the Deputies of the Milaneſe, thoſe of Breſcia, Bologna, Lodi, Novara, and the Marquis of Monferate, met and entered into a League againſt Frederick, Cremona, Padua, and the other Cities that ſided with him; and took an Oath to Henry King of the Romans, and agreed to be moſt Faithful to him. But neither Sigonius, nor Campo aſſign any Reaſon for this Quarrel betwixt Henry and the Emperor; but theſe being modern Authors, we muſt look for the Truth in more antient Writers. Riccardo da S. Germano, in relating this Rebellion of Henry, gives us as little Account of the Cauſe of it as the reſt; however we have it recorded in the Chronicle of the Monastery of S. Juſtina of Padua, written by a Monk of that Monastery, who lived in Frederick's Time, and wrote his Exploits, and the Tranſactions of Italy to the Year 1270. with great Judgment; which Chronicle is preſerved in the ſaid Monastery, and is printed in the Historical Volume, intitled Rerum Germanicarum. 'Tis ſaid in this Chronicle, that the Cauſe of Henry's Rebellion againſt his Father, was Folly and a pettiſh Envy, becauſe Frederick lov'd his ſecond Son Conrade, whom he had by Jole, more than him; and indeed, we find in Riccardo, and other Authors, that Frederick lov'd Conrade dearly, and had a greater Regard for him than all his other Children¹.

I N the Beginning of the Year 1235. Frederick hearing of his Son's Rebellion, and that he was reſolv'd to make War againſt him in Italy, march'd towards Germany, and upon the Borders thereof, was join'd by ſome German Lords, where having aſſembled a ſufficient Army, he began a War with his Son, who was follow'd by many Barons and Cities; but Henry, being afterwards deſerted by them, and in a manner left alone, went to his Father's Camp, and burſting forth in Tears, threw himſelf at his Feet, and begg'd Pardon. Frederick receiv'd him, but by his by-paſt Behaviour being ſenſible of his unruly Temper, he carried him with him Priſoner to *Worms*²; and whether he had actually attempted, or that it was only alledg'd, that he had deſign'd to poiſon his Father, he was put in cloſe Priſon, and committed to the Charge of the Duke of Bavaria; and afterwards Frederick, reſolving to remove him out of Germany, deliver'd him to the Marquis Lancia of Lombardy, with Orders to conſult him to Puglia, which he did, and imprison'd him in the Caſtle of *S. Felice*³, whoſe unhappy Death we ſhall relate in its Place.

A F T E R the Emperor had thus ſuppreſs'd this Rebellion, he married Iſabella Daughter of the King of England, and the Marriage was with great Pomp ſolemniz'd in Worms on the 13th of Auguſt, precisely ſeven Years after the Death of Jole. Joannes Cuſpinianus, a German Author of good Account, in his Book De Cæſaribus, atque Imperatoribus Romanorum, ſays, that Frederick had ſix lawful Wives, and places betwixt Jole and this Iſabella, Agnes Daughter of Otho Duke of Moravia, who being divorc'd by him, was married to Uldarick Duke of Carinthia; the other two were Rutina Daughter of Otho Count of Wolbershaufen in Bavaria, and Iſabella Daughter of Lewis Duke of Bavaria, and that he had no Children by any of the three laſt.

B U T be that as it will, Frederick after his Marriage, laid a general Tax on the Kingdom, and having got Conrade his ſecond Son, to be created and crown'd King of the Romans in Cologn, in Place of the depos'd Henry, and left the Empreſs in Germany, he went with Conrade to Italy, and viſited the Pope in Rieti, where, in his own Preſence, he made his Son ſwear to be faithful to the Pope, and obedient to the Holy Church; and then was very earneſt with the Pope to aſſiſt him againſt his rebellious Lombards, with whom he was going to enter into a War: Gregory, who was unwilling to have them subdued; dissuaded him, giving him great Hopes that he would make up all their Differences, and that they should return to their Allegiance; and eight of the ten Years Truce, which Frederick had concluded with the Soldan, being now pass'd, Gregory, in order to divert Frederick from the War with the Lombards, resolv'd to renew that against the Soldan; for which end he ordered, that, at the Expiration of the two Years, every Body should be ready to take on the Cross for that holy Expedition, and wrote particular Letters dated the 9th of September, to all the Princes and Cities of Christendom, to acquaint them with this intended new Expedition. But, according to Sigonius, Frederick, after a short stay in our Kingdom, intent upon the War of Lombardy, return'd to his Army in Germany, in order to march with it into Lombardy. Riccardo da S. Germano, without mentioning the Emperor's Progress to Rieti, says, that this Year 1236. Frederick left his Son and Wife in Germany, with a good Army pass'd the Alps, and came to Verona, which is likewise true; but Riccardo's Purpose being to give a particular Detail of Frederick's Transactions in our Kingdom, he touches upon Foreign Affairs by the by only; so that for these we must follow *Sigonius*¹, who collected them from the most antient Authors, and especially from Pietro Girardo of Padua, an Eye-witness, in the Life of Ezelino.

SIGONIUS then says, that Frederick being exceedingly vex'd at the obstinate Rebellion of the greatest Part of Italy, wrote from Germany to the Pope, that he was no longer able to bear the outrageous Behaviour of the Lombards towards him; therefore he begg'd him, that he would either fall upon Means to put an End to their Sedition, by an honourable Peace with the Empire, or assist him against them, and especially the People of the Milanese, the Authors of all the Mischiefs, and Favourers of the Hereticks, and other licentious People; it being very reasonable, that he should make a suitable Return to what he had so often done for the Church against the Romans, those of Viterbo, and her other Rebels, who by his Means were reduc'd to her Obedience. But Gregory, whose Ends were quite different from those of Frederick, upon the Receipt of the Letter, answered him, That he ought not to think of making War in Italy, but rather prepare himself for the War of the Holy Land, and inform him with what he had to lay to the Charge of the Lombards, that he might get him full Satisfaction; and soon after sent him the same Message by Giacomo Pecoraro of Pavia, Cardinal of Preneſte. Frederick, highly incens'd at this Answer, and plainly discovering the Pope's Designs, sent him a smart Letter recorded by *Sigonius*², which begins Italia, hæreditas est mea, &c. and not minding the Pope's Answer, he sent another such Letter to a Prince his Friend, adding, that the following Summer he would go to Italy, and on the Feast of S. James hold a General Court in Parma, and be reveng'd of all the by-past Injuries. And accordingly he was as good as his Word, for at the Time appointed, with a powerful Army of Germans, Neapolitans, Sicilians, and Saracens of Puglia, he march'd to Constance, where he was met by Ezelino, who spurr'd him on to the War; and after the People of the Milanese had in vain endeavour'd to hinder him, he pass'd the Alps, and march'd to Trent, and from thence to *Verona*³. He afterwards march'd into the Territories of Mantua, where he was join'd by the People of the Cremonese, Modenese, and others of his faithful Subjects, and march'd to the Borders of the Brescians; and after he had plunder'd and burnt all their Country, in the Month of August he march'd to Cremona, and from thence to Parma, where he called a Meeting of all the Princes and Cities in Friendship with him; and finding that his Enemies were firmly resolv'd to keep up their Confederacy, it was resolv'd in this Assembly to carry on a vigorous War against them. Vicenza was taken, sack'd and burnt, and a great many of the Citizens kill'd and ruin'd: Having laid waste the Country round Padua, he besieg'd Trivigi, but being gallantly defended by Pietro Tiopolo the Governor, it could not be taken; and Salinguerra Lord of Ferrara, Ezelino's Brother-in-Law, left the Lombards, and return'd to his Allegiance.

MEAN while the Emperor had Advice, that in Germany, Frederick, surnam'd the Warlike, Duke of Austria, had risen in Rebellion, whereupon, to prevent the Mischiefs it might occasion, he left a competent Army in Italy, and immediately return'd to Germany, where, according to Joannes Cuspinianus in his Austria, after a short War, with the Assistance of Otho Duke of Bavaria, the Bishop of Bamberg, and many other German Prelates and Barons, he took Vienna, and all the considerable Places belonging to the Duke of Austria; and Conrade the Emperor's Son, sailing down the Danube with a noble Retinue, join'd his Father, and remain'd with him three Months in Vienna; and seeing, that the rebellious Duke had Possession only of a few Places of his Dominions, he made Vienna an Imperial City, and gave it a Golden Eagle crown'd in a Field Sable for its Arms, which it keeps to this Day. Afterwards he held a general Dyet in Ratisbon; and Duke Frederick, after alternate Success, in process of Time having recovered his Dominions, with Two hundred well-armed Knights, came to Verona, and threw himself at the Emperor's Feet, and was not only kindly received, and his Rebellion pardon'd, but was adorn'd with new Dignities, as may be seen in the special Grant recorded by Cuspinianus.

IN the mean Time Ezelino with Frederick's other Generals took Pavia and Trivigi, with some other Places in Lombardy and Marca, and made most cruel Slaughter in all the Places that were Enemies to the Emperor, and likewise drove Giordano Prior of S. Benedikt, and Arnaldo Abbot of S. Justina from their Churches.

THESE Victories of Frederick much displeased the Pope, who seeing the Forces of the Confederates daily dwindling away; and, on the contrary, the Emperor, lifted up with the Victory he had obtained over the Duke of Austria; he resolved to put a Stop to the Career of so many Victories, by proposing a Treaty of Peace; and for that End he sent Gregorio da Montelongo the Protonotary, to tell Frederick, that if he had any Regard for the Peace of the Church, and his Favour, he would receive the Submission of the Lombards, on the same Condition that his Grandfather Frederick, and his Father Henry had granted them by the Peace made at Constance, and that at his Desire he ought to remit something of his Right. But Frederick, full of Indignation, seeing, that when he might rather have expected Assistance from the Pope upon his Return to Italy against the People of the Milaneses, now he was interceding in their Favour, notwithstanding they were not only Enemies to him, but to the very Church, being for the most Part polluted with various Heresies, would not so much as hear the Proposals of his Messenger; whereupon Gregory, after he had quelled the Tumults and Commotions rais'd in Rome against him by the Means of Pietro Frangipane, in order to be the better able to mind the Defence of Lombardy, took off the Mask, and declared himself Frederick's open Enemy; and though once more a Treaty was brought upon the Carpet, and on the Part of the Emperor was to be managed by the Great Master of the Teutonic Order, and Pietro delle Vigne, and on the Part of the Pope, by Cardinal Rinaldo de Conti, Gregory's Nephew, and Cardinal Tommaso di Capua; yet it was to no purpose, for both Parties were so elated and haughty, that not only nothing was concluded, but shortly after began that famous and cruel War, wherein happened that remarkable Battle of Cortenuovo, to the total Ruin of the People of the Milaneses, and the confederated Cities, described by many Authors¹, and therefore we willingly pass it over: Frederick having gain'd a compleat Victory, was more proud of having made Prisoner Pietro Tiepolo the Son of Giacomo Doge of Venice his bitter Enemy, Chief Magistrate and Governor of Milan, than of any Thing that had happened; and after the Manner of the antient Romans; he made a Triumphal Entry into Cremona, in a Chariot taken from the Milaneses, wherein consisted the Glory of Victory in these Times, and he ordered Tiepolo to be tied to a Post, with a Rope about his Neck, and shortly after to be hang'd.

AS this Victory gain'd Frederick great Reputation, so it struck such Terror into all Lombardy, that, except Milan and Bologna, all the rest of the Cities submitted to him, and the Students of the University of Bologna, who, contrary to the Emperor's Orders, had staid there, because the University of Naples, to which they had been commanded to go, was in a bad Condition by reason of the frequent Wars, were terribly afraid.

WHILE the Emperor was in Lodi, there came to him from Naples a noble Embassy, to beg of him in the Name of the Body of the People, and of the Masters and Students, to cause their University to be reform'd, and put upon a better Footing; with which Request of the Ambassadors he most willingly complied, and gave Orders to his Ministers to put it in Execution, and at the same Time forbid Students from the Countries of the Milaneſe, Breſcia, Piacenza, Aleſſandria, Bologna, and Trivigi, Enemies to him and the Empire, to be received into the Univerſity, and ordered only thoſe of Tuſcany, Marca, the Dukedom of Spoletto, and Campagna di Roma, who were all Partifans of his Son Eutius King of Sardinia, whom he had made Vicar of Italy, to be admitted, as may be ſeen in ſome Writs of Frederick's Register, which is the only one of that Emperor preſerved in the Royal Archives; for all the Records of the Suevian Princes that were in Naples, were carried away and deſtroyed by the Victorious French in the Time of Charles I. and none left but this intire Register of Frederick of the Year 1239. wherein the City of Naples is cry'd up, and the Franchiſes of the Students, and particular Directions how they were to perform their Exerciſes, are ſet down.

HE likewiſe ordered the ſaid Reform of the Univerſity by a particular Letter directed to the Governor of the Kingdom of Sicily, recorded by Pietro delle Vigne; and having alſo ordered all other publick Schools in Naples and Sicily to be put down, he wrote afterwards to the Juſtice of Terra di Lavoro, that notwithſtanding the ſaid Order he was not to moleſt thoſe who taught Grammar, becauſe it was proper for the firſt Inſtruction of Children.

AT this ſame Time Frederick, in order to ſhew his Gratitude to Ezelino for his exceeding Courage and Loyalty at the Battle of Cortenova, and the other Wars of Italy, gave him in Marriage Selvaggia his baſtard Daughter.

FREDERICK now Victorious, and to whom the greateſt Part of Italy had ſubmitted, was reſolved to ſubdue it intirely, and to conquer Milan, Piacenza, Bologna, Paenza, and ſome other Cities, which as yet continued in Rebellion; whereupon he left Italy, and return'd to Germany, in order to aſſemble a great Army, and return the following Spring.

POPE Gregory was grievouſly vexed at theſe Deſigns of Frederick, and afraid that with his Power he might overturn the Dominions of the Church; ſo that there being none in Italy to whom he could have recourſe, he reſolv'd to beg Aſſiſtance from foreign Princes; therefore he ſent Ambaſſadors to James King of Arragon, called the Conqueror, a Prince much eſteemed in theſe Times, on account of his noble and gallant Exploits in driving the Moors out of many Kingdoms of Spain, to invite him in the Name of himſelf and the confederated Cities, to come and make War againſt Frederick, promiſing to make him Lord of Lombardy, and pay him all the Revenues and Honours that were wont to be paid to the Emperors. King James was then at the Siege of Valencia, held out by the Moors, and being offended with Frederick, becauſe he had impriſon'd his Son Henry, who, by his Mother Conſtantia, was his Couſin-German, conſented to the Pope's Propoſal, and promiſed to aſſiſt him with Two thouſand Horſe, and made other Conditions recorded by Hieronymus Zurita; but whatever might be the Occaſion, King James never came to Italy, but indeed his Son King Peter came, though much againſt the Inclinations of the ſucceeding Popes; and by Virtue of the Rights of the Houſe of Suevia, which his Wiſe Conſtantia brought him, he bravely ſubjected Sicily to his Dominion, as ſhall hereafter be related.

IN the mean time Frederick having raiſed a great Army in Germany, gave the Command of it to his Son Conrade, with Orders to follow him to Verona; and he himſelf advanced, and without Oppoſition ſubdu'd Vercelli, Turin, and all the other neighbouring Cities and Places; and in the Month of July following, King Conrade paſſ'd the Alps, and with many German Prelates and Lords, and a numerous Army came to Verona, where his Father was waiting for him, and from thence they march'd to Cremona, and then to Padua, where the Emperor held a General Meeting. The People of the Milaneſe terrified at ſo great Preparations, and having but few Troops, begg'd of the Pope to intercede for them with the Emperor, and ſent Ambaſſadors humbly to aſk Peace of him, offering to ſend Ten thouſand Soldiers for the Relief of the Holy Land, provided their City might enjoy the ſame Freedom it then poſſeſs'd. Frederick ſcorning their Offer, answer'd them, that if they would deliver up themſelves and their City without any Condition, to his Will and Pleaſure, he would accept of them; but they, afraid of Frederick's Cruelty, reſolv'd rather to die under Arms in the Field like brave Soldiers, than be burnt, or starv'd in Prison, or hang'd; whereupon being obstinately bent on defending themselves, they strengthen'd the Walls and Ditches of their City, and provided it with Soldiers and Arms, and took Assistance where-ever they could find it. Frederick having put an End to the Assembly, divided his Army into two Bodies, and with one he besieged Brescia, and sent the other against Alessandria, and with continual Attacks harass'd these two Cities, and laid waste their Territories; but falling short of Money for carrying on so cruel a War, by the Advice of his Ministers he laid a Tax upon the Goods of the Churches and Ecclesiasticks, at which Gregory being offended, sent him Word while he was at this Siege, not to meddle with the Privileges of the Church; whereupon Frederick, in order to pacify him, and defend himself against these Accusations, thought fit to send the Archbishop of Palermo, the Bishop of Reggio, Taddeo da Sessa, and Ruggiero Porcaprello, his Ambassadors to the Pope, then in Alagna, where they found him exceedingly irrag'd; upon which they sent back the Archbishop of Palermo to acquaint the Emperor with the Pope's Pleasure, who, notwithstanding the so many Revolts in Italy, which oblig'd Frederick not to leave it, still insisted upon the Expedition to the Holy Land, and invired many Princes to go thither; on the contrary, Frederick, intent on the Affairs of Italy, would not be concern'd in that Expedition; but the Time of the Truce being expir'd, he renew'd it for other ten Years, and forbid Rinaldus of Bavaria, his Vicar in that Kingdom, upon any account to make War against the Saracens. Notwithstanding this Truce, Gregory persisted in his Resolution, for he sent many Monks to diverse Countries of Christendom, to exhort the People to take on the Cross, and go to Palestine, whereupon a great Number of the Faithful, both Germans, Italians, and French assembled; but this Expedition was very unfortunate, for, though Frederick had given free Passage through his Dominions, yet there not being a Fleet, nor a sufficient Number of Transports for so great a Body of Men, the greatest Part set out to go over Land, and died of Fatigue and want of Necessaries.

A T this very Time there happened a new Ground of Discord betwixt the Pope and Frederick: Eutius his bastard Son, according to Riccardo da S. Germano, married in Sardinia, by Virtue of which Marriage he took Possession of the Jurisdiction of Torre Gallura: Gregory, who pretended that these Places by antient Right belong'd to the Church, was much offended, and sent many Messages to Frederick, requiring him to order the Rights of the Church to be restored; but the Emperor answered, That that Island belong'd to the Empire, and that his Grandfather Barbarossa, who had a Right to it, invested Quelfus his Uncle by the Mother with it, and gave him the Title of Prince; and afterwards invested Barison Judge of Arborea with it, and gave him the Title of King; and in process of Time gave it to the Pisans and Genoese: So that he not only would not restore it, but at this very Time created his Son Eutius King of it, who was no sooner crown'd, than he got some powerful Barons of the Island to possess themselves of many Territories and Castles, which the Bishops of that Kingdom had appropriated to themselves. These new Incidents, and the Emperor's growing Power, gave the Pope so much Uneasiness, that about the Beginning of this new Year 1239. he sent Letters to Frederick, exhorting him to desist from incroaching upon the Rights of the Church; but the Emperor answered him, that ever since his Coronation he made it his Study to have the Rights of the Empire restor'd, and therefore had taken Possession of those Places belonging to it, and that he ought not to take it in ill part, it being lawful for every Man to recover his own. Gregory highly offended, order'd him to restore them under Pain of Excommunication, which Frederick likewise slighting, he was publickly excommunicated in Rome on Holy Thursday this Year, in Presence of all the Cardinals, and a Multitude of Spectators conven'd to be Witnesses to the Ceremony. This Excommunication, containing many Accusations against Frederick, is recorded by *Sigonius*¹, and by Bzovius in his Annals, and begins: Excommunicamus, & anathematizamus, ex parte Dei Omnipotentis, &c. After Gregory in most dreadful Terms had declared the Emperor excommunicated, he intimated this Excommunication to Baldwin Emperor of Constantinople, James King of Arragon, Ferdinand King of Castile, Lewis King of France, and William King of Scotland, and to all the other Kings and Princes of Christendom; and besides, sent Orders to all Prelates, and particularly those of Notwithstanding this Truce, Gregory persisted in his Resolution, for he sent many Monks to diverse Countries of Christendom, to exhort the People to take on the Cross, and go to Palestine, whereupon a great Number of the Faithful, both Germans, Italians, and French assembled; but this Expedition was very unfortunate, for, though Frederick had given free Passage through his Dominions, yet there not being a Fleet, nor a sufficient Number of Transports for so great a Body of Men, the greatest Part set out to go over Land, and died of Fatigue and want of Necessaries.

A T this very Time there happened a new Ground of Discord betwixt the Pope and Frederick: Eutius his bastard Son, according to Riccardo da S. Germano, married in Sardinia, by Virtue of which Marriage he took Possession of the Jurisdiction of Torre Gallura: Gregory, who pretended that these Places by antient Right belong'd to the Church, was much offended, and sent many Messages to Frederick, requiring him to order the Rights of the Church to be restored; but the Emperor answered, That that Island belong'd to the Empire, and that his Grandfather Barbarossa, who had a Right to it, invested Quelfus his Uncle by the Mother with it, and gave him the Title of Prince; and afterwards invested Barison Judge of Arborea with it, and gave him the Title of King; and in process of Time gave it to the Pisans and Genoese: So that he not only would not restore it, but at this very Time created his Son Eutius King of it, who was no sooner crown'd, than he got some powerful Barons of the Island to possess themselves of many Territories and Castles, which the Bishops of that Kingdom had appropriated to themselves. These new Incidents, and the Emperor's growing Power, gave the Pope so much Uneasiness, that about the Beginning of this new Year 1239. he sent Letters to Frederick, exhorting him to desist from incroaching upon the Rights of the Church; but the Emperor answered him, that ever since his Coronation he made it his Study to have the Rights of the Empire restor'd, and therefore had taken Possession of those Places belonging to it, and that he ought not to take it in ill part, it being lawful for every Man to recover his own. Gregory highly offended, order'd him to restore them under Pain of Excommunication, which Frederick likewise slighting, he was publicly excommunicated in Rome on Holy Thursday this Year, in Presence of all the Cardinals, and a Multitude of Spectators conven'd to be Witnesses to the Ceremony. This Excommunication, containing many Accusations against Frederick, is recorded by *Sigonius*¹, and by Bzovius in his Annals, and begins: Excommunicamus, & anathematizamus, ex parte Dei Omnipotentis, &c. After Gregory in most dreadful Terms had declared the Emperor excommunicated, he intimated this Excommunication to Baldwin Emperor of Constantinople, James King of Arragon, Ferdinand King of Castile, Lewis King of France, and William King of Scotland, and to all the other Kings and Princes of Christendom; and besides, sent Orders to all Prelates, and particularly those of Germany, to publish in their Churches the Excommunication, and absolv'd his Vassals from their Oaths of Fealty, and interdicted all those that obeyed him. And Mathew Paris writes¹, that after Gregory had absolved the Emperor's Subjects from their Allegiance, he wrote to Robert Brother of Lewis King of France, offering him the Empire, and that the King of France upon this Offer call'd a Council of all the Princes of France, to consult what was fit to be done, and all of them in publick Assembly condemn'd the arrogant Conduct of the Pope, in these Terms: Quo Spiritu, vel ausu temerario Papa tantum Principem, quo non est major inter Christianos, non convictum, & confessum de objectis sibi criminibus exheredavit, & ab Imperiali apice præcipitavit? Scimus quod Domino Jesu Christo fideliter militavit in oriente, & bellicis se periculis, confidenter opponens, tantum religionis in Papa non invenimus. Imo qui eum debuit promovisse, & Deo militantem protexisse, eum conatus est absentem confundere, & nequiter supplantare. Nolumus nosmetipsos in tanta pericula præcipitare, ut ipsum Federicum tam potentem impugnemus, quem tot Regna contra jurabunt, & causa justa præstabit adminiculum. Quid ad Romanos de prodiga sanguinis nostri effusione, dummodo iræ suæ satisfecerimus, si enim per nos, & alios devicerit omnes Principes Mundi, conculsabit sumens cornua jactantiae, & superbiam, quoniam ipsum Federicum Imperatorem Magnum contriverit.

WHILE Frederick with great Solemnity was celebrating Easter in Padua, on the Monday of that Feast, News was brought him, that on Holy Thursday the Pope had publicly excommunicated him; and though he was inwardly vex'd, yet he seem'd no-ways concerned; and looking upon the Censure as unjust, he immediately called an Assembly of the most eminent Citizens of Padua, and Italian and German Lords in the Town-House, and, according to Peter Gerard, Pietro delle Vigne his High Chancellor made a long Oration in his Defence, complaining of Gregory, and beginning his Discourse with this Sentence: Leniter ex merito quid quid patièrè ferendum est: Quæ venit indigne pœna, dolenda venit; saying, that Frederick who governed his Dominions so uprightly, was heinously injur'd by the Pope, and was not to be reckon'd without the Pale of the Church, seeing he was so unjustly excommunicated, and like a good Christian, was ready to submit himself to the Holy Apostolical See, in all Things which Divine Justice required, but not to the Caprice of a Man². Therefore the Emperor, without minding the Excommunication, left Padua, and with a noble Company of Barons went to Triwigi, where he was honourably received, and wrote Letters to the Cardinals and Romans, checking them for having consented to the unjust Excommunication. He likewise wrote to all Christian Princes, clearing himself from the Aspersions cast upon him by the Pope, and charging both him and his Cardinals with enormous Crimes; which Letters are to be seen in the Books of Pietro delle Vigne, wherein he shews how unjustly he had been abus'd by the Pope. Then he return'd to Padua, and labour'd with all his Might to make the most considerable Lords of Italy his Friends, in order to make Head against the Pope, and bent all his Thoughts on the War of Italy.

THE Pope, after this Excommunication, by the Means of Monks and Friars, did all he could to imbroil the Kingdom; but Frederick, though engag'd in the War of Lombardy, prevented him, by turning all the Monks out of the Monastery of Monte Cassino, leaving only eight to perform the Divine Offices over the Body of S. Benedict, and sending a Guard of Soldiers to keep the Monastery; and having made a strong Garrison of it, he took out the old Treasure, and the sacred Vessels of Gold and Silver, which for many Years, by the provident Care of the Monks, and the Munificence of former Kings, Lords and Barons of the Kingdom, had been amass'd. He likewise took Pontecorvo, and the Castle Imola from these Fathers. He also commanded all the Natives of the Kingdom, then at the Court of Rome, to leave it, except those in the Service of Cardinal Tommaso, and Giovanni di Capua his Vassals. He banish'd the Bishops of Aquino, Carniola, Teano, and Venafro from their Churches and the Kingdom. He levied a Subsidy upon all Cathedral Churches, the Monastery of Cassino, and all their Vassals, and ordered Ruggier di Landolfo, and Giacomo Gazzolo to be Collectors for the District of Terra di Lavoro, and to levy the Half of their Incomes, with part of which the Soldiers that guarded Monte Cassino and Pontecorvo were to be maintain'd.

AND at the same Time he ordered the underwritten Articles to be publish'd over all the Kingdom, and to be inviolably observed, and they are recorded by Riccardo ¹.

FIRST, That all the Friars of S. Dominick, and the Friars Minors of S. Francis, Natives of the rebellious Cities and Territories of Lombardy, shall immediately depart his Dominions; and all the other Religious shall give Security to do nothing contrary to his Interest. II. That all Barons and Knights, that heretofore have sided with the Pope, and especially those whose Baronies are situated on the Confines of Abruzzo and Campagna, shall go with Horse and Arms to serve in the Army in Lombardy at their own Charges, and those who have not wherewithal, shall receive Pay. III. That there shall be levied for his Use upon Cathedral Churches, a Subsidy according to their Riches, and likewise upon the Canons, Priests, and other Clergy of these Dioceses, according to their Ability; and the same shall be levied upon the Abbots, white and black Friars. IV. That all those, who are at the Court of Rome, excepting those who are exempted, and all suspected Persons, shall immediately return to the Kingdom, otherwise their Goods shall be confiscated; and after being summoned, if they don't obey, they shall never be suffered to return. V. That the Goods and Benefices of such Clergy, as are not Natives of the Kingdom, shall be all confiscated. VI. That none shall go out of the Kingdom to Rome, nor return to it from Rome, without a Licence from the Justices of the Provinces of Abruzzo and Terra di Lavoro. VII. Spies shall be appointed, to search both Men and Women coming into the Kingdom, for Letters from the Pope against him, and if any shall be found, the Bearers, whether of the Clergy or Laity, shall suffer Death.

FREDERICK, though now at odds with the Pope, sent the Bishops of S. Agata and Calvi to Rome, in order to treat with the Cardinals about an Accommodation; but as soon as Gregory understood that they were come to Rome, he ordered them to be gone, and they return'd without doing any Thing ².

CHAP. II.

An open War breaks out betwixt Frederick and Pope Gregory, who, after he had been every way worsted by the Emperor, dies of Grief.

BOTH Parties being now sufficiently exasperated, the Pope causes Ravenna to revolt from the Emperor to the Venetians. Frederick recalls into Italy his Son Eutius, who, with a good Body of Puglian, German, Sicilian, and Saracen Troops coming from Sardinia, invades Marca d'Ancona, and begins the War against the Pope. Gregory sent Cardinal Giovanni Colonna his Legate to defend that Country, and in the Month of November 1239. confirm'd the Censures against Frederick, and excommunicated King Eutius, with all his Followers, for having entered Marca in a hostile Manner, Quam juris esse dicebat Ecclesiæ, according to Riccardo.

THE Pope solicited the Venetians, who had already discover'd themselves to be Enemies to Frederick, to make War upon him, and they with their Fleet invaded Puglia, whereupon Frederick hearing that some of his Barons of Puglia, to favour this Invasion, had rebell'd, resolv'd to go thither; therefore having put good Garrisons into the most considerable Cities of Lombardy, he pass'd the Appennines, and arriv'd at Lucca, and from thence he march'd to Pisa, where he stopp'd some Days, and ingag'd the Pisans to make War upon the Genoese, and got many of the People of Tuscany to join him. At the same Time Elias the Monk, a Disciple of S. Francis of Assisi, offended with the Pope, because he had shewn himself more favourable to some of his Order, whom he hated, than to him, likewise sided with Frederick, and became one of his Abettors; whence we see some of the Emperor's Letters written in his Favour, and particularly one to the King of Cyprus, wherein he highly commends him, and shews that he had a great Regard for him.

BERNARDINO COIRO relates, that before Frederick left Lombardy, Pietro delle Vigne, Andrea di Cicala, Pandolfo della Fasanella, and Jacopo di Morra, with many more of his chief Barons, influenc'd by the Milanese, conspired to murder him in the midst of his own Army; and that the Emperor being appriz'd of their Treason, caus'd Pietro's Eyes to be put out, and the rest to be put to different Sorts of cruel Death. But Coiro is grossly mistaken in this Story, which, perhaps, he has taken from some Author, who unadvisedly has written it before him, for we read of no such Fact, either in Riccardo da S. Germano, or in any Writer of these Times; on the contrary, Andrea di Cicala, after the Death of Errico di Morra, was made Lord Chief Justice, and for a long Time serv'd Frederick very faithfully; and the Rebellion of the S. Severini, Teobaldo Francesco, Fasanella, and the other Barons, with the Ruin of Pietro delle Vigne, happen'd in Puglia a considerable Time after, and upon another Account than what Coiro tells, as we shall shew hereafter.

AFTER Frederick had made his Son Eutius his Lieutenant in Italy, and sent him with a good Body of Troops to take Possession of Marca d'Ancona, he himself with the rest of the Army on another Side enter'd the Dukedom of Spoletto, and other Parts of the Patrimony of the Church; and in the Beginning of this Year 1240. Fulgino, Viterbo, Orta, Civita Castellana, Corneto, Sutri, Montefiascone, and Toscanella, with many other Castles surrender'd to him; which so terrified the Pope, that he had recourse to Prayers; and having taken out the Heads of S. Peter and S. Paul, with the Wood of our Saviour's Cross, accompanied by all the Clergy, and almost all the People of Rome, he carried them in Procession from S. John Lateran to S. Peter's Church, where he made a long Speech upon the Miseries, which the Church of God, as he said, suffered by Frederick, and publish'd a Crusade against him, as a cruel Enemy to God and his Ministers, and with his Discourse animated many of his Hearers to put on the Cross. And after he had assembled a considerable Army of them and his other Soldiers, they march'd out to fight the Emperor, and had frequent Skirmishes with him, which so exasperated Frederick, that as many of the Crocesignati as he took Prisoners, he either caus'd their Heads to be cloven in four Pieces, or with a red hot Iron branded them on the Forehead with the Sign of the Cross; and after he had caus'd the Territories of Rome to be pillag'd and burnt, he march'd into Puglia, whither a little before he had sent the Empress his Wife, accompanied by the Archbishop of Palermo, and did all he could to drive the Venetians from that Coast, which they had been scowring with Twenty-five Gallies, and had pillag'd Termoli, Campomarino, Vesti, Rodi, and other Castles; and had met near Brindisi, a Transport returning from Palestine with German Soldiers, which, after an obstinate Fight, because they defended themselves resolutely, the Venetians burnt and sunk. Frederick not able to remedy these Losses, out of Revenge caus'd Pietro Tiepolo, their Doge's Son, to be hang'd in their Sight, on a Tower in Trani near the Sea-shore; and after the Venetians had harass'd the Coast till the Month of October, loaded with Booty, without any Opposition they return'd to Venice.

AT the same time Pope Gregory, by the Advice of the Cardinals, resolv'd to call a general Council to be held in the Lateran the Easter following, to remedy the bad State of the Affairs of the Church, and relieve Palestine, and for that end sent Giacomo Pecoraro di Pavia Cardinal of Preneste, and Ottone Bianco his Legates, to Spain, France, England and Scotland, to invite the Bishops and Prelates of these Kingdoms to come to the Council, in order to defend the Rights of the Church against the Emperor, giving them an account of the Wars and Persecutions she daily suffer'd. As soon as Frederick was appriz'd of this, he left no Stone unturn'd to hinder the Ultramountain Prelates from coming to the Council, and for that Purpose he wrote to the King of England, by no means to suffer his Bishops to leave the Kingdom, Kingdom, and threatned the German and French Prelates, if they should venture to come; and in order to be as good as his Word, he sent his Son Eutius with a powerful Army to the Coast of Genoa, to prevent their coming, and to make all of them Prisoners that should fall into his Hands, and to harais the Territories of Genoa to the utmost of his Power, because that State sided with the Pope. Frederick was at this Time in a most flourishing Condition, both as to Men and Money, having Five great Armies in his Pay; for, besides that which was besieging Faenza, and the other in the Genoese, he had a Third in Marca d'Ancona, and the Valley of Spoleto, whereof, as may be seen in Pietro delle Vigne's Letters, Marino d'Evoli was Captain General. The Fourth was in Palestine, under Rodolphus his Marshal, and the Fifth in Germany, commanded by his Son Conrade, design'd for the Assistance of Bela King of Hungary, against the Tartars, who, a little before, had come out of the remotest Parts of Scythia, and like a Deluge, had over-run, and conquer'd the greatest Part of Asia; and being Victorious and Powerful, they had divided themselves into several Armies, one of which having come into Europe, had defeated the Poles, Russians and Bulgarians; so that King Bela's seeking Assistance from Frederick, not only oblig'd him to order his Son Conrade to assemble a strong Army of Germans for assisting that King to drive the Tartars from the Borders of Germany; but likewise made him write to the Senators of Rome, complaining, that the Differences betwixt him and Gregory diverted him from going in Person upon so important an Expedition, begging of them to use their Interest for a Reconciliation, as may be plainly seen in the first Book of Pietro delle Vigne's Letters:

IN the mean time, in the beginning of the Year 1241, Frederick, in order to deprive the Pope of all possible Means of fomenting Rebellion by the Monks, order'd all the Cordeliers and Dominicans to be banish'd the Kingdom, leaving only Two of each Order, Natives thereof, in the Monasteries, and immediately laid Siege to Benevento, as Riccardo writes, which being gallantly defended for Nine Months, at last, reduc'd to Famine, surrender'd, and by Order of the Emperor, the Walls and Towers were levell'd with the Ground, and the Citizens disarm'd.

AT the same Time Gio. Colonna Cardinal of St. Prassede, Gregory's Legate in Marca, being disoblig'd by him, went over to Frederick, and deliver'd up to him a good Number of Castles in the Neighbourhood of Rome. During the Siege of Faenza, the Cardinals return'd from beyond the Mountains, and brought with them from England and Scotland, a great Number of Archbishops, Bishops and other Prelates to Genoa, on their Way to the Council, and they found in that City Gregorio di Romagio, likewise the Pope's Legate, sent thither about the same Affair of the Council. These Prelates, afraid to go to Rome by Land, because of Frederick's Menaces, resolv'd to take Shipping in the Genoese Gallies, cammanded by Guglielmo Ubriachi their Admiral, notwithstanding Frederick had invited them to come to him, because he had a mind either to make them sensible that he had Justice on his Side, and lay all the Blame on the Pope, or to prevent their going to the Council; but they embark'd in the Genoese Fleet, and were met by King Eutius with Twenty well-arm'd Neapolitan, Sicilian and Pisan Gallies, commanded by Ugolino Buzzaccherini da Pisa, a most experienc'd Sea-Officer: On the second Day of May the Two Fleets engag'd betwixt Porto Pisano and the Island of Corfica, not far from the small Island of Meloria, (for the Genoese Admiral had kept close by the Shore, both to shorten the Voyage and shun the Enemy) and by the Bravery of the Soldiers and their Commander Eutius, obtain'd a notable Victory. On this Occasion the Three Legates, all the Prelates, and a great Number of Ambassadors from diverse Princes and Cities, who were likewise going to the Council, were all made Prisoners, Three of the Enemy's Gallies sunk, and Twenty-two taken, Thirteen of which were taken by the Neapolitan and Sicilian Vessels, and the rest by the Pisans, besides Four thousand Genoese Prisoners; among the Prelates that were taken, the Archbishop of Roan was one, with a great many English and French Bishops and lesser Prelates; some of which were cruelly thrown into the Sea near Meloria; and others imprison'd in Naples, Salerno, and other Places on the Coast of Amalphis, where many of them died of Famine and Grief, and the rest were set at Liberty, at the Solicitations of the Kings of France and England, and Baldwin Emperor of Constantinople. There is still to be seen one of Frederick's Letters², written to some of his Barons, wherein he mentions particularly the taking of Faenza, and this Victory obtain'd by his Gallies, which begins thus : Adaucta nobis continuæ felicitatis auspicia, &c.

AFTER this Exploit, Andrea di Cicala, Lord Chief Justice and Captain General of the Kingdom, by Order of his Master, conven'd all the Prelates, that were Natives of the Kingdom in Melpbis, and made them consign into his Hands all the Furniture of their Churches, both of Gold and Silver, and the precious Stones, the Vestments of Silk and Purple, and all other Things set apart for Divine Worship, a great Part of which he convey'd to a Church in S. Germano, and committed the Charge thereof to Twelve of the richest and most responsible Men of that Town ; and particularly from the Altar of St. Benedict in Monte Cassino, there were taken two Tables, the one of most pure Gold, and the other of the finest Silver, with other costly Ornaments, set off with Gold and Jewels, and Vessels of Silver, with a vast Sum of ready Money ; but some of this sacrilegious Booty was ransom'd by those from whom it had been taken, and the rest was carried to Grottaferrata, to be coin'd for the Service of the Emperor ; who, after he had taken Faenza, and all the other Places of Romagna, and made his Son Eutius his Lieutenant in Lombardy, march'd to Marca, and attack'd Fano, Affisi and Pesaro, but could not make himself Master of them ; whereupon he laid waste their Territories, and march'd to Spoleto, which with Narni, and other Places of Umbria, immediately surrender'd, whilst Count Simone di Chieti his General, with another Part of the Army, took Chiusi and Viterbo ; then at the Request of Cardinal Colonna, who, as we have said, had revolted from the Pope, he took and destroy'd Monte Albano, Tivoli, and other Castles near Rome, where Gregory, afflicted with so many Disasters, soon after he had made Matto Rosso, a prudent and brave Man, Senator of Rome, in order to withstand the Attempts of the Emperor and Cardinal Colonna, was taken ill, and, according to Riccardo da S. Germano, died of Grief the 21st of August.

UPON the Death of Pope Gregory, Frederick wrote Letters to the King of England, and other Kings and Princes of Christendom, to tell them, that he hop'd by Gregory's Death, to put an End to the Differences which he had had with the Church, and to accompany them against the Tartars, who, as we have said, were ravaging Hungary, Germany and other Christian Countries. The Cardinals, on Gregory's Death, met to elect a new Pope ; but being only Ten in Number, they sent Ambassadors to Frederick, to beg that he would be pleas'd, on whatever Conditions he should think fit, to send them the Two Cardinals that were his Prisoners ; therefore having caus'd them to be conducted to Tivoli by Teobaldo di Dragone, he made them swear, as Sigonius relates, that unless one of them was elected Pope, they should return to their Prison, and then gave them free Liberty to go to Rome. And having left a good Garrison in Tivoli, by the Way of Campagna he enter'd our Kingdom, where he halted at Isola, and order'd a new City to be built over against Cepparano, and committed the Inspection of it to Riccardo di Monte Negro, Justice of Terra di Lavoro, and gave Orders, that the Inhabitants of Arce, Isola and Pesfena should go thither to live ; and that a certain Number of the Tenants belonging to Monte Cassino, St. Vincenzo of Vulturno, the Counties of Fondi, Comino and Molise, should go weekly by Turns, to assist in building this new City. But Riccardo, who writes this, makes no mention of the Name given to this new City ; but by what may be gather'd from what he says a little after, and by what we read in the Chronicle of King Manfred, it was call'd Flagella, by which Frederick would have it to be understood, that he had built this City, to be a Bridle upon Cepparano, and the other neighbouring Places belonging to the Church ; nevertheless there are no Remains, nor the least Vestige of such a City to be seen at present, nor do we find it mention'd in after-times, either because it has never been finish'd, or soon after has been demolish'd.

WHILE Frederick was on his March by the Way of St. Germano, Alife and Benevento to Puglia, and had order'd all the Goods taken out of the Churches, to be brought to him in Foggia ; the Cardinals, who were met in the Conclave at Rome, Thirty Days after Gregory's Death, elected Goffredo Castiglione a Milanese, Cardinal of St. Sabina, Pope, who was old and infirm, but a Man of great Worth, and gave him the Name of Celestine IV. who, Seventeen Days after his Election, before he was consecrated, departed this Life ; whereupon the Cardinals disagreeing among themselves, for a long Time did not elect another Pope, to the great Detriment of the Church ; but many of them, afraid of Frederick's Cruelty, left Rome privately, and fled to Alagna, and other Places, to shelter themselves.

IN the Month of December, while the Empress Isabella was with the Emperor her Husband in Foggia, she was seiz'd with a sudden Illness, and in a short Time died, and was buried in Andria.

THE following Year 1242, Frederick impos'd another heavy Tax upon the Kingdom, turn'd out Riccardo di Monte Negro from being Justice of Terra di Lavoro, and put Gisulpho da Narni in his Place : And suspecting the Fidelity of the Baresians, he caus'd all the Towers of their City to be demolished, and sent the Great Master of the Teutonic Order, the Archbishop of Bari, and Ruggiero Procastello, his Ambassadors to Rome, in order to reconcile the Cardinals that were there, and treat about the Election of a new Pope.

AT the same Time, according to Riccardo da S. Germano, Henry, who had been long Prisoner in the Castle of St. Felice in Puglia, and afterwards in that of Nicastro in Calabria, and then in Martorano, died a natural Death in this last Place : But Boccaccio, an Author that liv'd near to these Times, and famous for his Learning and other Virtues, treating of the Fate of illustrious Men, says, That while Henry was Prisoner in Martorano, his Father, mov'd with Compassion, order'd him to be brought before him, with a Design to set him at Liberty ; whereupon Henry, who knew nothing of his Father's Intention, afraid that he had sent for him to satiate his Cruelty in the most barbarous Manner, while the Keepers were conducting him a Horseback to the Emperor, in passing a Bridge of a River in the Way, threw himself, Horse and all, into it, and was immediately drown'd : Whatever way he came by his Death, 'tis certain, that Frederick was very sorry for it, and regretted the Severity wherewith he had us'd him ; which he evidenc'd to all the Prelates of his Kingdom, by Letters, wherein he bemoans his Loss, and orders them to celebrate pompous Obsequies, with Masses, and other sacred Offices, for the Space of a Month, as an Atonement for the Sins of his dead Son, which Letters are recorded by Riccardo, and begin, Fridericus, &c. Abbati Cassinensi, &c. Misericordia, &c.

HENRY left by his Wife Margaret, Daughter of Leopold Duke of Austria, surnam'd the Glorious, according to Cuspinianus, Henry and Frederick, Twins ; but it being the Will of God to put an End to that unfortunate House, these two Sons, with the Mother Margaret, died as miserable Deaths as the Father Henry ; for, Manfred caus'd the Sons to be poison'd when they were Twelve Years of Age ; and Margaret having outliv'd her Father, Husband and Brothers, who all died without Issue, and being left sole Heiress of the Dukedom of Austria, and the last of that Race, was married again to Othocarius the Son of the King of Bohemia, by whom she had no Children ; and in process of Time, grievous Discords arising betwixt them, she was divorc'd ; and Othocarius, under pretence of having a Dispensation from the Pope, whom he had in vain, by Bribes and Offers, solicited for that Purpose, married Kunigunda, Niece of Bela King of Hungary, and confin'd Margaret in the City of Krems in Austria, where, shortly after, he caus'd her to be poison'd, and, after terrible Wars on that Account, at last the Dukedom of Austria came to the Counts of Hapsburg, who are yet in Possession of it, and many other Dominions and Provinces, with the Surname of the House of Austria.

C H A P. III.

Sinibaldo Fieschi is elected Pope by the Name of Innocent IV. who prosecutes the War against Frederick, as his Predecessor Gregory had done ; and calls a Council to be held in Lyons in France.

IN the mean Time Frederick, who was very earnest to have a new Pope chosen, went in a friendly Manner to Rome, in order to persuade the Cardinals to come to an Election, as may be seen in one of his Letters recorded by Pietro delle Vigne ; and at the same Time Errico di Morra Lord Chief Justice of the Kingdom, died a natural Death.

THE Year of God 1243 being now begun, and the Cardinals not dispos'd to elect a Pope to Frederick's Mind, in a great Rage he enter'd the Territories of Rome, and, according to Riccardo, carry'd Ruin and Destruction with him where-ever he went ; and because the Romans laid the Blame of delaying the Election upon the Cardinals, he not only possess'd himself of their Churches, but likewise destroy'd their Country Seats and Estates, and the Saracens ruin'd Albano, which belong'd to a Cardinal. He caus'd Two Statues of Brass to be taken out of the Abby of Grotta Ferrata, and carried to Lucera in Puglia, and being reconcil'd with the Romans, he set the Cardinal of Prenefte, who had been long Prisoner in Castle Fanola, at Liberty, and sent him honourably back to Rome, having some time before done the same to Cardinal Oddo, that he might be present at the Election of the Pope ; these two Cardinals, according to their Parole, of their own accord, after the Election of Celestine, had return'd to Prison. The Cardinals, being met anew in Alagna, on the 24th of June, the Feast of St. John Baptist, elected Sinibaldo Fieschi a Genoese, of the Family of the Counts of Lavagna, Cardinal of St. Lorenzo, who was consecrated on the Feast of the Apostles St. Peter and Paul, and call'd Innocent IV.

HE had been a most intimate and particular Friend of Frederick's, therefore, upon the News of his Election, which might have been reckon'd agreeable to the Emperor, Frederick order'd Thanks to be return'd to God over all the Kingdom, and sent the Archbishop of Palermo, Pietro delle Vigne, and Taddeo da Sessa, his Ambassadors, with most friendly Letters to congratulate him upon his Accession to the Papacy ; this made the People of Italy conclude, that all Differences were now at an end, and that they might expect to live in Peace and Tranquillity ; but Frederick, who knew Innocent's Temper, answer'd his Friends who wish'd him Joy, that he had good Reason to mourn, because he had lost one who was his best Friend when a Cardinal, and would prove his bitterest Enemy now that he was Pope ; which accordingly happen'd ; for Innocent was scarcely fix'd in St. Peter's Chair, when he caus'd it to be signified to Frederick, that with the Papacy he had likewise taken upon him to defend the Rights of the Church, and sent Peter Archbishop of Roan, William Bishop of Modena, and William Abbot of St. Facundus, to tell him, that he must purge himself of all the Crimes laid to his Charge, and that if he had offended the Church in any thing, he had e'en best make such Reparation as some Delegates that he would appoint for that Purpose should determine. Frederick, hearing this insolent Message, immediately rejected it, and caus'd all the Ports and Roads to be guarded, that Innocent might not write of such a Thing to the Princes and People beyond the Alps; and being appriz'd, that the Pope had imploy'd some Cordeliers to go and solicit the Favour of these Princes and People, he order'd them to be way-laid, and they were all caught, and hang'd.

IN the mean time the Pope, in the Month of October, left Alagna, where he had continued ever since his Election, and went to Rome, and was receiv'd with great Pomp and Honour; and, shortly after, the Count of Toulouse, who some time before had come to Puglia to wait upon Frederick, did what he could to reconcile them.

H E R E ends the Chronicle of Riccardo da S. Germano, for want of which we shall not be able to give an Account of Frederick's Actions, and other Events of these Times, with the same Perspicuity as we have hitherto done.

IN the Beginning of the Year 1244, Frederick, at the Head of his Army, return'd, and enter'd the State of the Church; yet mov'd by the Intreaties of his Friends, and the repeated Sollicitations of other Christian Princes, he was perswaded to come to an Agreement with the Pope; whereupon he sent the Count of Toulouse, Pietro delle Vigne, and Taddeo di Sessa, his Plenipotentiaries and Ambassadors to Rome, who, in his Name, on the Feast of Easter, in Presence of Baldwin Emperor of Constantinople, who was then living there, promis'd, that he would submit to Innocent, and let the Church enjoy her Rights and Territories peaceably; upon which the Treaty was begun, and the Pope, with many Cardinals, went to Civita Castellana, and from thence to Sutri, to be nearer the Emperor. Frederick first of all requir'd to be absolv'd from the unjust Sentence of Excommunication pronounc'd against him by Gregory his Predecessor; but Innocent by no means would absolve him, till he had first restor'd all that he had taken from the Church; whereupon the Treaty was broken off, and Frederick began openly to threaten him, and even to fall upon Ways and Means how to seize him; whereof the Pope being appriz'd, immediately fled, and sent a Cordelier to acquaint Filippo Vicedomini Governor of Genoa, to come with arm'd Gallies, and his Nephews the Fieschi, to take him aboard at the nearest Shore; when the Governor made Report of this to the Senate, they resolv'd to assist Innocent with Twenty-two Gallies. The Fleet being ready, Alberto, Jacopo and Ugone Fieschi, the Sons of Innocent's Brother, imbark'd, and to conceal their Design from Frederick's Faction in Genoa, they pretended to be going upon another Voyage: They left Genoa the 11th of June, and after a prosperous Voyage, arriv'd at Civita Vecchia, where they found Innocent, who took shipping in their Fleet, and arriv'd at Porto Venere, and from thence at Genoa, where he was honourably receiv'd, and the Cardinals, whom he had left at Sutri, shortly after, in Disguise, and by different Roads, by the Favour of the Milanese, likewise arriv'd at Genoa. Frederick having certain Account of the Pope's Departure, furnish'd and fortify'd all the Places of St. Peter's Patrimony that were in his Possession, and then went to Pisa, from whence he sent his Ambassadors to Parma (where he knew that Innocent had many Relations, by some of his Sisters being married there) to prevent Revolts and Commotions there, and to confirm the Parmesans in their Fidelity, and then left Tuscany, and return'd to our Kingdom.

INNOCENT being now in Genoa, and fully perswaded, that Frederick would yield to no Terms, till he was first absolv'd from the Censures, which he was determin'd not to consent to; with a Design quite to undo Frederick, resolv'd to leave Italy, and being accompanied by the Cardinals, and other Roman Prelates and Barons, with the Marquises of Montferrat and Carretto, he went to Asti, and from thence to Lyons in France; where he was receiv'd with the utmost Honour and Respect by King Lewis IX. and presently summon'd the Council, which Gregory so earnestly desir'd to have call'd, without ever being able to do it; to which he summon'd all the Prelates of Christendom against the Feast of St. John Baptist; and to give a specious Pretence for calling this Council, he pretended that it was to find out Means how to relieve the Christians that were making War in the Holy Land, where, by reason of the Differences with Frederick, they were reduc'd to very miserable Circumstances; and likewise added, That in this Council Ways and Means ought to be fallen upon how to repair the distracted State of the Church in Italy; but his real Intent was to have Frederick's Deposition brought upon the Carpet. The Emperor having smelt out Innocent's Design, did not fail at the same Time to write a long Letter to all the Princes of the World, to whom he laid open the Pope's Designs, representing to them, that what he pretended was only Grimace, and that it was well known that he could not send Relief to the Holy Land, when Innocent was doing all he could to sow Sedition in, and turn him out of his Dominions in Italy, and that all the Mischief, and the Ruin of Jerusalem, was owing to the Pope; for all the Differences there betwixt the Knights Templars and Hospitalers were fomented by him, because these last were Creatures of his, and his Ministers.

THUS ended the Year 1244, in which Italy had not only been afflicted with War, but likewise with a cruel Famine and Pestilence. In the Beginning of the following Year 1245, Frederick finding that the Council of Lyons was levell'd against him, resolv'd to return to Lombardy, and, the best way he could, frustrate the Pope's Designs, and being arriv'd at Verona, he call'd a general Parliament, wherein were present many Italian and German Barons, together with Conrade the Son of Baldwin, Emperor of Constantinople, the Dukes of Austria and Moravia, with Ezellino; and after sundry Affairs of Italy were settled, he made heavy Complaints of Innocent, clear'd himself of all the Faults laid to his Charge, and sent Pietro delle Vigne, and Taddeo di Sessa, to the Council of Lyons (whither he resolv'd to go himself) to oppose the Attempts of the Pope; for this end he left Verona, and set forward in order to cross the Alps; but on his Arrival at Turin, he heard, that on the 27th of July, the Pope had pronounc'd Sentence against him, and deprived him of the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, and of the Imperial Crown, as a Rebel, an Enemy, and a Persecutor of the Holy Church.

S E C T. I.

The History of the Council of Lyons, in which the Emperor Frederick was depos'd.

MATHEW PARIS, and other grave Authors relate, that the Council being conven'd in the Cathedral Church of Lyons, Innocent sitting on the Throne, with Baldwin Emperor of Constantinople on his Right Hand; before they enter'd upon Business, adorn'd the Cardinals with red Hats, meaning by that Colour to shew, that they ought to be ready to shed their Blood in the Service of the Church against Frederick; and for the greater Ornament of their Dignity, he added the Portmantle and the Silver Mace when they travelled a Horseback, whereby he meant, that their Dignity should be look'd upon as equal to that of Kings. This he did likewise out of Spite and Malice to Frederick, who had said, that Prelates ought to imitate Christ, and the Apostles, by walking bare-footed, and that they ought to be reduc'd to the Primitive Poverty of the Church¹. Then other Affairs of the Church, such as the Relief to be sent to the Holy Land, and how to defend Hungary and Germany against the Tartars, who had invaded, and were destroying these Countries, were discuss'd: In the next Place the Pope began to exaggerate Frederick's Wickedness, and his continual Persecution of the Roman Pontiffs, and other Ministers of the Church of God, by banishing the Bishops, and depriving them of their Livings, imprisoning the Clergy, and often putting them to cruel Deaths, &c. But Taddeo di Sessa, one of Frederick's Ambassadors, stood up, and, in the Face of the Pope and the whole Council, boldly answered, that his Master was innocent of all these Crimes that they laid to his Charge; and that the Blame of the by-past Wars ought to be imputed to the Popes; and that trusting to the Justice of his Prince's Cause, he would clear him from all these Aspersions; and that the Emperor, if the Pope had been his Friend, would have got the Greek Church to have united with the Latin, and would have recovered the Holy Land, and restored all that had been taken from the Church of Rome; and that he had offered the Kings of France and England as Guarantees for his Performance ; but the Pope made a Mock of these Offers, as vain and illusory, and rejected them ; with this Discourse ended the first Session of the Council.

THE Council met the Week following, and in this second Session the same Affair was the first that was brought upon the Carpet ; and after the Pope had made a new Speech on Frederick's Wickedness, the Bishop of Carinola, who had been a Cistercian Monk, and was one of the Prelates whom Frederick had caus'd to be banish'd the Kingdom, rose up, and after he had told, with a doleful Voice, how severely he had been treated by Frederick, he began to give an Account of his wicked Life from his Childhood, and loaded him with many Crimes ; saying, That Frederick believ'd neither in God, nor the Saints ; that he had several Wives at one and the same Time ; that he was always a Favourer of the Saracens ; that he had a private Correspondence with the Soldan of Babylon ; that he often polluted himself with the unlawful Embraces of Saracen Women ; and that by leading an Epicurean and Worldly Life, in Opposition to all Laws, he was wont to repeat these Words of Averroes, that three Persons had deceiv'd the whole World, our Saviour Jesus Christ the Christians, Moses the Jews, and Mahomet the Arabs ; and after the Bishop had enumerated some other such like Crimes, he concluded his Discourse with saying, That Frederick intended to reduce the Prelates to that pitiful poor Condition of the Primitive Church, as his Actions and Letters clearly demonstrate. Then rose a Spanish Archbishop, who confirm'd what the Bishop of Carinola had said, and charg'd Frederick with other Crimes, such as Heresy, Sacrilege, and Perjury, and advis'd the Pope to proceed against him, and depose him from the Empire, and offer'd to assist him both with his Purse and Person, and to get all the Prelates of his Nation (who were more numerous in this Council, and made a greater Figure than those of any other Nation) to do the same.

BUT Taddeo di Sessa, not able to bear the opprobrious Speech of the Bishop of Carinola, answer'd him boldly, that he ly'd in every Thing he had said, and told him, That it was not the Love of Justice, but the Hatred he bore the Emperor, made him speak in that Manner, and upbraided him with many Crimes, for which he and his Brothers had been justly punished ; that whoever charg'd Frederick with Heresy ly'd, and that if he were present himself, he would from his own Mouth declare himself as pure and sincere a Christian as any of them all ; that his not suffering Usurers in his Dominions, was an undeniable Argument of his Love for the true Christian Religion ; in hoc Curiam Romanam reprehendens (as Mathew Paris says) quam constat hoc vitio maxime laborantem ; and having answered all the Accusations alledged by these Prelates, he earnestly begg'd of the Pope to delay the Meeting of the Third Session of the Council, because Frederick was arriv'd at Turin, and would be present to clear himself of all these Crimes that were laid to his Charge ; but the Pope at first refus'd to delay the Meeting, and said, that if Frederick should come, he would be gone ; but the next Day, at the Request of the Proxies of the Kings of France and England, he was forc'd to grant the desir'd Delay ; but he did it only for two Weeks.

FREDERICK, finding that his Condemnation was unavoidable, thought best not to appear before a partial Judge, and refused to come ; and notwithstanding that Taddeo di Sessa protested against what should be done in prejudice of the Emperor, and appeal'd to a future Council, yet the two Weeks were no sooner expir'd, than Innocent conven'd the Prelates, and after publishing some Constitutions made for the Relief of the Holy Land, non sine omnium audientium, & circumstantium stupore, & horrore, according to Mathew Paris, he pronounc'd Sentence against Frederick, depriv'd him of the Empire, and all his other Dominions, Honours and Dignities, absolv'd his Subjects from their Oaths, and ordered them under the Pain of Excommunication, not to obey him any more ; and at the same Time he ordered the Electors of the Empire to chuse a Successor, and that none of them should any longer acknowledge him Emperor or King. This Sentence is recorded by Bzovius in his Ecclesiastical Annals, and is to be read at full Length in the Life of Frederick, which Simon Scardius, by way of Introduction, has prefix'd to the Letters of Pietro delle Vigne. In relating Frederick's Deposition, we have chosen to follow what is recorded in the fourth Volume of the General Councils, and the Annals of Mathew Paris, where the Truth is more likely to be found, than in Sigonius and some other Authors.

THE Pope by particular Letters gave an Account of this Sentence to all Christian Princes, and sent Filippo Pontana Bishop of Ferrara, to the Princes of Germany, and the Electors, to get them to chuse a new Emperor, exhorting them to make choice of Henry Landgrave of Thuringia.

FREDERICK, while he was at Turin, hearing that he was depos'd, in a terrible Wrath turn'd to his Barons, and spoke thus: The Pope has depriv'd me of the Imperial Crown, let us see if it be so; and ordering the Crown to be brought him, he put it upon his Head and said, That neither the Pope nor the Council had Power to take it from him; but though he look'd upon the Sentence as void and unjust, yet considering of what Detriment it might be to him, he left no Stone unturn'd in order to be reconcil'd with the Pope; and by the Mediation of the King of France, he offer'd to the Pope Satisfactionem facere competentem: (according to Mathew Paris) obtulit etiam quod in terram Sanctam irrediturus abiret; quoad viveret Christo ibidem militaturus; but the Pope, scorning these Things, answered the King, that Frederick had many times made such fair Promises, but never perform'd them; to which the King replied: Septuagies septies pandendus est sinus, peto, & petens consulo, tam pro me, quam pro multis aliis millium millibus peregrinaturis prosperum exitum expectantibus, imo potius pro statu Universalis Ecclesiæ, & Christianitatis accipite, & acceptate tanti Principis talem humilitatem, Christi sequentes vestigia, qui se usque ad crucis patibulum humiliasse legitur; when the King of France saw that the Pope gave him a flat Denial, he left the Place in a great Passion, admiring so much Humility in an Emperor, and so little in a Servant of Servants.

THOUGH the Pope by his Letters had publish'd this Sentence to all the World, yet, as the Abbot of Stade writes, Quidam Principum cum multis aliis reclamabant, dicentes ad Papam non pertinere Imperatorem instituire, vel destituere, sed electum a Principibus coronare. And this Deposition was so chimerical and ineffectual, according to Tritemius, that as long as Frederick liv'd, per annos ferme sex contra eum, nec Papa, nec aliquis Principum prævalere potuit; sed non advertens sententiam Papæ, quam frivolum, & injustam esse dicebat, se Imperatorem gessit, magnamque Principum nobiliorum, & Civitatum usque ad mortem adrentiam habuit. Frederick finding that his Humility had been of no stead to him, was resolv'd to inform the World of Innocent's Behaviour towards him, whereupon he wrote anew to all Christian Princes, clearing himself of the Crimes laid to his Charge, and declaring the Nullity of his Deposition, as proceeding from one who had no Power to do it, whence in the first Book of Pietro delle Vigne's Collection of Letters, the first begins thus: Collegerunt Pontifices, & Pharisei concilium in unum, &c. and the Second: In exordio nascentis Mundi, and many more to the same Purpose. And it has been demonstrated by able Divines, that 'tis neither in the Power of the Pope nor Council to depose Princes; and much less could the Council of Lyons claim such a Power, for, besides its not being General, as (according to the Opinions of Mathew Paris, Albertus Stadenfis, Tritemius, Palmerius, Platina, and others) wanting all the Conditions requisite in a General Council, having but a small Number of Prelates present in it, and none at all from several Provinces of the West; the Sentence was not pronounc'd by the Council, but by the Pope alone, not sacro approbante Concilio, but only sacro presente Concilio, as may be read in the Acts of that Council, recorded by Du Pin and other famous Ecclesiastical Writers.

FOR these Reasons almost all the Princes and People of Europe, notwithstanding this pretended Deposition, acknowledged him both as Emperor and King. Neither did Frederick allow the Subjects of his Dominions and Kingdoms of Sicily, to obey Innocent in any Thing whatsoever; but ordered his Lord Chief Justice of Sicily, severely to punish, deprive of all their Goods, and banish the Kingdom, all Monks and Priests, who by the Pope's Order and Interdiction, should refuse to celebrate the Divine Offices, and administer the Sacraments to the People, and suffer none of the Religious to go from one Place to another without express Licence, and a Certificate from whence they came.

HE likewise sent the like Orders to the Justice of Terra di Lavoro, and strictly commanded him to exact from the Clergy the Third of their Incomes which they had by their Churches, and make them pay all other Taxes impos'd upon the Laicks, and besides, to imprison all those who should refuse to comply.

S E C T. II.

The unhappy End of Pietro delle Vigne.

P I E T R O D E L L E V I G N E, by neglecting to speak in Behalf of his Master in the Council of Lyons, when the other Ambassador Taddeo da Sessa had so boldly defended him, gave Occasion to his Adversaries to contrive that Mischief which shortly after befell him; for they represented to the Emperor, that being brib'd by the Pope, he had fail'd in the Performance of his Duty; and, indeed, we find no mention made, either in the Acts of the Council, or in the Ecclesiastick Annals of Bzovius, nor in any other Author who gives us the History of that Council, but of Taddeo da Sessa; whence we may gather, that Pietro, though present, did not concern himself in the Affair. This Conduct of his did in a great measure cool the Emperor's Affection towards him, and made him jealous that he was concern'd in some Plot against him; and, when some Time after that, the Emperor was taken ill in Puglia, and was advis'd by Pietro to purge and bathe, he ordered a Physician, an intimate Friend of Pietro's, to prepare him a Potion; and when he was just going to take it, he was inform'd that Pietro, brib'd by the Pope, had a Design to poison him; therefore turning to the Physician and to Pietro, who was there present, he said, Friends, I have Confidence in you, and know you will not give me Poison instead of Physick; Pietro answer'd, Sir, This Physician hath oftentimes cured you before, what have you now to be afraid of? The Emperor with a stern Countenance said to the Physician, Give me that Potion; the Physician being terrified, stumbled of Design, and spilt the greatest Part of it, which increas'd the Jealousy of the Emperor, who ordered them both to be seiz'd, and some Persons under Sentence of Death to be brought from the Prisons, who, at the Emperor's Command, drank what remain'd of the Potion, and died on the Spot; hence it was evident, that both the Potion and Bath had been mix'd with the strongest Poison; whereupon the Physician was hang'd, and Pietro (for he was unwilling to put him to Death) had his Eyes put out, and was depriv'd of all his Wealth, Authority and Offices, and condemn'd to lead a miserable Life. But Pietro, unable to bear this Reverse of Fortune, being told by his Guide, that he was near a Wall, or a Marble Pillar, according to *Sigonius*¹, he knock'd his Head against it with such Force, that he beat out his Brains, and died immediately. Others say, that he threw himself out of a Window of his own House in Capua, while the Emperor was passing under it, and by the Fall died on the Spot in the Year 1249. And Mathew Paris, who was alive in the Year 1250. in his Annals of England, Sigonius, and other antient Authors, place Pietro's Death in that Year. There are some who write that he died innocent, and that it was only some Courtiers, who envying his Greatness, in order to put him in Disgrace at Court, made Frederick believe, that by the Instigation of the Pope he was hatching a Plot against him, which brought him to such an unlucky End; among which Dante, an excellent Poet of that Age, is one, who, in his 13th Canto of Hell, brings in Pietro speaking in his own Defence thus:

*Of Frederick's Heart the Keys were in my Hand,
'Twas shut or open'd still at my Command, &c.*

BY which Verses, whatever was the Occasion of his Death, 'tis clear, that because he had incurr'd his Master's Displeasure, he in a Fury dispatch'd himself. Mathew Paris likewise writes, that the Emperor was much afflicted both for his Treason and Death, saying (according to this Author) Vae mihi contra quem servire coactus.

BUT as 'tis well known, that Innocent, by the Means of some Persons of Note, contriv'd Conspiracies against Frederick, and brought over many Princes to his Party, that had before been in Frederick's Interest, it was an easy Matter for him to shake the Fidelity and Constancy of Pietro delle Vigne, since by the Bishop of Ferrara he had brib'd some Princes of Germany, who, without regard to Conrade, Frederick's Son, in Complaisance to the Pope, elected Henry of Thuringia, King of the Romans, who, after his Election, commenc'd a cruel War in that Country against Conrade.

H E likewise corrupted many of his Barons, not only those in his Army, who had conspir'd to murder him, but even those that had remain'd in the Kingdom, and had been faithful to him before, who attempted, by Sedition, to overturn the Kingdom of Puglia; so that he was forc'd to put a Stop to the War against the Milanese, and to leave King Eutius his Lieutenant in Lombardy, and march in all haste to the Defence of the Kingdom against the Barons, who had openly taken Arms against him, and possess'd themselves of Capaccio, and other Castles of that Province.

T H E Barons, who by the Pope's Means had conspir'd against Frederick, had formerly been his most fast Friends; these were Teobaldo Francesco, Pandolfo Riccardo, and Fasanella, with all their Followers; and all the Family of the S. Severini, headed by Count Guglielmo, Jacopo, and Goffredo di Morra; Andrea Cicala Captain General of the Kingdom, Gisolfo di Maina, with many others, whose Names we know not.

T H O S E that had conspir'd to murder Frederick, while they were watching an Opportunity to put their Design in Execution; were discover'd to him by the Count of Caserta, who, as some Authors write, gave him Account of them by one of his trusty Domesticks, nam'd Giovanni da Presensano, when he was in Lombardy; whereupon Frederick caus'd some of them to be immediately imprison'd, and others fled, amongst the last were Pandolfo della Fasanella, and Jacopo di Morra; and the rest, viz. Teobaldo Francesco, Guglielmo S. Severina, and Andrea Cicala, hearing that the Conspiracy was discovered, surpriz'd Capaccio and Scala, which Places they fortified and provided as well they could, in order to defend themselves; but Scala was attacked, and after a sharp Engagement, taken by the Emperor's faithful Friends, and Tommaso S. Severina, with one of his Sons, made Prisoner.

I N the Beginning of the Year 1246. the Emperor came to Puglia, and ordered Capaccio to be besieg'd; and though the Besieg'd were in extreme Want of Water, there not having been Rain to fill the Cisterns, yet they made a vigorous Defence to the 28th of July, when they were forc'd to yield, and Teobaldo Francesco, and the greatest Part of the Conspirators were made Prisoners, whom the incens'd Emperor caus'd to be put to most cruel Deaths, and a great many of their Relations had the same Fate, and others were banish'd the Kingdom. From this Time we ought to date, what Matteo Spinello writes concerning Ruggieri S. Severina, who being saved by Donatello Stazio his Friend, was afterwards, by Polisena S. Severina his Aunt, sent to the Pope, who with a paternal Care caus'd him to be brought up, and he afterwards proved a gallant and comely Youth; and with the Assistance of this Pope, and the Encouragement given him by Charles I. of the Family of Anjou, became the Head of the banish'd Neapolitans for recovering his Estate; but the Defeat at Canosa, which Matteo Spinello relates, was not true; for if Frederick, who in two of his Letters gives a particular Account of this Fact, had fought and defeated the S. Severini in the Plain of Canosa, he would certainly have mention'd it; but the first Transcriber of Spinello, instead of the taking of Capaccio, has put the Defeat at Canosa, or out of his own Head has added it, as he has, in many other Places, made this Author write what never happened, and what he never intended to say.

C H A P. IV.

Frederick carries on the War against the Lombards, at the same Time that Conrade his Son was harass'd by Henry of Thuringia, and William Count of Holland. Frederick dies in Fiorentino, and is succeeded by Conrade.

WHILE King Eutius was carrying on a bloody War in Lombardy, the Battles were no less cruel in Germany betwixt Conrade and Henry of Thuringia, who, though he had gain'd a great Victory over Conrade, was afterwards kill'd by the Shot of an Arrow at the Siege of Ulm; as soon as Innocent heard of Henry's Death, he immediately sent other four Legates to stir up the German Princes against Frederick; and because King Eutius, by Order of his Father, had caus'd a Relation of the Pope's to be hang'd, the Pope excommunicated them both anew, and wrought so upon the Germans, that William Count of Holland was elected King of the Romans, and set out to be crown'd in Aix la Chapelle; but Conrade, having possess'd himself of that City, and furnish'd it with Provisions, made a long and gallant Defence against William and his Army. The Pope had left no Stone unturn'd in order to get Conrade himself to rebel against his Father, and caus'd Cardinal Ubaldo his Legate, the Archbishop of Cologne, and many German Barons to insinuate to him, that he ought not to follow the damnable Foot-steps of his Father: But Conrade, a pious and steady Prince, answer'd them, that he would stand by his Father to his last Breath.

AFTER Frederick had quieted the Commotions of the Kingdom, he left Puglia, and went to Pisa, and from thence by the Borders of the Territories of Parma to Cremona, where it was suggested to him, that he ought to fall upon some Method for reconciling himself with the Church; therefore he resolv'd to go to Lyons in Person, and submit himself to the Pope, and being attended by a good Number of his Friends, he went from Cremona to Turin, where he held another Assembly, and set out for Lyons; but he had scarcely reach'd the Foot of the Alps, when by a particular Messenger he was told, that Innocent by his Friends there, had made Parma to revolt; whereupon he immediately return'd in order to recover it, and joining with his Son King Eutius in that War, treated of at large by Sigonius, he spent all this Year there; and the following Year 1248. the War being carried on with alternate Success, he lost Vittoria, a City he had lately caus'd to be built over-against Parma, in which Action the greatest Part of the Besieged were either kill'd or made Prisoners, among the Number of the first was Taddeo di Sessa, our famous Lawyer, and who had the Honour to be Captain-General of that Army. While Italy was thus afflicted with this War, William Count of Holland, created King of the Romans, after a long Siege, took Aix la Chapelle, and the first Day of November this Year was crown'd there by the Archbishop of Cologne; and shortly after coming to an Engagement with Conrade, who had return'd with his Army near to that City, he defeated and put him to flight.

THE following Year 1249. Frederick left King Eutius his Lieutenant in Lombardy, and went to Tuscany; but, if we may give Credit to Giovanni Villani, he would not enter Florence, because, by a vain Prophecy of Michael Scot a great Astrologer and Magician of these Times, it had been told him, that he was to die in that City, but stopp'd at a Place near to it, and soon after went to Puglia, where he spent the short Remainder of his Life.

THIS same Year the Bolognese gave a terrible Overthrow to King Eutius, and took him Prisoner, which Victory, over so renown'd a Personage, both for the Nobleness of his Aspect, in the Flower of his Age, not above 25 Years old, and for the Grandeur of his Father, exceedingly increased both the Fame and Power of that People; they carried him Prisoner to Bologna, which shews us the Inconstancy and Misery of worldly Things; and having made a publick Decree, that he should never be set at Liberty, they entertain'd him like a King so long as he liv'd, at the Publick Expence; for neither the Menaces of his Father, who wrote to them a Letter about his Liberty, nor the Offer of a great Sum of Money for his Ransom, could ever move them to part with him. Cuspinianus writes, that after he had been Prisoner Twenty-two Years, and nine Months, he died, and was buried by the Bolognese with great Pomp in the Church of S. Domenico, under a rich Tomb of Marble, and his Statue gilded, where, according to Straderus, the Inscription remains to this Day on a Pillar of Brass.

THE News of this Defeat was sent to the Emperor in a Letter by the Modenese, wherein they condol'd his Loss, and the Imprisonment of his Son; the Emperor return'd them a generous Answer, thanking them for their good Will, and threatening the Bolognese, and all the Partisans of the Church. But these taking Advantage of the late Victory, subjected many Cities and Castles of Lombardy and Romagna, and among the rest Modena; whereupon Frederick, that he might not lose the Dominion of that Country altogether, the Year 1250. being now begun, resolv'd to raise both Money and Men for renewing the War, and endeavouring to set his Son at Liberty; but while he was about this, he was taken ill in the Castle of Florentino, now demolish'd, in Capitanata in Puglia, six Miles distant from Lucera; and, according to Cuspinianus, not without Suspicion that he had been poison'd by Manfred Prince of Taranto, his Bastard Son, who aspir'd to the Kingdom, and therefore wanted to dispatch his Father, as was found out afterwards.

THE Emperor's Disease increasing, he repented of his Faults, begg'd Pardon of God, and confess'd to Bernardo Archbishop of Palermo, who absolv'd him, and gaye him the Sacrament of the Eucharist, if we may credit Albertus Abbot of Stade; and at the Persuasion of the same Archbishop he made his Will, which contains many remarkable Things, therefore we shall subjoin it at full Length.

CUSPINIANUS adds, that while Frederick, by the Strength of his Constitution, or the Care of his Physicians, was like to recover, and get the better of the Poison, or Distemper, Manfred, to compleat his Iniquity, smother'd him with a Bolster in the Night-time; Giovenazzo seems to be of Opinion, that he died a violent Death, when he says, that it was reported, that the Emperor being pretty well recovered, was to quit his Bed the next Day, but by eating some sugar'd Pears over Night, he was found dead in Bed the next Morning, which made good the Prophecy (if such foolish Conceits are to be regarded) that he was to die in Florence; but according to the wonted Amphibologies of Astrologers, not in Florence in Tuscany, but in Florentino in Puglia: Altho' the anonymous Author of Manfred's Exploits, passes over in Silence the Circumstances of this violent Death, that he might not fully the Memory of his Hero.

SUCH then was the End of the Emperor Frederick II. who died in the Fifty-seventh Year of his Age, and in the Thirty-seventh of his Empire, the same Day of the Year he was elected to that Dignity in Germany, after he had govern'd the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily Fifty Years, and that of Jerusalem Twenty-eight. A Prince, for his many and singular Endowments both of Body and Mind, worthy of glorious and immortal Memory; therefore, laying aside what some Italian Writers, with too much Malice, and some German, with too much Flattery, have written, 'tis certain, that he was a wise, prudent and courageous Prince, and of a noble and majestick Presence; he was liberal in rewarding those that had serv'd him either in the Affairs of Peace or War, and conferred on the Princes of the Empire great Prerogatives and Privileges; for he first rais'd Leopold, surnam'd the Warlike, from being Duke to be Archduke of Austria; and, according to Cuspinianus, gave him the Royal Ensigns; and from the sixth Book of Pietro delle Vigne's Letters it appears, that he made him King of Austria, though according to Zurita, none of the succeeding Princes made use of the Titles of King and Archduke, till the Emperor Frederick III. conferr'd them anew on Philip Leopold's Grandchild, when he was courting a Daughter of Ferdinand King of Castile and Arragon, afterwards surnam'd the Catholick, in the Year 1488.

* Anonym. de Rebus Federici, &c. Mortuus est autem ipse Imperator apud Florentinum in Capitanata Apulie, die Mensis Decembris 9 Indiæ.

HE was most expert in military Discipline, whereby he obtain'd notable Victories over his Enemies; and he shew'd no less Fortitude in Adversity, than Temperance in Prosperity. He was provident in Council, and prudent in settling his Kingdoms by many useful and just Laws.

HIS having had three Popes, Honorius, Gregory, and Innocent, and the Guelf Cities, which were in their Interest, his Enemies, got him the Name of Perjur'd, and a Persecutor of the Prelates and Ministers of the Church; and his having driven many of them from their Sees, imprison'd and banish'd others, and having caus'd a great many Monks and Priests to be hang'd, and having tax'd the Churches, Monasteries, and Ecclesiasticks, and divested them of their Goods and Possessions, made all of them afraid that he had a Mind to reduce them to the mean Condition and Poverty of the Primitive Church, because they had heard, that the Emperor was often wont to use such Expressions; whence Matthew Paris, who, before Frederick was deposed, had always vindicated him in his Chronicle, when he understood that Frederick us'd these Expressions, he being an English Abbot, and possessed of many rich Benefices and Commendams, took Offence, and began to write in a Style quite different from what he had us'd before.

IF Matthew Paris did so, we may easily judge what the Italian Writers, who were in the Interest of the Popes, and all Guelfs, would do, and especially the Friars. Paolo Panfà, in the Life of Innocent IV. says, that Fra. Salimbene da Parma a Friar Minor, who liv'd in these Times, and knew Frederick, in his Manuscript Chronicle, writes, that Frederick on his Death-bed was afflicted with Vermise that burst out of his Flesh, and when he was dead, his Carcass stunk to that Degree, that no Body could approach it, and that it could not be then buried, that he was not a Catholick, but an Epicurean, and did not believe in a future State; adding, that when he was in the East, and saw the Land of Promise, he fell a laughing, and scoffingly said, That if the God of the Israelites had seen the Kingdom of Naples, and especially Terra di Lavoro, he would not have put such a Value upon his Land of Promise. Therefore they represented him as an Atheist, and that denying the Immortality of the Soul, he placed all his Happiness in the Pleasures of the Flesh, placing himself with what was most agreeable to him, and therefore he wallowed in all Sort of Luxury; and that besides his Wife, he kept a Seraglio of Concubines, some of which were even Saracens; and Dante, though a Ghibelline, seems to have entertain'd the same Opinion of him, for he puts him in a Place of Hell with Father Guido Cavalcanti, Farinata degli Uberti, a Florentine Gentleman, and Cardinal Ottaviano degli Ubaldini, where the Sin of Heresy is punish'd, and brings in Farinata speaking thus:

*The Second Frederick, with the Cardinal
Are here, and others whom I shall conceal.*

BUT it may be observed in the foregoing Books of this History, that when Frederick was in Friendship with the Popes, he was so wedded to the Interest of the Church of Rome, and her Ministers, that Otto was wont to call him King of Priests. And we likewise find, that he published many Constitutions in Favour of the Jurisdiction of the Church, and which are observed to this Day. We have also seen how he persecuted the Hereticks, as the severe Constitutions which he made for extirpating them not only out of Italy, but likewise out of Germany, testify. And if we may credit *Capecelatro*³, *Irveges*⁴, and some other Writers, in order to perform his Promise to Pope Innocent III. in the Year 1213. he instituted the Tribunal of the Inquisition in Sicily.

² We read the Constitutions of Frederick establish'd in Frankfort in the Year 1224, against the Hereticks of Germany, in Goldastus tom 1. p. 77. 292, 293. tom. 2. pag. 51, &c. And in Schil-

HIS Zeal in extirpating Hereticks was no less remarkable in our Kingdom; for, besides his having published that famous Constitution Inconsutilem, when he understood that the Heresy of the Patareni had crept into these our Provinces, and particularly into Naples, he sent the Archbishop of Reggio, and Riccardo di Principato his Marshal, to imprison them. But (whatever he did in Sicily, and that is even question'd by some, because no cotemporary Writer mentions it) he did not appoint a particular Tribunal of Inquisition against Hereticks in our Provinces. He only ordered his Officers to proceed against them ex Inquisitione, though they were not accused, as was usual in other enormous and heinous Crimes, and with more Severity than was practised in the Crimes of High-Treason against an Earthly King. Therefore he ordained, that the Persons any-wise suspected, should be carried before the Prelates, and Ecclesiastical Persons, to be examined by them, as best able to judge whether their Opinions differ'd from any Article of the Catholick Faith; and if these Prelates, by manifest and clear Proof, found them Guilty of Heresy, their Business was only to admonish them Pastorali more, to forsake the Errors and Snares of the Devil; and if, after being admonished, they persisted obstinately in their Errors, the Prelates had no more to do; but the guilty Persons, being thus convicted, came under the Cognizance of the Secular Magistrates, who, according to the Tenor of that Constitution, condemn'd them to be publicly burnt alive. He likewise ordained, that the Prelates should impeach Hereticks before his Delegates, and the Officers of the General Assizes, which were to be held in the Kingdom twice a Year, in order to be by them severely punished. And though he did not appoint a particular Tribunal in our Provinces, but that the same Officers, to whom the Punishment of all other Crimes was committed, should likewise proceed against Hereticks; yet the Methods of proceeding which he prescribed, the Punishment, and the Means whereby to discover them, were too severe and rigorous. He was the first that condemn'd them, in general, to Death; he punish'd with great Severity those that harbour'd or assisted them; he mark'd out clear and distinct Bounds betwixt the Power of the Ecclesiasticks, and that of the Secular Magistrates in taking Cognizance of this Crime. The Cognitio juris, or of Right, to wit, whether such or such an Opinion was Heretical or not, was left to the Church; for he would have those accus'd of Heresy to be examined by Ecclesiastical Persons; because it could not be otherwise known whether the Error was damnable or not; whether it was contrary to the Faith or not: Cognitio facti, or of the Fact, and the Punishment thereof was left to the Secular Magistrate; for the Church, as we have observed elsewhere, had Power to do nothing, but to separate the Hereticks from the Society of the Faithful; but she could neither condemn to Death, nor Mutilation of Members, nor inflict any other Temporal Punishment.

THEFORE Frederick has been unjustly aspersed by our Italian Writers, for the most part Guelfs: And though he us'd some Prelates severely, and the Monks and Friars cruelly, yet, by what we have said in this Book, the Reasons for such Severity may be seen; and a Prince ought not to be thought to exceed the Bounds of his Power, when, upon just Grounds, and especially if they concern the State, he banishes Prelates, and drives them from their Sees, imprisons Friars, and hangs them, when they are Disturbers of the State, and the Publick Peace: And much less ought it to seem strange to tax the Goods of Ecclesiasticks, when the Necessity of the Prince, and the Publick Welfare require it.

IT has been the common Custom of Princes, upon any urgent Occasion, to lay Taxes, as well upon the Churches and Monasteries, as upon the Cities, and those that hold Lands; and as we have observ'd elsewhere, the Patrimonies of our Churches paid Tribute to the Emperors of the East.

AFTER Charles the Great had expell'd Desiderius, and made himself Master of Italy, according to Sigonius, he impos'd Taxes upon the Churches and Monasteries of that Kingdom. And those, who, under the Title of Princes of Benevento, govern'd the greatest Part of these Provinces, which now make up our Kingdom, always exacted Tribute from the Churches and Monasteries, which were tax'd according to the Value of the Goods they possess'd. Thus in the Year 851. under the Emperor Lothaire, and Lewis King of Italy, his Son, when the Principality of Salerno was erected, by a Division of the Province of Benevento, Radelchisus Prince of Benevento, and Siconolphus Prince of Salerno agreed, among other Things then stipulated, that an Account should be taken of all the Goods of the Churches, Bishopricks, Monasteries, and Xenodochia; and that they should be taxed according to their Value, and the ordinary Tribute paid to the Prince; the Monasteries of Monte Cassino, and S. Vincenzo in Vulturno, only were exempted, because they were under the immediate Protection of the Emperor Lothaire, and King Lewis. The Goods of the Abbots, and other Ecclesiasticks who served in the Palace of the Prince, were likewise exempted¹. But Things being afterwards altered, when the Popes rais'd the Ecclesiastick State to the highest Pitch, and exempted both their Persons and Goods from the Power and Jurisdiction of Princes; Frederick was look'd upon as an impious Tyrant, for endeavouring to recover the ancient Rights and Prerogatives over their Persons and Estates.

AS for the rest, laying aside these false Accusations, Frederick was a Prince, in whom Justice, Munificence, and Learning shin'd in an eminent Degree. He left us many prudent and useful Laws; this Kingdom, and especially the City of Naples, is much beholden to him. He, out of Love to Learning, founded a famous University there, whither he invited Scholars from all Parts of his Dominions. He, as most skill'd in Philosophy, and all other Sciences, greatly honoured the publick School of Physick in Salerno, and founded another in Padua, and suppress'd that of the rebellious City of Bologna, and ordered, that none of the Citizens of the Guelf Cities of Lombardy, Tuscany, or Romagna his Enemies, should be allow'd to study in these Schools.

AND 'tis to be admir'd, that, in an Age, wherein, as the anonymous Writer says², Erant literati pauci, vel nulli, he was not only a Lover of Learning, but, like a deep Philosopher, and well versed in all other Sciences, he wrote a Book *De Natura, & cura Animalium*³. He prompted Giordano Ruffo his Master Farrier, to write a Treatise concerning the Dressing and Curing of Horses; and Giordano, in the End of his Book, which is preserved in S. Giovanni a Carbonara, among the Books of Cardinal Seripando, says, that what he had written was owing to the Instruction of his Master Frederick.

HE caused many Books to be translated from the Greek and Arabick into Latin, such as Ptolomei Almagest, Aristotle's Works, and many Books of Physick and other Sciences; and, according to Pontanus, he made a Present of some of Aristotle's Works to the Masters and Scholars of Bologna, before they became his Enemies, and wrote them a particular Letter.

HE likewise caused Michael Scot, a famous Physician and Astrologer in these Times, and his beloved Friend, to write many Books of Philosophy, Physick, and Astrology, as Michael himself, in some of them, which he dedicated to him, and Gesnerus in his Compend testify; whence Philosophy and Mathematical Learning began to be in vogue: And thus, by having the Works of Aristotle, Galen, and of several Arabian Physicians read in the Schools, and encourag'd by Frederick, Aristotle's Philosophy, and Galen's Physick, acquir'd that Reputation in the Schools which every Body knows.

HE also caused his Constitutions to be put in order, from which many Authenticæ were taken and inserted in the Code, as we have shewn in another Place; we are likewise beholden to him for the Books of our Constitutions, which he caused to be collected by Pietro delle Vigne. Frederick likewise wrote a Book of Faulconry, which Art was not in the least known at that Time; and Manfred his Son added many other Things to it afterwards.

AMONG the rest of the Endowments of this good Prince, he was most skill'd in many Languages, such as the Latin, Greek, Italian, French, and even the Saracen, besides the German his Mother Tongue; and he took great Delight in Italian Poetry, and compos'd many Sonnets and Songs, which are still extant, and bound up with those of Pietro delle Vigne, Eutius his Son, and some other Poets of that Time, when the Italian Language, sprung from a Mixture of so many other, especially from the Latin, began to diffuse itself, and being afterwards refin'd by able Writers, may not only be compar'd to the Latin and the Greek itself, but even contend for the Superiority. And the great Number of Poets in that Age, of whom *Lione Alacci*¹ has given us a long Catalogue, is owing to his Genius for Poetry; as among us are l'Abate di Napoli, Giacomo dell' Uva di Capua, Folco di Calabria, Guglielmo d'Otranto, Guzzolo da Taranto, Ruggiero, and Giacomo Pugliesi, Cola d'Alessandro, and many other Rhimers in the Infancy of the Italian Language.

A MOST magnificent Prince, who adorn'd Italy and our Kingdom with many noble Edifices, and especially Capua and Naples, where he enlarged, and put Castello Capuano into a better Form; and in Capua he rebuilt the antient Bridge of Casilino upon the River Vulturno, in a magnificent Manner, with two strong Towers, whereon he plac'd his Statue in Marble, which remains there to this Day.

HE founded many Cities in these his Kingdoms, such as Alitea, and Monte Leone in Calabria; Flagella in Terra di Lavoro, over-against Cepparano, and Dondona in Puglia, of which there is no Vestige now remaining, they being demolish'd soon after they were built; Augusta and Eraclea in Sicily, and Aquila in Apruzzi, as a Bulwark on the Borders of the Kingdom against the State of the Church.

BUT our Kingdom is in a special Manner much indebted to this Prince, for his having caus'd these our Provinces to be divided after a better Method, and more distinctly than formerly; which must be minutely taken Notice of, because of the Conformity which that Division has with the present.

CHAP. V.

The Disposition, and Number of Provinces, of which the Kingdom of Naples is now composed.

THE present Division of our Provinces into Twelve, which now compose the Kingdom of Naples, by *Surgente*¹, *Mazzella*², and generally by all Writers, is attributed to the Emperor Frederick II. they were not call'd Provinces, but Giustizierati, or Jurisdictions. But their Opinion is not altogether just, for Frederick was not the first that made such a Division, neither in his Time was their Number risen to Twelve; whence this Division ought not to be attributed to Frederick alone, but likewise to Charles I. of the Family of Anjou, Alphonfus I. of Arragon, and to Ferdinand the Catholick, as *Tasso*³, very much to the Purpose, observes.

NEITHER was the Number always the same, for some Times by the new *Pragmatics*⁴ some Provinces (with respect to their Government and Administration) were united, and afterwards divided, and the Number of Twelve made up again; neither were the same Cities constantly the Metropolises and Seats of the Presidents of the Provinces.

THIS Division was made quite different from that in the Times of Adrian, or Constantine the Great, and the other Emperors his Successors; for Longinus having first altered the antient Description, the succeeding Longobards, both under the Dukes and Princes of Benevento, by taking in sometimes in whole, and sometimes in part, Campagna, Puglia, Calabria, Lucania, Abruzzo, and Sannio, made a thorough Change in the antient Division of the Provinces of Italy. Italy on this Side of the Tyber underwent another Alteration, when it was divided into many Principalities and Dukedoms; to wit, into the Principality of Benevento (which was afterwards divided into Two, that of Salerno, and that of Capua) the Principalities of Bari and Taranto; the Dukedoms of Naples, Sorrento, Amalphis, Gaeta, and lastly Puglia and Calabria, as may be observed in the preceding Books of this History.

BUT the more immediate Cause and Origin of the present Division of these Provinces, are intirely owing to the Castaldati, and Contadi, which the Longobards introduced; for they divided the Dukedom of Benevento into many Castaldati, as is clear from the Capitularia of Prince Radelchis, recorded by Pellegrinus; and many of these in the Time of the Normans were converted into Giustizierati, and afterwards into Provinces.

CAMILLUS PELLEGRINUS with all his Care and Diligence, has in vain endeavoured to find out the Number of these Castaldati in the Time of the Longobards; for it cannot be certainly known, if there were so many of them as are mentioned in that Division of the Principality of Benevento, which was made by Radelchis and Siconolphus Princes of Salerno. The most accurate Pellegrinus^a reckons some of them, the Chief of which were, the Castaldo of Capua, which towards the West reach'd as far as Sora; that of Cosenza, which extended to S. Eufemia, and Porto del Fico, which are still the Confines of the Province of the Hither Calabria, whereof Cosenza continues to be the Head, and is the Seat of the Presidents; the Castaldo of Chieti, which comprehended many Cities and Towns, and was afterwards call'd Marca Teatina; the Castaldo of Bojano, which, with the neighbouring Places, was at first possess'd by Alczeus Bulgarus, with the Title of Castaldo, and 200 Years after went to Guandelpertus, whom Erchempertus mentions; but this Jurisdiction was annex'd to Molise, an adjoining Castle, with the Title of Contado; whence it was first call'd Contado di Molise, and afterwards the Province of Contado di Molise, which Name it retains to this Day.

THERE were likewise the Castaldati of Tolose, S. Agata, Avellino, and Acerenza; and that of Bari, very famous in the Time of the Longobards; whence in that of the Normans it became the Head and Metropolis of all Puglia. The Castaldati of Lucera and Siponti, famous Cities in Capitanata, which comprehended all the Cities and Towns betwixt the Castaldo of Bari, and that of Chieti. There were also the Castaldati of Taranto, Lucania, or Pesto, and the famous one of Salerno. In this manner, or with a very small Difference, did the Longobards divide the Dukedom of Benevento, which in these Times comprehended Nine intire Provinces of those, whereof the Kingdom of Naples is now composed, and which got these Names, to wit, Terra di Lavoro, excepting some few maritime Cities, such as Naples and Gaeta, Contado di Molise, Apruzzo Citra, Capitanata, Terra di Bari, Basilicata, Calabria Citra, and the two Principatos; and likewise Part of the Provinces of Terra d' Otranto, Calabria, and Apruzzo Ulteriore. And though in the Writers of these Times, and even in common Discourse, the antient Names of Campagna; Calabria, Puglia, Lucania, Bruzi, and Sannio have been retain'd, yet they have not preserv'd their antient Limits according to these Names, but some to shew their Learning, others to point out where the Castaldati were situated, have made use of them, just as the antient Name of Puglia still continues among us, tho' none of the twelve Provinces of the Kingdom be call'd Puglia, but either Bari, or Capitanata.

WHEN the Normans succeeded the Longobards, the Provinces got new Names; and as in the Time of the Longobards they were call'd Castaldati, from Castaldo, the Title of the Magistrate who had the Government of them; so in like manner the Normans committing the Government of the Provinces to their Officers, whom they call'd Giustizieri, the Provinces were call'd Giustizierati, whence came the Names of Giustiziero, and Giustizierato of Terra di Lavoro, Apruzzo, Puglia, Terra di Bari, and the like. As these Provinces were alter'd, and from Castaldati were call'd Giustizierati; so likewise the Names of them, excepting a few, were chang'd, as shall be seen by a particular Enumeration of them, in the Order modern Authors have rank'd them.

Terra di LAVORO.

THE Castaldato of Capua is not call'd Giustizierato di Capua, but of Terra di Lavoro: But when, and whence this Province took this new Name of Terra di Lavoro, and lost that of Campagna, or Capua, Authors are not agreed. Some believe that this Province had this Name long before the Normans; but they have been led into that Mistake by a Passage in a Letter written by Pope Martin to Elitberius, wherein he gives him an Account of what he had suffer'd in a Voyage from Rome to the East, which he had undertaken by the Order of Constans the Greek Emperor, and says; Pervenimus Kalendis Julii Misenam, in qua erat Navis, id est carcer; non autem Misene tantum, sed in Terra Laboris, & non tantum in Terra Laboris, quae subdita est magnae Urbi Romanorum (to wit Constantinople) sed & in pluribus Insularum, &c. But as the most accurate *Pellegrinus*¹ well observes, who is it but sees, that the Transcriber of this Letter, by mistake, instead of Terra Liparis, has put Terra Laboris? For the Pope in his Voyage from Rome to the East, was oblig'd to pass by Lipari, Nasso, and other Islands. Besides, if he had meant Terra di Lavoro, he ought not to have mention'd Miseno, as in a different Province from Terra di Lavoro, of which it is a Part, nor plac'd it among other Islands; seeing Terra di Lavoro is not an Island, but on the Continent, which was not then altogether subject to the Greek Emperor.

NARCISSUS the Physician², according to Sebastianus Munsterus, fell into the like Mistake, for he imagin'd that Terra di Lavoro was once call'd Terra Leporis; whereas the antient Monuments, which he cites, speak not of Compagna, now call'd Terra di Lavoro, but of Terra di Lipari; for all the Islands of Lipari were formerly so call'd: In the same manner we read in *Erchempertus*³ Barium Tellus; and in another Place Regium Tellus; and we likewise say, Terra di Bari, Terra d'Otranto, Terra di Lavoro, &c.

BLONDUS, who is follow'd by Leander Albertus, and our modern Writers, committed a grosser Error. For in his Description of Campania, he fancied, that Capua, by Reason of the old Hatred of the Romans, and the Desolation it had suffer'd, was become infamous; and that the People of the adjoining Cities and Towns looking upon the Name of Campani as both ignominious and dangerous, would no longer be call'd Campani, but Leborini; and that from their Obstinacy, all the Country of Campagna, was call'd Terra di Lavoro.

BUT the never-enough to be commended Pellegrinus in his *Campania*⁴, has clearly demonstrated all these to be meer Dreams, and has given us the true Origine of that Name, its Author, and the Time when this Province got it. He says, that it was first call'd so about the Year 1091, by Richard II. Prince of Capua and his Normans, who, in the beginning of the Year 1091, being driven out of Capua by the Capuan Longobards, forbore to call it the Principality of Capua, and gave it the Name of Terra di Lavoro, from the Pleasantness of its Soil, fit for any Labour; and when the Normans, in the Year 1098, for the second Time, made themselves Masters of Capua, they continued to call it by the same Name, and the former was but seldom us'd, except in publick Writs; in the same Manner as our Kingdom continues to have two Names.

THUS did this Province, which is bounded on the East by the River Silari, and on the West by that of Garigliano, of old call'd Liris, on the North by the Appenine Mountains, and on the South by the Tyrrhenian Sea, get both this Name and these large Bounds, and by reason of the many Cities wherewith it is adorn'd and the Fertility of its Soil, is reckon'd the first Province of the Kingdom, and Naples the Head and Metropolis thereof. In the Time we are now treating of, to wit, of Frederick II. this Province was call'd Terra Laboris, as may be seen in Riccardo da S. Germano; and in the Time both of the Norman and Suevian Kings was govern'd by its own Justice, who resided sometimes in Capua, and sometimes in Naples and other Cities, and was attended by the Judges and other Officers of Justice, and the Attorney General. He govern'd the whole Province, tho' every City had its particular Governor, who had the immediate Direction thereof, from whose Decisions the People, by way of Appeal, had recourse to the Justice of the Province. And seeing Naples began to increase in Frederick's Time, that it might be on the same Level with Capua and Messina, he order'd that its Governor should have Three Judges under him, and many Notaries; which was not allow'd in other lesser Cities. And 'tis said, that Marino Caramanico, an able Doctor in these Times, was one of the Judges in Naples in the Year 1269¹.

The Hither PRINCIPATO. The Further PRINCIPATO.

THE next Province was, and is still call'd Principato. Whence it got this Name is very clear, and all Writers agree in it. When Arechis, as we have told in the sixth Book of this History, who was only Duke of Benevento, made himself to be crown'd Prince thereof; from a Dukedom it became a Principality; and seeing the Dukedom of Benevento, before the Division made betwixt Radelchis and Siconolphus comprehended likewise Salerno, upon this Division there started up Two Principalities, whence both of them got the Name of Principato, and this Province comprehended so large a Country, that there was a Necessity of dividing it into Two, whence came the Name of Principato citra, or on this Side the Appenines, which, with part of Lucania, is also call'd Picentina, and Principato ultra, or on the other Side of the Appenines, or Sannio degl' Irpini.

THE hither Principato, which comprehends the Country of old inhabited partly by the Picentini, and partly by the Lucani, is divided from Terra di Lavoro on the West by the River Sarno, and on the North the Appenines divide it from the further Principato; on the East the River Silaro runs betwixt it and the Basilicata, and on the South it is wash'd by the Tyrrhenian Sea, and has Salerno for its Metropolis.

THE further Principato is the only Province of the Kingdom distant from the Sea, being situated amongst the Appenine Hills, at the Head of Sannio, where of old the Irpini liv'd. It is divided from the hither Principato by the Appenines on the South; from Terra di Lavoro, and the County of Molise it is separated by the same Appenines above Nola, and by the Forche Caudine above Arpaja towards the West, and by the beginning of Monte Matese towards the North, which likewise divides it from Capitanata on the North, but more towards the East by the Appenines, which also separate it from the Basilicata. It contains a Country call'd Valle Beneventana, which was formerly the principal Part of Sannio, and had Benevento for its Metropolis; but since that City came under the Dominion of the Church of Rome, it has other Cities for the Seat of its Presidents.

WHENCE the Normans, when they succeeded the Longobards, gave this Province the Name of Principato; and the Abbot of *Noce*¹, transcribing in his Notes on the Chronicle of Cassino, the Words of the Diploma given by Pope Nicholas II. to the Abbot Desiderius, appointing him his Vicar over the Monasteries and Monks of these Provinces, enumerates this Province among the rest, under the Name of Principato: these are the Words; Per totam Campaniam, Principatus quoque, & Apuliam, atque Calabriam, &c. And *Leo Ostiensis*², who wrote that Chronicle a little after the Death of the Abbot Desiderius, afterwards Pope, by the Name of Victor III. likewise says, Per totam Campaniam & Principatum, Apuliam quoque, atque Calabriam, &c.

² Ostiens. lib. 3. cap. 13.

IN the Time of Frederick II. according to what Riccardo da S. Germano, speaking of the General Courts instituted in the Kingdom by that Prince, tells us, it appears that this Province was not then divided into Two, as it was afterwards, for making Salerno to be a City, where the general Court was held, and to which the other Provinces were to repair, he says, In Principatu, Terra Laboris, & Comitatu Molisii usque Soram, apud Salernum.

ACCORDING to this Order, the Basilicata, which comprehends a great Part of the antient Lucania, and part of Magna Græcia, is next. It is likewise surrounded in part by the Appenines, which divide it both from the further and hither Principato. The Appenines are divided in this Province into Two principal Ridges near to Venosa: That which runs to Brindisi parts the Basilicata from Terra di Bari, as far as Altamura; and the other separates it from the hither Calabria to the Confluence of the Rivers Corianello and Crati, and running a little towards the Sea, it touches upon Terra d'Otranto on the Gulf of Taranto. This Province is also bounded for a little Space, by the Capitanata, from which it is divided by the River Ofanto, betwixt Ascoli in Puglia, and Lavello. Pesto, Venosa, Acerenza, Melpbis, and other famous Cities once belong'd to this Province; it has now Matera, Potenza, Lavello and other lesser Cities; but there's scarcely a Vestige of the antient remaining.

WHENCE this Province took the Name of Basilicata, and when, has been ill search'd into by our Writers; but it will be easily found out, if we call to mind what happen'd to these our Provinces about the End of the Tenth Century, when the Greeks made so many Expeditions and Conquests in them, and introduc'd a new Magistrate into Puglia, by them call'd Catapanus, from whom a great Part thereof took its Name, and therefore is now call'd Capitanata: In the Time of Basilus the Emperor of Greece, or of some of his Generals of that Name, this Part of Lucania got the Name of Basilicata; for we have seen in the Eighth Book of this History, that in the Year 989, while Basilus with his Brother Constantine reign'd in the East, the Greeks, by the famous Victory which they obtain'd over Otbo III. Emperor of the West, were not only for a long Time Masters of all Puglia and Calabria, till they were driven out by the Normans; but likewise of this Part of Lucania, which was possess'd by Basilus, and govern'd by Greek Officers sent hither by him, some of which, as is clear from the Chronicle of Lupus Protospata, were also nam'd Basilii, whence this Province got the Name of Basilicata. Joannes Pontanus is likewise of Opinion, that this Province was so call'd in these Times of the Greeks; but whence it was so nam'd, he adds, *Jure anceps est, ac dubium*¹.

IN the Time of Frederick II. the Basilicata was reckon'd one of the Provinces of the Kingdom by Riccardo da S. Germano, who says, that Frederick had appointed the City of Gravina to be the Place where the general Court was to be held, and to which these Three Provinces were to repair, to wit, Apulia, Capitanata & Basilicata apud Gravinam.

The Hither CALABRIA. The Further CALABRIA.

CALABRIA, according to the Denomination which it took from the last Greek Emperors, in Frederick's Time was divided into Two; not as now into the hither and further Calabria, but into Terra Jordana, and Val di Crati, and according according to Riccardo da S. Germano, In Calabria, Terra Jordana, & Vallis Gratae apud Cusentiam; and these Names are likewise to be found in Writs, not only in the Reign of the Family of Anjou, but also in that of the Family of Aragon, and in the Time of Alphonfus I. as Tutini witnesseth¹; and according to *Pellegrinus*², this Appellation is taken from the River Crati, which washes that Valley, and we now call the Province of the further Calabria, Terra Jordana, which has Catanzaro for its chief City; and the hither Calabria is call'd Val di Crati, and has Cosenza for the Seat of its President. These Two Provinces reach from both Parts of the Appenines to the Ionian and the Tyrrhenian Seas. They begin to be separated above Cosenza, and run in a direct Line to both the Seas, to the Ionian near Strangoli, and to the Tyrrhenian at the Gulf of Hipponiates. The hither Calabria includes a Part of Magna Græcia, and has for inland Bounds, the Basilicata, and the hither Principato, towards the West the Appenines, and reaches to both the Seas, till it joins the further Calabria towards the East. The further Calabria (which was inhabited by the Brutii) has the same Confines towards the North; but on all other Sides it is furrounded by the Seas; on the East, by the Ionian; on the South, by the Sicilian; and on the West, by the Tyrrhenian.

Terra di B A R I. Terra D'OTRANTO.

PUGLIA, (as it was call'd by the Greeks) which also comprhended a Part of antient Calabria, now call'd Terra d'Otranto, in Frederick's Time was not divided into Two Provinces, as now, to wit Terra di Bari, and Terra d'Otranto; and as it was reckon'd but one Province, so it had only the Name of Apulia, and is so call'd by Riccardo. However 'tis certain, and *Pontanus*¹ likewise witnesseth, that these Names of Terra di Bari, and Terra d'Otranto had their Rise, at the same Time that Basilicata, and Capitanata were so call'd: And we read in *Erchempertus*², Barium Tellus, and in the publick Writs in the Time of the Normans, we find the Province of Terra d'Otranto. The one of these Provinces was so call'd from Bari, its antient and famous Metropolis. The other from Otranto, likewise a renown'd City of the Salentini.

TERRA di Bari, of old call'd Apulia Peucetia, towards the West is bounded by the River Ofanto, and extending itself in Length, is confin'd betwixt the Banks of the Adriatick Sea, on the North Side of it, and the Appenines which divide it from Basilicata on the South, where it runs out, and terminates towards the East. It is divided from Terra d'Otranto on the Land Side, in the Territory of Ostuni, and towards the Sea, between Monopoli and Brindisi at Villa Nova, formerly call'd Porto d'Ostuni.

TERRA d'Otranto begins here, and by the Antients was reckon'd a Part of Puglia, and also call'd Calabria, Japigia and Salentina. This Province forms that utmost Point of Land, which makes one of the Three Angles of Italy, where it is bounded by one of the two principal Ridges into which the Appenines are divided. Here terminates also the Adriatick Sea, and mixes itself with the Ionian; and is bounded on the West by Terra di Bari, and Basilicata: Then it's wash'd on the North by the Adriatick, and on the East by the Confluence of the Adriatick and Ionian Seas, and on the South by the Gulf of Taranto in the Ionian Sea. Its Maritime Cities are Brindisi, Otranto, Gallipoli and Taranto, formerly a very strong City, and had a very commodious Harbour.

C A P I T A N A T A.

THAT Province, which we now call Capitanata, and which was antiently call'd Apulia Daunia, and comprehended Japigia in Monte Gargano, got this Name from the Greeks in the Height of their Prosperity, when Bari was the principal Seat of their Residence. They, in order to maintain their new Conquests, to keep the People in awe, and to curb Puglia, sent thither a new Governor, whom they no more call'd Straticus, as formerly, but by another Greek Name Catapanus, that is to say, one that could do every thing. Among the Catapani, of whom Lupus Protospatha has given us a long List, in the Year 1018, Basilus Bugianus is one, whom Gulielmus Apuliæ ¹ calls Bagianus. This was he, who, to preserve his Memory in Italy, made a new Province of that part of Puglia bordering on the Principality of Benevento, and in the Possession of the Greeks, and built new Towns and Cities, one of which he nam'd Troja, to revive the Memory of the antient City of that Name; the others were Dragonaria, Fiorenzuola, &c. whence this Province got the Name of Capitanata, which it retains to this Day.

THIS Province is divided from Contado di Molise, by Monte Matese, and the River Fortore, at the Mouth of which it joins the hither Abruzzo near to Termoli; and surrounding Monte Gargano, from Siponto it reaches to the River Ofanto, which parts it from Terra di Bari, and passing the Villages of the Territory of Barletta, it runs to the Lake of Versentino; and by the Head of the said River of Ofanto, it is separated from Basilicata, and by the Appenines in Crepacuore, and Sferracavalli it is divided from the further Principato.

IN the Time of Frederick it was also reckon'd a Province, so that Riccardo numbers it among the other Provinces of the Kingdom, by the Name of Capitanata. However 'tis true, that though in Frederick's Time the Provinces of Capitanata, Terra di Bari, and Terra d'Otranto were divided and comprehended in Puglia, taken in its largest Sense, yet they were govern'd by one Justice, call'd the Justice of Puglia.

Contado di MOLISE.

THE Contado di Molise, formerly call'd the Castaldato di Bojano, gave Name to another small Province, which it still retains¹; and it was so call'd from Molise, an ancient City of Samnium, and in the Time of the Longobards, Ifernina, Bojano and other Places, were comprehended in this Contado, from which the Family of Molise, now extinct, likewise took its Name. In the Time of Frederick this Contado was a distinct Province, and Riccardo numbers it among the rest, under the Name of Comitatus Molisii; whence it always has been, and is still reckon'd the smallest of all the Provinces, and has no President, but is govern'd by the President of Capitanata, to which it is join'd.

The Further ABRUZZO. The Hither ABRUZZO.

IN the Time of Frederick II. the Giustizierato of Abruzzo, was reckon'd but one Province, and according to Riccardo, that Emperor appointed Sulmona to be the Place for holding the general Court; In Justitiaratu Abrutii, apud Sulmoniam. Alphonfus I. of Aragon, in order to remove the Disputes which frequently arose among the Collectors of the Taxes, divided it into Two Parts.

THIS Country was once very famous for the warlike People that inhabited it, to wit, the Prægutii, the Marrucini, the Amiternini, the Marsi, the Vestini, the Hirpini, &c. The Longobards erected it into a Castaldato, which they indifferently call'd the Castaldato of Abruzzo, or of Teramo, as we read in Petrus Diaconus ¹: Gastaldatus Teramnensis; for Teramo, by the Ancients call'd Interamnina, was the Metropolis City of the Prægutii. Although the Word Abruzzo be variously deriv'd; by some from the Ruggedness of the Mountains, by others from the Abundance of wild Boars, yet its true Derivation is from Teramo, which was likewise call'd Abruzzo, because it was the Metropolis of the Prægutii, who, by a corrupt Word, were afterwards call'd Abrutii ².

THIS Province, which we now call the further Abruzzo (that is to say, on the other Side of the River Pescara) besides Teramo, Amiterno, (from the Ruins of which Aquila, now the Seat of the Presidents, had its Rise) contain'd Forconè, Valeria, and other renown'd Cities of the Marsi. In the Country of the Marrucini, and Ferontani, now call'd the hither Abruzzo (that is to say, on this Side of the River Pescara) it comprehended Chieti, by Strabo call'd Theanum, which was the Metropolis of the Marrucini, and is now the Seat of the Presidents, Petentand, Ortone, Lanciano, Sulmona, Aterno, and other famous Cities, some of which are yet in being. By these Provinces of Abruzzo, with a small Part of Terra di Lavoro, the Kingdom is separated from the Dominions of the Church of Rome.

SUCH was the Disposition of these Provinces, of which our Kingdom is now compos'd, in the Time of Frederick, and they were call'd Giustizierati, from the Giustizieri, or Justices, who govern'd them. According to the Computation of Riccardo da S. Germano, a Contemporary Writer, they were only Ten in Number, to wit, Calabria divided into Two, viz. Terra Jordana, and Val di Crati; Puglia into Terra d'Otranto, and Terra di Bari; Capitanata, Basilicata and Principato, divided into Two; Terra di Lavoro, Contado di Molise, and the Giustizierato of Abruzzo, likewise divided in the same Manner.

THERE was not a Justice appointed for each of these, but one frequently govern'd many Provinces, as we read of Giacomio Guarna Count of Marsico, who was Justice of Puglia, and Terra di Lavoro ³, and of Totimaso d'Aquino, who was Justice of Puglia, and had the sole Administration thereof, which is now divided into Three Provinces; and even in our Time we see, that the President of Capitanata, who resides in Lucera, likewise governs the Province of the Contado di Molise. Sometimes Two Justices govern'd one Province, as in the Year 1197, Roberto di Venosa, and Giovanni di Frassineto, were both Justices of Terra di Bari; and in the Year 1225 Pietro d'Eboli, and Niccolo Cicala, were Justices of Terra di Lavoro ⁴. In the Times of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, one Justice was sent to more than one Province; and the same was also practis'd in the Reigns of the Kings of the House of Aragon; and till the Time of Philip II. according to Alessandro d'Andrea ⁵, who wrote of, and serv'd in the War which that King had with Pope Paul IV. there were only Six Governors, first call'd Justices, and afterwards Viceroyes, who administr'd Justice to more Provinces than one; for the Two Abruzzi had then but one President; the Contado di Molise, and Capitanata another, as they have at present; the further Principato had one, the hither Principato, and Basilicata had but one ; Terra d'Otranto, and Terra di Bari one ; and the Two Calabria's another. But the Division was made afterwards, according to the Number of the Officers, call'd Treasurers, who collected the Royal Revenues, for the greater Conveniency of collecting them, and the Number of Governors was the same, whence, excepting the Contado di Molise, each Province had its own particular President.

General Courts and Fairs instituted by Frederick in these our Provinces. The Children he left ; and his last Will.

AL L these Justices were subordinate to the Lord Chief Justice of the Kingdom, who resided at Palermo, the Place of the King's Residence, and where he kept his High Court ; but Frederick, who could not fix himself in any one Place, but as his Affairs call'd him, made Progresses over all the Provinces of his Dominions, held his High Court in every City where he made any Stay, and was attended by the Lord Chief Justice, and the Judges of that Court. And this prudent Prince, who was a Lover of Justice, for the better Government of these Provinces, in the Year 1233, having conven'd a General Parliament in Messina, ordain'd a General Court to be held Twice a Year in certain Provinces of the Kingdom¹, where any Person, that found himself injur'd by, or had Cause to complain of the Justices, or any other of his Officers, should lay their Complaints before his Delegate, sent thither by him for that Effect, who was to set down all the Grievances in Writing, and, together with Four Clergymen of known Probity and Reputation, was to seal the said Writing, and present it to his Imperial Court. But Complaints against Persons who were not Officers, were to be decided by the Justices of the Provinces.

IN these General Courts, Four Persons of the best Account and known Probity of each City, and Two of each Village or Hamlet of the Province were to be present. And it was likewise ordain'd, that the Prelates of these Cities, if they had not a lawful Excuse, were to be present to inform the Court if there were any Patareni, or other Hereticks in their Province, and if they could not be there themselves, they were to do it by others, that these Hereticks might be severely punish'd. These Courts were to continue for Eight Days, and when Matters of Moment were to be discuss'd, they could prolong the Time to a Fortnight.

TH E Places appointed for holding of these Courts were, in Sicily, Plazza ; in Calabria, Cosenza, where Two Provinces were to meet, to wit, Terra Jordana, and Valle di Crati, now call'd the hither and further Calabria's ; the Provinces of Puglia, Capitanata and Basilicata, were to meet in the City of Gravina ; the Two Provinces of Principato, Terra di Lavoro, and Contado di Molise, as far as Sora, were to meet in Salerno ; and the Two Provinces of Abruzzo in Sulmona.

TH E Times fix'd for holding of these Courts, were the first Day of May, and the first of November. They were to be compos'd of the Emperor's Delegate, the Chief Justice, the Justices of the Provinces, the High Chamberlain, the Chamberlains and Bailiffs of the Provinces, and other Officers of the Court, the Prelates, Counts, Barons, and the Citizens of these Places, as above appointed.

IN order to keep up Plenty of all Things, this same general Parliament held at Messina, appointed publick Fairs in Seven Places of our Kingdom¹, whither all Merchants were to carry their Wares, and while the Fair lasted, they were not allow'd to carry them to any other Place. The first was appointed to be in Sulmona, and to last from the Feast of St. George, to that of the Apparition of St. Michael the Archangel: The second was to be in Capua, and to continue from the 22d of May, to the 8th of June: The third in Lutera, and was to begin on the Feast of the beatified Pope John, and to hold Eight Days: The fourth in Bari, and to last from the Feast of Mary Magdalen, to that of St. Laurence: The fifth in Taranto, from the Feast of St. Bartholomew, to that of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin: The sixth in Cosenza, from the Feast of St. Matthew, to that of St. Dionysius: The seventh in Reggio, from the Feast of St. Luke, to that of All Saints.

THUS did this most prudent Prince, by his provident Care, put these our Provinces in a better Form of Government; and if they had not been depriv'd of him by Death in the midst of his Progress, he would have provided them with many other wholesome Laws, and improv'd them to greater Advantage; but his untimely Death put a Stop to the Career of their Happiness, and they fell afterwards into a most deplorable State; for they were torn to Pieces, disturb'd and miserably afflicted by many Invaders, (each contending for the Crown) till the Royal Race of the Suevi being extinct, they came under another Family; which shall be the Subject of the first Book of the next Volume.

FREDERICK, by sundry Wives, and some Concubines, left many Children. According to Cuspinianus, he had Six Wives. The first was Constantia, Daughter of Alphonfus II. King of Aragon, and Sancia Queen of Castile, by whom he had Henry King of Germany, who died in Prison, and Jordanus, who died an Infant: The second was Jole, Daughter of John of Brenna, King of Jerusalem, who brought him as her Portion, the Rights to that Kingdom, which she had by Right of her Mother Mary, by her he had Conrade King of the Romans: The third was Agnes, Daughter of Otho Duke of Moravia, whom he divorced, and she was afterwards married to Ulderick, Duke of Carinthia: The fourth was Rutina, Daughter of Otho Count of Wolffeuxhausen in Bavaria: The fifth was Isabella, Daughter of Lewis Duke of Bavaria; none of these Three brought him any Children: The sixth was likewise nam'd Isabella, or Elizabeth, Daughter of John King of England, and Sister to the Prince of Wales, afterwards King of England, nam'd Henry III. and it may be seen in the Annals of that Kingdom, re-printed in the Reign of Queen Anne, that Frederick sent Pietro delle Vigne to England to treat about this Marriage; by this Isabella, Frederick had Henry, whom it was believed, Conrade caus'd to be poison'd, which occasion'd those Broils between the King of England, Henry's Uncle, and Conrade, of which we shall take Notice hereafter; Isabella likewise bore some Daughters. Cuspinianus was in the Wrong to write, that there was no Male Child of this Marriage; for the most approv'd Authors, amongst which Zurita, with more Truth, say, That she was the Mother of Henry, who got the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and a Hundred thousand Ounces of Gold from his Father, and was afterwards poison'd by the Means of Conrade, as shall be told in the following Book of this History. The Eldest of the Daughters, nam'd Agnes, was married to Conrade, Landgrave of Thuringia, and Constantia the Youngest, to Lewis, Landgrave of Hesse.

FREDERICK had likewise by Beatrice Princess of Antioch (whom, according to Zurita, he unlawfully took to Wife) Frederick Prince of Antioch, and Count of Albi, Celano, and Loretto, who, according to some Authors, by his Father was intitled King of Tuscany. This Frederick had a Son, nam'd Conrade of Antioch, who married Beatrice, Daughter of Count Galvano Lancia, by whom he had Frederick, Henry and Galvano of Antioch; whose Offspring flourish'd for some Time in Sicily.

THE Emperor Frederick had also by a Sister of Goffredo Maletta, Count of Minio, and Trivento, Lord of Monte S. Angelo, and High Chamberlain of the Kingdom, Manfred Prince of Taranto, afterwards King of Naples and Sicily, and Constantia, who, in her Father's Life-time, was married to Carolus Joannes Battasius Emperor of Constantinople, a Schismatick, and Enemy to the Church of Rome, as may be seen in the Royal Archives; with which Pope Innocent IV. upbraided him when he depriv'd him of the Empire; and it may be gather'd from Frederick's last Will, that he look'd upon Manfred as born in lawful Wedlock, seeing he is there nam'd to succeed to his Father's Dominions, in case Conrade and Henry should die without Issue; and some Writers have maintain'd, that he was lawfully begotten, and not a Bastard; which has led Mathew Paris into a Mistake, when in his History he says, That Manfred was born of Bianca Lanza, and that the Emperor married her while he was sick, a little before he died. And by the said Bianca Lanza, by some call'd Marchioness of Monferrat, and other Women, he had Henry King of Sardinia, commonly call'd Eutius, who died Prisoner in Bologna, and some Daughters, one of which was nam'd Selvaggia, and was married to Ezzelino Tiranno di Padova; another to Tommaso d' Aquino Count of Cerra; and a Third to the Count of Caserta.

FREDERICK, before he died, made his last Will, by which he left his Son Conrade King of the Romans, Heir of the Empire, and of all his other Dominions, and particularly of the Kingdoms of Buglia and Sicily; and upon his Death without Issue, Henry his other Son was to succeed, and if he should die without Children, Manfred Prince of Taranto, also his Son, was to succeed; and as long as Conrade should remain in Germany, or any other Place, he appointed Manfred with full Authority to be his Lieutenant in Italy, and especially in Puglia and Sicily. To Manfred he left the Principality of Taranto, with the Counties of Montescaglioso, Trocarico, and Gravina, with the County of Monte S. Angelo, and the same Title and Honour which he had given him in his Life-time, with all the Cities, Towns, and Castles belonging to the said County, but reserv'd the Sovereignty to Conrade, &c.

BUT seeing the Will itself deserves to be read, we have here subjoin'd it, and it is the very same which heretofore was to be seen in the Royal Archives, according to Matteo d' Afflatto, and is mention'd by Bzovius in his Ecclesiastick Annals, and by several Writers of this Kingdom: Capecelatro copied it from a very antient Chronicle of the Deeds of Frederick, and of some Kings his Successors; and it is the very same that is mention'd by Costanzo, Summonte, *Tutini*¹, and other Authors.

Testamentum FRIDERICI II.

IN nomine Dei æterni, & Salvatoris nostri Jesu Christi. Anno ab Incarnatione ejus millesimo ducentesimo quinquagesimo primo, & primo Anno Domini nostri Corradî Gloriosissimi Romanorum, Hierusalem, Siciliae, & Italiae Regis, mense Januarii, 9. Indictione. Dum in Archiepiscopali Salernitano Palatio, in præsentia Domini Caesaris, Dei Gratia venerabilis Salernitani Archiepiscopi essemus nos Philippus, Matthæus, Romoaldus, & Philippus Judices, præsentibus Matthæo de Vallone Straticoto Salerni Philippo Græco, & Gulielmo Curiali Notariis ad hoc specialiter rogatis: Illustris vir Dominus Bertoldus Marchio de Hobenburch Dei, & Domini nostri Regis Corradî gratia, Dominus Montis fortis, & Argentii, Castri S. Severini, & honoris ejus, ostendit, & præsentavit prædicto Domino Archiepiscopo Testamentum, sive ultimam voluntatem quondam Domini nostri serenissimi Imperatoris Friderici II. cerea, & pendente Bulla ejusdem Domini Imperatoris insignitum, quod vidimus, & legimus, & omni vitio, & suspitione carebat, & erat contingentia talis.

IN nomine Dei æterni, & Salvatoris nostri Jesu Christi. Anno ab Incarnatione ejus Millesimo ducentesimo quinquagesimo, die Sabati, Decimo septimo Decembris, nonæ Indictionis. Primi Parentis incauta transgressio sic posteris legem Conditionis indicxit, ut eam ne diluvii proclivis ad pœnam effragio effrenis adducere, nec Baptismatis tam celebris, tam salubris unda luviret, quin fatalitatis cu..... mortalibus senescentis ævi..... lascivia transgressionis in pœnam culpæ transfuga tanquam cicatrix ex vulnere remaneret. Nos igitur Fridericus II. Divina favente clementia Romanorum Imperator semper Augustus, Hierusalem, & Siciliae Rex, memor conditionis Humanæ, quam semper comitatur humana fragilitas, dum vitæ nobis instaret terminus, loquelæ, & memoriæ in nobis integritate vigentibus, egri corpore, sani mente sic animæ nostræ consulendum providimus, providimus, sic de Imperio, & Regnis nostris duximus disponendum, ut rebus humanis assumpti videamur, & filiis nostris, quibus nos Divina clementia fecundavit, quos presenti dispositione sub pœna benedictionis nostræ volumus esse contentos, ambitione sublata, omnis materia scandali sopiatur. Statuimus itaque Conradum Romanorum in Regem electum, & Regni Hierosolymitani hæredem dilectum filium nostrum, nobis hæredem in Imperio, & in omnibus aliis . . . & quoquo modo acquisitis, & specialiter in Regno nostro Sicilia; quem si decedere contingerit sine liberis, succedat ei Henricus filius noster, quo defuncto sine liberis succedat ei Manfredus filius noster: Conrado vero morante in Alemannia, vel alibi extra Regnum: Statuimus prædictum Manfredum Baliam dicti Conradi in Italia, & specialiter in Regno Sicilia, dantes ei plenariam potestatem omnia faciendi, quæ Persona nostra facere posset, si viveremus, videlicet, in concedendis terris, castris, & villis, parentelis, & dignitatibus, beneficiis, & omnibus aliis juxta dispositionem suam, præter antiqua demania Regni Sicilia, & quod Conradus, & Henricus prædicti filii nostri, & eorum hæredes omnia, quæ ipse fecerit firma, & rata teneant, & observent. Item concedimus, & confirmamus dicto Manfredo filio principatum Tarenti, videlicet, a Portu Rositi, usque ad ortum fluminis Brandani, cum Comitatus Montis Caveosi, Tricarici, & Gravina, prout Comitatus ipse protenditur, a maritima Terræ Bari usque Palinurum, cum Terris omnibus a Palinuro per totam Maritimam usque ad dictum Portum Rositi, cum Comitatus Castris, & villis infra contentis cum omnibus fustitiis, pertinentiis, & rationibus omnibus tam ipsius Principatus, quam Comitatus prædictorum. Concedimus etiam eidem Comitatum Montis S. Angeli, cum titulo, & honore suo, & omnibus Civitatibus, Castris, Villis, Terris, Pertinentiis, fustitiis, & Rationibus eidem Comitatus pertinentibus, videlicet, usque de Demanio in Demanium, & quæ de Servitio in Servitium. Concedimus, & confirmamus eidem quidquid sibi in Imperio etiam a nostra Majestate concessum, ita tamen quod prædicta omnia a præfato Conrado teneat, & recognoscat. Item statuimus, quod Fridericus nepos noster habeat Ducatus Austria, & Stiria, quos a præfato Conrado teneat & recognoscat, cui Friderico judicamus dari pro expensis suis decem millia unciarum auri. Item statuimus, ut Henricus filius noster habeat Regnum Alcarensē, vel Regnum Hierosolymitanum, quorum alterum dictus Conradus præfatum Henricum habere voluerit, cui Henrico judicamus dari centum millia unciarum auri pro expensis. Item statuimus, ut centum millia unciarum auri expendantur, pro solute animæ nostræ in subsidium Terræ Sanctæ secundum ordinationem dicti Conradi, & aliorum nobilium Crucesignatorum. Item statuimus, quod omnia bona Militiæ Domus Templi, quæ Curia nostra tenet restituantur eidem, ea videlicet, quæ de jure debent habere. Item statuimus, ut Ecclesiæ, & Domibus Religiosis restituantur jura earum, & gaudeant solitata libertate. Item statuimus, quod homines Regni nostri sint liberi, & exempti ab omnibus generalibus collectis, sicut consueverunt esse tempore Regis Gulielmi II. Consobrini nostri. Item statuimus, quod Comites, Barones, & Milites, & alii Feudatarii Regni gaudeant juribus, & rationibus, quæ consueverunt habere tempore prædicti Regis Gulielmi in collectis, & aliis. Item statuimus, ut Ecclesiæ Luceria, Soræ, & si quæ aliæ Ecclesiæ læsæ sunt per Officiales nostros reficiantur, & restituantur. Item statuimus, ut tota Massaria nostra, quam habemus apud S. Nicolaum de Ausido, & omnes proventus ipsius deputentur ad reparationem, & conservationem Pontis ibi constructi, vel construendi. Item statuimus, ut omnes Captivi in carcere nostro detempti liberentur, præter illos de Imperio, & præter illos de Regno, qui capti sunt ex proditoris nota. Item statuimus, quod præfatus Manfredus filius noster omnibus bene meritis de Familia nostra provideat vice nostra in Terris, Castris & Villis, salvo Demanio Regni nostri Sicilia, & quod Conradus, & Henricus prædicti filii nostri, & hæredes eorum ratum, & firmum habeant quicquid idem Manfredus super hoc duxerit faciendum. Item volumus, & mandamus, quod nullus de Proditoribus Regni aliquo tempore reverti debeat in Regnum, nec alicui de eorum genere Succurrere possint, imo hæredes nostri teneantur de eis vindictam sumere. Item statuimus, quod mercatoribus creditoribus nostris debita solvantur. Item statuimus, ut Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ Matri Nostræ, & aliorum nostrorum fidelium jura restituantur, si ipse Ecclesia restituat jura Imperii. Item statuimus, ut si de præsentī infirmitate nostra mori contingerit, in majori Ecclesia Panormitana, in qua Divi Imperatoris Henrici, & Divæ Imperatricis Constantiæ parentum nostrorum memoriæ recolendæ tumulata sunt corpora, corpus nostrum debeat sepeliri; cui Ecclesiæ dimittimus uncias auri quingentas pro salute animarum dictorum parentum nostrorum, & nostræ, per manus Berardi venerabilis Panormitani Archiepiscopi, familiaris, & fidelis nostri, in reparatione ipsius Ecclesiæ erogandas. Prædicta autem omnia, quæ acta sunt in præsentia prædicti Archiepiscopi, Bertoldi Marchionis de Hobenburch dilecti consanguinei, & familiaris nostri, Riccardi Comitiss Casertani dilecti generi nostri, Petri Ruffi de Calabria Marescallæ nostræ Magistri, Riccardi de Monte Nigro magnæ Curie nostræ Magistri Justitiarum, Magistri Joannis de Idronto Notarii nostri, Fulconis Ruffi, Magistri Joannis de Procida, Magistri Roberti de Panormo Imperii, & Regni Siciliae, & magnæ Curie nostræ Notarii, meorum fidelium, quos præsentis dispositione nostræ mandavimus interesse, per prædictum Conradum filium, & hæredem nostrum, & alios successore sub pœna benedictionis nostræ tenaciter disponimus observari, alioquin hæreditate nostra non gaudeant. Ita autem universis fidelibus nostris præsentibus, & futuris sub Sacramento fidelitatis, qua nobis, & hæredibus nostris tenentur, injungimus, ut prædicta omnia illibata teneant, & observent. Præsens autem Testamentum nostrum, & ultimam voluntatem nostram, quam robur firmitatis volumus obtinere, per prædictum Magnificum Nicolaum de Brundusio Scribi, & Signo Sanctæ Crucis propriæ manus nostræ Sigillo nostro, & prædictorum Subscriptionibus jussimus communiri. M y L O R D,

S my Design was to have address'd this Volume of the History of the Kingdom of Naples to your Lordship's Father, as a Token of Gratitude for the many Obligations I lay under to his Lordship; and particularly for his having done me the Honour to make me his Fellow Traveller through Italy, whereby I was enabled to undertake the Translation of this Work; hence it is, that none has so just a Title to this grateful Acknowledgment as your Lordship. Besides, my Lord, I should be wanting in my Duty, if I did not embrace this Opportunity to acknowledge the many Favours I have receiv'd from your Lordship, who, in the Prime of your Age, sets out in the World, indow'd with all the excellent Qualities, which have ever been the distinguishing Characters

D E D I C A T I O N.

Characters of your noble Family, and illustrious Ancestors, from whom your Lordship derives immortal Honour, particularly from that Pattern of Virtue and glorious Hero, who died in the Battle of Newberry fighting for the just Cause of his Royal Master, and whose Character is so truly described by the Noble Historian, that it puts him upon a Level with the greatest Men, either of his own, or of any preceding Age. A Character, which already begins to shine in all your Lordship's Actions ; and were it not for fear of trespassing upon your Modesty, I could instance one of a very fresh Date, in which, by a generous Sacrifice of private Interest to filial Duty, you have shewn a Soul so truly great, as gives a sure Prefage, that your Lordship's future Conduct will be an exact Imitation of the Virtues of your renown'd Predecessors, which will but answer the Expectation of every one who has the Honour of your Lordship's Acquaintance. As I am afraid that even this very Hint will put your Lordship to the Blush, I shall therefore conclude, and beg that you will be pleased to accept of this as a Mark of the great Sincerity, with which I am,

My LORD,

Your Lordship's most obliged, and most obedient humble Servant,

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XVIII.

THE Emperor Frederick was no sooner dead, than Manfred, who had been left Regent by his Father's Will, during Conrad's Absence in Germany, took upon him the Government of these Kingdoms with absolute Power and Authority. Manfred was a Prince indued with all his Father's excellent natural Gifts and Virtues; and the anonymous Writer of his Exploits says, he was called Manfred, because he was quasi manus & mens Frederici. He had been brought up at the Imperial Court, caress'd, and more belov'd by his Father than all his other Children, by which Means he had by Degrees imbib'd the same generous Notions; and had he had the good Fortune to have been his eldest Son in lawful Wedlock, he certainly would have rival'd his Father's Glory and Greatness; but Frederick, by his last Will giving Way to the Order of Succession in Conrad his eldest Son, could do no more than to appoint Manfred to succeed, in case Conrad and Henry should die without Issue, and during Conrad's Absence to appoint him Regent of Italy and the Kingdoms of Sicily.

IN relating the alternate Fortune of this Prince, and his noble Exploits, I shall follow the anonymous cotemporary Writer, whose Chronicle is now printed with the Works of *Ughellus*¹, and is reckoned to be of great Authority not only by Inveges, Tutini, and other more modern Writers, but likewise by Odericus Rainaldus in his Ecclesiastical Annals. This Writer says, that Manfred's Conduct and Virtues so much resembled those of his Father, that though the Death of Princes frequently occasions great Disorders, yet by Manfred's prudent Management every thing went on smoothly, as if it had been one continued Government: No Alteration could be perceived either in the Court or Ministry; and after he had caused Conrad to be proclaimed King in the Kingdom of Puglia, he sent Henry his younger Brother to govern under him in Sicily and *Calabria*¹, that the Sicilians and Calabrians, by having Henry among them, might be kept to their Allegiance, and look upon him as the same Person with Frederick.

BUT this Calm was of short Duration, and the Storm and Troubles that Pope Innocent IV. was about to raise were easily perceived. Innocent being persuaded, that by the Sentence of Deposition pronounced in the Council of Lyons, Frederick with all his Posterity had forfeited the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, pretended that by his Contumacy, as Fiefs of the Church of Rome, they were devolved upon her: So that upon the News of Frederick's Death, the Pope resolved to leave Lyons, and return to Italy; and in the mean time he wrote to all the principal Cities, and Barons of both Kingdoms, to set up the Standard of the Church, and being arriv'd at Genoa, the Place of his Nativity, he stirred up the Genoese to make War upon these Kingdoms. Manfred being apprised of these underhand Dealings, with a good Body of Saracen Troops made a Progress over all the Kingdom, baffled the Pope's Conspiracy, and caus'd Conrad to be proclaimed King, which quieted the Minds of the People, and confirm'd them in their Allegiance to their lawful Prince; nevertheless these Steps of the Pope did not fail to foment a secret Conspiracy, which was afterwards discover'd in the Provinces of Puglia and Terra di Lavoro. Foggia, Andria and Barletta rebell'd in Puglia; and Naples and Capua in Terra di Lavoro. Manfred march'd immediately into Puglia, and by his Valour and Courage suppress'd the Rebellion of these Cities, mercifully pardon'd the Citizens, and reduc'd them to Conrad's Obedience².

HAVING thus restor'd Peace and Tranquillity in this Province, he presently march'd into Terra di Lavoro; where he reduc'd Aversa, which being situated betwixt Capua and Naples, its Loyalty was suspected: He laid close Siege to Capua, laying waste the Territories to the very Walls; and Nola, which had taken part with the two rebellious Cities, refusing to surrender, was besieg'd and taken. But Naples at this time was very obstinate; so soon had the Neapolitans forgot that Frederick had made their City famous by the new Academy which he had establish'd, and the magnificent Buildings which he had erected in it, and which were the Ground-work of its being afterwards rais'd to be the Head and Metropolis of all the other Cities: For laying aside all Gratitude, he was no sooner dead than they rebell'd against his Son, surrender'd their City to Pope Innocent, and set up the Standard of the Church: Whose Example was followed by Capua, and the Counts of the House of Aquino, who at that time were in Possession of almost all that Tract of Land betwixt Vulturno and the Garigliano.

AS soon as Manfred was apprised of the Revolt of the Neapolitans, he sent them several Messages, exhorting them not to blemish their Reputation so unworthily; but they pretending that they could not refuse to obey the Pope, who had threaten'd them with terrible Anathemas and Interdictions, plainly declared, that they chose rather to subject themselves to the Dominion of the Church, than to be interdicted and excommunicated, by adhering to Conrad; whom, without the Pope's Investiture, they could not acknowledge for their lawful King. Wherefore Manfred, finding all his Labour lost, resolv'd to reduce them by Force; and having laid Siege to that part of the City next to Mount Vesuvius, he began to lay waste all the Territories on that Side, to the very Walls, in order to oblige the Neapolitans to sally out of the City, and attack him in the open Fields, not having Forces sufficient to make an Assault, by Reason of the strong Walls wherewith it was fortified. But the Neapolitans, aware of his Design, by no Means would leave the City, not minding the Destruction of their Fields; which Manfred perceiving, he resolv'd to lay Siege to another part of the City, whereupon he march'd and encamp'd on the Solfataras near *Agnano*³, where he laid waste and plunder'd all the Territories on that Side, in order to draw the Neapolitans out of the City, when they should see his Army surrounded with Mountains and Rocks, and not able to escape if pursued. But the Neapolitans, stedfast in their Resolution, would not quit the City, to expose themselves to a Battel; and although Manfred had often challeng'd them to come out and fight him, nothing could persuade them to do it, so that having waited for them three Days after the Challenge he rais'd the Siege, and after he had destroy'd all the Neighbourhood march'd off, and encamp'd in other Parts of Terra di Lavoro, to keep these People from following the Example of Naples and Capua.

C H A P. I.

Conrad King of Germany comes to Italy, and by the Adriatick Sea arrives in Puglia, and subdues the Counts of Aquino: Capua surrenders to him, and Naples is taken by Storm, and pillaged.

WHILE Manfred, with great Vigilance and Conduct, was altogether Intent on frustrating the Pope's Designs, he had Advice, that Conrad King of Germany, some few Months after his Father's Death, had disingag'd himself from the Wars in Germany, and was on his March to Italy with a powerful Army of Germans; and this Year 1251, ¹ he actually arriv'd in Lombardy, where he found the Power of the Ghibellins at such a low Ebb, that he was forced to halt for some time, in order with the greater Security to enter the Kingdom; whereupon he call'd for all the leading Men of that Party, and order'd them to make up amongst themselves a competent Army, of which he would have Ezzelino the Tyrant of Padua to be General, that he might so crush the Guelf Faction, as Pope Innocent should not be able to make use of them, to dispute the Possession of the Kingdom. Thus having settled the Affairs of Lombardy, he very prudently resolv'd to go to his Kingdom by Sea; for finding that all the Cities of Romagna and Tuscany sided with the Guelf Faction, he did not think it safe to venture by Land, lest his Army, being opposed in its March, should desert for want of Pay and Provisions ². Therefore he sent to the Venetians for Ships and Gallies to carry him to Puglia; who, willing to have him gone from their Neighbourhood, sent to him at Friuli as many Vessels as he desir'd, where he embark'd with all his Army, and with a prosperous Gale, in a few Days arrived near to Monte Gargano, and landed at the antient City of Sipontum, not far from the Place where the City of Manfredonia now stands ³.

MANFRED, with all the Barons of that Province, was there ready to welcome the King, to whom he gave an Account of the State of the Kingdom, and the Contumacy of the Neapolitans, Capuans, and the Counts of Aquino; the King commended Manfred for his Care and Diligence; and they were both of Opinion, that the first thing to be undertaken was to crush the Counts of Aquino, who being posted betwixt Garigliano and Vulturno were ready at hand to assist the Pope, and to make themselves Masters of these Places, where they could hinder Capua and Naples from getting Succours, which would make the taking of these important Cities very easy. Whereupon the King with Manfred and his Army, by the way of Capitanata, and Contado di Molise, march'd against these Rebels ⁴.

THE Pope, who had gone from Genoa to Milan, and from thence to Ferrara and Bologna, and at last stop'd in Perugia, shunn'd going to Rome, because the Romans were all in Factions, and many of them were in Conrad's Interest; and being inform'd of the Distress of the Counts of Aquino, whose Safety he had much at Heart, he immediately sent some Soldiers from Perugia to their Assistance, promising at the same time to send them greater Succours; but such was the Bravery of Conrad's Army, being reinforc'd by Manfred with a good Body of Saracens from Lucera and Sicily, that in a few Days these Rebels were subdued, and their chief Cities pillaged and burnt; among which were Arpino, Sessa, S. Germano, and some Castles in that Neighbourhood ¹.

AFTER Conrad had subdued the Rebels, and reduc'd these Cities to his Obedience, he march'd to Capua, which, being warn'd by the Treatment the before named Cities had met with, immediately surrender'd without Resistance ². Conrad now with all his Army march'd against the City of Naples, which was resolutely determin'd to hold out against the enrag'd King, and stick to the Church; for not only the Pope had promis'd the Neapolitans immediate Relief, but they were afraid of being deliver'd up a Prey to the Germans and Saracens. After Conrad had pitch'd his Camp near the City, he besieg'd it so close, that no Provisions could enter by Land; and observing, that by the Pope's Means they receiv'd some by Sea, he order'd Manfred to send for the Gallies that were in Sicily.

IN the mean time the Neapolitans did not fail to send frequent Messengers to the Pope for Relief, who always return'd loaded with Benedictions and Promises, but no Relief; for Ezzelino had got all the Ghibellins in Lombardy to take Arms; and the Guefs, amongst whom the Pope had many Relations and Followers, had much ado to defend themselves; for the Guelfs of Tuscany and Romagna, though they were at full Liberty, and had entirely crush'd the Ghibellins, were at Variance amongst themselves. Neither could the City of Genoa (the Place of the Pope's Nativity, and on which he laid great Stress) give any Assistance, because the Genoese Fleet at this time had been sent against the Infidels; so that the Besieged were depriv'd of all Relief, and had nothing to trust to but Promises.

AT last, by the Arrival of the Sicilian Gallies, all Hopes of Succour were at an end: Nevertheless such was the Obstinacy of the Besieged, that they continued to hold out till they were become so feeble through Famine, that they were no longer able to bear the Weight of their Arms; whereupon the old Men began to persuade them to send Messengers to capitulate, which was done. But Conrad, who knew to what Straits they were reduc'd, reject'd their Offer; and having dispos'd the Machines round the City, and undermin'd the Walls, he forc'd them to surrender, on Condition only to have their Persons safe ³.

THE City was given up to be plunder'd, and cruelly and rigorously treated by the enrag'd King; the Archbishop was banish'd, the Citizens, with their own Hands, were forc'd to demolish, to the very Foundation, the strong Walls of that City, which Livy says intimidated Hannibal the Carthaginian. After the King had stay'd two Months in Naples, and spent all that Time in severely punishing the Disloyalty of the Neapolitans, he return'd to Puglia, and took Manfred with him, whom he declar'd to be the second Person in the Kingdom.

Pope Innocent's first Invitation to the King of England's Brother to come and conquer the Kingdom.

INNOCENT finding that Conrad had subdued his favourite Cities, and reduc'd the Kingdom of Puglia to his Obedience, thought it was in vain any longer to contend with him; and seeing all the Expeditions of the Popes against this Kingdom had always prov'd unfortunate, Innocent resolv'd to invite Richard

Earl

Earl of Cornwal, and Brother to Henry III. King of England, a warlike and gallant Prince, to come and conquer the Kingdom. For which end he sent Alberto the Apostolick Notary to treat about the Conditions of the Investiture to be given to Richard. But Matthew Paris, in his Chronicle for this Year 1253. says, that several things concurr'd for rendring this Treaty fruitless. First, Richard thought it would not be in his Power to drive Conrad out of the Kingdom. Secondly, The Relation that was betwixt them, for Conrad, as he says, was the Son of Elizabeth of England, Sister to King Henry, and Wife of Frederick II. in which he is widely mistaken, for Conrad was the Son of Jole, and not of Elizabeth; so that the same Paris elsewhere, viz. in the Year 1258. gives another Reason, which was, that Richard would not accept of the Investiture but upon these two Conditions. First, That by vertue of his Conquest he should have Power to exact the half of the Tithes that were wont to be collected for the Holy War. Secondly, That the Pope should put him in Possession of some Castles in the Kingdom which he had fortified, for a Place of Retreat to his Army. To which the Pope would not consent, so that this first Investiture came to nothing, and there was another treated of afterwards in the Person of Edmond his Nephew, as shall hereafter be related. This is a convincing Proof of the Error of Collenuccio, and of his Follower Paolo Panfa in the Life of Innocent IV. where he says, that the Pope invested Richard the King of England's Brother, and that he accepted, and therefore in his Letters took the Title of King of Sicily.

C H A P. II.

Conrad being jealous of Manfred deprives him both of his Authority and Estate; poisons his own younger Brother Henry; and soon after he himself dies of Poison; whereupon Manfred reassumes the Regency of the Kingdom.

IN the mean time Conrad, by his having treated Naples and the other vanquish'd Citics in so cruel a manner, and by his natural rough and severe Disposition he became the Object of the Hatred and ill Will of all Ranks and Degrees of People; and being altogether destitute of the civil and military Virtues with which his Father was adorn'd, his Government became troublesome and grievous to his Subjects. On the contrary Manfred, a Man of excellent Parts and Courage, with admirable Dexterity always restrain'd the King's Cruelty, which endear'd him to the People and Barons; inso-much that it was the Opinion of the whole Nation, that whatever Mischief was left undone by the King and the German Army, was owing to the Intercession and Humanity of Manfred.

THIS Prince likewise with wonderful Art conceal'd the many Injuries which out of meer Jealousy Conrad did him; for perceiving that Manfred was a Man of noble Endowments and royal Virtues, more fit to reign than govern the Kingdom as a Regent, he was afraid that by his Power and good Conduct, and the Love he had acquired amongst the People, he would some time or other aspire to the Crown. Therefore he bethought himself how to bring him low, which he had no Mind to do openly, but said to him one Day, that he had resolv'd to revoke all the Donations which the Emperor his Father had made by his last Will, as being very detrimental to the State, and a great Loss to the Crown; and that the other Barons, by his Example, might bear it the more easily, he had a Mind to begin with him. Manfred with the same Cunning seem'd to give Credit to what he said; and to shew how ready he was to go into Measures, he willingly resign'd to him the County of Monte S. Angelo and the City of Brindisi, which he possessed by vertue of his Right to the Principality of Taranto ¹.

AND likewise from time to time, as Occasion offered, he took from him the Counties of Gravina, Tricarico and Montescaglioso, which had been given him by Frederick his Father; and there only remain'd to him the Principality of Taranto very much diminish'd; and that this remaining Principality might be of little Use to him, he impos'd a very heavy Tax upon the People of it, which he caus'd to be exacted, and brought into the Royal Treasury. He turn'd out the Justice of that Principality, which Manfred had usually made, and put in one of his own, as was practis'd in all the other Provinces of the Kingdom. He likewise depriv'd him of the merum Imperium and Power which Frederick had granted him over that Principality, and ordain'd, that the Prince should have no other Jurisdiction over it, but in civil Cases only ²; for in those Times no Barons got merum Imperium over their Fiefs, except some great ones, and those of the Royal Family, out of special Favour; which in the time of Alphonfus I. of Aragon began to be given to all the Barons, so that there is not the least Baron now that has it not.

THE Malice which Conrad bore this Prince did not end here; for, in order to free himself from all Jealousy, he resolv'd to reduce him to the most abject State: For which end, under sham Pretences, he order'd all Manfred's Relations by his Mother to depart the Kingdom; among the rest he banish'd Gualvano Lancia, who had so well and faithfully serv'd the Emperor Frederick, that he had made him his Lieutenant in Tuscany, where he had exercis'd that high Office for many Years with great Fidelity. He likewise banish'd Federico Lancia his Brother, and Bonifacio di Anglono Manfred's Uncle by the Mother, with all his other Relations, their Wives, Mothers, Sisters, Sons and Daughters, young and old. All these, having left the Kingdom, retir'd into Romania to Constancia Empress of Constantinople Manfred's Sister; whither he sent Conrad Bertoldus Marquis of Honebruch to acquaint the Emperor that he would take it as a very great Affront if he entertain'd these Exiles; whereupon that Emperor oblig'd them to depart his Dominions ³.

PRINCE Manfred very prudently seem'd to be no wise offended at all these Injuries; for he did not fail chearfully to assist and accompany him in all his Undertakings, as he had done in Terra di Lavoro, when he subdued the Counts of Aquino, Capua and Naples; and now in Puglia, concealing his bitter Displeasure; and at the same time gaining the Hearts of the Barons and People.

AT this time, while Conrad was in Melphis, Henry his Brother, who was only twelve Years of Age, came from Sicily to pay him a Visit; and though the anonymous Writer makes not Conrad guilty of so great a Villany, yet there are not wanting grave Authors, who relate, that by the Means of Gio. Moro a Saracen Captain, whom Henry had brought with him from Sicily, he got him poison'd. Those who say that Conrad had procured the Death of Henry in order to be Master of the Kingdom of Sicily, and that Frederick neither ought nor could separate it from that of Puglia, are grossly mistaken; for it was not the Kingdom of Sicily, but that of Jerusalem, or Regnum Alcareense, which in his last Will he left to Henry, at Conrad's Choice; and Manfred had sent Henry to Sicily to keep the Sicilians in their Allegiance to Conrad, as we have already said. Some believe, that he caus'd him to be put to death in order to get the greatest part of the Emperor Frederick's Treasure, which Henry was Master of. However that may be, Matthew Paris says ⁴, that Conrad was very much suspected to have been the Author of that innocent Youth's Death, for from that time forth he never had so serene and cheerful a Countenance as formerly. And in the Acta publica Angliæ, which were lately printed by the Order of Queen Anne, we find a Letter written by Conrad in the Year 1254. to the King of England, Henry's Uncle, wherein, on purpose to stifle the Report that had been spread abroad of his having caus'd him to be poison'd, he gave that King an Account of the Death of his Nephew, in very passionate Expressions, and seem'd to be very much afflicted for the Death of that Prince; but Pope Innocent fomented the Enmity arisen on that Account between Conrad and Henry King of England, and offer'd the Kingdom of Sicily to Edmond his Son, who was but a Child; and it is to be observ'd in these Acta publica, that Innocent left no Stone unturn'd to engage the Father to put him in Possession, by ordering the Clergy of England to lend Money to their King, and for that end to mortgage the Goods of their Churches. But all that Money was afterwards squander'd away, and put to other Uses by the same Pope, and this second Treaty likewise came to nothing.

CONRAD, having thus reduc'd the fluctuating Cities of the Kingdom to his Obedience, was preparing to go to Germany; but in the Spring of this Year 1254. when he was upon the Point of setting out, he was seiz'd with a mortal Fever in the Fields near Lavello, and in a few Days, in the Flower of his Age, being only twenty six Years old, on the twenty first Day of May he departed this Life¹, after he had reign'd little more than three Years; whence we have nothing more recorded of this Prince.

NEVERTHELESS the Writers of the Guelf Faction, Enemies both to Frederick and his Progeny, say, that Manfred, by the Means of a Physician, caus'd Conrad to be poison'd, in hopes that Henry and he being both dead, and none of Frederick's Issue remaining but young Conrad, the Son of Conrad, born the Year before, he might easily take Possession of both Kingdoms; and that Conrad, not knowing that he was dying of Poison given him by Manfred's Order, left his Son Conrad his Heir, and Manfred to be Regent.

BUT if we may give Credit to the anonymous cotemporary Writer, Manfred was neither Author of that Villany, nor left Regent by Conrad.

THIS Writer says, that when Conrad was on his Death-bed, Bertoldus Marquis of Honebruch, by Means of the Germans, then very powerful, seeing him inclin'd to leave Manfred Regent of the Kingdom, very sily, in order to feel Manfred's Pulse, ask'd him if he would take that Charge upon him. Manfred, being aware of the Marquis's Cunning, answer'd him, that he would not accept of the Regency, because the Marquis himself deserv'd it better, and to whom he would yield in every Respect: This he did very artfully, whereby he not only did not expose himself to the Hatred of the Germans, but he knew that Bertoldus was not fit for the Charge, and that he would soon sink under the Load of Affairs, and that the Grandees of the Kingdom would invite himself to take the Regency upon him, as it happened. Bertoldus having receiv'd this Answer, went and told Conrad that Manfred would not accept of the Regency, whereupon the dying King nam'd Bertoldus to be Regent of the Kingdom.

CONRAD, before he died, made his last Will, in which he left his young Son Conrad his Heir, and the Marquis of Honebruch Regent; he foresaw that Innocent was able to raise Commotions in the Kingdom, therefore he recommended to the Regent to use all Means possible to procure to his Son Conrad the Favour of the Apostolick See, that he might not be involv'd in new Wars with the Pope.

THE Marquis had no sooner taken the Regency upon him, and possess'd himself of the Royal Treasure, than, in Obedience to the King's last Will, he sent Ambassadors to the Pope, begging him in the Name of the young King to be at Peace with him, and take him into his Favour, as Conrad the Father had recommended in his last Will. But Innocent, upon Conrad's Death, thought he had a fair Opportunity to make himself Master of the Kingdom, and look'd upon this Embassy rather as a Sign of the Weakness of the Royal Party than an Act of Respect; whereupon he became more haughty than ever, and answer'd the Ambassadors, that he would do his best to have Possession of the Kingdom now devolv'd to the Church of Rome; that when the young King came to be of Age, his Pretensions should be examin'd into; and perhaps, if the Apostolick See should find him deserving, he should meet with Favour².

THIS Answer made it evident to the Marquis and the Barons of the Kingdom, that the Pope was fully resolv'd to take Possession of the Kingdom; the Effects of which were soon discovered, for he now began to assemble a sufficient Army in order to invade it; and besides it was found out that he kept a secret Correspondence with many Barons, who were in the Interest of the Church, desiring their Assistance in the Conquest; these Barons, not pleas'd with the Marquis's Government and the Insolence of the Germans, chose rather to be under the Dominion of the Church, than to be oppress'd and enslav'd by them. The Marquis was preparing to guard against the threatened Invasion, but having discovered that many Barons, from whom he expected Assistance, were gone over to the Pope's Interest, and his Army ready on the Borders to make an Invasion, he became so terrified and dejected, that he repented of his having taken the Regency upon him, which, to his great Shame, he basely laid down ¹.

THE Counts, Barons and other Grandees of the Kingdom, who had continued firm in their Allegiance to the King, seeing that the Marquis had abandoned the Government, immediately had recourse to Prince Manfred, begging and conjuring him, that in order to save the Kingdom from Ruin and Destruction, he would be pleas'd, as by Right it belonged to him, to reassume the Regency. Manfred refus'd, saying, that the Affairs of the Kingdom were in so calamitous a Situation, that he could not undertake it and save his Honour; but the Barons still importuning him, and protesting that the Kingdom would be ruined, at last prevailed with him to take the Government again upon him. He had another very persuasive Argument to induce him, for it was rumour'd Abroad that the young King was dead, and that the Pope had now greater Hopes of getting Possession of the Kingdom. Wherefore Manfred, who, according to the last Will of the Emperor Frederick his Father, look'd upon himself to be the next Heir to his Dominions, was determined to reassume the Government, that in case his Pupil was still alive, he might take care of the State for him, and resist the Attempts of his Rival Innocent; and if the Report of his Death should be confirm'd, he might easily get himself to be crown'd ².

MANFRED then having taken the Government upon him, obliged the said Marquis, the Counts, Barons, and all the faithful Subjects of the Kingdom to take an Oath of Fidelity in this manner: That if the young King was still alive they swore to him as Regent; if he was dead, they were from that time forth to look upon himself as their Lord and King ³.

Innocent's Expedition against the Kingdom.

NATTERS being thus settled the Marquis went to Puglia, promising to send from thence both Men and Money to Manfred, who in the mean time began to assemble and dispose the Army, so as to be able to face that of the Pope, which was marching in all haste to invade the Kingdom: Whereupon he garrison'd S. Germano with a good Body of Germans, and fortified Capua, and all the neighbouring Towns which were beginning to waver, in order to keep them in Subjection.

BUT on the other hand Innocent, for facilitating his Undertaking, had sent Messengers into Sicily to Pietro Rufo di Calabria, who, by the Marquis of Hohenbruck, had been left Governor of Sicily and Calabria, that he might dispose those People

People to set up the Standard of the Church ¹; and Pietro actually dispatched Folco his Nephew, with other Messengers, in two Gallies to acquaint the Pope, that both Sicily and Calabria were ready to desert Manfred, and espouse his Interest.

BESIDES, Riccardo di Monte Negro, out of Hatred to the Marquis Bertoldus, had gone over to the Pope's Faction, and promised to give his Army free Passage through his Lands, situate on the Borders of the Kingdom. Many other Barons had likewise privately sworn Allegiance to the Pope, and engaged to take new Investiture from him of their Fiefs which they possess'd ²; and some had actually got new Investiture from him, such as Bonello di Anglone, who was invested by Innocent with the County of Lesina before he entered the Kingdom, though it belonged to Manfred, as an Appurtenance of the County of Monte S. Angelo. Innocent had likewise given Investiture of the County of Lecce to Marco Ziano, the Son of Pietro Doge of Venice, and declared that it belonged to him as a Descendant of Count Tancred his Grandfather, notwithstanding the Claim of Count Tigrisio de Mudignana and his Children, by Right of his Wife Alberia, who ought to have been preferred to the Succession before all others; and was excluded by Innocent, because he and his Sons had adhered to the Emperor Frederick against the Church, and were still Enemies to her, which made Innocent look upon them as unworthy of his Favour; and the Charter of this Investiture drawn up in Perugia in the Year 1252, is recorded by Ughellus ³, which he says he found in the Register of the Vatican. As also the same Year 1252 on the twenty first of January, while the Pope was still in Perugia, he invested O. Frangipane with the Principality of Taranto, though it belonged to Manfred, with all the Lands of Otranto; under Pretence that it had formerly been given by the Empress Constantia I. to O. his Uncle, as appears by the Grant dated in Perugia and recorded by Rainaldus ⁴; thus Innocent, by gratifying these chief Barons of the Kingdom made them his Liege-men and Dependents, and brought over many Persons of great Interest to his Faction.

MOREOVER there was a Conspiracy discovered, which had been hatched in Capua against Manfred, with a Design, as soon as the Pope's Army should reach the Kingdom, furiously to attack that Prince, and either to make him Prisoner, or put him to Death. The Marquis Bertoldus also proved very disloyal; for contrary to his Promise made to Manfred of sending him both Men and Money from Puglia, he not only did not perform what he had undertaken, but rambled about the Country, and minded nothing but oppressing the Subjects with heavy Taxes for his own Use; and his Germans by their Rapine had alienated the Minds of the People from the King, insomuch that they longed to be under the Dominion of the Pope; and though Manfred had sent his Uncle Galvano Lancia to inform the Marquis of the Difficulties he laboured under, it was to no Purpose.

MANFRED finding himself in so distressed a Condition, occasioned more by his secret than open Enemies, thought it was in vain to make Head against the Pope with Force, but chose rather to yield to the Times, and have recourse to Art and Dissimulation. The Pope, in order to give Life to the Expedition, was resolved to be present himself at the Conquest of the Kingdom, and had stopped in Anagni, where he was making great Preparations; and that he might leave no Stone unturn'd for facilitating his Undertaking, he sent several Messengers to induce Manfred to quit the Government of the Kingdom, and deliver it up into the Hands of the Church. Manfred very cunningly delayed giving an Answer; but now finding himself in these Straits, he thought fit to return the Pope a very submissive and respectful Answer, and bid the Messengers tell him, that trusting to the great Concern and Affection his Holiness had for the King his Nephew, and judging that by Right it belonged to the Church to protect and receive him into her Favour, he was willing to quit the Government of the Kingdom, and put it into the Hands of the Church, the holy Mother of all, especially of Pupils; whereby he meant to fulfill the Desire of Conrad, the Father of the young King, who in his last Will had earnestly desired that the Holy See would receive the innocent Youth into its Protection and Favour; that he would not only not oppose, but would give all Assistance to the Pope's entering into, and taking Possession of the Kingdom, but that it was to be done without Prejudice to the young King's and his own Right ¹.

THE Pope, upon receiving this Answer, was so transported with Joy, and so extolled Manfred, that though before he looked upon him as excommunicated and in no wise a Catholick, yet now he received him into his own and the Church's Favour, and forgave him all past Offences; and having encouraged Manfred to rely upon him, assuring him that his putting the Kingdom into the Hands of the Church, should not in the least prejudice the King's or his Right; and that when the King should be of Age, the Apostolick See would restore him to his own; he made ready with his Army to enter the Kingdom. In the mean time Manfred, for a greater Mark of his Fidelity, sent Galvano Lancia his Uncle to Agnani to do Homage for him to the Pope; and if that Bull recorded by Tutini be genuine, we see that Innocent, in order to make a suitable return on his Part, on the twenty seventh of September this Year 1254, in Agnani, confirmed to Manfred the Investiture, which by the Means of the same Galvanus he had given him, and likewise confirmed to him the Principality of Taranto (with which he had before invested O. Frangipane) the Counties of Gravina, Tricarico, and Monte S. Angelo, with all the Titles, Honours and Prerogatives which the Emperor Frederick his Father had given him, and which Conrad had taken from him. And Innocent, as a stronger Proof of his Friendship, seeing the Marquis Bertoldus was then in Possession of the County of Montescaglioso, in room of that gave him the County of Andria, and in a publick Consistory invested the said Galvano Lancia with it in Manfred's Name, by giving him a Ring as a Symbol of the Investiture, as we read in the Bull of Investiture, recorded by Tutini in his Book of the Constables of the Kingdom ².

ALTHOUGH Prince Manfred, by the Tenor of this Investiture and other Facts, perceived that Innocent was resolved to govern the Kingdom, not as a Guardian till Conrad was of Age, but looking upon it as devolved to the Apostolick See, to rule it with absolute and independent Authority, yet with admirable Dexterity Manfred put up with every thing; and in order to wheedle the Pope the more, he appeared to be still more humble and obsequious to him; and as a Mark of great Respect, when he heard that Innocent was on his March, he went as far as Ceppe-rano to meet him, where on his bended Knees he adored him, and then led his Horse by the Bridle till he passed the Bridge of Garigliano ³.

INNOCENT took these Demonstrations of Submission in so good part, that though he was old, and by Experience very prudent, yet he suffered himself to be imposed upon so far, that besides having imparted to Manfred his most secret Thoughts, believing him to be entirely devoted to the Apostolick See, he heaped greater Honours upon him; for he not only gave him the first Rank among the Barons, but he likewise made him Vicar of the Kingdom, from the Phare of Mes-sina to the River Sele, and of all the County of Molise, and the Territories of Benevento, excepting the Jurisdiction of Abruzzo, and allowed him a Pension of eight thousand Ouaces of Gold; and the Charter of this Grant is also recorded by Tutini ⁴. The News of the Pope's entering the Kingdom, and with the Consent and Permission of Manfred taking the Government thereof upon him, being spread over all the Realm, the People, wearied with the ill Treatment of the Germans, were all ready to receive him, reckoning thereby to be freed from their Slavery, and out of Danger of being interdicted by the Church ⁵. And this was the Reason which induced Manfred very cunningly to advise the Pope to divide his Army amongst the richest Provinces of the Kingdom; the result of which Advice was, that the German Officers, partly out of Fear of the Pope's Army, and partly conscious of the Ill-Will the People bore them departed the Kingdom, and returned to Germany outwitted by Manfred, leaving only a few in Puglia and Terra d'Otranto, who daily dwindled away for want of Subsistence. Thus Manfred being rid of the Germans, whom he suspected more than open Enemies, and by Degrees acquiring more Power in those Provinces over which the Pope had made him Vicar, sought now an Opportunity to drive out the Pope's Army, which being cantoned in many Places distant from one another, he might the more easily accomplish.

⁵ Costanzo lib. 1. Hist. di Nap.

IN the mean time the Pope had enter'd the Kingdom, and by Reason of a slight Indisposition had stopped in Teano, and from thence had gone to Capua, where he had been received with great Pomp and Solemnity ¹; and having stayed there some time, he was wholly intent upon uniting under the Apostolick See all the other Provinces of the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, as he had done those of Abruzzo, Terra di Lavoro, part of Puglia, and some others. He made the Cardinal of S. Eustathius, his Nephew, Apostolick Legate over the Kingdom, and gave him all his Authority and full Power to govern the same. This Cardinal, being young and Innocent's Kinsman ², began to rule with a high Hand, not as Governor but absolute Master, and obliged the Counts, Barons, and all others to take an Oath of Fealty to him, nullo jure Regis, & Principis salvo (according to the anonymous Writer) but absolutely to himself, as Legate of the Apostolick See, to which the Kingdom was devolv'd. For which Cause he likewise pretended, that Prince Manfred, as all the other Barons had done, ought to take the like Oath of Fidelity to him.

THEN it was that Manfred began to take off the Mask, and openly to thwart the Legate, by telling him, that the Stipulation made with the Pope was, that the Government of the Kingdom should be put into the Hands of the Church, without Prejudice to the King's and his own Right, and that there should no Alteration be made in the State the Kingdom was in till the King should be of Age; therefore he refused to take the Oath required, notwithstanding the Legate's importunate Demand. The anonymous Writer says, that by these Disputes Manfred lost much of the Affection which the other Barons of the Kingdom had formerly had for him; for they seeing that the Legate had no regard to his Royal Descent, but put him upon the same Level with the rest, they began likewise to neglect him.

FOR which Reason the Pope, in order to induce Borello di Anglone to desert the King's Interest, and espouse that of the Church, having given him the Investiture of the County of Lefina, he pretended, that by vertue of that Investiture that County belonged to him; but Manfred justly claimed that County as a part of his Inheritance, and that he ought not to be disturbed in the Possession of it; and first in a friendly manner gave him to understand that he ought to lay aside such Pretensions; but as for certain other Lands which he (Borello) held, he might enjoy them, provided he would take the Investiture of them from him, and acknowledge him as his Superior, by taking the Oath usual in such Cases, otherwise he must renounce them ³. Borello, puff'd up with the Pope's Favour, despised Manfred's Message, and answered him very saucily, that he would neither part with the County, nor acknowledge him as Superior of these Lands, nor take any Oath to him. Manfred, though ruffled at this Answer, yet unwilling to contend at so great a Disadvantage, put up the Injury; and being informed that Borello had sent a good Body of Troops to take Possession of the County of Lefina by Force, and that they had already made themselves Masters of two Villages of that County; he did not think fit to make use of Force, but had recourse to the Pope who was then at Teano, to whom he represented the Injuries done him by Borello, who, under Pretence of a Grant of that County from his Holiness pretended it was his; whereas, being dependent on the County of Monte S. Angelo, it was a part of his Patrimony; therefore he begged of the Pope to do him Justice, that thereby greater Inconveniences might be prevented.

THE Pope, according to the usual Ambiguity of that Court, like an Oracle answered him thus: Se prefato Borello nihil de juribus Principis concessisse ⁴. Manfred understood by this Answer that the Pope had a Mind to favour Borello; but he pressing to be restored to his Right, was told, that as soon as the Pope was arrived at Capua he would cause the Affair to be examined by due Course of Law.

IN the mean time there came an Account that the Marquis Bertoldus was on his Way from Puglia to Capua, to pay his Respects to the Pope; whereupon Manfred, in order to shun meeting him, took his Leave of the Pope; and as he was on his Way returning, some of his Retinue saw Borello at a Distance, who, with a great Number of armed Men, was lying in wait in a narrow Pass to attack the Prince. Manfred's Men understanding their Design fell upon them, and routed them, and in the Scuffle Borello was killed, without Manfred's Knowledge.

WHEN the Pope arrived at Capua, Manfred's Enemies misrepresented the Fact, and made him guilty of a Crime; and though he employed the Marquis Bertoldus to tell the Pope that he was unjustly blamed; yet he found that the Marquis, instead of defending him, was endeavouring to get him made Prisoner; therefore he sent his Uncle Galvano Lancia to Capua to represent his Innocence to the Pope; and in the mean time he retired for Shelter to Acerra to his Cousin the Count of that Name.

THE Pope pretended that Manfred ought to appear before him, and stand his Trial. Manfred did not refuse to come, provided he had Security given him for the Safety of his Person; but Galvano Lancia having smelt out that the Pope had a Mind to make him Prisoner, and would give him no Security for his Person, but that he must appear before his Legate, advised Manfred immediately to leave Acerra, where he was not safe, and retire to Puglia, and by the Means of the Saracens, who were his Friends, endeavour to get into Lucera, and there fortify himself¹. Manfred upon this Advice departed in the Night time, and carried with him Marino Capece and Conrado his Brother, two trusty young noble Neapolitans. These two were his faithful Companions, who never left him during all that dangerous and troublesome Journey.

MANFRED, after having gone through many Dangers and Difficulties, at last arrived at Lucera, and with the Assistance of his Saracens who were in the City having broke open the Gates, he entered triumphantly with the Acclamations of all the Inhabitants, who proclaimed him their Lord and Prince; and after he had told them the Reasons for his leaving the Pope, who was resolved to usurp the Kingdom from the King his Nephew, he declared that his Intention was, jura Regis Nepotis sui, & sua, & libertatem, bonumque statum Regni, & Civitatis ipsius viriliter manutenerere atque defendere, as the anonymous Author has it. Whereupon all of them took the Oath of Fealty and Homage, pro parte Regis, & suâ.

THE Marquis Bertoldus, Odo his Brother, and the Pope's Legate, hearing of the Surprize of Lucera, immediately joined, and fortified themselves in Troja in order to oppose him; but Manfred soon after having taken Foggia, and daily gathering Strength, his Army became very numerous, and after alternate Success, he at last defeated the Legate and the Pope's Army, took Troja, forced Odo and the Marquis Bertoldus to fly, and obtained a notable Victory. It was on this Occasion that Manfred wrote to the Barons of the Kingdom, his Adherents, that Letter which we read in *Summonte*², who had it from Pier Vincenti di Brindisi, in which this Victory is minutely described, and it is certainly genuine, for Rainaldus has recorded it as such in his Annals, and it agrees with the particular Account of that Victory which the anonymous Writer gives us.

Innocent relinquisheth the King of England, and invites the Brother of the King of France to come and conquer the Kingdom: He dies in Naples, and all his Designs come to nothing.

INNOCENT, with his Court, in the Month of June this Year 1253 had gone to Naples, where hearing of Manfred's Success in Puglia, he was afraid of being driven out of all the other Provinces of the Kingdom that had submitted to the Church; and seeing it was in vain to have recourse to England, he sent M. Alberto da Parma his Chaplain and Secretary to Charles of Anjou, Count of Provence, Brother to S. Lewis King of France, whose Valour and Prudence, when Innocent was in France, had been much extolled, to treat about his coming to take Possession of the Kingdom, and to offer him the Investiture of it. But King Lewis being at that time in the East employed in the Holy War, nothing could be concluded: Nevertheless Alberto remained in France the Space of fourteen Years, and managed this Affair under the succeeding Popes, in order to bring it to Perfection, which was at last accomplished in the Pontificate of *Urban IV.*¹

THERE are some who write that Innocent, hearing of the News of this Victory obtained by Manfred, was taken ill in Naples, and on the seventh, or as others will have it, on the thirteenth of December this Year 1254 died of Grief¹. This Pope lies buried in the Cathedral Church of Naples, where his Tomb is to be seen at this Day. A Pope who could brag that he was the first, who to the Pretensions which all the Roman Pontiffs have always kept up, added the actual Possession of this Kingdom. All the Attempts of the other Popes for conquering it, either proved unfortunate, or very soon abortive; but as for Innocent IV. he had real Possession of it for several Months, and transmitted it to his Successor Alexander IV. Innocent was excellently skilled in the Civil Law, and adorned our Jurisprudence with many Treatises and Volumes.

IN those Days the Academy of Bologna was the most flourishing in Italy, whither Innocent was sent in his Youth to learn the Laws, and his Masters for the Civil were Azone, Accursio, and Jacopo Baldino; and for the Canon Lorenzo Spagnuolo, Giovanni Teutonico, Jacopo d'Albasio and Uguccione, the best Doctors of that Age, whence he came to be one of the most learned Lawyers of his Time². And resolving to rival Innocent III. likewise a famous Lawyer in his Time, in the midst of the Cares of his troublesome Pontificate, while he remained in Lyons, he wrote the Apparatus on the five Books of the Decretals, which are of so great Use to the Canonists; and in which Work he laid greatest Stress on the Authority of Ezechiel Profeta. S. Antonino speaking of this Work says, that it is of greater Authority than all the Books of the other Doctors, whence he was called the Father, and Paramount both of divine and human Laws.

HE wrote the Constitutions which he made in the Council of Lyons, a part whereof are to be found in the sixth Book of the Decretals. He wrote a Book, which Ostiensis in his Collection calls an Original. He wrote another intitled Apologeticus, against Pietro delle Vigne, concerning the Jurisdiction of the Empire, and the Authority of the Pope; and he likewise wrote Commentaries on the Old and New Testament.

HE had a great Regard for Men of Learning and Virtue, and particularly for Alexander Hales an Englishman, who in his old Age took the Habit of the Friars Minors, and at Innocent's Desire wrote upon the chief Points of Divinity, and other great Works, whence he got the Name of Doctor Irrefragabilis. He encouraged Bernardo da Parma and Compostellano his Chaplains, to write upon the Decretals and other Works.

HE was a great Lover of religious Orders, and especially those of S. Benedict, S. Dominick, and S. Francis, which then were rising like young Plants. He reformed the Rule of the Carmelite Friars, the Care of which he committed to Cardinal Ugo. He ordained, that all Hermits living without Rule, and especially those in Tuscany, and likewise many Religious under the Rule of S. Austin should be united under a General, and called Eremitani. He revived in France and also in Italy the Order of the Cruciferi, which was almost extinct; so that he rebuilt some Monasteries in Italy for them, and particularly in Naples they afterwards got that of S. Maria della Vergini, without the Gate of S. Januarius, from the Families of Carmignana and Vespoli. He granted Power to the Knights of SS. Mauritius and Lazarus to chuse their Great Master out of their own Order; and allowed the Canons of the Archbishoprick of Naples to wear a white Mitre when the Archbishop performed Divine Service; and he gave the Clergy the Immunities, which to this Day they enjoy over all the Kingdom.

C H A P. IV.

Alexander IV.'s Expedition into the Kingdom, and new Invitations made by him to the Count of Provence and the King of England.

THE Pope's Legate, intimidated by the Victory obtained by Manfred, abandoned Puglia, and returned with the Army to Terra di Lavoro, directing his March towards Naples, and on the Way joined the Marquis Bertoldus, who accompanied him to Naples, where they found that Innocent had died some Days before ¹. When the Cardinals and all those of the Court saw the Legate and the Marquis, and heard that their Armies had been routed, they were seized with such a panick Fear, that they resolved to leave Naples, and retire to Compagna di Roma; but being encouraged by the Marquis not to go they remained there, and were all fully bent on electing a new Pope. There are not wanting Writers ² who say, that there was a great Debate among the Cardinals about this Election, and on that Account the See was vacant a whole Year. But the anonymous Writer, Collenuccio, Pansa, and others ³ say, that the Cardinals fearing that if they delayed the Election it might turn to their Disadvantage, immediately with one Consent joined and elected Rainaldo d' Agnari of the Family of Conti, Nephew of Gregory IX. who took the Name of Alexander IV. and was consecrated and crowned in the Cathedral Church of Naples, and, according to Ghioccarelli, he remained in that City a whole Year ⁴.

MEAN while Manfred, animated by the Death of Innocent, reduced to his Obedience almost all the other Cities of Puglia that had set up the Standard of the Church. He subdued Barletta, then Venosa, and at last Acerenza, where Gio. Moro was cruelly put to Death by the Saracens. He took Rapallo, then Bari, and Trani surrendered, and in short all Puglia, excepting some Cities of Terra d'Otranto, which still held out for the Church.

POPE Alexander IV. terrified at these Proceedings of the Prince in the beginning of his Pontificate, dispatched Tommaso Count of Cerra, Manfred's Kinsman, and Riccardo Filangerio to have an Interview with him: It was said, that they were likewise moved by some Cardinals to insinuate to him, that he ought to send Ambassadors to congratulate the new Pope upon his Advancement to the Chair, and that they wondered he should neglect to do what all the other Princes of the World had done ⁵. But Manfred was afraid that if he should send an Embassy to the new Pope, it might be interpreted as a Mark of Weakness and Want of Courage, therefore he answered them, that he would send Ambassadors for no other end, but to treat of a Peace on the following Conditions: Ut Regnum in dominio, & possessione Regis Conradi II. Nepotis sui, sub baliau Principis remaneret. Compositio autem super eo tractari esset, ut census pro ipso Regno Romanæ Ecclesiæ augetur.

WHEN the Pope, upon the return of the Count and Riccardo, understood that Manfred was neither disposed to send Ambassadors to him, nor to leave the Kingdom in the Hands of the Church, after the Example of his Predecessor, he began to shew himself more an Enemy than any other Pope had been. For first he caused

M. Alberto da Parma to set on Foot again the Treaty with Charles Count of Provence, in which there appeared such Difficulties, that Charles had no Inclination for the Enterprize; then he had recourse to Henry King of England, by renewing the Treaty with him which his Predecessor had begun, offering him the Investiture of the Kingdom for his Son Edmund, provided he would come immediately and drive out Manfred; and it is recorded in the Acta publica of that Kingdom, that Alexander was so eagerly bent upon this Design, that he changed the Vows which the Kings of England, Norway, and others had made to go to the Holy Land, and applied them to the Conquest of Sicily and the Kingdom of Puglia in favour of the Church.

HE likewise sent a Bishop into Puglia to summon Manfred: *Ut in festo Purificationis Beatæ Mariæ proximè futuro ad Curiam Romanam accederet, responsurus de interfectione Borelli de Anglone; & de injuria, quam Apostolicæ sedis intulerat expellendò legatum, & Exercitum Ecclesiæ de Apulia*¹. This Citation was answered by Manfred in a Letter directed to the Pope, wherein he cleared himself of the Death of Borello; and as for driving the Legate and the Church's Army out of Puglia, he said it was in Defence of his Nephew's and his own Right.

WHILE Manfred was firmly resolved not to send Ambassadors to the Pope, M. Giordano da Terracina Apostolick Notary, and formerly a Well-wisher of Manfred, came to him from the Pope, and appearing to be much concerned for those Disputes between them, advised the Prince by all Means to send Ambassadors to the Pope, which would turn both to his Honour and Advantage: At last Manfred, moved by Giordano's Advice, appointed Gervasio di Martina, and Goffredo di Cofonza his Secretaries to be his Ambassadors, and gave them Power to treat of a Peace².

THESE Ambassadors upon their Arrival at Naples, where the Pope then kept his Court, began to treat about Peace with some Cardinals deputed for that Purpose; but Difficulties and Doubts arising, which could not be surmounted but by treating with the Prince himself, the Ambassadors pressed the Pope to send a Cardinal to him, whereby the Articles might easily be concluded. But the Cardinals, puffed up with their Dignity and Grandeur, which had been lately so much exalted by Innocent, said, *Id non convenire sedis honori, ut Cardinales hoc modo mittantur*³. This Point being long debated, the Prince's Ambassadors could by no Means prevail with the Court to send a Cardinal to Manfred.

IN the mean time the Prince, seeing that the Treaty was suspended, resolved to lose no time in taking Possession again of his County of Andria, which of Right belonged to him, and therefore seiz'd Guardia Lombarda, which belonged to that County, and had been till now in the Pope's Possession. The Cardinals, upon the News of this, seemed to be much offended, and said, the Prince had a Mind to amuse them, and break off the Treaty. The Prince's Ambassadors answered, that Manfred by this Action had no Design to break off the Treaty, because he had only acted as Count of Andria and not as Regent, and that his re-possessing himself of that Country, which, as the anonymous Writer says, erat de speciali jure ipsius Principis, ought no wise to displease the Pope.

BUT though the Cardinals under this Pretence seemed to be offended, yet the true Cause of their Uneasiness was Manfred's approaching with his Army; for they were afraid he would at last come to Naples, which put them into such a Consternation, that the Pope with all his Court were resolved to take Shipping, and leave that City: Therefore they bid the Prince's Ambassadors acquaint him, that if he was in earnest to make Peace with the Church, he ought to march with his Army out of Guardia Lombarda, and return to Puglia.

THE Ambassadors, perceiving their Fear, promised to write to Manfred to persuade him to return to Puglia, which they did; but at the same time they gave him privately to understand that if he would march towards Naples, the Pope and his Army were in such a Fright he might easily defeat them, and be Master of Terra di Lavoro. Manfred upon this Intelligence, notwithstanding a great Storm of Snow, was resolved to march into Terra di Lavoro; but upon Advice which he received that very instant of time, that the People of Brindisi had risen up in Arms, and had surprized Nardo, and made a great Slaughter among the Citizens and Soldiers commanded by Manfred Lancia, whom the Prince his Cousin had made Governor of

Terra d'Otranto, he altered his Resolution and marched towards Brindisi, which made the Pope easy.

THE Cardinals, since he was now at a Distance, and engaged in this new Expedition in Terra d'Otranto, became indifferent about the Peace, so that Manfred's Ambassadors could conclude nothing; on the contrary the Pope appointed Ottaviano Cardinal Deacon of S. Maria in via Lata, Apostolick Legate over the Kingdom, who was no sooner made than he began to assemble a sufficient Army to oppose Manfred, of which the Ambassadors being apprized, they immediately left Naples, and went to join the Prince, who was now on his March to Brindisi, and told him what the Pope, by the Means of his new Legate, had resolved to do, and that the Treaty was dropt.

MANFRED was not at all daunted but pursued his Purpose, and laid Siege to Brindisi, the Seat of the Rebellion, with which many other Cities of Terra d'Otranto, such as Oria, Otranto, Lecce and Mesagna had joined; he laid waste the Country about Mesagna, and demolished the City, subdued Lecce, and laid Siege to Oria.

WHILE the Prince was wholly intent upon quelling these Revolts, he was diverted by new Revolutions in Calabria and Sicily.

AT this time Pietro Ruffo di Calabria Count of Catanzaro had the sole Government of these Countries. This Count, in the time of the Emperor Frederick, had been brought to Court in a very poor Condition¹, and by Degrees crept into Favour and was made a Privy Counsellor, and at last Marshal of the Kingdom of Sicily. Upon Frederick's Death Manfred made him Henry's Guardian, and Governor of Calabria and Sicily. Conrad afterwards created him Count of Catanzaro, and confirmed him in the Government of these Provinces; but Conrad dying he became uneasy under Manfred's Regency, and was suspected to be in Confederacy with Innocent IV. and an Enemy to the young King Conrad; he had always an Aversion for Manfred, and now more than ever, when he saw him so powerful in Puglia, insomuch that by the Means of Giordano Ruffo he not only made Calabria, but also Sicily to revolt. He had now fortified himself with a great Number of Followers in Cosenza, and kept the Province of Val di Crati, and Terra Jordana so much at his Devotion, that the Name of Manfred was both despised and hated; and a secret Treaty between him and Pope Alexander was discovered for delivering up Calabria into the Hands of the Church, and Messengers were going and coming for completing the Treaty².

MANFRED being advised of this Conspiracy by some Cosentines and Gervasio di Martina, immediately sent Troops to Calabria, and gave the Command of them to Conrad Truich, to whom and the said Gervasio he committed the Charge of that Province. These gallant Warriors, after alternate Fortune at large describ'd by the anonymous Writer, at last reduced these Provinces under King Conrad's Obedience; and after Manfred's Army had subjected almost all Calabria, Messina was taken by Storm, and Reggio quickly reduced; the Prince at the same time his Army was making War in Calabria and Sicily, carried on the Siege of Oria, and reduced the Cities of Terra d'Otranto to his Obedience.

BUT while Manfred was intent on the Siege of Oria, and had his Forces divided into different Parts of Calabria and Sicily, Ottaviano the Apostolick Legate had assembled a great Army in order to invade Puglia; and the Number of Troops was such, that Manfred was obliged to raise the Siege, and march to Melfis to ward off the impending Danger. However he assembled his Germans and Saracens the best Way he could; and though his Army came far short of that of the Legate, nevertheless by the Bravery of his Soldiers, with wonderful Intrepidity he met him and offered him Battel. But the Legate shunned an Engagement, and contented himself with fronting Manfred's Army.

MEAN while another Army was assembled for the Expedition into Calabria under the Conduct of the Arch-Priest of Padua, whom the Legate had made his Vicar; for Pietro Ruffo being driven out of Messina and Calabria, had put the Legate upon that Expedition. Besides Bartolomeo Pignatelli, whom the Pope had made Archbishop of Cosenza, being a mortal Enemy to Manfred, pushed on that Expedition, and the Pope looked upon him as a fit Instrument to carry it on in Conjunction with Pietro Ruffo. To them was added Odo Marquis of Honebruch, to whom Alexander, for an Allurement, had given the Investiture of the County of Catanzaro, which Manfred had taken from Pietro Ruffo ¹.

WHILE these were on their March to Calabria, the Archpriest was ordered back by the Legate, in order to reinforce the Army that was facing Manfred; and the Archbishop of Cosenza and Pietro Ruffo marched to Cosenza, who, upon their Arrival there, spread a great many false Stories, in order to draw in these People, and at last required them to surrender to the Pope. But Gervasio di Martina, who had the Charge of that Country, opposed them stoutly; and observing that thro' want of the Troops that had returned with the Archpriest, the Archbishop's Army was greatly diminished; and in order to recruit it, by a Power he had received from the Pope, the Archbishop began by way of Crusade to enlist all the Calabrians he could in that Neighbourhood; and after he had published this Crusade against Manfred, with a Remission of all Sins, and a plenary Indulgence, as if they had taken the Cross for driving the Infidels out of the Holy Land, and from the Sepulchre of Christ, the Calabrians left the Spade, the Plough and the Oar, and flocked to him from all Parts to be marked with the Cross ²: By which Means two thousand Calabrians entered into this Crusade, and joined the Archbishop's Army: and though they were but ill provided both with Horse and Arms, yet they were as intrepid as if they had been going to suffer Martyrdom for the Faith, insomuch that they pressed the Archbishop at all Hazards to fight the Enemy. However Gervasio di Martina despising their Numbers, after various Turns of Fortune, minutely related by the anonymous Writer, at last routed and dispersed them all, and forced the Archbishop and Pietro Ruffo to fly to Lipari for Shelter, and they afterwards returned to the Pope in Terra di Lavoro. By this Victory the Calabrians were humbled, and all Things being set to rights again, they returned to their former Allegiance.

IN the mean time Manfred was encamped with his Army in Puglia near Guardia Lombarda, fronting that of the Legate, who by no Means would venture an Engagement, but both Armies watched the Motions of each other.

WHILE the two Armies were in this Situation, there arrived a Marshal of the Duke of Bavaria's, Uncle to the young King, sent by Queen Elizabeth the King's Mother and the Duke himself to treat with Manfred and the Court of Rome concerning the King's Affairs ³.

AS soon as the Legate and the Marquis Bertoldus heard of the Arrival of the Marshal, and the Occasion of his Message, they sent to Manfred to desire a Truce and Suspension of Arms, in order to treat of a Peace between Pope Alexander and King Manfred by Means of the Marshal. Manfred consented; and many of the Nobility and Barons of both Sides swore to the Truce as long as the Treaty should last, and five Days after, in case nothing should be agreed upon: The Legate answering nothing as to the five Days after the Treaty, it was suspected, that he had a Mind to play some Trick, as the Event shewed; for Manfred, after the Truce had been agreed to by both Parties, having removed with his Army from the Place of Encampment, and marching along the Sea Coast of Bari, the Legate, contrary to the Terms of the Truce, entered with his Army into Capitanata, surprized Foggia, and put all the Cities of that Province into a Consternation; and the City of S. Angelo situate upon the Top of Monte Gargano, upon the Arrival of the Pope's Army in Foggia, revolted from the Prince. Manfred, who was then at Trani, amaz'd at the Legate's Treachery ⁴, could not at first believe the Surprizal of Foggia; but being afterwards assured of the Villany, full of Resentment, he immediately marched with his Army to Barletta, and after he had made himself sure of the Fidelity of that City he returned to Lucera; from thence he marched to Gargano, took that rebellious City by Storm, and reduced it to his Obedience; and after he had refreshed his Army he marched directly to Foggia, and besieged that of the Pope which had retired into that City. In the mean time the Marquis Bertoldus came with his Troops to the Legate's Assistance; but Manfred prevented him, and after a notable Defeat put him to flight, and took all his Baggage.

THE Legate shut himself up with his Army in Foggia, and Manfred laid close Siege to it, which occasioned so great a Scarcity of Provisions, that a Horse was exchanged for a Hen; and to complete the Misery of that Army it was seized with a Sickness, of which many died, and the Legate himself was likewise taken ill ¹.

THE Legate finding himself in this Distress, and knowing it was in vain to strive against the Frowns of Fortune and the Valour of the Prince, to prevent the Ruin of his Army by this close Siege, sent Messengers to beg Peace of Manfred: The Prince complied with his Desire, and after divers Conferences the Peace was concluded on these Conditions ²,

THAT the Prince should possess the Kingdom for himself and King Conrad his Nephew, except Terra di Lavoro, which Province was to be yielded to the Church; that if Pope Alexander would not accept of this Agreement and Transaction, it should be lawful for the Prince to recover that Province which belonged to the Kingdom.

AS soon as this Peace was concluded, the Legate earnestly begged of Manfred, that after the Example of our blessed Redeemer he would pardon those Gentlemen, who in the time of the Emperor Frederick had been banished the Kingdom, and who were now along with him. Although this was not included in the Articles of Peace, yet Manfred was so merciful as to pardon them all; and not only restored them to his Favour, but also gave them back all the Lands, which by their Rebellion they had justly forfeited, provided that by their future Behaviour and Loyalty they would efface their past Offences.

NEITHER did he except out of this Act of Grace the Marquis Bertoldus and his Brothers, but with an ample Pardon received them into Favour again, and allowed them to possess their Estates, which by their Crimes they had deservedly forfeited for ever.

THIS Peace being thus settled, the Legate with the Pope's Army left Foggia, and marched to Terra di Lavoro, and Manfred having raised the Siege went a hunting in the neighbouring Plains; and during this Tranquillity he sent Ambassadors to the Pope to get him to ratify the Articles of Peace agreed upon with the Legate; otherwise in pursuance thereof he would endeavour to be Master of Terra di Lavoro.

SHORT liv'd was this Peace; for the Ambassadors, upon their Arrival at Naples, found at the Pope's Court Count Guasferbuch, who discovered to them a Conspiracy, which the Marquis Bertoldus, his Brothers, and some Noblemen of the Kingdom, by a Correspondence with that Court, were hatching against Manfred's Person, whereof it was necessary to advise him that he might be upon his Guard. The Count likewise told them, that the Pope had not the least Inclination to ratify the Peace made with the Legate, whereupon they immediately sent Advice of both these Matters to Manfred.

THE Prince surprized at this Account, after he had caused the Conspiracy to be narrowly examined into, found, that what his Ambassadors had wrote to him was true; therefore he ordered the Marquis and his Brothers to be put in Prison. And after his Ambassadors had returned from the Pope's Court without concluding any thing, by Reason of Alexander's refusing to accept of the Peace, in order to guard against the Mischief that was intended, he summoned a Parliament of all the Counts and Barons of the Kingdom to be held in Barletta on Candlemas-day the Year following 1256. And in the mean time that nothing might be wanting on his part, and that the Pope might have no Excuse, he sent new Ambassadors to him to demand a Ratification of the Peace; but Alexander positively refusing it, dismissed the Ambassadors.

THE appointed Time for holding the Parliament being now come, all the Counts and Barons of the Kingdom met in Barletta, where divers and weighty Affairs were resolved upon.

Pietro di Calabria, on Account of his Disloyalty, was deprived both of the Honour of Count of Catanzaro, and of the Office of Marshal of the Kingdom of Sicily.

Gualvano Lanciz, the Prince's Uncle, was created Count of the Principality of Salerno, and had likewise the Office of Great Marshal of the Kingdom of Sicily conferred upon him.

GUALVANO's Brother, another Uncle of Manfred's, was created Count of Squillace; and Errico di Spernaria got the County of Marfico ¹.

IN this Parliament was likewise tried and discussed the Case of the Marquis Bertoldus and his Brothers, who were found guilty of the Conspiracy hatched against the Prince, and with the unanimous Voice of the Counts and Barons of the Kingdom were sentenced to die. But Manfred out of his Clemency commuted the Punishment to perpetual Imprisonment, where they miserably ended their Days.

AS soon as Manfred had put an end to this Parliament, wherein the Polity and Quiet of the Kingdom were taken care of, he was wholly intent upon the Expedition to Terra di Lavoro, and rooting out of Calabria, and more especially out of Sicily, the Faction of the Pope, who still kept in that Island Rufino, of the Order of Friars Minors, as Legate of the Apostolick See, who had seduced many of the Sicilians from their Allegiance to the King, and engaged them to acknowledge him as Lord of the Island in the Name of the Church of Rome. In order to remedy these Mischiefs, Manfred made Federico Lancia, his Uncle, his Lieutenant of Calabria and Sicily, who by his admirable Conduct and Bravery restored Peace and Tranquillity among the wavering Cities of Calabria, and made them obedient to the King; and he so animated the Royal Army that was in Palermo, that the Legate Rufino, with all his Followers, were made Prisoners, and Palermo and all the Neighbourhood returned to their Allegiance; and afterwards having marched to Messina he likewise reduced that City.

IN the mean time Prince Manfred, having declared War against the Pope who had left the Kingdom, and with his Court had first gone to Anagni, and afterwards to Viterbo, prepared himself for the Expedition to Terra di Lavoro, in order to recover that Province. He displayed his Standards, and with a powerful Army marched directly towards Naples. It was truly very surprizing, as Costanzo observes ², that the City of Naples, which a few Years before had stubbornly shut their Gates upon him, and renounced their Allegiance to Conrad, should now send Messengers to Manfred when at a great Distance, and spontaneously offer to surrender to him ³. The Reason of this Procedure was thought to be the low Ebb to which the Pope's Power was reduced, and that it was fresh in their Memory, how by trusting to Assistance from Pope Innocent IV. they had been pillaged and ruined. Neither is it to be doubted but that Manfred himself had a Hand in it, for he had sent to insinuate to many Gentlemen of his Acquaintance, that gallant Men had more Reason to expect Encouragement under his Government, than under that of a parcel of Priests; many Instances of which they might see in Puglia, Calabria and other Provinces, where he had raised many to the Order of Knighthood, and other Dignities and Prerogatives. In a Word, the Neapolitans received Manfred into their City with great Pomp and Acclamations; and he, to be as good as his Word, behaved quite otherwise than Conrad had done; for at his own Charges he repaired all the publick Edifices, pardoned all those who in Conrad's and his own Time had appeared Enemies to the House of Suevia, and, according to their Ages and Qualities, honoured many of the Nobility by making them Countellors, or giving them Posts about his own Person ⁴.

THE kind Usage which Naples received at Manfred's Hands induced the Capuans likewise to surrender their City, and all the other neighbouring Cities did the same, excepting Aversa, where the Pope's Faction made some Resistance, but at last it was forced to yield to Manfred, and in short all the Province of Terra di Lavoro submitted to him. Having thus reduced this Province he marched to Capitanata, and then to Brindisi, in order to quell the Sedition which the Archbishop of that City had fomented, which he soon accomplished, and imprisoned the Archbishop. Ariano and Aquila, that were the last and most obstinate in their Rebellion, were burnt and destroyed.

THIS Prince having thus subjected the whole Kingdom of Puglia to his Dominion, was resolved to go over to Sicily, whereby he might more firmly establish the King's Authority in that Island, and entirely extirpate the Pope's Faction. He took shipping, passed the Streights, and arrived at Messina, where he remained a few Days, and from thence went to Palermo, the Royal Seat of the ancient Kings of Sicily.

IN the mean time Pope Alexander, not able to make Head against Manfred, this Year 1257, renewed his Intrigues in England, in order to bring that King to accept of the Investiture of the Kingdom for his Son Edmund; and Matthew Paris says, that Henry did accept of it; but because he had not Forces sufficient for the Undertaking, it behoved him to ask powerful Assistance from his Subjects; whereupon he called a Parliament, wherein his Son Edmund appeared in a Neapolitan Dress, that thereby they might be the more readily induced to grant him Assistance, and that the Kingdom which was offered might not be lost through their Fault¹; but the English came to no Resolution, and, as shall be related in the Year 1259, the Treaty was entirely laid aside; and on a false Report that the young King Conrad was dead, Manfred caused himself to be crowned in Palermo, and fixed himself on the Throne of Sicily; as we shall have Occasion to mention in the following Book of this History.

CIVIL HISTORY

B O O K XIX.

WHILE Manfred was in Palermo, News was brought him that the young King Conrad was dead in Germany; but Historians, according to the Faction they are of, differ in this Point of History. The Guelfs, such as Giovanni Villani a Florentine, and other Italian Writers of that Faction say, that Manfred having for a long time had a Design to usurp the Kingdom from the King his Nephew, had in vain endeavoured to get him to be poisoned, but now had employed some false Messengers to bring him News from Germany, first of Conrad's Sickness, and then of his Death, which Report he artfully caused to be spread in Palermo, and all the other Cities of the Kingdom; and in order to give it the greater Air of Truth, with much Dissimulation and Grief, he sent this Advice to the Barons and Syndicks of both Kingdoms, publishing Conrad's Death as a certain Truth; and having caused the Funeral Obsequies to be performed in Palermo with great Pomp and Demonstration of Grief for the pretended Death of this Prince, in Presence of all the Counts, Barons and Prelates there conven'd, he made a very moving Speech, wherein, after he had enumerated all the Favours which the Norman Princes and the Emperors of the House of Suevia his Ancestors had done to both the Kingdoms, and the Services done by himself in the Reign of Conrad, and the Minority of his Son Conrad, he begged of them all, that since in so short a Space of Time Death had robbed them of so great an Emperor as Frederick his Father had been, and of his so numerous Offspring, not to defraud him of that Succession, which the Will of God and that of his Father in his Testament had marked out for him, he being the only surviving Prince of all the Blood Royal. And then he added, that they had little to expect and as little to fear from the Roman Pontiffs, because their Government was but short and changeable, for the Death of a Pope broke all his Measures, and left his Successor to begin anew. So that the Writers of the Guelf Faction will have it, that these Things being told with so good a Grace and admirable Art, were of such Force and so effectual, that he was immediately proclaimed their King and Lord.

ON the other hand the anonymous Writer, though Cotemporary but a rigid Ghibelline, and those who follow him say, that Manfred made use of no such Deceit and Cunning; but that as soon as this Report of Conrad's Death was spread over our Kingdom, almost all the Counts, Barons and Prelates immediately set out for Sicily to wait upon Manfred; and that all the Cities of both Kingdoms sent their Syndicks and Messengers to Palermo, where being all assembled in one Body, with unanimous Consent they requested him, that since he had hitherto with so much Prudence governed the Kingdom for Conrad his Nephew now dead, he would as lawful Heir take upon him the Government, and cause himself to be crown'd King of Sicily; then all the Counts, Barons and Prelates of the Kingdom being assembled together proclaimed him King, and with the usual Ceremonies on the eleventh Day of August 1258, crowned him in the Cathedral Church of *Palermo*¹.

LET it be so, that Manfred brought all this about by Art, which is very probable, considering the Ambition he had to reign, or whether it was Chance, or the Will of the Subjects, he was with great Solemnity, according to antient Custom, with the Consent of all the Counts, Barons and other Grandees of the Kingdom, and of a great many Prelates, crowned King, and Rainaldo Archbishop of Agrigento, assisted by the Archbishop of Sorrento, and the Abbot of Cassino said the Mass; and he being afterwards seated on the Throne, the Archbishops of Salerno, Taranto and Monreale put the Royal Crown upon his Head. Some have dreamed that Manfred likewise caused himself to be crowned King of Puglia in Bari with the Iron Crown, as had been said of Henry and Constantia; but though Beatillo in the Life of S. Nicholas of Bari, from the Authority of some modern Writers, endeavours to prove it, 'tis altogether a Romance, there being neither antient nor cotemporary Authors for Vouchers.

MANFRED had no sooner mounted the Throne, than in order to gain the Hearts of the People, and get the Name of a gracious and generous Prince, he made very rich Presents, conferred Offices, and advanced many to the Honour of Knighthood. After the Ceremony of the Coronation was over he left Palermo, and to keep the Germans in Awe, took some Saracens with him to Puglia; but finding all the Provinces in perfect Peace and Tranquillity, and pleased with his new Government, he held a Parliament in Barietta, where he honoured many with the Order of Knighthood, and invested others with different Bounties, by delivering to them the Standard as a Symbol of Investiture. After this he called another Parliament in Foggia, where he conferred the Order of Knighthood on many others, and liberally bestowed other Honours, Offices and Dignities, and with magnificent Feasts, Games and Illuminations kept the People all merry and full of Joy.

POPE Alexander was grievously vexed at Manfred's prosperous Fortune, and the small Account he made of him; and being sensible that the Forces of the Church were not sufficient to check him, had already the preceding Year 1257 resumed the Treaty with Henry King of England, by inviting Edmund his Son to come and conquer the Kingdom; and, as we have said, had sent his Legates into England to invest King Henry with the Kingdom in Name of his Son Edmund, who was then under Age. And Henry in the Name of his Son took the Oath of Fealty to the Legates; and the Conditions and Tribute which was to be paid to the Apostolick See were settled, and he had promised to come with a powerful Army to drive Manfred out of the Kingdom. But that Prince, either upon second Thoughts did not think fit to involve himself in a new War, or that the Tribute agreed upon was truly too heavy and exorbitant, delayed the Expedition, and being pressed by Alexander, he answered him, that first of all the Tribute ought to be moderated². The Pope impatient of Delay had resolved to send into England Ariotto Subdeacon of the Apostolick See, and his Chaplain to treat about moderating the Tribute; but he altered his Resolution, because at that very time King Henry sent the Archbishop of Monstiers, the Bishops of Bath and Wells and Rocheſter, and Mr. Nicholas French his Royal Chaplain Ambaſſadors to treat about the ſame Affair; but theſe having been at a great deal of Pains to no purpoſe, on Account of new Troubles ariſen in England, at laſt, the following Year 1259, the Treaty was quite broken off; neither did Alexander ever after make any farther Application to Henry, but both he and his Succeſſor Urban had recourſe to France.

WHILE theſe Things were tranſacting, Manfred had driven the Pope's Forces out of Puglia, Terra di Lavoro and Sicily; he had taken and puniſhed the Rebels, and had been, as we have ſaid, crowned King in Palermo. The Pope therefore, more enraged than ever, and reſolving to be revenged, ſince the ſecular Arm availed nothing, was determined to have recourſe to the ſpiritual, by Excommunications and Interdictions.

FIRST he prefixed a certain time for King Manfred's appearing before him, to give him Satisfaction for all the Injuries done againſt the Apoſtolick See, otherwiſe he would depoſe, excommunicate and ſtrip him of all his Honours; but Manfred not appearing, and undervaluing all his Threats, he excommunicated him and declared him a Rebel, an Enemy to the Church of Rome, and a ſacrilegious Uſurper and Robber of her Rights, and a Confederate of the Saracens, whoſe Head he had declared himſelf to be. He deprived him of the Principality of Taranto, and of all the Fiefs, Rights, Honours and Prerogatives. He pronounced him guilty of moſt execrable Crimes, of having taken and put Friar Ruffino his Chaplain, and Legate in Sicily and Calabria, into a dark Priſon; of having laid his ſacrilegious Hands upon the Goods of the Churches of the Kingdom of Sicily; of having taken and kept chained in cloſe Priſon the Archbishop of Brindifi, and robbed him of all his Goods; and of having by an outrageous Attempt aſpired to the Throne of Sicily, and poſſeſſed himſelf of that Kingdom devolved to the Apoſtolick See, and made himſelf to be crowned King without his Permiſſion and Conſent. Therefore with the Advice and Suffrages of his Cardinals he declared Manfred excommunicated, his Coronation, Unction, and all that had followed thereupon void and of no effect.

HE interdicted all the Cities, Places and Caſtles that ſhould receive Manfred, or acknowledge him for King. He prohibited all the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, or any other Eccleſiaſtical Perſon whatſoever to celebrate the Divine Offices if Manfred was preſent, or to receive from him any Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, or any Power of Adminiſtration of Churches or Monaſteries; and he ordered, that thoſe who had received them from him ſhould by all Means within two Months reſign them.

BESIDES, the Pope when he was in Naples had ſtrictly forbidden all Prelates and other Eccleſiaſtical Perſons to go near Manfred, or to ſend or receive Meſſages from him, or give him Aſſiſtance or Advice; notwithſtanding that Prohibition, almoſt all the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots and other Prelates of the Kingdom of Sicily had gone to Palermo, and been preſent at his Coronation; therefore he gave a general Summons to all thoſe who had been preſent, and to ſome in particular, to appear perſonally before him between that and a certain time; but none appearing or regarding his Citation, he therefore excommunicated Rainaldo Biſhop of Agrigento, and depoſed him from the Epiſcopal Dignity, for having, with his ſacrilegious Hands, anointed Manfred King, and on the Day of the Coronation ſolemnly celebrated Maſs. He likewiſe excommunicated and depoſed the Archbishop of Sorrento, as alſo the Abbot of Caffino, for having aſſiſted at the Unction and Coronation, ordering the Chapters of the Churches of Agrigento and Sorrento, and the Convent of the Monaſtery of Caffino, and all the Vaſſals of the ſaid Churches and Monaſtery not to obey them, or own them as ſuch, or pay them any Rents or Profits. He cited the Archbishops of Salerno, Taranto and Monreale, who had put the Royal Crown upon Manfred's unworthy Head, and had ſeated him upon the Throne of Sicily, to appear perſonally before him on the next Feaſt of the Octave of SS. Peter and Paul. The Writ of theſe terrible Cenfures, which Alexander fulminated againſt Manfred and his Adherents, is recorded by Tubini in his Treatiſe of the Countables of the Kingdom¹.

BUT theſe Thunderbolts were not at all minded, but looked upon as void, and thrown without any juſt Cauſe; ſo that neither Manfred, or the Cities, Prelates or People took any Notice of them; on the contrary he enjoyed the Fruits of his Labour and Toil, and often diverted himself with Games and Hunting, and gave strict Orders for performing the Divine Offices in all the Churches of the Kingdom as formerly, which all the Prelates and other Ecclesiastical Persons willingly obeyed. Manfred being now powerful and triumphant, carried his Arms beyond the Confines of the Kingdom, and his Name was become famous in other Parts of Italy, insomuch that the Ghibelline Faction began to outstrip the Guelfs; and in Lombardy and Florence they had made notable Progress.

ALTHOUGH this Prince was Master of two opulent Kingdoms, yet he was sensible they were not able to maintain so great an Army as was necessary to be kept on foot, in order to defend himself against such Enemies as the Roman Pontiffs; therefore he resolved to send part of his Army to Tuscany, and part of it to Lombardy to assist the Ghibellins; whereby he not only saved Charges, but gave the Pope a Diversion, by obliging him to send his Army to protect the Guelfs, S. Peter's Patrimony, Romagna and Marca ¹. And in the mean time Manfred lived at Ease and in great Splendor, diverting himself in the maritime Cities of Puglia, and particularly in Barletta: And while he was in this City there came to him Ambassadors from Queen Elizabeth, according to the anonymous Writer, or (according to the Opinion of Summontes, who took it from a Charter) Margaret King Conrad's Mother, and the Duke of Bavaria, who declared their Embassy to Manfred, and told him that King Conrad was still alive, and that he ought to punish those who had reported that he was dead; so that in the Name of the Queen and the Duke they entreated him to relinquish the Kingdom, which of Right belonged to Conrad. Manfred received the Ambassadors with great Honour and Respect, and like a cunning and prudent Man, having foreseen the Embassy, he readily answered them, that it was notorious and manifest to all the World that the Kingdom was lost as to Conrad, and that he with the Sweat of his Brow, and much Fatigue and Labour, had by mere Force recovered it from the Hands of two Popes; that Conrad being very young would soon lose it again; and the Popes, who were bitter Enemies of the House of Suevia, would easily recover it from him; besides that the People, who abhorred the Germans, whose Support Conrad must depend upon, would never bear to be domineered over by that Nation; that now the People being used to his Government, and gentle Italian Customs, by giving them a new Prince, would be afraid of new Revolutions; and since it was obvious that it was not out of Ambition to reign, but for the young King's Advantage that he did not part with the Kingdom, he would keep it for him and govern it as long as he lived, and then leave it to him; that the Queen would act very prudently in sending her Son to be brought up by him, that he might learn the Italian Customs, and that he would take care of him, not as his Nephew, but as his own Son ². The Ambassadors having received this Answer, and taken Leave of Manfred, departed, loaded with Presents; he sent ten fine Horses to the Duke of Bavaria, and many Jewels to young Conrad.

THE Queen's and the Duke's Ambassadors returning with these Answers, that unfortunate Prince's found that it would be a very difficult Matter to recover the Kingdom out of the Hands of Manfred, and therefore was forced to put up with the Injury for the present, and wait for a more favourable Opportunity to get her Son restored to the Throne of Sicily.

MANFRED was now better fixed on the Throne than ever; for he had not only humbled the Pope and the Guelfs, but had made himself formidable to all Italy; and the Fame of his Courage, Munificence, and all the other truly Royal Virtues that adorned his Person were every where known, which had made him to be beloved and esteemed by almost all the Princes of Europe, amongst whom he made a very shining Figure; and it happened at this time, that Baldwin Emperor of Constantinople came to Bari, and Manfred being at Barletta went and received him very honourably, and in a most magnificent manner entertained him with Feasts and Tournaments, and sparing no Cost, he treated him with Royal Fare, and continual Tiltings, to which the chief Nobility of both Kingdoms were invited.

THE Fame of Manfred's noble Endowments made James King of Aragon desirous to enter into Alliance with him, by marrying his eldest Son Peter to Constance Manfred's Daughter, whom he had by Beatrice, the Daughter of Amadeus Count of Savoy, his first Wife, whom he had married in the Life-time of the Emperor his Father ¹; and the Marquis of Monferrat married another of his Daughters.

THESE Alliances much displeased Pope Alexander, and to prevent that with the King of Aragon, he ordered Raimonda di Pennaforte a Dominican Friar, and famous for his Collection of the Decretals, to use his utmost Endeavours with that King, whose Confessor he was, to dissuade him from it; but all Friar Raimondo's Efforts and Insinuations were in vain; whereupon Alexander being out of all Hopes, from that time forward never attempted to disturb Manfred any more; so that he governed and restored the Affairs of the Kingdom with all Tranquillity and Prosperity as long as this Pope lived; and being born to great Things, he was resolved to leave among us a lasting and perpetual Monument of his Name, by founding at the Foot of Monte Gargano on the Sea-shore a magnificent City, which altogether abolished the antient Sipontum, and from his Name to this Day it retains that of Manfredonia, although Charles of Anjou, after he had possessed himself of the Kingdom, and the Roman Pontiffs out of Hatred to the Name of Manfred, did all they could to sink the Name of Manfredonia, and have it called New Siponto.

POPE Alexander not able longer to bear the continual Vexations of Mind, which the Prosperity of Manfred and the Ghibellins gave him, at last overcome with Grief, while he kept his Court at Viterbo, was taken ill, and in a short time ended his Days this Year 1260, according to the anonymous Writer, though Sigonius, Inveges and others have unanimously recorded his Death to have been in the following Year 1261.

THE Cardinals had great wrangling about chusing a Successor, and at last not able to agree amongst themselves, after three Months Dispute, they elected one that was not of their College. This was James Patriarch of Jerusalem, who was then at Viterbo about some Concerns of his Church ². He was a Native of France, a Man of great Parts, and a most zealous Promoter of the Pretensions of the Court of Rome, and consequently a bitter Enemy to Manfred and his Ghibellins. He was called Urban IV. a mischievous and fatal Name to the House of Suevia.

CHAP. I.

Urban IV.'s Expedition against Manfred; and his Invitation to Lewis King of France to come and conquer the Kingdom for one of his younger Sons.

KING Manfred, upon the News of Urban's Election, was very much alarmed, and began to be afraid that he would have recourse to the Power of France for disturbing the Peace of the Kingdom. Nor was his Jealousy ill grounded, for the new Pope had no sooner mounted the Chair, than he formed Schemes to induce James King of Aragon to break off the Marriage already concluded between his Son Don Peter and Constantia Manfred's Daughter ¹; and to shew that he had more Courage than his Predecessor, he resolved to begin anew with Manfred's Trial; and accordingly on the Feast of Corpus Christi he solemnly, in Presence of a prodigious Multitude of People, sent him a dreadful Citation ², and to make it the more publick, he caused it to be affixed to the Doors of the Churches, whereby he summoned Manfred to appear before him, to purge himself of many great and heinous Crimes, and to receive such Punishment as in Justice he should think fit to inflict upon him.

THE Crimes expressed in this Citation, as they are recorded by *Tutini*¹, and for which the Pope would have Satisfaction; were, that Manfred had caused the City of Ariano to be demolished and ruined by the Saracens: That he had most inhumanly caused Tommaso d'Oria and Tommaso Salice to be put to Death: That he had cruelly and treacherously caused Pietro Ruffo di Calabria Count of Catanzaro to be murdered, and had made a terrible Slaughter among the Adherents of the Church of Rome: That in Contempt of the Apostolick Authority and Ecclesiastical Censures he caused the Divine Offices to be performed in his Presence in Places under Interdiction, which was a Sign of a stubborn Heretick, and for which he had been cited by Alexander his Predecessor, and not appearing, had been by him excommunicated: That to the Reproach of the Catholick Faith, he preferred the Saracens to Christians, and made use of their Rites, and conversed familiarly with them: That by the heavy Taxes and Impositions which he laid upon the People of Sicily, he had reduced that Kingdom to a State of Infamy and Slavery: That he had imbrued his Hands in the Blood of his Relations, and had treacherously caused Cerrado Busario the Ambassador and Vassal of King Conrad to be murdered, besides many other execrable Villanies, for all which he was publicly declared infamous.

ALTHOUGH Manfred was not personally cited, but only by this Edict, yet upon hearing of the Citation he did not fail to send Ambassadors in order to vindicate himself in the Matters laid to his Charge; but they were quickly sent back without concluding any thing; however, the time affixed for Appearance drawing near, Manfred sent other Ambassadors, viz. the Judge Aitardo da Venosa, and Giovanni da Brindisi Notaries, and his own Domesticks, who strenuously demanded Letters of safe Conduct for Manfred's personal Appearance before the Pope and the College of Cardinals, to prevent any Molestation or Hostilities in passing through the Places belonging to the Church, for being cited to answer to weighty and serious Matters, he could not intrust Ambassadors with his Defence. The Pope consented to his coming, but limited the Number of his Convoy, and that he should bring no Army with him; whereupon Manfred set out, and for fear of Treachery, took with him a competent Number of Soldiers and a good many Gentlemen. Urban looking upon this as a great piece of Boldness in Manfred, was highly enraged, and would hear nothing that the Ambassadors alledged in his Vindication, but being out of all Patience renewed the Censures against Manfred, and with as great Solemnity as his Predecessor had done, excommunicated him anew, and declared him a Tyrant, Heretick, and an Enemy of the Church².

MANFRED therefore despairing of a Reconciliation with Urban, whom he saw determined to do him all the Mischief he could, and seeing no other Remedy left but to humble his Pride by Force, he immediately sent to raise a new Body of Saracens, with Orders for them to march to the Borders of the Kingdom to infest the Estate of the Church in Campagna di Roma; he sent also other Troops to Marca d'Ancona, and retired himself to Puglia to make Provision for a new War with Urban, which he saw was inevitable.

THESE Steps so provoked the Pope, that as he had humbled the House of Suevia in Germany, so he was resolved likewise to crush it in Italy; and observing that the recourse his Predecessors had had to England proved always fruitless, he therefore resolved to try if he could meet with better Success in France. Whereupon he sent thither M. Alberio Apostolick Notary to treat with King Lewis about accepting the Investiture for one of his three younger Sons, which were John Count of Nevers, Peter Count of Alençon, and Robert Count of Clermont. But that holy King refused the Offer, lest (as may be gathered from a Letter of that Pope's to the said Alberto, recorded by *Rainald*³) by invading a Kingdom, which by Right belonged to Conrad the Sueve, and given by Investiture to Edmund of England by Alexander IV. he should give Scandal to the World.

NOTWITHSTANDING King Lewis had rejected the Offer made him of the Kingdom, yet Urban had a mind to proclaim a Crusade in France, and for that purpose sent thither an Apostolick Legate to list Soldiers, and to publish a plenary Indulgence and Remission of Sins to all those that should take up Arms against Manfred, declaring him to be a Tyrant, Heretick, and an Enemy of the Church.

THE Legate upon his Arrival in France publish'd the Crusade, and listed a great Number of Soldiers under the Command of Robert Count of Flanders, the Son-in-Law of Charles Count of Provence and Anjou, who, with a good Body of French Horse, came to Italy, and so animated the Guelfs, and dispirited the Ghibellins, that Manfred was forced to recall a great part of his Army which were dispersed in Italy for supporting the Ghibellins; whereupon the Guelfs of Tuscany and Romagna went to meet Robert, and being joined, they fought and defeated the Marquis Uberto Pallavicino. King Manfred, in order to be in readiness to prevent the greatest Danger, resolved to march into Campagna di Roma, and post himself so as to be able to hinder the Enemy from entering the Kingdom, either by the way of Abruzzo or Terra di Lavoro; and he immediately marched and encamped with all his Army between Frosinone and *Anagni*¹.

THE Pope was then at Viterbo, and desired that the Count of Flanders would march his Army that Way, where he gave him a gracious Reception, praising and caressing him and the other chief Men of the Army; and he blessed the Standards and Soldiers, wishing them all Prosperity, and loading them with Benedictions and Promises, with which Robert was so elated, that without halting one Moment in Rome, he marched in all haste and encamped close by Manfred.

BUT the King well knowing that it was not for his purpose to front the Enemy in the Field, but rather to garrison the Towns, and guard the Passes, in order to take Advantage of the Temper of the French, who are naturally impatient of Fatigue, when it's of long Continuance, retired to the other Side of the Garigliano, to that part which divides the Estate of the Church from the Kingdom of Naples; whereupon Robert likewise endeavoured to pass that River. But God had designed others to be the Instruments of Manfred's Ruin; for the Romans rebelled, shook off the Pope's Yoke, and created a new Magistrate called Banderefe, which obliged Urban to recall the French Army to guard himself, and keep the rest of the Estate of the Church from following the Example of Rome.

MANFRED did not neglect to take the lucky Opportunity to harraß the French; for they had no sooner quitted the other Side of the River, than he with the Saracens only repass'd it, the Barons refusing to act offensively against the Dominions of the Church, under pretence, that it was their Duty only to fight in Defence of the Kingdom², as if to harraß the Enemy had not been defending the Kingdom. But Manfred yielding to the Times, seemed not to regard their leaving him, but readily permitted them to retire quietly to their Families; only entreating them, that by way of Loan, they would let him have what Money they had brought with them for their Charges, which was managed by the Count of Caserta, and agreed to.

THEN the intrepid King with his Saracens only marched towards Rome, and by giving Assistance to others of the Pope's rebellious Subjects, he put the Estate of the Church into such a Commotion, that the mercenary French, for want of their Pay, retired to the other side of the Alpes, and those that remained were scarcely able to protect the Pope.

S E C T. I.

Urban invites Charles of Anjou to come and conquer the Kingdom.

THE Revolt of the Romans and Manfred's joining with the other Rebels so perplexed and provoked Urban, that he began to think of more powerful and effectual Means whereby he might ruin him; and having found by Experience that the Church was not able to raise an Army sufficient for so great an Undertaking, dertaking, he called a Meeting of Cardinals ¹, and with a grave and elaborate Discourse put them in mind of the Injuries and Hardships that, for the Space of fifty Years, the Church of Rome had suffered from Frederick, Conrad and Manfred, without any Regard to Religion or Humanity; and proposed, as a thing absolutely necessary, not only for the Credit of the Apostolick See, but likewise for the Safety of their own Persons, to extirpate that impious and cursed Race; and according to the Sentence of Deposition pronounced against Frederick by Pope Innocent IV. in the Council of Lyons, to give both the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, by Right devolved to the Church, to some gallant and powerful Prince, who, at his own Charges, would undertake not only to deliver the Church, but likewise many others from the Oppression of that perfidious and cruel Tyrant, by whom, in all Probability, both himself and all the sacred College would soon be put in Chains and sent to tug at the Oar. This Speech, delivered by the Pope with so much Energy, so moved the Minds of all the College, that his Proposition was approved of, and the Concern he had shewed for the Apostolick See and their common Safety was much commended.

THE first thing then to be done was to pitch upon a Prince; and seeing there was nothing to be expected from Henry King of England, who was at so great a Distance, and had already disappointed them, they must look out for another. The King of France had already rejected the Offer. No Relief was to be expected from Germany, then involved in a cruel War about the Election of two Kings of the Romans, viz. Alphonfus X. King of Spain, and Richard Brother to the King of England. As for the other Princes of Spain they were either of kin to Manfred, or at too great a Distance, or else too weak; so that of Necessity they must have recourse to France, as near at Hand, and always ready to succour the Church of Rome.

CHARLES Count of Provence was then a famous Warrior, and remarkable for his noble Exploits against the Infidels in Asia under the Banner of his Brother Lewis King of France ², who, for the Innocency of his Life, is now adored as a Saint; and besides Charles was rich, and by right of his Wife was in Possession of all Provence, Languedoc, and a great part of Piedmont; he was therefore no sooner named, than he was judged by the Pope and the whole College to be the fittest Person for their Purpose; whereupon without farther Delay they pitched upon Bartolommeo Pignatello, formerly Archbishop of Amalphis, then of Cosenza, and afterwards of Messina ³, to go as Apostolick Legate to Provence, and give him an Account of the Inclinations of the Pope and College to make him King of two Kingdoms, and to invite him to come as soon as possible. There was likewise this Year 1263 another Legate sent by Urban to Henry King of England and Edmund his Son, to get them to make a Renunciation to the said Legate of any Right they could claim in those Kingdoms, by vertue of the Investiture given them by Pope Alexander IV. seeing they were neither willing to accept, nor in a Condition to perform the Articles contained in the Investiture. And these Princes, rejecting the Conditions demanded by the Pope, readily renounced the Investiture ⁴, and would never hear it mentioned any more; whence the English say, that the Popes, after having drawn vast Sums of Money out of England for that Affair, at last left Henry in the Lurch, and blame him for not refusing that Crown at first, or at least immediately renouncing it, upon so many hard Conditions as were required of him; and that the Pope's giving a Kingdom to which he had not the least Shadow of Title, and even then to be conquered at Henry's Expences and Hazard, was making not only an unjust but a disadvantageous Present, which must be as injurious in the Acceptor, as it was dishonourable in the Donor.

IN the mean time the Archbishop of Cosenza arrived in Provence, where he declared his Message; and being a Neapolitan, and Manfred's bitter Enemy, whom he had many times offended, dreading too that some time or other Manfred might be revenged of him, he pressed hard on the Count to accept the Proposal; and with a great deal of Art extolled the Beauty and Opulency of both the Kingdoms, which, because of the Hatred the People generally bore the House of Suevia, would be easily conquered.

ALTHOUGH Charles was an ambitious Prince, yet after he had heard the Message he was a little in suspense, and when he had considered the Difficulty of the Undertaking, and the Aversion which his Brother King Lewis had always shewn to it, he seemed to decline the Offer; but Beatrice his Wife (not brooking to see three of her Sisters Queens, one of France, another of England, and the third of Germany, and she herself, who had had a greater Portion than all of them, being Heiress of Provence and Languedock, with no other Title but that of Countess) seeing him thus undetermined, offered him all her Treasure, and all her Jewels, even those that served to adorn her Person, provided he would not neglect so honourable an Undertaking. Moved therefore no less with a Desire to please his Wife, than with his own Thirst after a Crown, he answered the Archbishop, that he thanked the Pope for his kind Offer, and that as soon as the Conditions of the Investiture should be agreed upon, he would acquaint the King his Brother therewith, who he hoped would not only consent to his going upon the Expedition, but would likewise favour and assist him in it.

AND after they had begun to treat of the Conditions which the Pope had a mind to impose upon the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, they were found to be the same with those on which the Peace had been concluded between Manfred and Cardinal Ottaviano then Apostolick Legate, viz. That the City of Naples and all the Province of Terra di Lavoro, with all its other Cities, Towns, and the adjacent Islands, such as Capri and Procida; Benevento with its Territories and Val di Gaudo should belong to the Church of Rome, and that Charles should have the Investiture of all the other Provinces, with the Island of Sicily.

THESE Conditions having been represented to Charles, he by no Means would accept of them, but would have them modified thus: That he was not willing to undertake the Expedition, unless all the Kingdom of Sicily, with all the Provinces on this Side of the Phare of Messina to the Confines of the Ecclesiastical Estate were given him; in the same manner as the Norman and Suevian Kings had possessed them, excepting the City of Benevento with all its Districts and Appurtenances, and that none of the other Provinces should remain in the Possession of the Apostolick See, excepting the Quit-rent of ten thousand Ounces of Gold, which he would pay yearly *.

SINCE it was of great Moment to Urban not to have this Affair any longer in suspense, for otherwise he would not have been able to drive Manfred out of the Kingdom, he was content to model the Conditions according to Charles's Pleasure; the Treaty therefore being thus concluded, the Pope wrote to King Lewis, to desire him to assist his Brother, and by another told him, that the Money he should advance him should be only by way of Loan, and should be repayed him. King Lewis no longer able to resist so much Importunity, was at last forced, though with Reluctance, to give his Consent, that his Brother should accept of the Invitation. As this remarkable Transaction was the Cause of the fatal Ruin of the House of Suevia, so likewise that cannot be denied, which has been allowed by all wise Politicians, That it not only at the same time brought Destruction and Desolation upon the House of Anjou itself, but also great Expences and many fruitless Expeditions upon the Crown of France, which for several Ages on that Account was obliged to be involved in many expensive Wars, which were always attended with ill Success, immense Charges, and great Inconveniencies; for it is well known, and can be proved both by antient and modern Instances, that from Gregory the Great all the Pope's Successors, though they have invited many Princes to the Conquest of the Kingdom, yet whenever any of them became successful and had arrived at a Pitch of Grandure, the Popes then became jealous, and invited others to drive them out whereby our Kingdom has been always miserably afflicted, and made the Theatre of bloody and cruel Wars.

NEVERTHELESS while the Apostolick Legate was returning to Italy with the News of Charles's coming, Urban dies in Perugia this Year 1264, which put a Stop to Charles's Expedition for that time.

* These Conditions and Modifications are recorded by Tutini in his Treatise de Contestab. del Regno, fol. 70, & 71.

Clement IV.'s Expedition; and the Conquests of Charles of Anjou, whom Clement invests with the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily.

ING Manfred, upon the News of Pope Urban's Death, was extremely rejoiced, and thought himself out of all Danger, not only because of the Disputes, that on these Occasions were usual amongst the Cardinals about the Election, the Result of which was generally a long Vacation of the Apostolick See, but likewise because he had great Hopes that some Italian might be elected who was not in the French Interest, and would abhor the bringing an ultramountain Nation into Italy; but he was hugely mistaken, for the Cardinals, conscious of their having offended him, were afraid that he would be revenged on them; therefore they were resolved to elect a Pope of the same Spirit and Resolution with the deceas'd, and in the Month of February this Year 1265, the Cardinal de Narbone was elected. This Pope was not only a Frenchman, but also Charles's Vassal¹; he had formerly been married, and had Children, and was one of the best Lawyers in France. As soon as he was apprized of his Election he left France, and, according to Platina, in the Disguise of a Beggar, or as Collenuccio will have it, of a Merchant, came to Perugia, where with the utmost Reverence he was received by the Cardinals, who adored him as Pope, and called him Clement IV. from thence with great Marks of Honour they conducted him to Viterbo.

THIS Pope, moved with the natural Affection which the French have for their Princes, in the beginning of his Pontificate, was eagerly bent on having the Treaty put in execution, which Urban his Predecessor, by Means of the Archbishop of Cosenza, had concluded with Charles of Anjou; and finding all the College of the same Mind, he immediately dispatched the Archbishop to solicit Charles's coming to Italy. He likewise confirmed Cardinal Simone of S. Cecilia Legate in France, and ordered him to absolve all the French that had listd themselves in the Crusade for the Holy Land, by applying their Vows to the Conquest of Sicily, as may be gathered from a Letter of Clement's recorded by *Inveges*². He wrote to King Lewis also, desiring him to assist his Brother Charles; and upon Assurances that both of them were disposed for the Expedition, he ordered the Cardinal de Tours to agree to the Conditions upon which the Investiture was to be given; and though nothing of the Modification which had been stipulated with Urban was to be altered, yet now when he saw Charles engaged, he had a Mind, at the giving of the Investiture, to tie him down to harder Conditions.

URBAN as we have said had endeavoured, by the Investiture he offered the Count of Provence, to make the best Bargain he could for the Apostolick See, by doing what in him lay to have the Province of Terra di Lavoro, with the City of Naples and the adjacent Islands, as well as Benevento, excepted, and annexed to the Church; but Charles by no Means would agree to it, because he was not to take Possession of a vacant Kingdom, but was to dispossess Manfred of it by Force, and the Pope was to be at no Charges but of Blessings and Indulgences, and a little Paper for the Writ of Investiture; his own Forces being so weak, that they were not sufficient to support him in Rome. Clement, though not able to gain his Point as to that Province, yet resolving to make the best of a bad Market, clogged the Investiture with so many Articles and Conditions, that the new King in effect became his Liege-man, being stripped of many Prerogatives, of which his Predecessors the Norman and Suevian Kings were formerly possessed.

THE Conditions stipulated and sworn to by Charles, and which the Pope required, as they are recorded by Summonte, *Rainaldo*¹, and Inveges, are these following.

I. CHARLES Count of Provence was invested by Clement with the Kingdom of Sicily ultra & citra, that is to say, that Island, and all the Provinces on this side of the Phare reaching to the Confines of the Estate of the Church of Rome, excepting the City of Benevento with all its Territories and Appurtenances; *Pro se, descendantibus masculis, & fœminis: sed masculis extantibus, fœminæ non succedant; & inter masculos, primogenitus regnet. Quibus omnibus deficientibus, vel in aliquo contrafacientibus, Regnum ipsum revertatur ad Ecclesiam Romanam*².

II. THAT Charles upon no Account was to divide the Kingdom.

III. THAT he was to take an Oath of Fealty, and do Homage to the Church of Rome.

IV. THE Princes of the House of Suevia that had been both Emperors and Kings of Sicily, having been the Terror of the Roman Pontiffs, Clement would have it to be stipulated by several Articles, that Charles by no Means should aspire, or endeavour to be elected, or anointed King and Emperor of the Romans, or King of Germany, or even Lord of Lombardy or Tuscany, or of the greatest part of those Provinces; and if he should be elected, and did not renounce within four Months, he should be deemed to have forfeited the Kingdom.

V. THAT he should not aim at the Possession of the Roman Empire, the Kingdom of Germany, or Tuscany and Lombardy.

VI. THAT if it should happen, during the Dispute now in Agitation about the Election of an Emperor of the West, that Charles should be elected, he was in that Case to deliver up into the Hands of the Pope his Son who was to succeed him, and in Favour of him to renounce the Kingdom, without any Reservation.

VII. THAT the King at the Age of eighteen Years was to take the Administration of the Kingdom upon him, but while under that Age he could not do it; but was to be under the keeping and Guardianship of the Church of Rome until he was of Age.

VIII. THAT if it should fall out that a Daughter of the King's should be married to the Emperor in her Father's Life-time, and who at his Death should become Heiress, she was not to succeed him; and if a Daughter should happen to succeed the Father, and should be married to the Emperor, she was to lose her Right of Succession.

IX. THAT the Kingdom of Sicily should never be united to the Empire.

X. THAT the King should be obliged to pay a yearly Quit-rent of eight thousand Ounces of Gold at the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul, upon Failure of which he should forfeit the Kingdom; besides, he was obliged to send every Year a good handsome white Horse; and according to the Instrument now in the Royal Archives³, drawn up in the Year 1274, between King Charles the First's Treasurers and some Merchants for payment of this Quit-rent of eight thousand Ounces of Gold, we see that six thousand were paid for the Kingdom of Puglia, and two thousand for the Island of Sicily. The Popes exacted this Quit-rent with so much Rigour, that in the Year 1256, King Charles being in Rome and without Money, he was forced to write to his Treasurers in Naples to pledge his great Golden Crown, many Jewels and other Things of Gold to Merchants for the Loan of eight thousand Ounces of Gold, which was immediately to be sent to Rome for the payment of that Year's Quit-rent to the Apostolick See⁴.

XI. THAT he should pay five thousand Marks Sterling every six Months to the Church of Rome.

XII. THAT on the Pope's Demand he should be obliged to send as Auxiliaries to defend the Lands of the Church, three hundred Cavaliers well-armed; and that each of them should have wherewithall to keep three Horses at least on his own Charges three Months every Year, or in lieu thereof an equivalent Number of Ships.

XIII. THAT he should be obliged to stand to the Pope's Determination with respect to the Limits of Benevento.

XIV. THAT the Beneventans should have free Access to all Parts of the Kingdom; and that they should enjoy their Privileges, and have Power freely to dispose of their own Goods.

XV. THAT he should not on any Pretence whatsoever acquire any Thing, Office or Jurisdiction within the Dominions of the Church of Rome.

XVI. THAT he should be obliged to restore to the Churches of the Kingdom all the Goods that had been taken from them.

XVII. THAT all Churches and their Prelates and Rectors should enjoy Ecclesiastical Immunity, and particularly in Elections, by observing what Alexander IV. had subjoined in the Investiture given to Edmund the Son of the King of England, viz. That the King and his Successors should not intermeddle in Elections or Collations of Prelates, insomuch, that *nec ante electionem, sive in electione, vel post, Regius assensus, vel consilium aliquatenus requiratur*¹; subjoining however, that this should not prejudice the King and his Heirs, in what belonged to them, In jure patronatus, si quod Reges Siciliae, seu ejusdem Regni, & Terræ Domini, hactenus in aliqua, vel aliquibus Ecclesiarum ipsarum consueverunt habere: In tantum tamen, in quantum Ecclesiarum Patronis canonica instituta concedunt; therefore the Kings still retained the Power of hindering a Person elected, whom they suspected of Disloyalty, from taking Possession, and of giving their Royal Assent to the Bulls of Induction, as shall be treated of elsewhere.

XVIII. THAT Ecclesiastical Causes shall be tried by the Ordinaries; and by Appeal to the Apostolick See.

XIX. THAT all Statutes enacted against the Ecclesiastical Immunity shall be repealed.

XX. THAT the Clergy, neither in civil or criminal Cases, should be obliged to appear before a secular Judge, unless in Cases relating to Fiefs.

XXI. THAT the Churches should be free from all Taxes.

XXII. THAT the King should not claim the Regale or Rents of vacant Churches.

XXIII. THAT those that have been banished Sicily shall have leave to return, as the Church of Rome shall order.

XXIV. THAT the King shall enter into no Alliance or Confederacy against the Church.

XXV. THAT he shall have a thousand ultramountain Horsemen ready and well accoutred either for the Holy Land, or other Occasions of the Church.

THESE are the Conventions so often mentioned by Marino di Caramanico, Andrea d'Isernia and others of our Writers in treating of the hard Conditions imposed upon Charles in the Investiture given by Clement.

THESE Stipulations being thus agreed, and Clement earnestly soliciting Charles's coming, he set out, accompanied by Beatrice his Wife, and many French and Provençale Captains and Knights: These marched over Land, and he himself with a few Vessels boldly undertook the Voyage by Sea; and after having miraculously escaped the Ambushes which Manfred had laid with eighty Gallies, he at last in the Month of May 1265 arrived safely at Rome, where he was received and caressed with all the Demonstrations of Gladness and Rejoicing; and the anonymous Writer says², that such was the Levity and Vanity of the Romans, who by their Senatorial Dignity had still some Shadow of their antient Liberty remaining, that they divested themselves of that, and secluding their Nobles, created Charles their Lord, and perpetual Senator of Rome.

THIS so prosperous and sudden Arrival of Charles, gained him the Reputation and Fame of being so bold and magnanimous a Prince, that over all Italy even his very Person was deemed equivalent to an Army; infomuch, that all the Favourers of the Guelf Faction came to wait upon him, and offer their Service. And at last Charles's Army after various Adventures arrived in Italy, and the Countess Beatrice came to Rome; then Charles, eager to enter the Kingdom, and left by staying too long in Rome, his Money for paying the Soldiers should be exhausted, he hastened the Expedition, by drawing all his Forces together in order to fight Manfred's Army.

Charles crowned in Rome.

BUT Charles, before he left Rome, would have Clement with the usual Solemnity to crown him King, and send him the Investiture according to Agreement. The Pope, who was then at Perugia, sent him his Bull, by which he gave Commission to five Cardinals to proclaim the Bull of Investiture before the Altar of the Church of S. John Lateran, and to take the Count's Oath of Fealty and Homage, for the Observance of the Articles abovementioned, and in due form to crown him King of both the Kingdoms of Sicily. The Cardinals appointed for this Solemnity were Rodolfo Bishop of Albano, Archerio Priest by the Title of Prassede, Riccardo di S. Angelo, Goffredo di S. Giorgio al velo d'Oro, and Matteo di S. Maria in Portico, Cardinal Deacons, who, on the Feast of the Epiphany this Year 1266, with the usual Ceremonies crowned Charles King of both the Sicilies, together with Beatrice his Wife, in the Presence of many Prelates and Lords, and a great Multitude of People. Clement's Bull of Investiture was read, by which on the Conditions above mentioned Charles was invested with the Kingdom of Sicily, Et de tota Terra, quæ est intra Pharum, usque ad confinia terrarum ipsius Romanæ Ecclesiæ, excepta Civitate Beneventana cum toto Territorio, Et omnibus districtibus, Et pertinentiis.

ON the other hand the King did Homage to the Cardinals, and gave them his Oath of Fealty, the Form of which, with the Instrument of Coronation, are both recorded by Tutini ¹ thus: Nos Carolus Dei gratia Rex Siciliæ, Ducatus Apuliæ, Et Principatus Capuæ &c. Vobis Dominis Rodulpho Albanensi Episcopo, Archerio &c. Diaconis Cardinalibus, quibus per literas suas Dominus Papa commisit receptionem ligii homagii, quod pro Regno Siciliæ, ac aliis Terris nobis a prædicta Ecclesia Romana concessis tenemur, eidem Domino Clementi Papæ IV. Et ejus successoribus canonice intrantibus, Et prædictæ Ecclesiæ Romanæ facere, ac in manibus vestris, vice, Et nomine ipsius Domini Clementis Papæ, Et hujusmodi ejus successorum, ac prædictæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ, Et per nos eidem Domino Papæ, ejus successoribus, ac Romanæ Ecclesiæ ligium homagium facimus pro Regno Siciliæ, ac tota Terra, quæ est intra Pharum, usque ad confinia Terrarum, excepta Civitate Beneventana cum toto territorio, Et omnibus districtibus, Et pertinentiis suis, nobis, Et hæredibus nostris a prædicta Ecclesia Romana concessis, &c.

THIS Prince in Recompence and Commemoration of this Deed gave to the Chapter of S. Peter and its Canons for ever the Rents and Profits of the Bailiwick of the City of Aitona, and the other Revenues, which the Chamber of Accounts gathered from that part of it situate in Abbruzzo, as may be seen in a Charter of the Royal Archives recorded by Tutini ²; besides fifty Ounces of Gold yearly for ever out of the Custom-House of Naples ³.

THE Summary of the Bull of this Investiture, with the Articles abovementioned, is recorded by Summonte, and a part of it by Baldus ⁴, in his Commentaries on our Code. And this is the first Writ, wherein these two Kingdoms for the first time got the Name of Sicilia citra, Et ultra Pharum, thus: Clemens IV. infeudavit Regnum Siciliæ citra Et ultra Pharum. And from this in process of time the modern Title had its Rise: Rex utriusque Siciliæ. Not that Charles ever made use of it in his Letters Patent and Grants, for he always retained the antient Titles, which the Normans and Suevian Kings took, as may be observed in the abovementioned Writ of Homage, and in a great many other Deeds afterwards, and Agostino Inveges in his Annals of Palermo shews the same.

BLONDUS, Platina and some others affirm, that Charles at this time procured to himself the Title and Crown of King of Jerusalem; but they are grossly mistaken, for this Title had not as yet been taken from the young King Conrad, which he had by Right of Jole the Mother of his Father Conrad, and which the Pope never disputed with him. It came afterwards to Charles after the Death of that young King in the Year 1276, by the Cession of Mary of Antioch; whence it comes, that in his Writs the Number of the Years of his Reign as King of Sicily is greater, than that of his Reign as King of Jerusalem ¹.

THE Solemnity of the Coronation being over, King Charles without further Delay set out with his Army in order to give Manfred Battel, and directed his March through Campagna di Roma towards S. Germano. The Pope to encourage him and facilitate the Expedition, sent Cardinal Rodolfo Bishop of Albano to Sicily, to engage the Sicilians to enter into a Crusade and take up Arms against Manfred. Another Crusade had been before proclaimed in Italy, which conduc'd not a little to Charles's good Fortune and Success, by notably encouraging the Guelf Faction, and crushing that of the Ghibelins.

King Manfred with invincible Courage engages the Enemy, and betrayed by his own Men is unhappily killed.

ON the other hand King Manfred with great Intrepidity prepared to make a gallant Defence. Notwithstanding he was equally grieved and surprized to see that his Enemy with a few Ships had not only passed the Sea, and escaped his Gallies, but had been received in Rome with Joy and Acclamations, and was now on the Borders with an Army ready to enter the Kingdom. He was astonished to find his Subjects so inconstant and fickle ¹, for it seemed to him that they all cried out Charles, and that his Name and that of the French were echoed again from every Corner. In the mean time this unfortunate Prince did not fail to animate and encourage them to stand by him; for which end he called a general Assembly of all the Counts and Barons requiring their Assistance ²: He run up and down, sometimes to Capua, sometimes to Cepparano, sometimes to Benevento, and entrusted the guarding of the Passes to the Count of Caserta his Brother-in-Law, and to Giordano Lancia his Kinsman, whose Conduct and Fidelity he had no Reason to suspect: He garrison'd S. Germano, and left in it a good Body of German and Puglian Cavalry, and all the Saracens of Lucera; he also went to Benevento to keep that City firm to his Interest, and to hasten some Necessaries for his Army, and from thence he went to Capua.

BUT all these Precautions were of no Service to this unfortunate Prince, for upon Charles's Arrival at the opposite Bank of the Garigliano, near Cepparano, the Count of Caserta, who had the keeping of that Pass, retired, and left him to pass the River without any Resistance: Count Giordano amazed at this Treachery, retreated to Manfred by the way of Capua. Thus, as the anonymous Writer laments, Ad malum destinatus Manfredus, qui apud Ceperanum gentis suæ resistentiam ordinare debebat, passus Regni vacuos, & sine custodiæ munitione reliquit, ut liber ad Regnum aditus pa- teat inimicis. Thus did Charles with his victorious Army enter the Kingdom, all the open Places submitted to him, and he soon took Aquino and the Castle of Arçi.

KING Manfred, upon hearing that Charles had passed the River without the least Opposition, was shocked at this piece of Treachery; he instantly reinforced his Army with the Troops under the Command of Count Giordano, but began now to suspect the Fidelity of the other Barons, as he had done before the Loyalty of the Gentry, therefore he endeavoured to be Friends with Charles, and bring about a Treaty of Peace; for which end he sent Ambassadors to him to desire a Peace, or at least a Truce. But King Charles, who saw that Fortune smiled upon him, unwilling to let slip so fair an Opportunity, in his French Language gave the Ambassadors this haughty and rough Answer. *Tell the Sultan of Lucera, that I will neither make Peace nor Truce with him, and that very quickly I shall either send him to Hell, or he shall send me to Heaven*¹. Charles, in order to encourage his Soldiers, had persuaded them that he was fighting for the Catholick Faith against Manfred an excommunicated Heretick and Saracen: That they were Christ's Soldiers, and the worst that could happen to them, was either certain Victory, or a Crown of Martyrdom, which would render their Memories immortal².

MANFRED, upon receiving this Answer, was altogether bent upon Action, and laid his whole Stress upon the strong Garrison, which he had left in S. Germano; for he believed that Charles would not venture to advance farther, and leave so strong a Body of his Enemy's Troops behind him; and that the strong Situation of S. Germano would be able to keep him so long in play, that either the French Army, by being kept in those fenny and marshy Places in the Month of January, would be ruined, or that he would get a strong Reinforcement from Barbary, whither he had sent to hire a good Body of Saracens; besides, he expected to be joined by some Ghibellins from Tuscany and Lombardy. But alas how soon are the Schemes of Man brought to nought by the over-ruling Providence of God; for contrary to the Nature of the Season, the Weather was warm and serene, as if it had been the middle of the Spring; and the Garrison of S. Germano did not shew that Courage in defending it that might have been expected; for though the Saracens made a gallant Defence, yet such was the Bravery of the French, that they stormed the Place and took it, and put the greatest part of the Garrison to the Sword.

WHEN Manfred heard by some of the Garrison that had escaped that S. Germano was lost, he was quite confounded; and after he had sent a good Body of Troops to garrison Capua, by the Advice of Count Galvano Lancia, and other loyal Barons, he retired to Benevento, that thereby he might have it in his Choice, either to fight the Enemy when he thought fit, or in case of Necessity to retire to Puglia. King Charles hearing that Manfred had retired to Benevento, marched directly after him, and exactly on the sixth Day of February he arrived in the Plains of Benevento, and encamped two Miles distant from the City, and less than one from the Enemy's Camp. Then Manfred with the Advice of the chief Men of his Army resolved to give him Battel, judging, that Charles's Soldiers being sore fatigued he could not fail of certain Victory. On the other hand King Charles, spurred on by his own natural Courage, and that which Fortune inspired him with, after he had drawn up his Men in order, though much wearied, marched out, and began that memorable and bloody Battel, a particular Description of which not being to our purpose, we refer the Reader to the anonymous Writer Inveges, Tutini, and many other Historians, who have given a relation of it with all its Circumstances.

THE unfortunate Manfred, in the Heat of the Battel, from a rising Ground seeing two of his Squadrons severely handled by the Enemy, made a Motion with that under his Direction, consisting all of Puglians, and called to his Officers to run immediately to their Relief; but having been corrupted by Charles, they treacherously refused to obey, and in the Heat of the Action gave over Fighting³. Whereupon Manfred with invincible Courage, chusing rather to die, than outlive so many gallant Champions, whom he saw slaughtered, marched down to the Field, and rushed into the thickest of the Enemy's Squadrons, and while he was fighting bravely, by the Stroke of an unknown Hand, he was miserably kill'd, but none could brag of having given the fatal Blow. His Body lay three Days amongst a Multitude of dead Carcasses before it was known. Thus died Manfred by the infamous Treachery of his own Men ¹. Both Dante and the anonymous Writer have charged our Natives, then commonly called Puglians, with this Treachery, and the first, in his Poem ² in Commemoration of this Defeat, and of that of young Conrad, says,

The other, wrong'd Manfredi, whose Remains,

Where old Allardo without Arms o'ercame.

BEHOLD the unfortunate End of this invincible and gallant Hero, a Prince (laying aside his too great Thirst after a Crown, and his Misfortune of being hated by several Popes, who represented him to the World to be a Man both cruel, barbarous, and void of Religion) to be compared to the most famous Captains among the Ancients. By his great Courage, Liberality, and Love of Justice, he kept his Dominions always in a flourishing and plentiful State. It is true he violated the Laws, but then it was only for the Sake of a Crown; however, in all other things he was a Promoter of Piety and Justice. He was a deep Philosopher, and a most expert Mathematician, not only a Patron of learned Men, but most learned himself; and it is said he composed A Treatise on Hunting, at that time much practised and esteemed. He was fair, of a beautiful Shape, and genteel Carriage, most affable, always pleasant and smiling, and of an admirable and ready Wit; insomuch, that there are not wanting some ³, who for his Liberality, Gracefulness and Courtesy, have compared him to Titus, the Son of Vespasianus, who was reckoned the Delight of Mankind. There are still remaining among us shining Monuments of his Liberality, such as the Harbour of Salerno and the famous City of Manfredonia, so called from his Name. And if the continual Trouble of defending the Kingdom against the Invasions of four Popes had not taken up his time, he would have left us more magnificent Monuments of his Bounty, and provided this Kingdom with wholesome Laws.

AFTER Charles's Army had entirely routed that of Manfred, it advanced farther into the Kingdom, and on its March the French committed all manner of Cruelty: Benevento was plundered, and neither Age nor Sex spared. Some of the Barons that were not killed in the Battel made their Escape by flight, others were pursued and made Prisoners: Some of which were sent to Provence, where they were cruelly put to Death: Some other German and Puglian Barons were kept Prisoners in different Places of the Kingdom: Nevertheless at the Intercession of Bartolommeo Pignatelli Archbishop of Cosenza, afterwards of Messina, Charles set at Liberty the two Brothers, Counts Gualvano and Federico, and Corrado and Marino Capece di Napoli, likewise Brothers ⁴.

THREE Days were already past, and not the least News of Manfred, so that it was believed he had made his Escape by flight; but Charles having ordered a most exact Search to be made amongst the Dead, at last upon the twenty eighth of February, being Sunday, his Body was found ⁵; which being brought to King Charles, he bid Riccardo Count of Caserta, and Count Giordano Lancia, and other Barons, who were Prisoners, look upon it, and tell him if they knew it, some of them answered faintly, but when it was shewn to Giordano, he no sooner knew it, than he struck himself on the Face, and crying out aloud, fell into a violent Passion of Grief and threw himself upon the Corps, and kissing it, said, Alas, my Lord, what is this I see! My good Lord, my prudent Lord! who has been so cruel as to kill thee? The Prop of Philosophy, the Ornament of Warriors, the Glory of Kings! why am I denied a Knife, wherewith to put an end to my Days, that I may accompany thee in the Grave, as I have done in thy Misfortunes ⁶? And thus lamenting he could not be plucked away from the Corps, which Fidelity and Love for the dead Prince was much commended by the French Nobility there present, who, moved with Compassion, begged of Charles at least to allow the Funeral Rites to be performed, and the Body put in holy Ground; which the Apostolick Legate opposed, and said, that it was not proper, since he died a Rebel to holy Church; whereupon Charles answered them, that he would willingly consent, if he had not died excommunicated. Therefore his Body was buried in a Ditch near the Bridge of Benevento, upon which every Soldier threw a Stone and raised him a Monument, that thereby at least it might be known to Posterity where his Body had been laid, and his Bones might likewise be preserved in that Place.

BUT the Archbishop of Cosenza, a bitter Enemy to Manfred, whose Death was not sufficient to assuage his implacable Hatred, made a terrible Splutter, and said, that though Manfred had not been buried in holy Ground, yet his Carcass had been laid near Benevento, in Earth that belonged to the Church of Rome: That that dead Dog ought to be taken out of that Place, and carried out of the Kingdom, and his Bones exposed to the Wind; with which Zeal Pope Clement was so well pleased, that he ordered the Bones to be dug out, and with extinguished Torches * they were carried to the Banks of the River Verde, now called Marino ¹, and exposed to the Wind and Rain, so that the Inhabitants of those Places could never find any Mark or Memory of them. ² Dante, who was a Ghibellin, commiserating so deplorable a Case, imagines Manfred penitent, and not in Hell, but in Purgatory, and makes him speak thus :

* A Ceremony performed at the Burial of excommunicated Persons.

I am Manfred, and of Constantia's Race,
 Whose Royal Brow th' Imperial Crown did grace.
 When therefore thou shalt breathe thy native Air,
 I beg thou to my Daughter wou'd repair,
 To her I mean, whose Offspring grac'd the Throne
 Of Sicily, and eke of Aragon.
 Tell her the Truth, nor leave her in Mistake,
 To think me doom'd to the eternal Lake:
 Tell her that at the Point to yield my Breath,
 (Two mortal Wounds made haste to cause my Death)
 In grief of Soul, tho' late, to him I su'd,
 Whose willing Mercy still proclaims him good.
 Tho' monstrous were my Crimes, yet when compar'd
 With Bounty infinite, they disappear'd.
 Eternal Love gives Pardon without Date,
 Repentance, if sincere, is ne'er too late:
 This had the Prelate of Cosenza known,
 Whom Clement sent, with Rage, to run me down;
 He had not basely dug beneath the Stones,
 At Benevento's Bridge, to raise my Bones;
 Nor shou'd my poor Remains neglected lie
 Expos'd to Wind and Rain in open Sky,
 Furth of the Kingdom, on the Banks of Verd,
 With Lights extinct, doom'd not to be interr'd.
 Let their Anathema then take its Course,
 Eternal Love surmounts their feeble Pow'rs;
 Hope is not limited to Days or Hours. }

C H A P. IV.

King Charles begins his Reign with Cruelty and Severity, which made his Government to be abhorred, and so exasperated the People, that they invited young Conrad to come and conquer the Kingdom.

MANFRED's Defeat and Death were no sooner spread Abroad, than all the Cities of both Kingdoms submitted to the French Government. The Name of Charles was huzza'd every where, and the People hugged themselves with the Notion of Plenty and Freedom, and of being eased, not only from the extraordinary, but likewise from the ordinary Taxes under this new Reign. There was not a City whither Charles went, that did not receive him with all Marks of Joy and Gladness. He immediately left Benevento and went towards Naples, but before he arrived, the Neapolitans sent and presented him with the Keys of their City, into which with Queen Beatrice he made his Entry with great Pomp and Magnificence, accompanied by all the Nobility of the City, who proclaimed him their King; and assisted by the Archbishop of Cosenza, he went to the Cathedral Church of S. Restituta to give Thanks to God for so signal a Victory. He afterwards created his eldest Son Charles Prince of Salerno, and left Naples in order to make a Progress through the Kingdom, thereby to win the Affections of the People; and with an uninterrupted Series of Prosperity every thing succeeded according to their Wish. The Remains of the broken Army had retired to Lucera, where Queen Sibylla Manfred's Wife, with her young Son Manfred and a Daughter had likewise taken Shelter ¹. King Charles presently sent Philip of Monfort with the greatest part of the Army to besiege that City, but the Saracens within made so stout a Defence, that he was forced to abandon the Undertaking; however he left it closely besieged, and that City with the Queen and her Son did not surrender till after the Defeat of young Conrad, as shall be told.

THE Sicilians, and among the first those of Messina had declared for the French. Therefore King Charles sent Philip of Monfort to that Island, who in a short time reduced it to Charles's Obedience ².

THUS in a Trice did Charles make himself Master of these Kingdoms, than which nothing could be more acceptable to the People, who thought themselves now freed, as they said, from the Yoke of Manfred and the Saracens, and expected to live under Charles's Government, exempt from all Taxes, in lasting Plenty, Tranquillity and Peace.

NEVERTHELESS they soon found their Mistake, for the French, scowring about every where, carried Ruin and Destruction to the Inhabitants wherever they came ³. And the King, besides calling the Barons of both Kingdoms to come and serve him, laid an extraordinary Tax upon all the Lands of the Kingdom contrary to their Expectations, having flattered themselves not only with seeing no more Soldiers, or paying extraordinary Subsidies, but likewise with being free from the ordinary. But on the contrary the King, whose chief Aim was by these Means to fill his Coffers, called for all the Treasurers and Chamberlains of the Kingdom, and ordered them to give him an exact Account of the Revenues of the Kingdom, Offices and Jurisdictions; and having been informed, that there was one of Basletta named Giezzolino della Marra who was very knowing in these Matters, he sent for him in order to take his Advice about laying on the new Taxes, Tributes and Contributions: Giezzolino, to curry Favour with his new Prince, and humour him in his Avarice, not only brought him all the Registers, wherein were set down the Revenues of the Offices, Jurisdictions, and all the other Royal Rights, but likewise the Registers, wherein were marked with red Letters all the extraordinary and exorbitant Imposts, Collections, Taxes, Donations and Contributions, wherewith the miserable People had often been oppressed ¹. Such were the Insinuations and Advices of Giezzolino, that Charles, in order to have them speedily put in execution, turned out all the Officers of the Provinces, and made new Justices, Admirals ², Protonotaries, Port-reeves, Collectors of the Customs, Warehouse-keepers, Secretaries, Jurats, Bailiffs, Judges and Notaries in all parts of the Kingdom; over those also he put other superior Officers to have an Eye upon them. These executed their Orders with unheard of Austerity and Rigour, and so harassed the People by insupportable Exactions, that they sucked the very Blood and Marrow out of them ³.

THUS was the Joy of the People changed into Tears; they groan'd under the heavy Yoke, being now of another Mind, and but too late lamented the Loss of Manfred. Nothing was heard but grievous Complaints in all Quarters: O Rex Manfred (with a doleful Voice said they) te met non cognovimus, quem nunc & ter etiam deploramus. Te Lupum credebamus rapacem inter oves pascuæ hujus Regni, secuti spem præsentis dominii, quod de mobilitatis, & inconstantiæ more sub magnorum profusione gaudiorum anxie morabimur, agnum mansuctum te jam fuisse cognoscimus, dulcia tuæ potestatis mandata sentimus, dum alterius, & majora gustamus. Conquerebamus frequentius nostram partem, partem in dominii tuæ Majestatis adduci, nunc autem omnia bona, quod prius est, & personas alienigenarum convertere debemus in prædam ⁴.

Young Conrad invited to Italy, and his unfortunate Expedition.

FROM Complaints the People proceeded to Murmurs, and at last resolved to invite young Conrad from Germany in order to drive out the French. Many Barons of both Kingdoms prepared themselves for the Undertaking, and, besides the Fugitives and Vagabonds, they instigated the Ghibellins of Lombardy and Tuscany to do the same, and the more to spur them on, they set forth to them the insupportable Government of the French ¹. The most forward in this Undertaking were the Counts Gualvano and Federico Lancia the two Brothers, and Corrado and Marino Capece; these went to Germany to sollicite Conrad ², the only remaining Branch of all Frederick's Posterity. For this purpose, many Imperial and Ghibellin Cities, such as Pisa and Sienna, sent likewise Ambassadors with Promises and Offers, besides a good Sum of Money for facilitating Conrad's coming.

CONRAD being a Youth of not above fifteen Years of Age, his Mother Elizabeth of Bavaria, who loved him dearly, was afraid to expose him to the Dangers of so difficult an Enterprize; but Conrad, spurred on by a generous Spirit, got the better of her, and embraced the Invitation; he was likewise encouraged by the Duke of Austria, also a Youth, who offered to accompany him, and help to restore him to the Throne of his Ancestors; whereof Corrado Capece sent Advice to Sicily.

IN the mean time Conrad prepared for his Journey, and in the beginning of the Winter 1267, he set out from Germany, taking with him the Duke of Austria and an Army of ten thousand Horse, and by the way of Trent in the Month of February he arrived at Verona; where he conven'd all the chief Men of the Ghibellin Faction, who had pressed his coming; and after it had been resolved that he should march through Tuscany, he left Verona, and having sent the greatest part of the Army by the way of Lunigiana, he with the rest of it directed his March by Genoa, and in a few Days arrived at Savona, where he found the Pisan Fleet, in which he embarked and sailed to Pisa. The Pisans received him with great Honour and Respect, provided him with Money, and shewed him the Fleet, which they designed to send to the Assistance of the maritime Cities of both the Kingdoms.

WHILE Conrad, with a great many German Princes was at Pisa, Corrado Capece desired the Pisans to furnish him with some Ships for going over to Tunis to sollicite the Assistance of the Saracens. Frederick and Henry of Castile, envying the Grandure and Prosperity of the King of Castile their Brother, had provoked him to that Degree that they had been banished Spain, and were now in the Pay of the King of *Tunis*¹; and by their continual Conversation with the Saracens, they had almost forgot the Christian Religion, and differed little in their Manners from the Saracens themselves². Frederick was in Tunis when Corrado Capece arrived there, and being informed by him of the State of King Conrad's Affairs, he was induced to espouse his Interest, and interpose his good Offices for persuading the King of Tunis to send him a powerful Assistance. But Henry, out of his natural Pride and Ambition, jealous of the King of Tunis, had gone over to join Charles in Italy, and then by Fictions and Cunning, endeavoured to raise his Fortune at the Court of Rome; on Account of his Birth he was honourably received at that Court, and he began to lay Claim to the Kingdom of Sardinia. Upon his Arrival at Rome he managed Matters so artfully, that he got himself to be chosen Senator of that City, though a great part of the Nobility of Rome and of the Cardinals were against it³. He had formerly been a Friend to Charles, who was his Cousin-German, by whose Means he expected some Principality in Italy; but seeing him too covetous, and that he seized upon every thing for himself he began to hate him, and envy his Greatness, and sought all Opportunities to ruin him. He likewise heavily complained, that tho' he had assisted him with Money when he was in a low Condition, and he went upon the Expedition into Italy against Manfred, yet now when he had raised himself to so much Grandure and Riches, and could easily repay him, he by no Means could be brought to do it. Therefore having heard that Conrad had been invited to come into Italy, he thought he had a fair Opportunity of being revenged of Charles, and by siding with Conrad, he was in Hopes to obtain of him what he had been denied by Charles; whereupon he sent Letters and Messengers to Conrad to encourage him to come, and to tell him, that he would do him all the Service in his Power, and that he longed more to see him Italy than all his Subjects, Rome, and all the rest of Italy, and that he was confident they would be able to drive out the French.

CONRAD being thus solicited by Henry's Letters, and as we have said, arrived at Pisa, the more to incite the People of Italy, and those of Puglia and Sicily, he caused a Manifesto to be drawn up, and Copies of it to be dispersed every where⁴, he therein made heavy Complaints against four Popes, and two Kings, Manfred and Charles, and invited his Friends to assist him in the Expulsion of the French from his Dominions of Puglia and Sicily.

IT is incredible what Commotions this Manifesto occasioned in Sicily, Puglia and Calabria; nothing was heard but the Name of Conrad; besides, for another Motive there had been an Engagement at Ponte a Valle near Arezzo, wherein William Stendard and William Biselwe, two of Charles's famous Captains, in endeavouring to hinder Conrad's Army from passing, had been routed, and William Stendard with Difficulty escaped with two hundred Lance-men, and Biselwe, with a few French Troopers that were left alive, made Prisoner.

THE News of this Defeat being spread over both the Kingdoms, was pretty much magnified, and the Minds of the People being already disposed, almost all the Provinces revolted; and the Saracens, who under Frederick and Manfred were wont to be employed, respected, and raised both to civil and military Posts, not able to bear the mean Condition to which they were reduced under Charles, took Courage, and made Lucera revolt, and declare for Conrad. Almost all the other Cities of Puglia, Terra d'Otranto, Capitanata and Basilicata followed the Example of Lucera; and it was very surprizing to see so much Inconstancy and Levity in those very People, who, a little before, had so earnestly desired the coming of Charles and his Frenchmen, whom they now abhorred so much, that the Name of Conrad was continually in their Mouths; from this, and many former Instances, and from some that we shall have Occasion to mention, proceeds the Opinion of both antient and modern Historians, that our Natives are most fickle and inconstant, soon disgusted with one Government, and ever desirous of a new one. A Blemish, from which *Scipione Ammirato*¹ in his Characters, durst not venture to clear our Natives; and from which Tommaso Costa in his unhappy Apologia del Regno di Napoli could not excuse them.

SUCH Inconstancy, both in the Natives and his Fortune, astonished King Charles; and after he had recovered himself, he was wholly intent upon augmenting his Army, in order to oppose Conrad, who was marching in all haste towards Rome, where Henry of Castile and the Romans were waiting to enter the Kingdom with him by the way of Abbruzzo.

IN the mean time Pope Clement who was at Viterbo having heard of Conrad's Success in Italy, and of the Commotions of the Kingdom, in order vigorously to oppose him, did not fail, when he was apprized that Conrad was arrived at Verona and Pavia, to write very pressing Letters to sundry Cities of Italy, enjoining them not to take part with Conrad; but finding that these Letters had no Effect, he resolved to try if another Method would frighten Conrad. Therefore in the Month of April this Year 1267, he sent him a terrible Summons, in which he prefixed a certain time for appearing before him; and if he had any Pretension to the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, he was not to do himself Justice with Arms, but to produce his Right before the Apostolick See, which would do him Justice; and if he did not appear, Sentence would be pronounced against him. Conrad did not appear, but pursued his March, and the Pope, on the twenty eighth of April, in the Cathedral Church of Viterbo in Presence of all the People, pronounced Sentence against him. Then he invited Charles to come to Viterbo, where they had an Interview, and the Pope made him Governor of Tuscany; and seeing the Empire of the West was vacant, he made him Vicar-General of the Empire. And on the twenty ninth of June, the Feast of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, with great Pomp and Solemnity he publicly excommunicated Conrad, and declared him an Enemy and Rebel to the Church of Rome, whereby he had forfeited all his Pretensions². He likewise wrote to William of Thuringia a Dominican Friar, to excommunicate all those that would not submit to Charles; and on the contrary he bestowed his Blessings and Indulgences upon all who would take up Arms for him against Conrad. And after all, when he knew for certain that Conrad was in Confederacy with D. Henry of Castile, he excommunicated him anew. But Conrad, little minding these Thunderbolts, was not at all discouraged, but firm in his Resolution, and applied himself wholly to raise Men and Money for the Expedition³.

ON the other hand Corrado Capece, and D. Frederick, Henry's Brother, who were still at Tunis, hearing that the Expedition went swimmingly on, set sail from Tunis with two hundred Spaniards, as many Germans, and four hundred Turks, and landed in Sicily. Capece arriving at Schiacca, declared himself Conrad's Lieutenant, and dispersed Letters over all the Island, for encouraging the People to receive their King, who was coming with a numerous Army. The Tenor of these Letters was this: Ecce Rex noster citò veniet in celebri, &c. and they are recorded by Inveges. These Letters, strengthened by the Fame of Capece's Courage, in a short time had such Effect, that almost all Sicily declared for Conrad, insomuch that Fulk, who was Lieutenant of the Island for King Charles, was amazed, and with Force of Arms endeavouring to suppress the Revolt, his Troops were routed, and he himself forced to fly. The anonymous Writer ending his Chronicle here, we shall now have recourse to Villani, and other no less careful Writers, than faithful Recorders of what passed in these Times.

IN the beginning of the Year 1262, Pope Clement, hearing of Fulk's Defeat in Sicily, published the Crusade, and excommunicated all those, who should invade the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily. He sent Legates to Conrad, ordering him immediately to depart Italy; and he, not obeying, was deprived of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and declared incapable of being Emperor, or King of any Kingdom. He excommunicated anew all People, Cities and Villages that should assist him. He likewise excommunicated D. Henry, and deprived him of the Senatorial Dignity, and conferred it on King Charles for ten Years.

BUT Conrad, without taking any Notice, pursued his March, and arriving at Rome, he was received in the Capitol by the Senator Henry, and by the Romans with the same Pomp and Rejoicings as if he had been Emperor; and after he had raised both Men and Money, and been joined by D. Henry and his Troops, and likewise hearing of the Commotions of the Barons and Cities, he thought it a fit time to enter the Kingdom, and on the tenth of August he left Rome, accompanied by D. Henry and his Barons, with many Romans: He did not think it proper to march through Campagna, knowing that the Pass of Ceperano was well guarded, but took the Mountains between Abruzzo and Campagna, and led his Army through Places unguarded, cool, well watered, abounding in Provision for Men and Horses, which to the Germans, impatient of Heat, was a great Comfort, and at last encamped his Army in the Plains of Tagliacozzo.

ON the other hand King Charles, after he had ordered Ruggiero Sanseverino, with a great many other Barons of his own Faction to keep in Awe those that had revolted, with all his Forces marched from Capua to oppose Conrad; but it happened, that at this very time landed at Naples Alard de S. Valtri, a most gallant French Baron, who had come from Asia, where, for the Space of twenty Years with great Honour, he had served in the Wars against the Infidels, and now being old was returning to France to rest himself and die in his native Country. He, not finding the King in Naples, went to wait upon him at Capua, where he was with the Army: King Charles seeing him was overjoyed, and immediately resolved to embrace the Advantage of a Man of his great Experience, therefore he entreated him to give him his Advice and Assistance in so critical a Juncture; and though he excused himself, that upon Account of his Age he had laid aside the Exercise of Arms, and had taken himself to a Christian Life, and that having spent his Youth in fighting against Infidels, it was not fit, now in his old Age, to pollute his Hands with the Blood of Christians. Nevertheless Charles having given him to understand, that fighting against Conrad was still fighting against Infidels, he being a Rebel to the Pope, excommunicated and excluded the Church; besides, that the King of France would take it as a Favour done him; he at last was prevailed upon; and hearing that Conrad was encamped in the Plains of Tagliacozzo, he would have Charles's Army, of which he had now the Direction, to encamp about two Miles distant from the Enemy: Then, with a few Horse, having gone up to the Top of a Hill, and viewed the Enemy's Camp, he found that Charles's Army was much inferior in Number to that of Conrad, therefore Prudence and Stratagem were more to be depended on than Strength; and after he had privately posted the third Squadron in a Valley behind, he offered Battel to the Enemy, who, despising the Boldness of the French, in offering to engage with so great Disadvantage in Number, greedily accepted of it. The Battel began, and though the French with two Squadrons only bore the Shock of the Enemy with great Bravery, yet they were forced to give Way at last, and were cruelly slaughtered. King Charles, who with Alard from the Hill seeing his Men cut in pieces, was pressing to go to their Relief, but he was hindered by Alard, who begged of him to have Patience till the end of the Victory, which would be the result of the Defeat of his Men, as it fell out; for the French beginning to throw away their Arms, and yield themselves Prisoners, and some flying: Conrad's Army thinking they had gained an entire Victory, dispersed themselves, some following the Runaways, some plundering the Dead, and pursuing their Horses, and others carrying off the Prisoners. Then Alard turning to the King, said, Let us go Sir, the Victory is our own; and then going down, they joined the third Squadron which had been posted in the Valley, and with great Fury attacked the Enemy scattered here and there, and easily routed them, and pushing pushing forward they found that Conrad, the Duke of Austria, and the greatest part of the Lords that were with them, being certain of Victory, and quite spent with Fatigue and Heat, had thrown off their Helmets; and having neither Time nor Strength to put on their Armour again they fled, and the most part of them were killed in the Flight.

CONRAD and the Duke of Austria, with Count Gualvano, and the Count Girardo da Pisa run towards the Sea-Coast next to Rome, with Design to take Shipping there for Pisa; and travelling Day and Night in the Disguise of Countrymen they came to Astura, which at that time belonged to the noble Family of the Frangipani, where by cruel Fate they were accidentally discovered, and made Prisoners by one of that Family, and from thence conducted and delivered up to Charles, who sent them Prisoners to Naples. Charles looking upon this as a most valuable Present, gave to that Lord Pelosa, and some other Villages in the Valley of Benevento, and would have him to settle in Naples: From him are descended the Frangipani, who had the Honour for a long time to be Presidents * A Tribunal. of the Seggio * of Portanova in Naples.

D. Henry of Castile in his Flight was overtaken by Charles's People, who defeated his Troops, and made many of them Prisoners; and he himself made his Escape by the Favour of the Night. Some say that he went to shelter himself in Monte Cassino, where the Abbot, in order to curry Favour with the Pope, made him Prisoner; and after he had been assured that his Life should be spared, he sent him to Pope Clement, who immediately carried him to King Charles, by whom he was made Prisoner in Naples. Others say, that he fled towards Rieti, and that an Abbot of another Monastery to which he flew made him Prisoner and sent him to the Pope.

THE only Persons of Note that escaped the King's Fury, were Corrado Capece, and Henry's Brother Frederick who had fled to Sicily, where they took shipping in some Pisan Gallies, and landed at Pisa.

KING Charles, in order to perpetuate the Memory of this signal Victory, by which, if we may credit Fazzello, twelve thousand Germans lost their Lives, caused a Monastery for Benedictin Monks to be erected¹ in the Field where the Battel was fought, and gave it the Name of S. Maria della Vittoria, and endowed it with many Lands. But in the following Wars it was demolished and deserted; and now the Pope disposes of the Title of this Commendam, and the Revenues thereof are still in the Possession of the Crown².

THE cruel Slaughter which Charles made of the Rebels, and of those taken in the Battel, is inexpressible. Some were hanged, others were beheaded, and a great many condemned to perpetual Imprisonment. The Cities of our Provinces, which upon Conradin's Arrival had rebell'd, were destroyed by the French, who carried Desolation, Ruin and Fire wherever they went. Aversa was demolished, Potenza, Corneto, and almost all the Villages of Puglia and Basilicata were cruelly destroyed.

THE Slaughter was no less in the Island of Sicily. Conrad of Antioch and many Lords who had sided with young Conrad, first had their Eyes put out, and were afterwards barbarously hanged. The Sicilians were in a manner reduced to Slavery by new and heavy Taxes; and the insolent French spared neither the Honour nor Goods of the Inhabitants which was the Ground-work of the famous Sicilian Vespers; for the Sicilians afterwards, in order to get rid of the Slavery, entered into the Conspiracy of Giovanni di Procida, of which we shall treat hereafter.

LUCE RA held out by the Saracens, was taken and reduced to Charles's Obedience, where young Manfred and his Mother Hellen, King Manfred's second Wife, were made Prisoners, and sent to Castel dell' Uovo near Naples, where, by Charles's Orders, they were put to Death.

Scipione Ammirato in his Characters³ says, that Manfred had left three Sons, Henry, Frederick and Ansellin, who were kept Prisoners in the Castle of Santa Maria a Monte, and had three Tari of Gold allowed them a Day. But others, amongst whom *Inveges*⁴, confute Ammirato; for Manfred's two Sons, which he had by his first Wife Beatrice of Savoy, died before their Father.

S E C T. II.

The unfortunate Death of King Conrad, in whom the Race of the Suevi became extinct.

CHARLES having thus brought these Kingdoms under his Obedience, and with the utmost Severity put it out of the Power of his Subjects to give him any more Trouble, the only Matter in Question now was, how to dispose of Conrad, the Duke of Austria, and the other Prisoners. At first he would by no means hearken to the Pope's Advice, with whom he used to consult in the most weighty and serious Affairs of the Kingdom. Errico Guadelfier, Villani, Fazzello, Collenuccio, and others say, that when the Question was put to Clement, he gave this short Answer: Vita Conradini, mors Caroli: Mors Conradini, vita Caroli. But Costanzo, Summonte and Rainaldo deny it; and Summonte grounds his Opinion upon a very false Reason, saying, that that could not be, because Clement was dead ten Months before Conrad was beheaded; nevertheless that's not repugnant to the Testimony of these Writers, who say, that Charles asked the Pope's Advice, which he gave him; but soon after, being prevented by Death, he could not see his cruel Advice put in execution. Costanzo taking Clement to be a Man of a very sanctified Life, and because Collenuccio his Antagonist asserted this Advice, he could not be persuaded to believe it. But in this Villani deserves all credit, who, though a Guelph, and a mortal Enemy of the House of Suevia, in defending the Pope, had not the Assurance to deny it.

POPE Clement could not see his cruel Advice put in execution, for on the twenty ninth of November 1268, or as some write on the thirtieth of December, he departed this Life; and on Account of the continual Discords and opposite Factions among the Cardinals, about chusing a Successor, the See, according to Gordon, was vacant three Years, viz. till the Year 1271.

THE Pope being dead, King Charles, spurred on by his natural Ferity and Cruelty to take the most inhuman Resolutions against that unfortunate Prince, in order to colour his Barbarity with the Name of Justice, resolved to take Advice; and having conven'd in Naples all the Syndicks of the chief Cities, and the principal Barons of the Kingdom, and those French Lords that were with him, he held a Council, for determining what should be done with Conrad. The principal French Barons differed in their Opinions, for the Count of Flanders the King's Son-in-Law, and many other great and generous hearted Lords, who had no Design of settling in the Kingdom, were of Opinion, that Conrad and the Duke of Austria should be kept some Years in Prison, till Charles's Government should be so well rooted and fixed, that he might have no Reason to be afraid of them. But those who had been rewarded by the King, and were desirous to secure themselves in their Estates (which they thought they could not do while Conrad was alive) were of Opinion, that they ought to be put to Death. Others who knew the King's Mind, in order to humour him joined with the last, and the King himself was likewise of the same Opinion¹. Whether it was out of his natural Cruelty, or the great Ambition he had to be Master of Greece, which he could not attempt till he was sure not to be disturbed at Home, considering the Revolutions which Conrad's coming had occasioned; and fearing that the Saracens who were still in the Kingdom, assisted by those of Barbary, while he was at a Distance, might set Conrad at Liberty, at last it was resolved that they should be put to Death.

THEREFORE the Articles of the Process were ordered to be drawn up, and they were these: That they were Disturbers of the publick Peace, and disobedient to the Pope's Command: That they were Traitors to the Crown: That Conrad had had the Boldness to invade and usurp the Kingdom under the false Title of King, and had likewise attempted to kill King Charles. The Process was drawn up and completed before Robert de Bari, who was King Charles's Protonotary, and he pronounced and read publickly the Sentence of Death, founding it upon the abovesaid Articles. D. Henry of Castile was the only Person excepted in this Sentence of Death, who was condemned to perpetual Imprisonment in Provence, in order to fulfill the Promise given to the Abbot, who delivered him up to the Pope under Condition, that his Blood should not be spilt.

THIS barbarous and execrable Sentence was put in execution on the twenty sixth of October 1269, in the midst of the Market-place of Naples; and 'tis said, that when the unfortunate Conrad heard the Protonotary read it, turning to him, he said thus: Serve nequam tu reum fecisti filium Regis, & nescis quod par in parem non habet imperium: Then turning again to the People, he purged himself of the Crimes falsely laid to his Charge, saying, that it never was his Inclination to give Offence to the holy Church, but only to take Possession of the Kingdom which was his undoubted Right, and of which he had been unjustly deprived. That he hoped the Duke of Bavaria, his Relation by the Mother's Side, and the Germans would not leave unrevenge'd his barbarous and cruel Death. And having said these Words, he took a Glove, according to Collenuccio, or as others will have it, a Ring, and threw it among the People, as a Token of Investiture. And there are some who write, that by this Act he had a mind to leave D. Frederick of Castile his Heir, who, as we have said, had fled to Sicily, and from thence to Pisa. But Maurolico, and others generally affirm, that by this Act he appointed D. Peter of Aragon, the Husband of Constantia his own Cousin-German, his Heir. And Pope Pius II. ¹ writes, that this Glove or Ring was taken up by Errico Dapifero, who carried it to Spain to King Peter. From this the Kings of Aragon, and the House of Austria derive their Right of Succession to the Kingdoms of Sicily and Puglia, and not from the Family of Anjou, but from this Conrad, who transmitted them to the Kings of Sicily, descended of Peter and Constantia the Daughter of Manfred, according to Besoldus ², Summonte and others, who take it from Aventin. And the Sicilian Writers ³, considering the Emperor Frederick's last Will, wherein Manfred is treated as a lawful Son, and named in the Succession of his Kingdoms, in case Conrad and Henry should happen to die without Children, look upon as a Truth what Matthew Paris tells as a Story invented by Manfred himself, viz. that his Mother being at the Point of Death, caused the Emperor to be called to her, and by her earnest and fervent Prayers prevailed upon him to marry her, and own her as his lawful Wife for the few remaining Hours of her Life; by which Manfred became legitimate ⁴; and hold it as a thing certain, that the Right of Succession to these Kingdoms, by the Death of Conrad, was conveyed to Constantia Manfred's Daughter, and Wife of King Peter, and their Offspring; and that the Aragonese had a Right to drive out the French, and take Possession of them as their lawful Lords.

BUT what is more, that the unfortunate Conrad's Anguish might be the greater and more bitter, he was not the first that suffered, but was reserved to behold the cruel Death of Frederick Duke of Austria, whose Head was no sooner sever'd from his Body by the Hangman, than the sorrowful Conrad took it in his Hand, and after having bathed it with bitter Tears, he kissed and hugged it, bewailing his cruel Fate, and blaming himself, who had been the Cause of his barbarous Death, by taking him from his unhappy Mother. Being then weary of surviving so cruel a Spectacle he kneeled down, asked Pardon of God for his Sins, and gave the Hangman a Sign to do his Duty, who at one Stroke cut off his Royal Head. And after him were beheaded Count Girardo da Pisa, and Hurnasius a German Knight; and nine Barons, all Natives of the Kingdom, were hanged.

SUCH was the unhappy End of the young Conrad, at the Age of seventeen Years; a Spectacle so horrid and dismal, that it drew Tears from all the Spectators. In him was extinguished the famous and most noble House of Suevia, which both by the male and female Lines was descended from the Kings Clovis and Charles the Great of France, and the Dukes of Bavaria. A Family that could have boasted of more Emperors, Kings, Princes and Dukes than any other in Europe, and of all the Families in Germany was the most noble. This barbarous Action gained Charles eternal Infamy throughout all the Nations of Europe; and there is not a Writer, not excepting the French, that does not detest and abominate so cruel a Fact, not to be parallel'd by all the inhuman and wicked Deeds of the most brutal Tyrant that ever lived. From thence the illustrious House of Austria had its Rise in Germany; for the Race of the Princes of Suevia being extinct, and Richard Brother to the King of England, who aspired to the Empire being dead, and Alphonfus King of Castile his Competitor having no more Partizans in Germany; in the Year 1273 the Electors met in Frankfort and elected Rodolphus Count of Hapsburg Emperor, who was crowned that same Year in Aix la Chapelle, and acknowledged by the Princes of Germany; and having humbled Othocarius King of Bohemia, made him restore Austria, which he gave to Albertus his eldest Son, whose Offspring took the Name of Austria.

THUS ended the House of Suevia, after they had reigned in Sicily and Puglia for the Space of sixty nine Years, and was succeeded by the French with so cruel a Beginning, as brought about great Alterations in these our Provinces, not only in the Civil and Temporal, but likewise in the Ecclesiastical and Spiritual State: Which, after having related the Ecclesiastical Polity of these Times, shall be the Subject of the following Books of this History.

CHAP. IV.

The Ecclesiastical Polity of the thirteenth Century down to the Reign of the Family of Anjou.

HE Power of the Roman Pontiffs was arrived to such a Pitch in this Age, as never had been seen in any former; they would have themselves believed to be Monarchs no less in temporal than in spiritual Matters, and therefore they assumed the Power of deposing Princes from their States and Dominions; of calling them to Rome for purging themselves of Crimes laid to their Charge; of appointing them a prefixed time for appearing, and in case they did not obey, of passing Sentence, and declaring that they had forfeited their Dominions; of absolving their Vassals from their Oaths, and inviting others to conquer the Dominions they had forfeited. Looking upon themselves to be Lords of the Universe, they made no Difficulty to invest their Favourites with Provinces and Kingdoms over all the Earth, and with Islands and Gulphs in every Sea, and even with unknown and distant Provinces. Ruggiero di Loria, a famous Admiral, having conquered Gerba, and some other Islands of Africa, Boniface VIII. in the first Year of his Pontificate, while he was in Anagni, sent him a Bull of Investiture, by which he gave him the said Islands in Fief, and obliged him to take an Oath of Fealty and Homage, and to pay him yearly fifty Ounces of Gold, Sicilian Weight, as a Quit-rent, and an Acknowledgment of the Sovereignty, which that Pope pretended to over these Islands, as he did over all the other Provinces of the World; and the Charter of this Investiture is recorded by Tutini ¹. From this beginning it was, that in the Year 1493 Alexander VI. took upon him to grant a Continent and Islands, till that time unknown, to Ferdinand and Isabel King and Queen of Castile, and to draw a Line from Pole to Pole, which he made the Limits of their Dominions ². Whence the new Doctrine taught by the Guelf Doctors and Canonists had its Rise, that the Pope was Lord of the Universe, in Opposition to the Ghibellins, who ascribed that Title to the Emperor.

THE Popes would have S. Peter's Chair to be looked upon as the Royal Throne of all Christendom, and in order to give it the more Lustre, they aggrandized the Cardinals, and depressed the Bishops. The Cardinals, as we have seen, disdained to go in Person to treat with Manfred, saying, that it was not consistent with their Dignity and Honour; and Innocent IV. out of spite to Frederick, who was doing what he could to humble him and all the Ecclesiasticks, gave them the red Hat, the Portmanteau, and the Silver Mace when they travelled on Horseback, and put them upon the same Level with Kings; and having afterwards got their Dignity to be raised to a much greater Degree of Honour and Eminency, by the Flatterers of the Court of Rome they came likewise to be called Great Senators, and thus adorned with Royal Honour, they elect the Sovereign Prince, for such they call the Pope, and attend at his Throne.

THE Pope thus become a Monarch, the Cardinals Great Senators, and the Apostolick See the Royal and General Court of Christendom. Gregory IX. in order to the more firmly establishing the Monarchy, set about to compose and publish the Decretals, the result of which was the entire Ruin of the antient Canon Law, and the Establishment of an absolute and unbounded Power in the Roman Pontiffs; for he, considering that the Emperor Theodosius had framed the Polity of the Empire, by collecting into one Volume, both his own Edicts, and those of the Emperors his Predecessors, which was afterwards called the Theodosian Code; and that the Emperor Justinian, besides his collecting the Pandects, which contained the antient Laws adapted to his time, likewise collected his own Constitutions and those of the Emperors his Predecessors into his Code, thought it incumbent on him to frame a new Polity for the Church adapted to his Time (though as Matters then stood, the Decretals were not to the Purpose) and to pick out and collect into one Volume all the Decretal Epistles of his Predecessors, which he thought might be subservient to his Purpose, of establishing a Roman Monarchy, especially with respect to the Matter of Benefices, and the Episcopal Court, and for enlarging the Cognizance of Causes, and the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction; whence he, in Imitation of these two great Emperors, ordered a new Code to be composed; and having repealed all the other Rescripts, he would have his Book to be called the Decretals, and to have the Force and Authority of Laws, in which there is much more contained concerning the Management of Law-Suits, than the Edification of Souls.

S E C T. I.

Of the Collection of the Decretals; their Use and Authority.

THOSE Letters, which in the first Ages the Bishops of the most noted Sees wrote to the Fathers of the Church to ask their Opinions concerning the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, were called Decretal Epistles¹. But afterwards the Roman Pontiff, as Head of the Church, having raised himself above all Patriarchs and Bishops, and therefore taking more Authority upon him than all the rest, assumed to himself alone that Privilege of sending his Letters to the Fathers and Bishops, who had recourse to him for consulting about the Affairs of their Churches; and these Letters being increased to a considerable Number, were confirmed in the Synod of seventy Bishops held in Rome in the Year 499, in the Pontificate of Pope Gelasius, and thereby acquired the same Authority with the Canons that had been established in Councils².

BUT in the Time of Charles the Great, a mighty favourer of the Roman Pontiffs, their Decretals acquiring much more Force, they began to be separated from the Canons, and were thought sufficient of themselves for regulating the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church, without being confirmed by Councils or Synods, whence the Popes established their Authority the more, and their Number grew much greater, so that it was thought necessary to collect them into one Body, and thereby introduce a new Pontifical Law, leaving the Canons of the Councils to shift for themselves¹.

THE first Collection of these Decretal Letters, distinct from the Canons, was made by Bernardo Circa Prefect of Pavia, and afterwards Bishop of Faenza, who disposed the Decretals of the Popes under certain Titles, beginning from Lucius III. down to Pope Celestin III. whose Pontificate began in the Year 1191. All his Design was, that his Collection might serve as a Supplement to Gratian's Decree; whence it was called Liber Extravagantium, because the Constitutions therein contained, *Vagabantur extra Decretum*². Antonio Augustino published them, and gave them the first Place among the other Collections of ancient Decretals. In this thirteenth Century there appeared another Collection, of which Gilberto, Alano, and Giovanni Gallense are said to be Authors. These imitating Bernardo, collected the Decretals of those Popes who lived after Bernardo; but Giovanni excelled the other two, by making more ample Collections³. The third is owing to Bernardo Compostellano, who collected it from the Registers of Innocent III. the most learned and the greatest Decretal Maker, and it was called the *Roman*⁴.

ALL these Collections being made by private Authority, were of no Force when quoted in the Courts or elsewhere, whence of Necessity recourse was to be had to the Archives of the Church of Rome to give them Authority. For which Reason the Romans begged of Innocent III. that of his own Authority he would be pleased to order a new Collection to be made. Innocent granted their Request, and gave the Charge of doing it to Pietro Benevento his Notary, who finished it in the eleventh Year of Innocent's Pontificate 1210, and it was the first Collection of the Jus Pontificium that was made by publick Authority⁵. Five Years being taken up with the Lateran Council under the same Pope, there was another Collection made in the Year 1215, in which were added all the Decretals and Rescripts that had been issued out during those five Years. Afterwards in the Year 1227, Tancred Dean of Bologna made another, into which he inserted the Constitutions of Honorius III. Innocent's Successor; but altho' it was finished that same Year that Honorius died, Gregory IX. his Successor, with Design to eclipse the Fame of his Predecessors by a new and more ample Collection, caused it to be suppressed, and it was never published till of late, when Innocentius Cironius caused it to be printed with his own most learned Notes in Toulouse in the Year 1645⁶.

Gregory IX. in order to the better establishing the Roman Monarchy, ordered a new Code to be made, and, in Imitation of the Emperor Justinian, he caused all those Constitutions of the Popes his Predecessors, which were not suitable to his Time, to be left out, and his own, with those of his Predecessors that he thought were more for his Purpose to be inserted; and besides, that there might be no Occasion of having recourse to the Jus Civile, he instituted many things of himself that were not required⁷, that by this his Code the Tribunals might regulate themselves in their Sentences, and the Schools in teaching Youth the Law. He entrusted the making of this Collection to Raimundus di Pennaforte of the County of Barcelona, a Dominican Friar, a great Canonist and Inquisitor in Catalonia, much esteemed by James King of Aragon, who chose him for his Confessor⁸. Gregory, taken with the Fame of his Learning and good Life, called him to Rome, and made him his Chaplain and Penitentiary, a Dignity, which in those Times was bestowed only upon Men of Worth and Learning. Raimondus performed and completed the Work, and divided it into five Books, following the same Method that Tribonianus had done in composing *Justinian's Code*⁹.

POPE Gregory, the Work being done to his Mind, immediately published a Constitution, which he prefixed to the same Code, by which he repealed all the other, and ordered that this Collection only should be made use of in the Courts of Justice and Schools: He likewise, under a severe Penalty commanded, that no Person should be so bold as to make any other, without the special Authority of the Apostolick See¹⁰. He likewise ordered it to be published over all the World, and read in all the Academies and Universities in Europe ¹, and excited both Professors and Scholars to study it.

THERE was no part in Europe, where Gregory had either Power or Interest, that did not greedily receive it, and the Professors every where not only taught it, but made large Commentaries upon it. The first that commented upon it were Ruffinus, Silvester, and Richard an Englishman: Rodovicus surnamed Pocopassus, and Petrus Corbulus, or Boliatus a Spaniard; Bertrandus, Damasus, and Allan an Englishman; Pietro Prefect of Pavia, Pietro Gallense of Volterra, Bernardo Compostellano, Vincenzo Castiglione of Milan, Giovanni Teutonico, and Tancredi. After these Guglielmo Naso, and Giacomo di Albenga Bishop of Faenza, Vincenzo Goffredo, Filippo, Innocenzio Ostiense, Pietro Sampso, Egidio of Bologna, Bonaguida of Arezzo, Francesco of Vercelli, Boatino of Mantua, and the Archdeacon. But afterwards Bernard Button of Paris collected all their Glosses, and about the Year 1240 made a more full one of his own, which was commended above all the rest ².

THE Monks likewise, out of Complaisance to the Popes, employed their Talents, and composed a Treatise, intitled, Suffragium Monachorum; but this Work being defective in essential Things, and full of Errors, trifling and superfluous, was noways esteemed. Friar Giacomo, a Canon of S. John in Monte, likewise commented upon this Code; but he came off with as little Credit as the other Monks, which gave Rise to the Proverb Magnus Decretista, magnus Asinista; and Cujacius tells us ³, that there were no Doctors more ridiculous than those, who had took in hand to write upon this new Jus Pontificium.

AFTER this Collection of Gregory's, the Popes his Successors (in order still to aggrandize the Roman Monarchy) did not fail to establish other Constitutions; so that about the end of this thirteenth Century Boniface VIII. thought that another Collection was much wanted. Some Constitutions had been made by this Gregory, and many by Innocent IV. Alexander IV. Urban IV. Clement IV. the two Gregories IX. and X. Nicholas III. and by Boniface himself. There had likewise many Constitutions been made in the Council of Lyons in the Year 1242. under Gregory X. Therefore Boniface VIII. who, above all his Predecessors, had conceived the greatest Notion of the Papal Dignity, by his truly extravagant Constitution Unam Sanctam, looking upon the Pope to have Power equally to wield both the Swords, and the temporal Sovereignty to be a dependent upon the spiritual, resolved to have a new Collection made of all these Constitutions, to be a Supplement to that made by Gregory IX. and committed the Care of it to three Cardinals, William Mandogot Archbishop of Embrun, Bishop Berengario Fredello, and Riccardo Malumbro a learned Doctor of Sienna and Vice-Chancellor of the Church of Rome ⁴. These accomplished the Work, and it was divided into five Books, and as many Titles, in the same manner as Raimundus de Pennaforte had divided his. As soon as this Collection was finished, Boniface caused it to be published about the Year 1299. and to be added to Gregory's Decretal Volume, and therefore it was called the sixth Book; and by a particular Bull, ordered it to be observed by all Persons, and to be read in all the Universities of the World, and to have the same Authority with that of Gregory's; but this Collection of Boniface's was little regarded in France, not only because it contained many Constitutions relating to the enlarging of his own Power, and the Advantage of his Court; but likewise because he had established many Things in it out of Hatred to the Kingdom of France, by Reason of the hot Disputes, which were then between him and King Philip the Fair ⁵. It had better Success in other Kingdoms ⁶, where it got an honourable Reception, and was glossed upon by the Canonists, and among the rest by Giovanni d'Andrea, a famous Doctor of the Canon Law in those Days ⁷.

IN the following fourteenth Century other Collections were made, and called Clementine; and also Extravagantes, to the End, that as the Collections already made, to wit, the Decree answered to the Pandects, and the Decretals to the Code, so the Extravagantes might answer to the Novellæ; and that nothing might be wanting, in the latter Ages the Books of Institutions were likewise to be collected; of which in their Place, and as Occasion offers.

THESE Decretals, during the Reign of the House of Suevia, had but little Weight with us, in Matters, wherein they clashed with our Constitutions; and both Frederick, and the other Kings of that House his Successors supported their own Constitutions, and those of the Norman Kings their Predecessors, and vigorously withstood the Encroachments intended by the Roman Pontiffs upon their Rights and Royal Prerogatives; they maintained the Laws they had made concerning Matrimony, and Immovables acquired by Churches; and they kept up their Royalties in vacant Sees and the Election of Prelates; and in many other Things related in the preceding Books.

BUT this Kingdom coming under the Dominion of the Family of Anjou, who themselves became Liege-Men to the Roman Pontiffs, and of whom they held the Kingdom; the Gælf Faction also gathering Strength, and that of the Ghibellins being at a low Ebb, the Face of Affairs was quickly altered, and new Maxims were introduced, and the Decretals not only received and taught in the Schools, but likewise in the Tribunals; not by the Laws of any Prince, but by Use and Custom, and as containing Things not expressed in the Civil Law, especially concerning the Form and Manner of Proceedings at Law contained in the second Book¹; as also containing Directions with respect to Ecclesiastical Causes, and Suits that might occasion Sin, and endanger the Salvation of the Soul². And although our Princes of the Family of Anjou knew very well that this Volume was collected in order to vie with the Laws of the Emperors, and to enlarge the Power of the Popes, who not only intermeddled in Ecclesiastical, but likewise in Civil Affairs, by assuming the Authority of judging in all Causes within the Dominions of Christian Princes, as well between Laicks as Ecclesiasticks; yet partly through Negligence and Ignorance, and partly because it was their Interest to be in Favour and Friendship with the Popes, they were easily prevailed upon to receive it into their Dominions, and to allow it to be publicly taught in the Schools, and quoted on the Tribunals.

THEREFORE our Professors applied themselves as much to the Study of the Decretals, as those of the other Cities of Italy, so that being corrupted in their Maxims, whatever was not conformable to them, was reckoned foreign and unlawful. Some Constitutions of Frederick and of the Norman Kings his Predecessors were therefore looked upon to be impious, particularly those concerning Matrimony, Acquisitions, the Disposal of the Revenues of vacant Churches, and such like Things; for it was thought that these Things were not in the Power of the Prince, and that it was falcem in alienam messem mittere. Andrea d'Isernia plainly says, that all these Things were formerly established, because the Book of the Decretals was not then in being: *Non erat compilatum Volumen Decretalium*³.

THE Roman Pontiffs took care in the Investitures they gave to our Kings to provide against these Encroachments; and Clement IV. in that which he gave to Charles I. of Anjou, would have all the Constitutions and Statutes which he thought against the Ecclesiastical Immunity to be repealed⁴; thereby depriving him of many Royalties and Prerogatives, which the Norman and Suecian Kings had maintained; whence with us, during the Reign of the Family of Anjou, the Popes not only had nothing to obstruct their Designs of establishing the Monarchy; but treating this Kingdom as their Fief, and the Princes as their Feudatories and Liege-Men, they made a wonderful Progress, as will be observed in the following Books of this History.

S E C T. II.

The Election of Bishops, and the Collation of Benefices.

IN order to lay the Foundation of a Monarchy it was not sufficient barely to provide it with Laws, and adorn the Court with great Senators and other Ministers for rendering it more majestick; but it was necessary to furnish it with Money, for supporting the Pomp and Grandure suitable to the general Royal Seat of Christendom, without which it would soon come to nothing. The Revenues of the Ecclesiastical State alone were not sufficient; Care therefore was taken to draw every thing to Rome from the Provinces. That as other Princes, to gratify their faithful Subjects, and reward those that fought for them, gave Fiefs, Dignities and Offices; so it was requisite to have such Posts and Offices as were necessary to support the Grandure and Magnificence of a Court, and to find out Means for establishing them, that nothing might be wanting to render the Priesthood in every thing conformable to Empire. Wherefore many Dignities and Offices were instituted, which did not in the least concern the Hierarchy of the Church, in things relating to her spiritual Power, but were solely intended for the temporal Jurisdiction and political Government; and in that the Court of Rome has outdone all the Courts of Princes. Benefices were appointed in order to answer to Fiefs, and as there had started up a new Body of Law, called the Feodal, which had taken up so many Volumes; so with respect to the Matter of Benefices there appeared another, on which the Canonists have written more Volumes, than the Lawyers have done on the Feodal Law.

THE Method taken for carrying on these Matters, was no less artful than laborious; it required a long time to establish them, and both the Princes, the People, and the Chapters of the Provinces struggled hard in order to prevent their going to Rome.

ALTHOUGH in Appearance the Election of Bishops was left to the Clergy, yet we have already seen, that the Popes have made use of sundry Means for drawing them all to Rome. Care was likewise taken to deprive our Princes of their Assent in Elections. Frederick II. Conrad, and Manfred, boldly defended their Rights, and would not suffer the least Innovation; but when Clement IV. invested Charles I. of Anjou, amongst the Stipulations already related, which he made him swear to, one was, That he should expressly renounce his Right of Assent; and in the eighteenth Article it is stipulated, That neither he nor his Successors shall intermeddle in the Elections, Postulations, or Provisions of Prelates; insomuch, that neither before nor after the Election, was the King's Assent to be demanded; and he was only to retain the Right of Patronage of some Churches, so far as was agreeable to the Canons of the Church¹.

HENCE there remained to our Kings the Power only to hinder the Elect from getting Possession without the Royal Consent, and even that was disputed; however, not only the Kings of the House of Aragon, but also those of Anjou who were Liege-Men to the Popes maintained it; for we find, that when Manfredi Gifanio a Canon of Melito was elected Bishop of that City, Charles II. being jealous of his Loyalty, hindered him from taking Possession of that Church, by not granting him the Royal Exequatur, as may be seen in a Writ of the King's dated in Naples in the Year 1299, recorded by Ughellus in his *Italia Sacra*². And all the other Kings of the Family of Aragon, such as Charles III. Ladislaus, down to Queen Joan II. when the Elect was not suspected by them, gave immediately the Exequatur to the Bulls of the Popes, of which we have many Instances in *Chioccarelli*³.

CLEMENT likewise deprived our Kings of the Royalty, which (as well as the Kings of France) they had in the vacant Sees of our Kingdom, by appointing their Bailiffs or other Officers for taking the Administration of the Revenues, in order to preserve them for the Successor, according to the Prescription of the Canons; and Frederick II. as is clear from the Constitutions of the Kingdom, maintained ¹. Besides, Conrad his Successor did the same; who, according to Matthew Paris, among other things being blamed by the Pope for having taken Possession of the Revenues of the vacant Churches, answered to that Accusation, That he had not made the least Encroachment, but had made use of that very Right which his Predecessors had enjoyed in vacant Sees, by giving the Charge of the Rents thereof to his proper Officers, and that he was satisfied with the exercise of the same Right, which the Kings of France and England had in the vacant Churches of their Kingdoms ².

BUT Clement IV. not pleased therewith by the twenty second Article of the foresaid Stipulation, obliged Charles I. and his Successors to renounce that Royalty, declaring, that he had no Pretension either to the Royalty or Revenues of vacant Sees; but that the Charge of the Churches was to be committed to Ecclesiastical Persons until they were provided, who, according to the Prescription of the Canons, were to receive the Rents and preserve them for the Successors ³. This depriving of our Princes of the Royalties in vacant Churches was a great Step in the Popes; for though in these Beginnings they pretended to give the Charge of them to Ecclesiastical Persons, and to regulate the Administration of the Revenues according to the Canons; nevertheless in process of time, they appointed Collectors and Nuncios, who seized on the Revenues, which they preserved for Rome, and not for the Successors; whence a new Calamity was entailed upon our Kingdom, and the Title of Apostolick Nuncio began to be known; which was not brought to Perfection till the following Century in the Reign of King Robert, to serve Ends, which shall be mentioned in the following Books of this History, when we shall have Occasion to treat of the Introduction of the Apostolick Collector into the Kingdom, and of his wonderful Success in furnishing Rome with Money from the Spoils of our Churches, and other Emoluments drawn from thence.

IN these Times other Circumventions were practised for drawing every thing to Rome; for whereas formerly, according to the agreement made between King William I. and the Apostolick See, appeals to Rome from the Kingdom of Sicily were excepted ⁴; Clement now, in the eighteenth Article of the Investiture given to Charles, expressly declares, That Ecclesiastical Causes are to be referred to the Ordinaries, and by Appeal to the Apostolick See; and in these Times Care was taken, as we shall see by and by, to extend the Cognizance of the Episcopal Court excessively; insomuch that there was no Controversy but what they pretended to be Judges of, and all Causes were brought to Rome, which brought vast Profits to that Court.

BUT that which proved of greatest Advantage and Profit to the Court of Rome, and was the Means of bringing Poverty on the Kingdom, was the Collation of Benefices, and the various Ways and Means invented, and afterwards established by their Decretals and Extravagantes; and much more by the Rules of Chancery, by which almost all the Money of our Churches and Monasteries was spent in Rome.

IN the first Ages of the Church the Name of Benefice was never heard of, nor during all the time of the quadripartite Division of the Goods was it ever mentioned; but that Division being afterwards laid aside and annulled, many Alterations followed. As that Share which was allotted for the Poor was given to the Bishops with the Burthen of maintaining them; so that Portion which was appointed for the Clergy ceas'd, and in lieu thereof certain Offices were assigned the Ecclesiasticks, and a settled Income allowed them, which the Ministers of the Church made use of as their own Goods; and this Right of collecting the said Incomes being annexed to the spiritual Ministry, was generally called Benefice; and it is commonly believed that this Name, and the Assignment of Income to each Minister began in the ninth Century about the Year 813, as may be gathered from the Council of Metz held that Year, where for the first time mention is made of Eccle- fiastical Benefice ¹. Thus, as those who fought for the Empire were rewarded with Fiefs, which were likewise called Benefices; so it was reasonable, that the Ministers militant for the Church should be rewarded with such Benefices, that is to say, with those Revenues and Ecclesiastical Dignities which were called Benefices; so that by such a Reward every one might be encouraged and enabled to perform his Duty and Office.

BUT these Benefices being only an annexed Right, and the Enjoyment of the Ecclesiastical Revenues depending on the Ministry by vertue of a Canonical Institution, it was necessary for the Person, who conferred a Benefice, to have a Right and Power of conferring; and for the Person, upon whom it was conferred, to be an Ecclesiastick, because of the Ministry, to which by a perpetual Right it was annexed. In Diocesses the Power of conferring belonged to the Bishops, who either did it freely, or of Necessity, when the Benefice could not be conferred upon any, but the Person whom the Patron, by vertue of his Patronage, presented; which Right he had acquired, either by having founded the Church, or endowed it with Possessions, upon which the Benefice was instituted.

THE Popes contrived Means not only to draw the Collations to Rome, and deprive the Bishops of them, and the Patrons of the Presentation, but likewise invented new Regulations, whereby every thing was made to contribute towards the acquiring of Riches. They prescribed a certain time, both to the Bishops and Patrons for making use of their Rights, which being elaps'd, the Collation devolv'd to the Church of Rome. Moreover, if unworthy Persons were presented, or others rendered incapable by the Canon Law, then they reserved the Power of dispensing to themselves only. If any Dispute happened between Persons named or elected, the Cause was brought to Rome, and very often the Benefice was given to neither of the contending Parties, but to a third Person. It was made a standing Rule, that the Pope could either concur with or prevent all Patrons. The Reservation was contrived as a Decree, by vertue whereof the Pope, before a Benefice becomes vacant, declares, that when it shall be vacant none can confer it. That all Vacancies by the Sentence of Courts shall be filled up by the Pope; as also all Vacancies by Deprivation, Translation from one Benefice to another, or Resignation; and he had likewise Power to dispose of all the Benefices of Cardinals, Officers of the Court, Legates, Nuncio's, Rectors and Treasurers within the Dominions of the Church of Rome; and in like manner the Benefices of those, who came to Court about Business, if in coming or returning they happened to die within forty Miles of the Court; as also all Vacancies occasioned by the Possessor's having had two Benefices.

UNDER the specious Pretence of abolishing the Plurality of Benefices, those who were possessed of them were ordered to resign; and for the Time to come, whoever enjoyed one Benefice and afterwards got another, was obliged to resign the first, which was to be disposed of by the Pope; whence Resignations were introduced.

IT was in this Century too that the Practice of holding Benefices in Commendam took its Rise, which, according to their ancient Institution, were only to last for a short time; because when a Benefice became vacant, which the Ordinary, for some Reasons, could not immediately supply, the Care of it was recommended by the Superior to some worthy Person, till it should be filled up; however he was not to apply the Incomes to his own Use, but to take care of them, and reserve them for the future Successor; but afterwards, though the Popes forbade Bishops to give Commendams for more than six Months, yet they themselves gave them for Life. And the Commendams of our vastly rich Abbeyes have brought more Treasure to Rome, than those of all other Parts of Italy.

POPE John XXII. who above all the rest was remarkable for his exquisite Art of squeezing Money out of every thing, having in his twenty Years Pontificate gathered an immense Sum of Money; and notwithstanding his Profuseness while he lived, leaving at his Death twenty five Millions, afterwards introduced the Annats, ordering, that for the Space of three Years to come, every Person, who should obtain a Benefice, whose Income should be above twenty four Duckets, should pay a Year's Income for passing the Bulls; which Payment, after the three Years were elapsed, was continued both by him and his Successors.

PENSIONS upon Benefices were likewise introduced, which have turned to better Account than the Benefices themselves. Then followed the Coadjutories, Gratie expectative, Spolia, and many other Devices for drawing Money to *Rome*¹. But the chief of all were the great Number of Prohibitions, in order to lay a Foundation for so many Dispensations afterwards, as well with Regard to the Plurality of Benefices, as the Degrees of Matrimony, Irregularities, Bastardy, and an infinite Number of other Cates; which Dispensations not being granted without Money, the general Royal Seat of Christendom was well provided with many different kinds of Sources for heaping up Treasures; whereby our Churches were impoverished, and our Bishops deprived of the Collation of almost all the Benefices of the Kingdom, which were for the most part bestowed in Rome upon Strangers, and the Natives excluded, contrary to the Prescription of the Canons.

CARDINAL Pallavicino says², when upon the Complaint of the Princes and Bishops, it was proposed in the General Diet held in Worms to reform these Abuses, that Pope Alexander's Legate protested loudly, that they might as well turn the whole World upside down; for, said he, to make the Church a Body Politick, and then confine her to the antient Discipline, is the same as to tie down a full grown Man to the Food of a sucking Child; for as the Constitutions of human Bodies alter, so it fares with Bodies Politick. And when the same thing was moved in the Council of Trent, at least to make some Reformation, it was taken more heinously ill, and gave more discontent, than any thing that could be proposed. The Prelates of the Pope's Party stood up for these Abuses, and defended them with the same Warmth, as if that Body Politick, and that great Monarchy had been to be dissolved; and the same Cardinal *Pallavicino*³ says plainly, that the Pope being the Supreme Prince, who has so many Great Senators, to whom Royal Honours are paid, and being placed upon the universal Royal Throne of Christendom, it ought not to seem strange, if, in order to keep up the Splendor of the Royal Ecclesiastical Chair, he has taken to himself all the Graces, Dispensations, Collations, and so many other Emoluments by Resignations, Regressions, Annats, Pensions, &c. and all the other Methods introduced for drawing Money to Rome; forasmuch as (says he) all Princes, without being blamed, exact the Taxes laid on their Subjects, in requital of the Favours and Privileges they heap upon them; so neither ought the Pope, who is the Supreme Prince and Monarch, to be blamed for what he grants and dispenses in Christendom; and as Princes bestow Fiefs or other Rewards upon any of their faithful Subjects who signalize themselves by some military or political Action; so the Pope as Supreme Prince bestows as many Benefices as he thinks fit upon those who have signalized themselves by any Action, or managed an Affair, a Legation or Nunciature to purpose, or done any other signal Service to the Holy See. and to remove the Incomparability of many Benefices, and the Impossibility of performing the several ministerial Duties annexed thereto, the bare reciting of the Breviary, and of the Canonical Hours in lieu thereof, was thought sufficient.

THIS same Cardinal says⁴, that in order to support this Royal Court, it was necessary to open many Fountains for drawing forth Money and Honours, wherewithal to maintain its Ministers with kingly Grandure and Pomp; and that therefore the Plurality of Benefices in one Person, without his being bound to Residence, was not to be minded: These are the sure Means (says he) whereby to support with Splendor the Dignity of the Clergy, and a Royal Ecclesiastical Court; and that one of the most effectual Means was plenty of these Benefices, which do not oblige the Incumbent to Residence: And elsewhere⁵ making use of the same Comparison, he avowedly says, that as, in order to the right Government of a State, the Prince's Treasury must always be full, so to keep the Pope's Coffers empty, who is the Supreme Prince, is the same as to unbinge all Discipline. Whence he concludes, that to reform the Datary, to forbid Ecclesiastical Judges to impose pecuniary Mulcts, and to take off the Fees for Dispensations, was putting a Stop to all Discipline; Since Money (these are his Words) virtually implies every thing; so by human Weakness a pecuniary Mulct affects Men more than any thing else that can be inflicted by a Court purely Ecclesiastical; which, like a Secular, when it cannot curb Licentiousness with Iron, must therefore do it by Silver.

Of the Cognizance of Causes.

ALL Appeals being carried to Rome, Care was taken to enlarge the Jurisdiction of the Episcopal Court, and to extend the Cognizance of the Ecclesiastical Judges over more Persons and more Causes, so that little was left to the secular Magistrates to trouble themselves about. However Frederick II. not willing to see some enormous and insufferable Crimes of the Clergy go unpunished, was wont frequently to chastise them; but Clement in the Conditions of the Investiture given to Charles by the twentieth Article would have it stipulated, that the Clergy should not be sued before a secular Judge either in civil or criminal Cases, except in those that concerned Fiefs. And the Encroachments which in these Times were practised, not only in our Kingdom, during the Reign of the Family of Anjou, but even in that of France, were surprizing; for our Kings of that Family holding their Crown of the Roman Pontiffs, and seeing that the Kings of France bore with those Encroachments, had not the Courage to resist. The Clergy being now wholly exempted from secular Jurisdiction, and enriched with many Privileges and Immunities, first of all it was resolved to have that Exemption extended to many Persons, who were not of the Clergy.

I. THEY included in the Number of the Clergy all those who had received Tonsure, although they were married, and did not follow Ecclesiastick Employments; and *Loyseau*¹ says, that in France the thing was carried to so great Excess, that almost every Body was within their Jurisdiction, because all took Tonsure, more for obtaining Exemption from the Jurisdiction of the King and their Lord, than for serving the Church. Therefore in France this bad Practice, with respect to Exemption from Taxes and Customs, in the Year 1274, was remedied by King Philip the Hardy, who would have the married Clergy to be subject to Taxes, like mere Laicks, and their Immunity to be extended only to the Courts of Justice; of which afterwards they were likewise deprived by the Edict of Roussillon, by which this Immunity was only allowed to the Clergy in holy Orders; and after that, the Parliament allowed it also to those that had Benefices. But in our Kingdom this Grievance was only remedied so far as it regarded the Exemption from Taxes and Customs, because our Kings of the Family of Anjou made the Constitution of Boniface VIII. take place in our Kingdom, whereby the Privilege of Immunity was granted to the married Clergy; whence King Robert in the Year 1322, ordered his Officers to have regard to that Privilege, and not to proceed against such Clergy, either in civil or criminal Cases, provided they had been married to Maids, and had got the Tonsure, and wore the Habit of the Clergy, and did not meddle with Merchandising or Traffick; nor had, after committing the Crime, in order to shun the Punishment, taken the Tonsure and Habit²: Which Ordinance was afterwards in the Year 1347 renewed by Queen *Joan I.*³, and confirmed by King Ferdinand I. of Aragon by his Pragmatick⁴ enacted in the Year 1469.

IN our Kingdom the Friars of the third Order of S. Francis, who wear Cloaks and Cords, and live in Cloisters, are likewise intitled to Exemption from the Secular Courts. And during the Reign of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, Exemption was extended even to the Concubines of the Clergy; and we read, that the Clergy of the City and Diocess of Marsico quarrelled with King Robert, because the Justice of the Province of the Hither Principato proceeded against their Concubines; for Charles II. Robert's Father having by a Law ordained, that Concubines who continued a Year under Excommunication should be fin'd in a certain Sum of Money, the Justice would needs exact the Fine; whereupon King Robert in the Year 1317, ordered him not to proceed against them by vertue of that Law of his Father, nor to trouble their Persons or Goods, but to leave their Punishment to the Prelates of the Churches ¹.

THERE sprung up likewise in the Kingdom the Diaconi Sylvatici, who also pretended Exemption; and for remedying this Grievance, the abovementioned Ferdinand I. in the Year 1479, was forced to publish a Pragmatick ², by which it was ordained, that whenever it was found that they were not appointed for the Service of any Church, but meddled in secular Affairs, and had only the bare Name of Deacons and Clergy, they were to be looked upon as mere Laicks, and should be in Subjection to the secular Courts of Justice, and were equally liable to be sued in civil as well as criminal Cases before the secular Judges; nor were they exempt from Taxes, Customs, and other Burdens laid upon the Laity. And they were afterwards deprived of the Benefit of Can. si quis suadente, and of the Privilege of the Courts of Justice in civil Cases, and had it only in criminal and civil Cases with respect to their Persons, and personal Duties, but not as to Taxes, Imposts, and other Collections belonging to the King. All which Points were better regulated, and the Grievances partly redressed, by several Deliberations of our Collateral Council, and the Tribunal of the Chamber of Accounts; for which see Chioccarelli ³.

IT was likewise a controverted Point among us, whether the Domesticks of Bishops, both in civil and criminal Cases, ought to be judged by the Bishops, or by the Secular Judges ⁴; the Ecclesiasticks pretending to call them before the Episcopal Court.

THE Ecclesiasticks, in Consequence of that misunderstood Maxim, mobilia sequuntur personam, extended the Exemption granted to their Persons, even to their Moveables, so that none of the Moveables of the Clergy either married or unmarried could be attached, or adjudged to any Person by a Lay Magistrate.

II. THEY maintained, that all Causes, wherein Breach of Faith was concerned, and consequently Sin, belonged to their Jurisdiction, because the Soul was engaged, whereof they had the Direction; and thus they understood that Passage of the Gospel, Si peccaverit frater tuus dic Ecclesie, particularly when the Parties accused one another, which Accusation they call Denunciatio Evangelica, at large treated of in the Decretals ⁵; where the Pope takes upon him to be Judge of the Differences between the Kings of France and England, concerning the Devolution of all the Fiefs and Lordships which the King of England held of that Crown, on Account of his Rebellion, to the King of France; wherefore they pretended to be Judges competent of all personal Actions among the Laity, saying, that such Actions were seldom free from Breach of Faith, and consequently sinful in one of the Parties; and when the Question was about performing of Contracts, they made no Difficulty in appointing themselves Judges, because of the Oath, which, by the common Stile of Notaries, is inserted in all Contracts ⁶, maliciously confounding Censura morum with Jurisdictio; and Correctio penitentialis with Justitia contentiosa, without regarding Nathan's Case with David recorded in Gratian's Decree ⁷.

III. BY the same Parity of Reason they affirmed, that they were Judges of Testaments, as being a Matter of Conscience, saying, that they were the proper Executors of them; but what is more, the Body of the Testator being left to be buried by the Church, she likewise became Mistress of his Moveables in order to quiet his Soul, and execute his Testament. And Loyseau ⁸ tells us, that there had been a Custom introduced into England, that when any Person died without making a Will, the Bishop, or one appointed by him, seized the Moveables of the Deceased. And that formerly in France the Ecclesiasticks would not bury the Dead, unless the Testament was put in their Hands; if otherwise, a special Licence from the Bishop was necessary; insomuch, that in the Year 1407, the Parliament was forced to remedy this intolerable Grievance, by making an Edict against the Bishop of Amiens and the Curates of Abbeville, obliging them to bury those that died intestate, without any Delay, or particular Order from the Bishop. And that it had likewise been a Custom in France, in order to save the Honour of those that died intestate, for the Heirs to ask a Licence of the Bishop to impower them to make a Testament for the Deceas'd, ad pias causas; and in that Case the Ecclesiasticks obliged the Heirs to agree upon Arbiters for determining the Sum which the Deceas'd ought to have left to the Church.

FROM these Encroachments of the Clergy in our Kingdom arose the Pretension of some Bishops, to arrogate to themselves the Power of making Testaments, ad pias causas, for the Laicks who died intestate, in the same manner as formerly the Bishops of Nocera de Pagani, Alife, Oppido, S. Marco, and other Prelates had claimed in their Diocesses a Power of applying the Goods of the Deceased to their own Uses, which they frequently put in Practice. And in some parts of the Kingdom the Prelates pretended to apply to their own Uses indifferently the fourth Part of the Moveables of those that died intestate. And it was not without a great Struggle, and but of late Years, by the reiterated Deliberations of the Royal Chamber of Accounts, and the Votes of the Collateral Council, that these Grievances were redressed; and the Bishops were enjoined not to pretend to assume to themselves such a Power; and those that disobeyed were proceeded against even to the Sequestration of their Revenues, and Imprisonment of their Accomplices; nor was the Bishop of Nocera spared, although he alledged Prescription, being adjudged guilty of an unpardonable Grievance, and a Corruption rather than a laudable Custom¹.

WHENCE likewise proceeded the Custom which still subsists among us, as also in France, that Curates or Vicars are as capable of drawing Testaments as Notaries; and when they make them ad pias causas, though without Solemnity, they are still good and valid.

IV. BY Reason of Connexity, if amongst many Buyers, Coheirs, or Debtors there happen to be one Clergyman, according to the Canonists, the Clergyman, on Account of his Dignity, ought to carry all the other Parties before his Judge. Moreover they maintained, that a Laick could refer his Cause to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, but a Clergyman could not refer his to the Secular; and affirmed also, that it belonged to the Ecclesiastical Judge to supply the Defects or Negligence of the secular Magistrate; but not reciprocally; and when the Reason was asked them, they said it was, because that formerly the Ecclesiasticks were not only Judges of the Clergy, but likewise of the Laity; and that according to Cardinal *Ostiensis*², no Inconveniency would follow, if things returned to their former Channel. And we have clearly seen from the preceding Books of this History, that the Justitia contentiosa granted to Ecclesiasticks by Princes, is distinct from the Justitia ordinaria; and therefore was called Privilegium Clericale, and the Canonists call it Privilegium Fori, to denote that it is contrary to the common Law.

V. THEY asserted, that all difficult Cases, especially in Point of Reason, belonged to them, and chiefly when the Lawyers and Judges differed in their Opinions, for which they quoted that Passage of *Deuteronomy*³: Si difficile, & ambiguum apud te judicium esse prospexeris, & judicium intra portas videris variari, venies ad sacerdotes Levitici generis, & ad judicem, qui fuerit illo tempore, qui judicabunt tibi veritatem, & facies quaecunque dixerint qui præsunt in loco, quem elegerit Dominus. Although the great Difference between the Roman Laws, and the Polity of the Old and New Testament be manifest to every Body. And from this Principle it comes to pass, that in many Places of the Decretals we see difficult Cases decided by the Popes, which by no means belonged to the Ecclesiastical Court; as for Example the famous Decretal *Raynutius*⁴.

VI. THEY said, That it was their Business to supply the Defects, Negligence or Suspicion of Partiality in Lay Judges⁵; and under this Pretext, if a great Process depended long in a secular Tribunal, they brought it before their own. Whence they claimed to themselves the Power of judging secular Magistrates suspected of Corruption; and this Grievance was not only introduced into France, as Loyseau tells us ¹, but also into the Kingdoms of Spain ²; and with us it got footing in the Reign of the Kings of the Family of Anjou: For such was the Cunning and Artifice of the Popes, or the Stupidity of the Princes of that Family, that it is very surprising to find amongst the Customs of the High Court of the Vicariate ³, a Pragmatick of Queen Joan II. by which she ordains, that (excepting the City of Naples, where she would have the Great Protonotary to be Judge of Suspicions) in all other Cities and Places of the Kingdom, Suspicions were to be brought before the Bishop of the Diocess, or his Vicar: And though in the Reign of the Kings of the House of Aragon it was not observed, yet the Bishops, whenever they had an Opportunity, did not fail to take Cognizance of them.

BUT when the Spaniards came to the Crown, they made use of more effectual Means for redressing that Grievance; for in the Year 1551, the Archbishop of Acerenza having attempted to take Cognizance of the Suspicion alledged before him by the Governor of Pietrapertosa against his under Officers, D. Peter of Toledo, at the Instance of that Corporation, with the Consent of the Royal Collateral Council, wrote a serious exhortatory Letter to the Archbishop, intimating to him, that he must forbear taking Cognizance of that Suspicion, because the Cognizance of such Matters belonged to the King's Jurisdiction, such a pretended Pragmatick not being observed; and that if he did otherwise he would be proceeded against as an Usurper of the Royal Jurisdiction ⁴: And Prosper Caravita says ⁵, that he caused this Letter to be printed among the other Pragmaticks of this Kingdom, which is still to be seen in that Volume. And when D. Parafan de Rivera was Viceroy, it being told him, that the Bishops and their Vicars in the Provinces of the Hither Principato and Basilicata had presumed to take Cognizance of Cases wherein Judges were suspected, in the Year 1566 he directed a peremptory Order to the Governor of these Provinces, commanding him, in his Name, to issue out a Proclamation thro' all the Cities, Towns and Places of these Provinces, that in Cases of Suspicion, the Parties concerned were not any more to have recourse to the Bishops of the Diocesses, but that they were to make their Application to the Royal Courts, where Justice should be duly administred; which Order was likewise printed amongst our Pragmaticks ⁶, in order to have the Grievance effectually abolished.

VII. UNDER Pretence that by the antient Canons the Bishop was the Protector of Persons in Distress, such as Widows, Pupils, Strangers and the Poor, they pretended to take Cognizance of all their Causes ⁷; notwithstanding there is a manifest Difference between protecting the Distressed, and obtaining Justice for them by becoming their Judges.

VIII. THEY contrived another kind of a Judicature, called, Forum Mixtum, insinuating, that both the secular Magistrate and the Bishop might proceed against a Laick, allowing Prevention in the Crimes of Bigamy, Usury, Sacrilege, Adultery, Incest, Concubinage, Blasphemy, Sorcery and Perjury, as also in the Cases of Tithes and Legacies for pious Uses; in which they had always the Advantage, because by their exquisite Industry, they always prevented the secular Magistrate, and brought all the Grist to their own Mills; and besides, they looked upon these as Ecclesiastical Crimes. These Grievances indeed were not quite redress'd in our Kingdom till the Reign of the Spaniards, who allowed of no Prevention; and it was wholly left to the secular Magistrate to take Cognizance of the abovemention'd Crimes in Laicks ⁸; for those by no Means could be said to be Ecclesiastical, because Ecclesiastical Crimes must certainly be, either those that concern the Ecclesiastical Polity, as Justinian says in Nov. 83. or the lesser Crimes, which the ordinary Courts of Justice overlook, and whereof the Primitive Church undertook the Censure or Correction, in order to preserve a particular Purity of Manners amongst Christians; but that Corrections were summarily executed, and without any judicial Trial, as we have observed in the first and second Books of this History.

IX. THEY pretended that all matrimonial Cases belonged to them, saying, that Matrimony having been advanced to be a Sacrament by our Saviour Jesus Christ, all Matters relating to it ought to be decided by Ecclesiastical Judges. But we have seen in the preceding Centuries, that the Catholick Princes took care of matrimonial Affairs; it being most evident, that the Laws of Matrimony, prohibiting and dispensing with the Degrees, were all established by the Emperors; and as long as the Roman Laws were in force, all Processes depending on them were discussed by the secular Magistrate; which the bare reading of the Theodosian and Justinian Codes and of the Novellæ plainly demonstrates. And in the Prescripts of Cassiodorus ¹, as we have observed elsewhere, the Words are recorded which the Ostrogoth Kings made use of in dispensing with the prohibited Degrees, which were then looked upon to belong to the Civil Government, and not to be a religious Concern; and it is most notorious to any versed in History, that the Ecclesiasticks began to judge in Matters of that Nature, partly by Order, and partly by the Negligence of Princes and Magistrates. But now, by the Decision of the Council of Trent ², it is no longer lawful to call that in Question.

LASTLY, the Roman Doctors ³ took upon them to teach, that Delinquents in the Territories of other Princes ought not to be pardoned, but sent directly to Rome to be punished; because the Pope being Lord of the City of Rome, which is the common native Country of all Men (the Emperor Antoninus having established by a Law ⁴, that all those born within the Roman Empire were Citizens of Rome) he could lawfully judge and punish them ⁵.

THEIR Encroachments did not stop here, for there are innumerable other Cases wherein Laicks were forced to plead before Ecclesiastical Judges, of which it is not for my purpose to make a longer Catalogue in this Place. Nevertheless Ostiensis has summ'd them up in seven Verses ⁶, which whoever considers must be surprized to see what an unbounded Latitude the Ecclesiasticks took in those Times in extending their Jurisdiction; whence we may likewise see that there is no end in Usurpation, when once the Bounds of Reason are exceeded and transgressed.

ALL these Usurpations of Ecclesiastical Judges continued for a long time amongst us during the Reign of the Family of Anjou, as also in France; but afterwards the French, having applied strong and effectual Remedies, broke their Chains; and by the Edict of 1539 cramped them so, as to reduce their Judicature within the Bounds of Reason; leaving only to the Church the Power of administering the Sacraments to all Persons, and to take Cognizance of the Causes of Ecclesiasticks only; which was effectually to restore the ancient Distinction between the two Powers, leaving the Persons and Things spiritual to the Ecclesiastical Judicature, and temporal to the Secular. In our Kingdom the Spaniards began to redress these Grievances, but they did not reduce their Judicature within such just Bounds, as was done in France; for the Spaniards, as Peter de Marc Archbishop of Paris wisely observed, and which we shall shew when we come to treat of their Government, took in Hand to cure the Wounds of the Royal Jurisdiction with Plaisters and Ointments, and not with Fire and Sword as the French did.

S E C T. IV.

The Tribunal of the Inquisition.

IN order to the more effectual establishing the Monarchy, in this Century the Tribunal of the Inquisition was introduced into Rome. Innocent III. as we have seen in the fifteenth Book of this History, had not erected any Tribunal for the Inquisitors; neither did our Emperor Frederick II. erect any among us, but left it to the ordinary Magistrates to condemn Hereticks, who with the Prelates of the Churches were appointed to be Judges, whether the Facts alledged amounted to Heresy or not; and to them was the Extirpation of Hereticks committed. But the Death of the Emperor Frederick putting the Affairs of Germany in Confusion, and Italy being under an Interreign, which lasted twenty three Years, Innocent IV. was in a manner left Umpire in Lombardy and some other Parts of Italy; considering therefore the great Progress which the Hereticks had made during the late Troubles, he set about the Extirpation of them; and when he called to mind the Pains which the Dominican and Franciscan Monks had heretofore taken in that Service, he thought his only Expedient was to make use of them by employing them, not as formerly, in preaching and assembling those who entered into Crusades, but by giving them a standing Authority, and appointing a settled Tribunal for that Purpose only.

THERE were but two things stood in the Way of this Project; one was how, without Confusion, to withdraw the Cases of Heresy from the Episcopal Court, where they had always been judged, and to appoint a Tribunal for them only; and the other, how to exclude the secular Magistrate, to whom the Punishment of Hereticks was committed, as well by the antient Laws of the Empire as by those of the Emperor Frederick II. And lastly by particular Statutes, which every City had been obliged to make, to prevent the Ruin of their Government in those troublesome Times. For the first Inconveniency the Pope found an Expedient, by erecting a Tribunal composed of the Inquisitor and the Bishop; in which nevertheless the Inquisitor was not only to be the Principal, but to have the Power, and the Bishop to have little more than the Name. In order therefore to give some Colour of Authority to the secular Magistrates, he allowed them to appoint Officers for the Inquisition, but even those to be of the Inquisitor's own chusing; and when the Inquisitor made a Progress into the Country, one of their Assistants was to be sent along with him, who was also to be nominated by the Inquisitor, to apply a third part of the confiscated Goods to the Publick, and other such like things, which in appearance made the secular Magistrate a Partner with the Inquisitor, but in reality a Servant only. What yet remained was to provide Money for the Expences of keeping and maintaining Prisoners; whereupon it was ordered that the Publick should be at that Charge; and thus it was resolved in the Year 1251, the Pope being then in Brescia.

THEREFORE the Dominican Friars were pitched upon to be Inquisitors in Lombardy, Remagna, and Marea Trivisana, who, executing their Commission with great Rigour, occasioned some Tumults in Lombardy; for the Year following Innocent having made Choice of Pietro da Verona of the Order of Preaching Friars to be Inquisitor of Milan; this Man, in order to extirpate from that City some infected with Heresy, who called themselves Believers, was very sedulous in punishing them; He imprisoned some (these are Pansa's Words) others he banished, but he delivered up the Obstinate to the secular Magistrate, and caused them to be burnt alive; and having already put many to Death, the Execution of the rest was deferred till after Easter; these Processes which the Inquisitor had caused to be drawn up, so terrified some of the chief Men of the Milanese, against whom these Processes were levelled, that they combined together, and resolved to be beforehand with the Inquisitor by putting him to Death; whereupon they employed some Assassines, who posted themselves in a lonely Place between Milan and Como, through which the Inquisitor was to pass, and who as soon as they saw him, fell upon him with their naked Swords and killed him. This having made a great Noise in Milan, the Assassines were severely punished; and Innocent, looking upon the Inquisitor as a Martyr, on the first Sunday of Lent in the following Year 1253 with great Solemnity canonis'd him, and enroll'd him in the Catalogue of the Saints, under the Name of Peter Martyr of Verona. In the same manner did many of that Order signalize themselves; and many likewise of the Friars Minors being sent to the Country about Toulouse, a great Number of them too were murdered.

NEVERTHELESS Innocent did not think fit to abate any thing of his Rigour; but on the contrary, seven Months after he had prescribed the Laws for this Tribunal in Brescia, he directed a Bull to all the Governors, Counsellors and Corporations of the abovesaid three Provinces, prescribing to them thirty one Articles, which they were to observe for the good Success of this new Tribunal, commanding, that those Articles should be registred among the publick Statutes, and inviolably observed. He afterwards gave Authority to the Inquisitors to excommunicate and interdict them, in case they did not obey. Nevertheless the Pope had no Mind for the present to introduce the Inquisition into other Places, either in Italy, or elsewhere, saying, that the said three Provinces were more immediately under his Eye, and more beloved by him. But the true Reason was, because they were destitute of Princes, and his Authority was great in them; for every City consisting of a distinct Government, the Pope had his Faction in them, because in the late Wars he had been engaged in the same Cause. But notwithstanding all this the Bull was not readily complied with; insomuch, that Alexander IV. his Successor, seven Years after in 1259 was forced to modify and renew it. Nevertheless he ordered the Inquisitors by Censures to oblige the chief Magistrates of the Cities to observe it.

FOR the same Reason Clement IV. seven Years after, to wit in 1265, renewed it in the same manner; yet for all that it was not put in execution every where, till four other Popes his Successors were obliged to make use of their utmost Efforts to surmount the Difficulties, which thwarted the Reception of this Tribunal in some Places. These Difficulties proceeded from two Causes; the one from the rash Severity of the Inquisitors, their Extorsions and other Grievances; the other, because the Publick refused to pay the Expences, wherefore they did not insist upon that Point; and to moderate the excessive Rigour of the Inquisitors they gave a little more Power to the Bishop, which occasioned less Difficulty in introducing the Inquisition into these three Provinces of Lombardy, Marca Trivisana and Romagna, and afterwards into Tuscany, Aragon, and some Cities of Germany and France. But it was soon prohibited in France and Germany; and some of the Inquisitors were driven out of these Countries, as well for their Cruelty and Extortions, as for want of Business. For the same Reasons too they were reduced to a very small Number in Aragon, for they had not reached the other Kingdoms of Spain.

DURING the Reign of the House of Suevia, the Method of proceeding against Hereticks, established by the Emperor Frederick, was not altered in our Kingdom. Neither after Frederick's Death, on Account of the Enmity and continual Wars carried on by Innocent and the succeeding Popes against Conrad and Manfred his Successors, was there any Novelty introduced. It was the Business of the General Courts instituted by Frederick to take notice of such Hereticks, as the Bishop gave Information of; and as they were proceeded against by the Judge, whose Office it was to determine upon the Fact and Punishment, so it was the Prelate's to declare whether the Facts amounted to Heresy or not. It was our own Princes, and not the Popes, that appointed the Prelates for this Office, who, as often as Occasion required, made Progresses through the Provinces with the Royal Judges; as often then as any were found guilty of Heresy, and obstinately persisted in their Error, they were put to Death; but if there were Hopes of Amendment, they were sent to the Monastery of Monte Cassino, or to that of Cava, where they were kept Prisoners, until they had abjured their Error, and paid the Penalty imposed upon them, as we have shewn in the preceding Books of this History.

BUT when the Kingdom fell into the Hands of the Princes of the Family of Anjou, Liege-Men of the Popes, although there was no settled Tribunal of Inquisition, depending upon that of Rome, introduced among us; nevertheless from time to time the Popes were wont to appoint by Commission particular Inquisitors, for the most part Dominicans, who travelled all over the Provinces, and, by the Favour and Authority of the secular Magistrate, put their Commission in execution. And altho' these Commissions could not be put in execution without the Royal Assent, yet our Princes of that Family, on Account of the Subjection they were under to the Popes, not only did not hinder them, but ordered their Judges to favour and assist them; but what is more, they frequently allowed their Expences out of the Royal Treasury. Thus Charles I. of Anjou, in the Year 1269, ordered his Ministers to pay to Fr. Giacomo di Chieti a Dominican, Inquisitor in the Provinces of Terra di Bari and

* An ancient Gold Coin of the first Emperors.

Capitanata, appointed such by the Pope, an Augustale * a Day for maintaining himself, his Companion, a Notary, three other Persons and their Horses ¹; and in the same Year he ordered the Governor of the Province of Terra di Lavoro to give all Assistance, Advice and Favour to Fr. Trojano, appointed Inquisitor by the Apostolick See, when and whenever he pleased, and to put the Sentences, which he should pronounce against Hereticks, their Goods and Abettors, speedily in Execution ². Moreover the Royal Secretaries of Puglia were ordered to furnish Fr. Simone di Benevento, of the Order of Preaching Friars, with thirty Ounces of Gold, being appointed by the Church of Rome Inquisitor of Basilicata and Terra d'Otranto ³. The same King in the Year 1271 commanded his Ministers to pay an Augustale a Day to Fr. Matteo di Castellammare, Inquisitor in the Provinces of Calabria for maintaining himself, another Friar his Companion, a Notary and three other Persons ⁴; and in the Year 1278 he sent many Letters to the Justices of Abbruzzo, the Governors of Aquila and to all his Officers, requiring them to give all Assistance to Fr. Bartolommeo dell' Aquila, of the Order of Preaching Friars, appointed by the Apostolick See Inquisitor of Sicily, and to torture the Guilty, according as the said Inquisitor should direct; and also that they should put in Execution whatever he should command them to do ⁵.

CHARLES II. his Son in the Year 1305 gave Orders to all his Barons and Officers to aid and assist Fra. Angelo di Trani, appointed Inquisitor by the Apostolick See, by putting and keeping in Prison Persons defiled with Heresy, according as the said Inquisitor should think fit; not to molest his Men for carrying Arms to execute the Sentences which he should award against the Persons of Hereticks and their Goods; and put to the Rack those imprisoned, in order to compel them and others to confess the Truth ⁶: And in the Year 1307 the Pope gave it in charge to Fr. Roberto di S. Valentino, Inquisitor of the Kingdom of Sicily, That he should with all Rigour proceed against the Archpriest of Bucclanico, who had been formerly chastised by Benedict his Predecessor, and was relapsed into his former Errors, for maintaining false Doctrine concerning some Articles of the Catholick Faith ⁷.

THIS Prince in the Years 1295 and 1307 wrote to his Son Philip Prince of Achaia and Taranto, that Pope Clement V. had sent a Brief to Robert Duke of Calabria his Son, and Vicar-General of the Kingdom, advising him, that the King of France had with exceeding Care at one and the same time imprisoned all the Knights Templars that were in France, and confiscated their Goods on Account of their Heresy; and therefore the Pope begged of him, with the Advice of his most judicious Counsellors, that with great Caution and Secrecy, he would in the like manner imprison all the Knights-Templars that were in his Dominions; and that they being imprisoned should be kept in safe Custody till he should have Orders from the Apostolick Chamber, and in name of the said Chamber to sequester all their Goods; whereupon King Charles ordered his said Son to put the said Brief in execution in Achaia, as the Duke of Calabria should do in the Kingdom.

KING Robert his Successor in the Year 1334 likewise ordered his Officers to give all Assistance to the Inquisitors sent from Rome; and Queen Joan I. in the Year 1334 did the same; King Lewis also in the Year 1352 followed their Example; so did King Charles III. in the Year 1381, who gave to Tommaso Marincola his Domeftick the confiscated Goods of the Bishop of Trivento a Heretick, and a declared Rebel to the Church and the faid King, for his adhering to the Antipope ¹.

THIS Office however was not folety conferred upon the Preaching Friars, for the Friars Minors had their Share, and being appointed Inquifitors by the Pope, they alfo traversed our Provinces. The Number of Hereticks in this Century was hugely increafed, of diverfe Sects and Institutions. Some, leaving their Orders, and affecting to live like Solitaries, without Rule or Superiors; and to lead more aultere Lives, retired to Defarts, rambled about the Country and polluted many People with their Errors. They called themfelves Fraticelli, or little Friars, out of Humility, Begardi, or Beghins, and Puritans; and their Number increafed very much in the Mountains of Abruzzo, and Marca d'Ancona. They hadprung from the Friars Minors, and had almoft all the fame Principles and the fame Conduct; their chief Leaders were two Friars Minors, Pietro di Macerata, and Pietro di Foro Sempronio, who firft obtained a Permiſſion from Pope Clement V. a Lover of Retirement, to lead a hermetical Life, and literally to follow the Rule of S. Francis; but Honorius IV. Nicolas IV. and Boniface VIII. condemned their Institution afterwards; and their Succeſſors Clement V. and John XXII. ſuppreſſed them altogether ². The Charge of extirpating them was generally given to the Friars Minors; whence we read, that Boniface VIII. ordered Fr. Marco di Chieti, of the Order of Friars Minors, Inquifitor in the Province of S. Francis, to go to the Mountains of Abruzzo, and to Marca d'Ancona; and if need were, to require Aſſiſtance of the ſecular Magiſtrate, and to proceed againſt them and their Favourers, to diſcover their lurking Holes; and ſend them Priſoners to Rome, where they were to be proſecuted with the utmoſt Severity ³. Therefore they retired to Sicily, and began to inveigh againſt the Prelates and the Church of Rome by calling her another Babylon.

IN this manner was the Inquifition managed among us, during the Reign of the Princes of Anjou; but how much this Kingdom diſtinguiſhed itſelf above all others, by totally abolishing the leaſt Remains of the Inquifition, ſhall be related in its Place in the following Books of this Hiſtory.

Monks and Temporalities.

HENCEFORTH it will be neceſſary to join the Monks and Temporalities together, becauſe as we have obſerved elſewhere, that a Religious Order and Riches are ſynonimous Terms: So now the Monks being more ſkilled in the Acquisition of Riches, than all the other Eccleſiaſticks; inſomuch, that there is no Proportion between the Acquiſitions made by the Churches in theſe Times, and thoſe made by the Monaſteries, we may therefore ſay, New Religious Orders, new Riches; and what makes this Matter the more monſtrous, is, that notwithſtanding they were founded upon Mendicity, whence they were called Mendicants, yet the Acquiſitions and Riches were immense.

THE Religious Orders thatprung up in this Century, had as good Succeſs in preſerving and ſupporting the Roman Monarchy, as if they had been ſo many Legions; and the Popes were never ſo well ſerved by the others, as by them, who laboured with all their Might to maintain their Authority, and facilitate their Undertakings; ſo that they very wiſely loaded them with many Privileges and Prerogatives. Thoſe who diſtinguiſhed themſelves the moſt in this Age were the Preaching Friars and the Friars Minors. The Author of the firſt, as we have ſeen, was Dominick Guſman, who having for a long time preached againſt the Albigenſes in the Year 1215, reſolved with nine of his Companions to found an Order of Preaching Friars, on purpoſe to employ their preaching for the Extirpation of Heresy, which at that time encreaſed very much in Italy and France. Dominick went to the Pope to ſollicit for a Confirmation of his Order; but the Pope deferred giving it, and dying, Honorius III. his Succeſſor in the Year 1218 confirmed it, and conſented consented to permit the Religious to lay aside the Habit of Canons Regular, which they had hitherto wore, and to take a particular Habit, and observe new Rules. They multiplied in France, and from the Year 1217 had a Monastery in Paris in S. James's Street, whence they were called Jacobins. They no sooner appeared than they came to our Kingdom to found Monasteries, and they had a very kind Reception; for the Patareni and other Hereticks having begun to pollute Naples and the other Provinces, Gregory IX. sent them to Naples; and in the Year 1231 wrote to Pietro di Sorrento Archbishop of that City, to give them a favourable Reception, to employ them in preaching, and to declare to the People committed to his charge, that they would receive from their Mouths the Seed of the Word of God; they being Men who had signalized themselves so much in extirpating Heresy, and by a Vow of voluntary Poverty had dedicated themselves wholly to the preaching of the Gospel of Jesus Christ ¹. He likewise charged him to provide them with a convenient Habitation in Naples, that by living therein commodiously, they might with the greater Fervency discharge the Duty imposed upon them. He wrote such another Letter to the People of Naples, to receive them favourably and reverently, that thereby they might happily attain their Ends, and reap the Fruit of their Labours, to wit, the Salvation of Souls ²; and he likewise recommended to Cardinal Castiglione his Apostolick Legate in the Kingdom of Sicily, to enjoin the Archbishop to give them a gracious Welcome; wherefore the Archbishop, having received the Pope's Letters and the Legate's Recommendation, received them honourably, and gave them for a Habitation the Church of the holy Archangel ad Morsifam, with a large Monastery adjoining to it, which was then in Possession of the Benedictin Monks, who, having other large Monasteries in Naples, yielded that to the Preaching Friars, by resigning it into the Hands of the Archbishop, with all the Houses and adjacent Gardens. The Archbishop and Chapter invested Fra. Tommaso with them, under whose Direction these Monks had come, and delivered him the Bull, which we read in Chioccarelli ³, dated the thirty first of November 1231. These Monks enlarged their Convent afterwards (and changing the old Name, called it after their Founder S. Dominick) with other contiguous Gardens, which they got from Giovanni Brancaccio, to which the same Archbishop in the Year 1246 gave his Consent. In the Year 1269, in the Time of the Archbishop Aiglerio they enlarged it much more by new Acquisitions ⁴; and it was still more increased afterwards in the Reign of Charles II. of Anjou, a great Lover of that Order, for which see Eugenio his Napoli Sacra.

THE Kings of that Family, not content with having one single Convent of Preaching Monks in Naples, the same Charles II. in the Year 1274 built another in Honour of S. Pietro Martyr of Verona, who, as we have said, was enrolled in the Catalogue of the Saints by Innocent IV. in the Year 1235. He endowed it with rich Farms, many Houses and other Revenues. After the Example of the Prince many noble Neapolitans bestowed great Riches upon it, such as Errico Macedonio, Bernardo Caracciolo, Giacomo Capano and others recorded by Eugenio.

THIS Prince built likewise a Church and Convent in Aversa for the Monks of this Order, by the Name of S. Lewis, who was his Uncle, to which he gave most ample Privileges, and endowed it with great Revenues ⁵.

THE Dominican Sisters who lived under the same Rules, got likewise a very commodious Habitation in Naples. At the Instance of Mary, the Wife of Charles II. Pope Boniface VIII. ordered the Archbishop of Capua to give for a Habitation to the Dominican Nuns the Monastery of S. Peter a Castello, situate within Castle Nuovo, with all the Houses and Possessions; and to remove the Benedictin Monks, who possessed that Place, to the Monasteries of S. Severino, S. Maria a Capella, and S. Sebastian. But the Monastery of S. Peter being afterwards pillaged by the Catalans, and the Nuns turned out with great Dishonour; Pope Martin V. wrote to the Abbot of S. Severino, to receive them into the Monastery of S. Sebastian, which had then been given in Commendam to the Bishop of Melito, where only one single Benedictine Monk lived; and that he should give them all its Possessions and Revenues, which was done; whence by the said Union that Monastery retains to this Day the Name of S. Peter and S. Sebastian ⁶.

THE Preaching Friars, what by the Favour of the Popes, and by the Affection of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, multiplied in this Century not only in Naples, but over all the Kingdom. Innocent IV. in the Year 1245. dispatched a Bull to the Archbishops of Naples, Salerno and Bari, giving them Power, in the Name of the Apostolick See, strictly to command all the Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and all the Prelates of the Churches of the Kingdoms of Sicily to do no Injury to the Preaching Friars, and to forbid their Vassals to give them any Molestation; and to take care to maintain them in the free Enjoyment of all the Exemptions and Immunities granted them by the Apostolick See¹. Thus by the Indulgence of the Popes and the Princes of the Family of Anjou did their Number grow much greater, than it had been during the Reigns of Frederick and his Successors of the House of Suevia; and their Order got great Honour by Thomas Aquinas, surnamed the Angelical Doctor, descended of the Family of the Counts of Aquino, who in the Year 1241, contrary to his Mother's Inclination, entered into the Order of Preaching Friars; and in 1255, having taken the Degree of Doctor of Divinity, in 1263 he returned to Italy; and after he had there taught the Scholastick Divinity in most of the Universities, at last he settled in Naples to read Divinity, and refused the Archbishoprick of that City offered him by Clement IV.

THE Friars Minors had no less Success in this Kingdom. They acknowledge for their Founder S. Francis of Assisi, and had their Rise at the same time with the Valdenses; but their Fortune was not the same. Peter Valdo a rich Merchant of Lyons took a Resolution to lead a Life altogether Apostolical; and having distributed all his Riches amongst the Poor, made Profession of voluntary Poverty. Many followed his Example, so that about the Year 1160 there sprung up a Sect, who called themselves the Poor Men of Lyons, because of the Poverty which they professed. They also took the Name of Lyonists from the City of Lyons; as also Sandalists, from a certain sort of Pumps or Sandals which they wore, cut open to let their naked Skin appear, in Imitation of the Apostles. But they afterwards pretended too, without any Mission from the Bishop or the Apostolick See, to preach up Reformation, and of themselves to teach their Doctrine, though they were only Lay-Men. The Clergy of Lyons opposed them in that; whereupon they began to find Fault with the dissolute Lives of the Ecclesiasticks, and to inveigh against the Errors, which they saw introduced into the Church. They were enjoined to be silent, but still persisting, Lucius III. excommunicated them, and condemned them together with the other Hereticks. Excommunications provoked them still the more, and confirmed them in their Obstinacy, insomuch that they threw off the Yoke of Obedience, and fell into many Errors. Their Sect spread itself into many Places, and in the Year 1194, Alphonfus King of Aragon banished them his Dominions, and Bernard Archbishop of Narbonne condemned them. Not able therefore to resist such Assaults, they resolved to have recourse to Rome, and to ask a Confirmation of their Institution from the Apostolick See.

ON the other hand Francis, likewise a Merchant of Assisi, leaving his Father Barnardone to merchandise, abandoned all worldly Care, and betaking himself to a Life altogether Apostolical, he likewise made Profession of voluntary Poverty; and by his exemplary and innocent Life, having drawn in many to live in Poverty, and employ themselves in Works of Charity, the Number increas'd more by the Example of an innocent and austere Life, than by Preaching and Sermons: Therefore not much regarding, nor inveighing against the dissolute Lives of the Ecclesiasticks, nor taking upon him to go about preaching and teaching his Reformation without a Mission, he was entirely submissive to the Apostolick See; for in the Year 1208, having drawn up a new Rule for his Friars, he presented it to the Pope for his Approbation and Confirmation. Although Pope Innocent III. had rejected the Institution of the Valdenses, knowing it to be full of Superstition and Errors, yet in the Year 1215 he approved of Francis's Rule, and the Order of Friars Minors, who, although they still went bare-footed, and made a Vow of voluntary Poverty, yet they were not so superstitious as the Valdenses. Therefore they got footing in many Places of Italy and France, and in the Year 1216 they were received into Paris. Honorius III. in 1223 confirmed their Institution, and adorned this rising Order with many Prerogatives and Privileges.

ALTHOUGH in our Kingdom, under Frederick II. and his Successors of the House of Suevia, this Order (because the Popes, in the Disputes they had with these Princes, made use of them as Messengers and Letter-bearers) had often suffered Hardships, Imprisonment and Death; yet they were received by our People at their very Beginning; and it is said, that S. Francis himself, their Founder, with his own Hands laid the Foundation of some small Convents in Bari, Montella, Agropoli and elsewhere ¹. Naples likewise boasts of having had a Convent founded by S. Francis, in the Place where Castel Nuovo now stands, which he left under the Care of Agostino d'Assisi his Disciple, which was afterwards by Charles I. removed to S. Maria la Nova ². In short, as there is not a City that does not boast of having had S. Peter for the Founder of its Church, so there's no Place where any old Convent of this Order is to be seen, that brags not of S. Francis having been its Founder. However that may be, it is not to be doubted that this Order was received into Naples from its very Institution; forasmuch as John Bishop of Aversa being in Possession of the Church of S. Lorenzo in Naples, with some Houses and Gardens belonging to the Cathedral of Aversa, in the Year 1234, with the Consent of his Chapter, gave it to Fra. Niccolo di Terracina a Minor Friar of S. Francis, and Provincial of the Province of Naples, in the Name of his Order, upon Condition that they should live there, which Grant was afterwards confirmed by Pope Gregory IX. in the Year 1238 ³.

BUT during the Reign of the Princes of Anjou this Order was no less favoured and caress'd by the Princes of that Family, than by the Popes. Charles I. enlarged the antient Church of S. Lorenzo with the adjoining Palace, where the Nobility and People were wont to assemble; and built there a magnificent Church, which was finished by Charles II. his Son, who, in the Year 1302, among other Revenues assigned to it, gave it the third Part of the Duty upon Iron. The Example of the Prince induced others to enrich it. Our famous Lawyer Bartolommeo di Capua Great Protonotary of the Kingdom, caus'd to be built at his own Expences the Frontispiece of the great Door, and Aurelio Pignone that of the little Door ⁴. King Charles I. designing to build Castel Nuovo in Naples, in the Place where that Convent of the Friars Minors lately mentioned stood, removed the Friars from thence; and in the Year 1268 built them a new Church and Convent in the Market-Place called Alvino, where formerly stood the antient Palace and Fortress of the City, which was of old called S. Maria da Palatio, and afterwards got the Name of S. Maria la Nuova, which it keeps to this Day ⁵.

KING Robert favoured this Order no less than his Father and Grandfather, and not only caress'd the Monks, but also the Nuns of it. As the Benedictine Nuns had Scholastica, the Sister of S. Benedict for their Foundress, so the Franciscan Nuns had Clara of Assisi, a Disciple of S. Francis for theirs. Clara, zealously imbibing the Instructions of her Master, became a Nun, and shut herself up in the Monastery of S. Damian in Assisi, where she formed a Rule for her Order, adapted to Women. At a time when she was very sick, it happened that Pope Innocent IV. went from Perugia to Assisi, when he made her a Visit, and confirmed the Rule of her Order; but she dying soon after, was, on Account of her great Reputation for Innocency of Life, sainted by Alexander IV. Innocent's Successor ⁶. Wherefore, in Memory of her, many Monasteries of Nuns of her Order were erected in Italy; but King Robert, at the Desire of Queen Sancia his Wife, in the Year 1310, built one in Naples, the most magnificent and large of any at that time in Italy, into which the Queen introduced the Nuns of the Rule of S. Clara, from whom they took their Name, and retain it to this Day. It was endowed with vast Revenues and Possessions, and he built close by it a Convent of Monks of the same Order, for celebrating the Divine Offices. The Church was built in so sumptuous a manner, that it vied with the most stately and rich Temples of Italy; besides which Robert made it his Chapel Royal ⁷. This King in the Year 1320 placed in a House near to this Church some Nuns to be his Almoners; but in the Year 1325, a Nun of the third Order of S. Francis coming from Assisi to Naples, animated these Almoners to that Degree, that with one Accord, instead of the House, they built a Church with a Mona-tery, which was quickly filled with noble young Neapolitan Ladies taken with the Humour of being shut up there; and among the rest Maddalena di Costanzo, whom King Robert, though she had taken on the Habit in the Monastery of S. Clara, had sent thither to oversee the Distribution of the Royal Alms. This Monastery remains in a flourishing Condition at this Day, and from the Name of their Saint is called S. Francesco ¹. Queen Sancia in the Year 1324 erected and endowed another Monastery in Naples for the Repenties, or Penitent Sisters, who lived under the Rule of S. Francis, and were under the Care of the Friars Minors; their Church got the Name of Magdalena, which it still keeps, but not the same Rule; because now noble Ladies and Virgins are taken in, and wear the Habit of S. Augustin, and are under the Rule of that Saint, though they wear S. Francis's Cord ².

THE Monasteries of Friars Minors and of Franciscan Nuns multiplied not only in Naples, but likewise in all the Provinces of the Kingdom; and in process of time their Number came to that height, that there is not the least City or Village that has not one of them.

IN this Century there started up another Order of Mendicants, called the Hermits of S. Augustin. Innocent IV. was the first that laid the Design of uniting diverse Orders of Hermits into one; but that Design was afterwards put in execution by his Successor Alexander IV. who drew them out of their Hermitages, in order to fix them in Cities, and employ them in Ecclesiastical Functions, and made one Congregation of them under one General, and gave them the Name of the Hermits of S. Augustin.

THE Augustinians did not multiply near so much with us as the two preceding Orders. In the Reign of the Family of Anjou Naples had some of them, such as that of S. Augustin, which, according to the best founded Opinion, had its Rise in the time of Charles I. and was enlarged and endowed afterwards with greater Revenues by Charles II. his Son, and by other Princes of that Family ³: The other of S. Giov. a Carbonara was founded by Fra. Giovanni d' Alessandria, and Dionigi del Borgo, by the Bounty of Gualtieri Galeota, who, in the Years 1339 and 1343, gave all his Houses and Gardens which he possessed in that Place for building that Church and Monastery; it was afterwards much enlarged and repaired by King Ladislaus ⁴. There were some others in Naples; but many of them were erected in the Provinces of the Kingdom.

THE Order of Carmelites made no great Progress with us in these Times. It had been instituted about the Year 1121, by some Hermits of Mount Carmel, assembled by the Patriarch of Antioch, in order to erect them into a Society. Afterwards in the Year 1199 they got a Rule from Albert Patriarch of Jerusalem, which was confirmed in this Century by Honorius III. These Religious in the Year 1238 came to the West, formed a Congregation, and spread themselves there; their Rule was afterwards explained and mitigated by Innocent IV. in the Year 1245; and being spread over Italy they came to Naples, where at the Gate of Mercato they built a little Church and Convent. The sorrowful Queen Margaret Mother of King Conrad coming afterwards to Naples with a great many Jewels and a good Sum of Money for redeeming her only Son out of the Hands of King Charles, but finding him dead, and buried in the little Chapel of the Cross, caused him to be removed from thence to this Church of the Carmelites; and after decent funeral Ceremonies had been performed, for the good of her Son's Soul, she bestowed upon the Church all the Treasure she had brought with her. King Charles, to shew his Approbation of the Queen's Piety, in the Year 1260 for enlarging their Church, gave them a Place belonging to his Demesnes hard by it, called Morricino; and it was enlarged afterwards to the Bulk we now see. Other Convents of this Order have since been founded in Naples, and in other Parts of the Kingdom, but not so many as to be equal in Number with those of the Preaching and Minor Friars.

BESIDES these four Orders of Mendicants, this Century produced many other Religious Societies, which by Degrees were brought into our Kingdom. The Order of Slaves of the Trinity founded in the Year 1211 by John de Mata of Provence a Doctor of Paris, and by Felix the Hermit of Valois, and confirmed three Years after by Innocent III. The Order of the Sylvestrins, who followed the Rule of S. Benedict, was founded in the Year 1221 in Monte Fano by Sylvester Gu- solino, who was first a Canon, and afterwards turned Hermit, and drew a great many into his Society. The Order of S. Mary of Mercy, founded by Peter Nolasco in Barcelona in the Year 1223, under the Protection of James I. King of Aragon, by the Advice of Raimund de Pennaforte, and confirmed by Gregory IX. in the Year 1225. The Order of Servites, which began in Florence in the Year 1233, was confirmed by Alexander IV. and Benedict XI. The Order of the Holy Cross or Cruciferi, which being almost extinct, was restored by Innocent IV. and some Monasteries of it were rebuilt in Italy; and in the Year 1334 the Families of Carmignana and Vespola gave to Fra. Marino di S. Severino, in Name of these Cruciferi, the Church of S. Maria della Vergini, with the adjoining Hospital, without the Gate of S. Januarius, in order to their living there, and serving the Sick of that Hospital¹. The Order of Celestines had likewise its Rise in this Century, and was instituted in our Kingdom by Pietro Morone of Ifernina, who lead a most austere and solitary Life on the Skirts of Majella, where he framed his Rule; and Charles I. of Anjou had so great an Esteem for him, that he took all his Monasteries under his Protection; and so remarkable was his Sanctity, that from the Hermitage he jump'd into S. Peter's Chair, and took the Name of Celestin V. He put his Order under the Rule of Benedict, and by a Bull of his own when he was Pope in the Year 1294, he confirmed it, and Boniface VIII. in 1297, and Benedict XI. in 1304 did the same. The Celestines from their very Infancy got footing not only in Abruzzo, but also in Naples. Giovanni Pepino of Barletta Count of Menervino (in great Esteem with Charles II. for his having gallantly driven the Saracens out of Lucera) gave them a Church, hard by the Gate formerly called Donn' Orso, which he built and endowed with rich Farms; and in this Church his Tomb is to be seen at this Day. It was called S. Peter a Majella, which being decayed by time, in the Year 1508 was repaired and enlarged by Colanello Imperato Great Port-reeve of *Barletta*².

MANY other Orders started up in this Century, the Number of which was become so great, that Gregory X. in the General Council of Lyons held in the Year 1274 was forced to put a Stop to the founding of any more, and to prohibit all those that had been founded after the fourth General Lateran Council, and had not been confirmed by the Apostolick See. And so many Convents of the same Order and in the same City were a building, that several Popes by their Bulls³ were obliged to appoint proper Distances between them, to prevent their drawing the Auditory from one another, of which they were very jealous.

BUT of all these Orders, the Mendicants were the most distinguished; and of these, the Preaching and Minor Friars were the greatest Favourites of the Popes. They had signalized themselves above all the rest by their Expeditions against the Hereticks of these Times, and had done other important Services to the Church of Rome; therefore they were raised above the rest, and many Privileges and Prerogatives heap'd upon them. Innocent III. and Honorius III. granted them Exemption from their Ordinaries, and would have them to be immediately subject to the Apostolical See. Thus both they and the other Mendicant Monks, relying upon the Privileges granted them by the Popes, pretended to have Power of Confessing and giving Absolution to the Faithful without a Licence either from the Curate or Bishop; whence arose so many obstinate Controversies between them and the secular Clergy, which cost many Popes a great deal of Labour to reconcile.

BUT if ever these new Orders deserved the Favour of the Popes, nothing surely could intitle them so much to it, as their being the Authors of the new Scholastick Divinity, which having made the Dogmatick to be laid aside, and the Study of Antiquity and Church History to be quite neglected, kept Men of Parts employed about abstracted and useless Controversies, and Disputes, so full of Obscurities, Contradictions and Subtleties, that there were none but those who were well skilled in such captious Arguments, that could comprehend any thing.

THIS kind of Study, by taking Men off from that of Antiquity and History, pleas'd Rome; and so much the more, because by that Means the Power of the Popes was thereby render'd boundless; and besides, it was incumbent upon these Orders to do so for their own Interest; because having obtained most ample Exemptions and great Privileges from Rome, in order to reap the Benefit of them, and be able to maintain them against the Bishops and Curates, it was their Business to enlarge the Power of the Granter. Whence the Decretists on the one Hand, and the Scholasticks on the other combin'd together for the better fixing of the Roman Monarchy, and to raise the Pope to the supreme Power no less in Temporals, than Spirituals.

PERHAPS it will seem strange how these Orders, founded upon Mendicity, whence they took the Name of Mendicants, and who owe their Being to the Remission of Discipline and Irregularity, occasioned by too much Riches, could in process of time gain so great Acquisitions, as to make another Reformation necessary among themselves, which has been to as little Purpose as the first. But whoever will consider the Nature of Men always in quest of Novelties, and the Conduct of the Court of Rome, to which the Increase of their Acquisitions was of great Consequence, because the greatest part of them center'd in Rome, will cease to wonder. The old Monks having now lost the Reputation of Sanctity, and their Zeal for Religion being cool'd, the Mendicant Friars by their very Profession of Poverty gain'd Credit, and rais'd a stronger Inclination in the Faithful to enrich them; but as they had divested themselves altogether of the Power of acquiring Immoveables, and vowed to live solely upon Oblations and Alms, and though there were many pious Persons ready to give them real Estates and Farms, yet by their Institution it being out of their Power to accept of them, they rejected the Offers. The Court of Rome soon found out a Remedy for that; for notwithstanding their Vow, and that by their Institution they could not acquire Immoveables, yet the Apostolick See dispensed with both, and gave them Power to accept of real Estates. By this Device the Monasteries of Mendicants in Italy, Spain, and other Kingdoms in a short time acquired vast real Estates. The French alone opposed this Innovation, saying, That as they had come into their Kingdom with that Institution of Poverty, so it was fit they should continue to observe it.

BUT in our Kingdom, and particularly during the Reign of the Princes of Anjou, who were Liege-Men of the Popes, their Acquisitions were surprising, especially in the Time of the Schism, when all the other Clergy were little valued, and the Monks in great repute. They had no sooner tasted the Sweets and Conveniency of Riches, than they exceeded all Bounds, like Men whose Thirst after Money had got the better of their Reason. In order to heap up worldly Pelf, and to make a Tool of the People's Zeal for Religion, they invented many particular Devotions. The Dominicans were Authors of that of the Rosary; the Franciscans of the Cord; the Augustines of the Leathern Girdle, &c. And afterwards in Imitation of them, the other Orders likewise invented their own Badges, some the Scapulary, and some, other particular Devotions; and the Profit they reap'd by them made them run out into Excess; every one preaching up the Efficacy and Excellency of their Badge, and undervaluing those of the other Orders. Women were no less taken with these things than Men, and wore the Badges of their favourite Orders, and erected their own Chapels and Societies, which were always favoured by the Popes with plenary Indulgences, Remission of all Sins, and other Advantages. And these Orders were so jealous upon this Point, that each of them took care that none of the others should make use of their Badge for drawing the People to them, or should endeavour to introduce one like it; which created many Disputes that were still to be decided in Rome; as for Example, if a Franciscan had employed a Painter to draw the Image of the Virgin Mary, and ordered him to add a Rosary to it, as denoting a new Institution, in order by that to lessen the Auditory of the Dominicans, and to increase that of their Rivals the Franciscans. Fra. Ambrogio Salvio of Bagnuolo of the Order of Preaching Friars a famous Orator, and afterwards Bishop of Nardo, in great Esteem with the Emperor Charles V. and Pope Pius V. for his Sermons, and to whom the Neapolitans erected a Statue of Marble in the Church of the Holy Ghost, and who was Uncle to Doctor Alessandro Salvio, who was likewise remarkable for his Learning, and the famous Treatise which he composed of the Game of Chess; because, to make one of the Fraternity of the Rosary, belonged only to the Dominicans; and that none of the other Orders might arrogate that Power, in the Year 1596 had recourse to Pope Pius V. and obtained a Bull¹, by which all other Orders were prohibited to erect Chapels or Fraternities of the Rosary; and that Power was lodged in the General of the Dominican Order only, or his Deputies, and by special Favour it was also granted to the said Fra. Ambrogio.

UPON Account of those particular Devotions, the more to inflame the Godly, many false Miracles were invented; and besides preaching them up in the Pulpit, there were Books of them composed, insomuch, that as Bacon of Verulam observes¹, the Ecclesiastical History was thereby so corrupted, that it now requires great Nicety and Labour to distinguish the true from the false Miracles. Such was the Foundation of these new Acquisitions in this thirteenth Century, which were much more enlarged among us during the Reign of the Family of Anjou; the Particulars of which shall be related in the following Books of this History.

CIVIL HISTORY

Of the KINGDOM of

N A P L E S.

B O O K XX.

ABOUT the Time that the Roman Empire began to decline, the French inhabited that Country towards the North, which extends itself along the Banks of the Rhine between Bavaria and Saxony; and which from that Nation still retains the Name of Franconia. When the Empire was decayed, and the Roman Power no longer dreaded, invited by the Example of other neighbouring People, they resolved by the Force of Arms to purchase for themselves a more commodious Living, and a larger and more fertile Habitation; and having elected Pharamond, one of the Sons of Marcomire, to be their King; under his Conduct, about the Year 419 they passed the Rhine, in order to conquer the Gauls, leaving the old Prince Marcomire in Possession of Franconia. Clovis the Son of Pharamond extended the Conquests, and began to govern that part of Gaul next the Rhine, called Gallia Belgica. To him succeeded Meroveus, whether he was his Brother or Son is not certain, but he was surely the next in Blood; who by his noble Exploits made himself Master of Gallia Celtica, and extended the French Empire to the City of Paris; and thinking he had acquired as much as would be sufficient to subsist his People, and to form a reasonable and moderate Dominion, he put an end to his Conquests; and resolving to end his Days in Peace, he united the two Nations under one Name, and with moderate Laws, and a peaceable Government founded the French Kingdom.

THE lineal Course of Descent continued in this first Merovingian Race, to the last King Chilperick. Pepin afterwards transferred it into the Caroline Family; but this this second Race being extinct, Hugh Capet began the third, from him called the Capetians: of whom were descended the Philips and the Lewis's, by whom France was governed for a long time; and the Succession having for many Ages continued in this Race, about this time King Lewis IX. came to the Possession of the Crown, who, on account of his innocent Life, and unblemished Character, after his Death, was inrolled in the Catalogue of Saints. The Brother of this King was Charles Count of Provence and Anjou, who, for the Reasons given in the preceding Book, being invited to conquer the Kingdom, with great Success accomplished the Undertaking, and established the Government of Puglia and Sicily in the Family of Anjou.

IN relating the Events, and the Revolutions that happened in the Civil Government during the Reign of that Family, contrary to the Method of other Writers, I shall study greater Brevity than I have done hitherto. Considering the vast Plenty of them already in Records, which are taken notice of in many Volumes of our Authors; and there being many Histories of them written, I hope, since they are now known and published, my passing over some of them in Silence will not be imputed as a Defect in me. Our Writers have been very full concerning the Actions of the Princes of the Family of Anjou, and of the succeeding Kings, but have very little, and that much perplexed, concerning those of our Kings their Predecessors. That proceeded from many Causes; chiefly because the Norman and Suevian Princes did not fix their Residence in Naples, or in some other City of these our Provinces; and therefore the publick Archives of their Records have been destroyed. The many Wars and Revolutions that afterwards happened; the burning and plundering of those Cities, which would have been able to preserve them, such as Capua, Benevento, Salerno, and Melfis; and lastly, the Rudeness, Ignorance, and Incapacity of Historians, have in a manner deprived us of all Memory of them. Therefore we are much indebted to the Monasteries of the Benedictins, and especially to that of Monte Cassino, in which the most ancient Records of the Goths are preserved; it being of the greatest Antiquity of all the Archives in the Kingdom; and to the other two, those of the Trinity of the Cave, and Monte Vergine, where all that we have left concerning the Normans is kept. We are likewise much beholden to the Monks of these Monasteries for some ancient Chronicles, and ill-compiled Histories. The Roman Pontiffs being Enemies to the illustrious House of Suevia, made the Italian Historians, for the most part Guelfs, write very contemptibly of those Princes, and not agreeable to the Truth; and if they had not been supply'd by some foreign, or other Chronicles lately found out, we should have been still in the dark, and the same Prejudices would have prevailed.

THE Case was otherwise in the Reign of the Family of Anjou; for Charles having begun to adorn Naples with magnificent Churches and Edifices; and after the Separation of the Kingdom of Sicily, made it the Royal Seat, Head and Metropolis of the Kingdom, the Royal Writs and other Records were carefully preserved, and the Royal Archives in Naples put in better Order. Charles was the first that instituted the Archives of the Royal Mint in Naples, which were formerly under the Direction of the Masters of Accounts, and he put them in a better Form; whence they have continued so long, and subsist to this day, and they are the most ancient we have in that City. In these Archives are preserved four hundred and thirty six Registers, beginning from Charles I. in the Year 1267. which was the second of his Reign, down to Queen Joan II. wherein there are many Writs in the French Language. We find fifty five Registers of Charles I. and an hundred and fifty three of Charles II. his Son, who reign'd longer; of Robert an hundred and seventeen; of Charles his Son, who was Lieutenant of the Kingdom, sixty two; of Queen Joan I. thirty two; of Charles III. who was of the second Race of the Family of Anjou, no more than three; of Ladislaus ten; and of Queen Joan II. his Sister, four¹. By this we now see, that the Writs preserved in these Archives are of an older Date than the Reign of Charles of Anjou. And as a Miracle there is still one Register, only of one Year, remaining of the Emperor Frederick II. to wit, of the Year 1239. And 'tis probable, that Charles caused all the rest to be destroyed, in order to extinguish entirely the Memory of the Suevian Kings, to whom he had succeeded, not by hereditary Right, but by that of the Sword, and Invitations of the Popes². Whence it came, that our Writers have been more full in recording the Transactions of the Princes of the Family of Anjou, than those of the Kings their Predecessors.

BESIDES, the Princes of that Family reign'd in Times wherein Ignorance did not prevail; and Learning and a good Taste of History began to revive in Italy and amongst us. Florence had Giovanni and Matteo Villani, who being Contemporaries of the two Charles's and Robert, did not fail to transmit their Actions to Posterity.

THERE appeared afterwards Men more famous, such as Petrarca and Boccaccio, who, being much carested, and highly esteemed by the Princes of the Family of Anjou, have recorded many of the Actions of those Kings in their Works: And among us there has not been wanting some who have done the same; such as Matteo di Giovenazzo, who wrote from the Death of Frederick II. to the Reign of Charles II. in which he lived. The Author of the Journals of the Duke of Montelione, as they are called, in which the Transactions from Day to Day are set down from the Reign of Queen Joan I. to the Death of King Alphonfus I. and Pietro degli Umili of Gaeta, who wrote at large of the Affairs of King Ladislaus, and who was the Contemporary, and chief Officer of that King's Treasury. By the Help of these Works, with those of other grave Authors, and being encouraged by the two great Men Giacomo Sannazoro and Francesco Poderico, Angelo di Costanzo compiled his grave and well digested History of the Kingdom of Naples, which not only eclipsed all that had been written before that time, but likewise for its Gravity and Elegancy excels all the Histories written since by an infinite Number of Authors. Therefore we shall follow the History of this notable Writer more than any other; neither shall we be ashamed sometimes to make use of the very same Words, as being both grave and proper.

CHARLES then, after having, by the Means above related, fixed himself in the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, and by profuse Donations gained the Affections of many Barons of his own Party; for his greater Security he got many French Lords to settle in the Kingdom, to whom he gave many Fiefs; whence new Families sprung up among us, which rendered him formidable over all Italy, and made him to be looked upon as one of the greatest Kings in Europe; and extending his Arms beyond the Limits of his own Dominions, he had also made the Kingdom of Tunis tributary: And still thirsting after more Dominion, he aspired to the Empire of Constantinople, and had nothing so much at heart, as the driving Palæologus out of it. And perhaps he might have succeeded, had he found the same Inclinations and Goodwill in Pope Gregory, as his Predecessor Clement had.

AFTER the Death of Pope Clement, by the Divisions among the Cardinals, the Apostolick See had been almost three Years vacant; and nothing less was necessary for bringing the Cardinals to chuse a Successor, than the Presence of Philip King of France, and of Henry and Edward, the one Brother and the other Nephew to the King of England; for these Princes, returning from Palestine, having travelled through Sicily and Naples, went to Viterbo, in order to solicit the Cardinals to come to an Election; who at last, moved by their Presence, but not agreeing upon one of their own Number, on the first Day of September, 1271. they elected a Person not of their College, which was Teobaldo di Piacenza, of the Family of Visconti, Archdeacon of Lodi, who was at that time Apostolical Legate in the Christian Army, then in Asia, fighting against the Infidels: And the Year following he was crowned in Viterbo, and named Gregory X. who, being sensible of the late Disorders, was the first that made the Law for shutting up the Cardinals in the Conclave after the Death of a Pope, and to keep them there till they should elect a Successor.

AFTER the Election of the new Pope was over, King Philip went to France, and King Charles returned to Naples: the latter considering, that Philip his second Son, and Robert his third, were both dead, and that Charles the eldest (whom he had invested with the Principality of Salerno, by the Symbol of the Crown or Circle of Gold, with the County of Lefina, by the Standard, and with the Title of Monte S. Angelo, by the Ring¹) having no Sons, in the beginning of the Year 1272. he married a second Wife, the Daughter (according to Costanzo) of Baldwin of Flanders, the last Emperor of Constantinople, and by her expected to obtain some Part of the Empire of the East; though Sigonius says, that she was not the Daughter of Baldwin, but of the Duke of Burgundy. On account of this Marriage there were great Feasts and Tournaments, and the King honoured many Gentlemen with the military Belt, and made many Knights. This Year was very lucky to the King; for about the end of it the Prince of Salerno had a Son born, who was named Charles Martel, and was afterwards King of Hungary; whereupon there was great Feasting and Rejoicings both in Naples, and over all the Kingdom.

CHARLES hearing, that the new elected Pope, on his Way from Palestine, had landed in Puglia, he immediately set out to wait upon him at Manfredonia, where he received him with all the Respect and Honour imaginable, and would needs accompany him through Capitanata and Abruzzo, as far as Campagna di Roma; flattering himself, that by these Civilities Gregory might be induced to assist him in the designed Expedition against Constantinople; but the Pope, having been long in Palestine, had that War much at heart; he was therefore no sooner crowned, than he declared in the first Consistory to all the College of Cardinals, that he intended to employ all the Forces of the Church in the War of Palestine against the Infidels, whereof Charles was no sooner apprized, than he was sensible of the Loss he had suffered by the Death of Clement.

AT this time Philip, the Son of the last Baldwin, and King Charles's Brother-in-law, having come from Greece to solicit Charles to undertake the Expedition against Constantinople, the King advised him to go to the Pope, and sent with him as his Ambassador the Bishop of Avignon, who having jointly made Application to the Pope for such Assistance as he should think fit, in order to unite the Greek to the Latin Church, they found him very averse to that Undertaking; because at the same time Palæologus, who was in Possession of the Empire, had sent Ambassadors to the Pope, offering to reduce the Greek Church to the Obedience of the Roman: Whereupon Gregory, who preferred the general Good of Christians to the particular Interest of the Emperor Baldwin, chose rather to be in Friendship with the Person that was in Possession of the Empire, and could assist the Christian Army in recovering the Holy Land, than divert him from that Assistance, by restoring Baldwin to his Dominions: So the Pope left Viterbo, without giving Philip any Hopes of Assistance, and went to France to hold a Council in Lyons; in order to invite the Kings of France and England, and other Ultramontan Princes to the Expedition of the Holy Land. Palæologus, hearing that Baldwin was gone in Person to the Pope, and fearing that his Presence might have more Influence than his own Embassy, left Constantinople, and took along with him the Patriarch of that City, and other Prelates, to pay Obedience to the Bishop of Rome, who received him with exceeding great Honour, and granted him all he desired; whereupon he returned immediately to Greece confirmed Emperor by the Apostolick See¹. The Empire of the West having been vacant many Years, Gregory likewise got Rodolphus Count of Ausburg to be elected Emperor thereof, to the end that these two Princes might join in the Conquest of the Holy Land.

ALL these things were very displeasing to King Charles; and in the Year 1274, Gregory having opened the Council in Lyons, he invited Fra. Bonaventura, surnamed the Seraphick Doctor, who was there made a Cardinal, and Thomas Aquinas the Angelick Doctor; for the Union of the Greek with the Latin Church being to be there treated on, these two famous Divines were designed to confute the Errors of the Greeks: But Charles being afraid that Thomas, (who had gone from Naples, where he taught Divinity in that University, and who knew Charles's Cruelty) might more exasperate the Pope in the Council, went to Fossanova, a Place not far from Terracina, and caused him to be poisoned, where, on the seventh Day of March the same Year, at the Age of fifty, he died in the Monastery of the Cistercian Monks. *Dante*² numbers this among the other Cruelties of that Prince, saying, Carlo venne in Italia, &c.

When Charles to Latium came, his Power to show,
He Conradin sent to the Shades below,
But, for that Cruelty to make amends,
Thomas he toss'd to Heaven amongst his Friends.

NEVERTHELESS Charles finding that the Pope had no mind to favour him in his Expedition, delayed it; and as long as Gregory lived, he gave himself no trouble about the Affairs either in, or out of Italy; but remained in Naples, and applied himself to the beautifying of that City, and putting the Affairs of this Kingdom upon a new Footing; and from this time our Provinces began to acknowledge Naples as their Head and Metropolis.

CHAP. I.

The Occasions whereby Naples became the Metropolis of the Kingdom, and the Royal Seat.

THE first Foundation of the Magnificence and Grandeur of this City, whereby it happily arrived to the State in which we now see it, was laid by the Emperor Frederick II. First the University which that Prince founded there, drew to it all the Scholars not only of this Kingdom, but also of Sicily, and other more remote Parts. Frederick's not residing in Palermo, as the Norman Kings his Predecessors had done, but making Progresses through many Cities of our Provinces, and stopping frequently in Naples with his Court, and other Officers of the Kingdom, was a great Step towards raising this City to so much Grandeur; nor did the Capuan Castle, and that of Nuovo, being built in so stately a manner, contribute a little to it.

The other Occasion of this City's being so much exalted, was the long Residence here of Innocent IV. and Alexander his Successor with their Courts. But those who crowned the Work were the new Kings of the Family of Anjou, Charles I. and II. and the disjoining of Sicily by the famous Sicilian Vespers had its Part too: The Result of which was two Royal Seats, and two Kingdoms, to wit, The ancient Kingdom of Sicily, and the new Kingdom of Naples. Palermo the ancient Royal Seat became that of the Aragonians in Sicily, and Naples the new Royal Seat was left to the French in Puglia and Calabria.

SECT. I.

Of Edifices.

CHARLES began first to enlarge Naples with magnificent and stately Edifices: and not pleased with the Capuan Castle built after the German manner, he had no sooner defeated Manfred, and made his triumphal Entry into this City, than he caused Castel Nuovo to be built after the French manner, where it now stands, in order to make it capable of receiving Succour by Sea, and of defending the Harbour; and it was look'd upon at that time to be one of the noblest Pieces of Work in Italy, enlarged since, and made stronger and more impregnable by his Successors. 'Tis likewise said, that for the greater Security of Vessels, and the better Defence of this Castle, he caused the Tower of S. Vincent to be built, which yet stands upon the Old Mole, and takes its Name from the Chapel in it, dedicated to that Saint.

HE likewise adorn'd this City with noble Churches and Monasteries, and, as we have said, caused the Church of the Franciscans, which was built where Castel Nuovo now stands, to be rebuilt in a more magnificent Form, in the Place where S. Maria della Nuova is now situate; and erected there a convenient Monastery capable of containing many Friars Minors, whose Number in the following Years was considerably increased. He took care to demolish the antient Palace of the Neapolitan Republick, where the Nobility and People were wont to assemble, in order to prevent their meeting; and in its Place he built the magnificent Church of S. Lorenzo, and added to it a large Convent of Franciscans.

HE began to rebuild the antient Cathedral Church of Naples, which was formerly the Church of S. Restituta, in a larger and more magnificent Manner; but not living to see it finished, his Son Charles II. brought it to the Perfection in which we now see it; although in the Year 1456 it was thrown down by an Earthquake, yet it was rebuilt in the very same manner by Ferdinand I. King of Aragon, and some of the great Men of the Kingdom; every one of which chose to rebuild his own part, whose Arms are to be seen at this Day upon the Pillars.

THE Example of the Prince moved his Ministers and Domesticks to adorn Naples with other Churches; but three Frenchmen distinguished themselves above all the rest; and it is thought they were three of King Charles's Cooks, who in the Year 1270 having got a Gift of a piece of Ground from their Master, built upon it a large Hospital with a Church dedicated to three holy Bishops Eligius, Martin and Dennis, which in process of time became one of the most remarkable Monuments of Christian Piety.

HE also caused the Streets of this City to be finely paved with square Stones, taken out of the Via Appia; and he repaired the Walls of it, and made them stronger than formerly. And in order to encourage Traffick and make Provisions more plentiful, he made the present large Market-Place, which being then without the City was more spacious¹; so that Naples had two Market-places, this new one made by Charles, where the unfortunate Conrad was beheaded, and the old Market-place which was formerly near the Church of S. Lorenzo.

The University restored.

THIS Prince following the Footsteps of Frederick II. in order to make Naples more remarkable and famous, he enlarged the University founded by Frederick, and bestowed many other Prerogatives and Privileges upon it. King Robert in the Articles which he added to those made by his Grandfather and Father, mentions an ample Privilege granted to this University by Charles in the first Year of his Reign 1266; which was drawn up in Nocera by Roberto da Bari his Protonotary, wherein may be seen how much he had the Grandeur and Reputation of this University at Heart². And that the Doctors and Scholars might enjoy more ample Privileges, he appointed a particular Judge, who was to hear and determine all their Causes both Civil and Criminal; and they were not obliged to appear or plead before any other Judge or Tribunal, unless they had a mind by way of Compromise to appear before the Archbishop of the City or a Doctor of their own University, to have them decide their Causes. Therefore he settled a Salary of twenty Ounces of Gold a Year upon the Judge, if he was a Neapolitan; and if he was a Foreigner thirty. And Summonte from the Books of the Records of the Year 1269 reports, That Charles appointed Landolfo Caracciolo Judge that Year, with a yearly Salary of twenty Ounces of Gold. For the right Administration of Justice he appointed three Assistants to this Judge; one of them an Ultramontan, and was to be chosen by the Ultramontan Scholars; another of them an Italian, to be chosen by the Italian Scholars; and the third a Native, to be chosen by the Scholars of the Kingdom; these Assistants were to be changed every three Months.

HE likewise gave Power to this Judge (to prevent the Students being imposed upon in the Price of Eatables) with the Advice of the Assistants, Doctors and Masters of the Scholars to put an Assize upon all Vendibles, which should be so moderate and just, that neither the Seller nor Buyer might suffer any Detriment thereby. That with the Consent of the Students they might likewise appoint Men of Probity to assign Lodgings for the Scholars, and to settle a reasonable Rent for them. And that the Scholars might not be diverted from their Studies; he forbid his Officers to impose Taxes, Collections or personal Services upon them, even although his Court or the City stood in need of them. The Collectors and other Officers were to exact no Duty whatsoever for the Goods and other Things sent to the Scholars for their Maintenance or Necessities, exempting them altogether from their Jurisdiction and Power.

LASTLY, he invited all Nations to send their Youth to study in Naples, to whom should be granted free Ingress and Egress at their Pleasure; and that they should be kindly received, and graciously protected under the Royal Safeguard. The Tribunal of the Scholars instituted by Charles I. is mentioned in the Royal Records; and in the Registers of Charles II. we read of other Judges, such as Marino del Duca Judge of the Scholars, Pietro Piscicello, called Ortante, Gualtiero Caputo of Naples, Knight, and lastly, Matteo Dentice, Knight. And Summonte says, that it is to be read in the Writs of these Registers, that the Assize of Fish and other Eatables granted by Charles I. and afterwards confirmed by Charles II. his Son to the University of Naples, was made in the Church of S. Andrew a Nido by the Judge, Doctors and Students, according to Custom¹; of which there are still some Footsteps remaining; for though he conferred the Office of Judge of the Scholars upon the Chaplain Major, who, as Head of the University, has Jurisdiction, but very much limited, and different from that which the Judge had, as reaching only the Scholars who transgress the Laws of the University; yet the Power of settling the Assize he left to the Judge and his Assayers of the Weights and Measures, with Jurisdiction widely differing from the antient, and confined to the Sellers of Eatables only²; nevertheless the Profits arising from the Weights and Measures at this time belong to the primary Professor of the Civil Law of this University; who without any particular Grant enjoys these Emoluments, as annexed and depending upon the primary Chair of the Civil Law.

MOREOVER in order to render this University still more flourishing and numerous, he invited the most famous foreign Doctors of his time by great Salaries, to come and teach the Belles Lettres, and good Discipline. At this time the University of Bologna flourished, and among the other Professors Giacomo Belviso was famous for the Civil Law, whom Charles invited to come to Naples to teach it, and settled a yearly Salary of fifty Ounces of Gold upon him. In the Year 1269 he likewise invited M. Girardo de Cumis to come and teach the Canon Law, and gave him a Salary of twenty Ounces of Gold yearly. For Divinity he gave an Invitation to M. Thomas Aquinas a Dominican Monk, whom we now worship as a Saint, and gave him an Ounce of Gold a Month. And for Physick M. Filippo de Castrocelli, with a yearly Salary of twelve Ounces of Gold³. This Prince's Footsteps were afterwards followed by Charles II. and Robert his Successors, as shall be related.

THIS restoring of the University of Naples (which, after the Death of Frederick by the continual Wars that lasted more than twenty Years, had lost that Splendor in which Frederick left it) was one of the chief Causes which made Naples so populous, that it rais'd its Head above all the other Cities of the Kingdom.

CHARLES's Resolution not to remove his Royal Seat to Palermo, as his Predecessors had done, was likewise another great Cause of the Rise of Naples. That Prince looked upon Palermo as a distant City, not conveniently situate for having a strict Eye upon the Pope and the Guelfs in Italy, and at too great a Distance from his Dominions in Provence and France, with which he kept a close and strict Correspondence; of which the Sicilians unjustly complained, in the same manner as the Romans unreasonably complained of Honorius, who, in order to put a Stop to the Incurfions of the Barbarians who landed frequently on that side to infest Italy, removed his Seat from Rome, and resided first in Milan, and then in Ravenna. Therefore Charles fix'd his Residence in Naples; and though he did not always stay there, being often obliged as well for the good of the Kingdom, as to keep it quiet and peaceable under his Obedience, to make Progresses, sometimes to one City, sometimes to another, as may be seen by the Dates of his Writs, and also of his Statutes, which we see are sometimes dated in Nocera, at other times in Trani, Foggia, Aversa, Venosa, Brindisi, and elsewhere; yet for the most part he took up his Residence in Naples, with the Prince of Salerno his eldest Son, and the Officers of the Crown and Court, and applied himself to aggrandize it, and adorn it with so many Seggi, or Tribunals, which he did not to any other City of the Kingdom.

DURING his Residence in Naples, he added to the Dignity of his Royal Person many illustrious Prerogatives, such as his making the Kingdom of Tunis tributary, and his taking upon himself the Title of King of Jerusalem; these as they gave new Lustre to the regal Power, so did they also much aggrandize Naples his Royal Seat.

CHAP. II.

Charles makes the Kingdom of Tunis tributary; and by the Cession of Mary Daughter of the Prince of Antioch becomes King of Jerusalem.

ABOUT the end of the Year 1269, Lewis King of France, Charles's Brother crossed over to Africa against the Infidels; but while he was besieging Tunis his Army was seized with a Pestilence, and in Danger of being ruined by the Moors, and himself and his Sons that were with him made Prisoners¹. Charles being apprized of this, thought himself bound as well by the Ties of Blood, as by the Obligations he lay under to that good King, who had assisted him in the Conquest of two Kingdoms, to put himself aboard of his Fleet, which he had prepared for the Expedition to Greece, and to sail immediately for *Tunis*²; where he found the French Army so much diminished, that it was almost a Miracle the Moors had not attacked and cut them off; and there too was the King in his last Moments breathing out his Soul to God. How welcome then his Arrival was to the King's Sons, may be easily conjectured; for at that very time an infinite Number of Arabs came, more with Design to plunder the rich Baggage of the Kings of France and Navarre, and of many other Princes, who had gone upon that Expedition, than to assist the King of Tunis; but seeing the Christian Army so much reinforced, they returned to their own Country: Nevertheless the King of Tunis every Moment expected the Arabs to raise the Siege, but at last finding himself thus disappointed, he sent Ambassadors to King Charles to beg a Peace: When Charles fearing that the Plague might destroy his Army, as it had already done that of King Lewis; and also perceiving that his Nephew Philip, the new King of France, was anxious to be gone in order to be crowned, he entered into a Treaty of Peace with the Ambassadors of the King of Tunis, which in a few Days was concluded on these Conditions: That a great Sum in Gold should be paid to the new King of France for the Expences of his Expedition: That all the Christian Prisoners that were in the Kingdom of Tunis should be set at Liberty: That Christians should have free Liberty to trade in Africa: That they should have Liberty to erect Churches and Monasteries, and to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ without any Impediment: and That the King of Tunis and his Successors should become Tributaries to King Charles and his Successors, and pay a yearly Tribute of twenty thousand Deublons. A Tribute, which was formerly paid to the Kings of Sicily, such as Roger and William, Norman Kings. Tutini transcribes a Charter from the Royal Archives, where the yearly Value of this Tribute is computed; the Tenor of

S E C T. I.

Charles by the Cession of Mary Daughter of the Prince of Antioch, becomes King of Jerusalem.

IN the beginning of the Year 1275 Pope Gregory died, without having put any of his Schemes in execution; and in his Place Peter of Tarantaise a Burgundian Preaching Friar was elected, and called Innocent V. Charles, upon hearing of the Election of a French Pope, with great State resumed his Senatorial Dignity, and having substituted Giacomo Cantelmo, who formerly had been his Deputy, he governed Rome as he thought fit, and obtained for himself and his Friends whatever he desired; but his Hopes soon vanished, for Innocent, after a Pontificate of a few Months, ended his Days. And the Cardinals, jealous of Charles's Power, quickly elected an Italian Pope, which was Ottobono del Fiesco a Genoese, and Nephew of Innocent IV. and he was called Adrian V. During the short time this Pope lived, he shewed a great Inclination to lessen Charles's Power, by which Italy and Rome were oppressed; wherefore he had invited the Emperor Rodolphus. But Adrian soon dying, and Peter a Spanish Cardinal being elected, and according to Platina called John XXII. and as others will have it XX. or XXI. Charles's Power was not in the least diminished; for though John was a Man of a holy Life, yet he was unfit to manage so great a Machine; so that Charles as Senator of Rome governed and directed every thing belonging to the Papacy. Wherefore during this Pontificate, and six Months after John's Death, when the Apostolick See was vacant, till the Election of Pope Nicolas III. he was looked upon as the greatest and most formidable King of those Times; for besides the two Kingdoms, and his Dominions of Provence and Anjou which he possessed in France, he had the Kingdom of Tunis tributary; and Tutini adds, that he had likewise made himself Master of the Island of *Corfu*¹; the Florentines were also his Tributaries, and he had all the Guelf Cities of Italy at his Devotion. And besides he had the Management of the young King of France his Nephew; but what made him most formidable, was the great Number of Soldiers which he had training up under the Direction of most experienced Officers. He was likewise powerful in Sea-Forces, which were little inferior to those at Land; for he had several Fleets in our different Ports, under the Command of Errico di Mari a Genoese his High-Admiral; and was Master of both the upper and lower Seas; so that surely the Venetians could not in his time boast of the Dominion of the Adriatick Sea, because Charles was more powerful at Sea than they; for trusting to his Sea-Forces, he had undertaken to drive the Emperor Palæologus out of Constantinople, and to perform other Exploits in the East.

WHEREFORE Mary, Daughter of the Prince of Antioch, with whom Hugh her Uncle King of Cyprus disputed the Title and Right to the Kingdom of Jerusalem, came to Rome, and had recourse to the Pope and King Charles for their Assistance; but finding that the Pope was not disposed to give her any, she was at last prevailed upon by Charles to yield her Right to him; whereupon in Presence of the College of Cardinals she conveyed and renounced her Rights, which she had to the Kingdom of Jerusalem, and the Principality of Antioch in Favour of *Charles*², with all the Solemnity requisite to a Matter of so great Importance¹; so that Pope John, who favoured the King, taking Mary's Right to be good, this Year 1277 crown'd Charles King of Jerusalem; and from this time he began to date his Reign of that Kingdom.

IMMEDIATELY upon this Cession Charles sent Ruggiero Sanseverino to take Possession of all the Lands which Mary was in Possession of, and to prepare for the Recovery of the rest; and at the same time he ordered a strong Fleet of Gallies and other Vessels, with a good Body of Land Forces to be got ready, not only for the Expedition against Constantinople, but likewise against Jerusalem.

THE Rights which Mary had to the Kingdom of Jerusalem were transmitted to her by Melissina her Mother, the fourth Daughter of Isabel Sister to Baldwin IV. King of Jerusalem. Isabel, by her first Husband Conrad of Monferate, as we have related in Book XVI. left four Daughters; Mary the eldest was Mother of Jole the Emperor Frederick's second Wife, who brought him the Rights and Title of Jerusalem as her Portion; by vertue of which Frederick, Conrad his Son, and Conrad his Grandson, took upon them the Title of Kings of Jerusalem. By the Death of Conrad, the last of the House of Suevia without Heirs, these Rights being extinct in that Line, Mary, as Daughter of Melissina, claim'd them as belonging to her.

ISABEL's second Daughter was Alisia, who was married to Hugh King of Cyprus, who, by right of his Wife, seeing the Line of the eldest Daughter was extinct in the Person of Conrad, took upon him the Title of King of Jerusalem; it was alledged for Mary of Antioch, that the Rights of Alisia were also extinct, because Almericus King of Cyprus, another Husband of Isabel's, to whom King Hugh his Son had succeeded, and was the Son of his first Wife, and Alisia's Husband, had yielded the said Rights to John of Brenna the Husband of Mary the eldest Daughter, according P. Lusignano in his Chronicle of the Kings of Cyprus.

ISABEL's third Daughter was Sibilia, who was married to Livo King of Armenia, and died without Heirs; so that all the Rights were extinct except those of Melissina the fourth Daughter, and Mother of Mary, who made this Cession to Charles.

BUT this Cession was clogged with great Difficulties; for truly it could not be said, that the Rights of the second Daughter Alisia were extinct by the Cession made by Almericus to John of Brenna, because that Cession could not prejudice his Successors, who were to succeed by vertue of other Rights, to wit, those of Alisia, to whom, as Daughter of Isabel, and not of Almericus, they belonged; neither did Almericus yield any other but those Rights, which at that time belonged to him as Isabel's Husband, not future Rights, which could only belong to Alisia and her Descendents; for which Reason P. Lusignano wisely observes, that this Cession made by Mary to Charles, was of a Right which she had not, but belonged to her Aunt Alisia the Wife of King Hugh. And indeed, when the Emperor Frederick II. was excommunicated, and had returned to Puglia from Palestine, the Queen Dowager of Cyprus went thither, in order to get the Knights Hospitalers and Templars to put her in Possession of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, because Frederick was returned to Puglia, and had been excommunicated; in which the Hospitalers and Templars would do nothing, but said, that they would wait a Year to see, if Conrad the Son of Frederick and Violante his Wife, who was the eldest Sister of the Queen of Cyprus's Mother, would come to Palestine, which Conrad, according to Bossio, was the nearest Heir to the Crown of *Jerusalem*². Hence it was, that Charles, afterwards finding the Insufficiency of Mary's Title, thought fit to compromise Matters with Henry II. King of Cyprus, who, according to the said P. Lusignano, was his Competitor. And though Henry renewed the Dispute afterwards with Charles II. by vertue of the Rights of his Grandmother; nevertheless, both Charles, and all the other Kings of the Family of Anjou his Successors, continued still to take the Title of Kings of Jerusalem, as may be seen in their Charters and Grants. And King Robert with his Wife Queen Sancia, in whose time the Christians, who had the Charge of the holy Sepulchre, were more infested than ever, agreed with the Sultan, by promising him a large Tribute, that the Christians should not in the least be molested; and at the same time they provided them with all Necessaries for the

Support of that holy Place¹. Moreover Queen Sancia, at her own Charges, caused a Convent of Friars Minors of the Order of S. Francis to be built on Mount Sion for which she obtained a Bull from Pope Clement VI. recorded by Wadingo; which Author likewise says, that Queen Joan I. got leave also from the Sultan to build another Convent for the said Friars in the Valley of Jehosaphat, and furnished the Expences, both of the Building and Maintenance of the said Friars². Wherefore some say, the Kings of Naples claim the Patronage of the holy Sepulchre, and of these Convents of Friars Minors of S. Francis, founded and so liberally endowed by their Predecessors.

BUT others considering, that the Fountain from whence the Kings of Naples derive the Title of King of Jerusalem is somewhat muddy, if it arise from this Cession of Mary's; in order to ward off more strongly the Pretensions of the Kings of England, of the Marquisses of Monferate (from whom the present Dukes of Savoy derive their Right) and of the Republick of Venice, which, as having succeeded to the Kings of Cyprus, pretends to that Title, have asserted, that the Title of King of Jerusalem justly belongs to the Kings of the House of Austria by right of Mary, the eldest Daughter of Isabel Sister of Baldwin IV. King of Jerusalem, which was not extinguished in the Person of Conrad; because all the Ultramontan and Italian Writers agree, that when this unfortunate Prince was beheaded, he, with the Glove and Ring, invested Peter King of Aragon with all his Kingdoms and Rights, to whom they justly belonged, as Heir of the House of Suevia, by right of Constantia Daughter of King Mansfred; and King Frederick of Aragon succeeded to Peter, and to him the Kings of Spain of the House of Austria, who had all a better claim to the Title of King of Jerusalem, than any of the other Competitors.

C H A P. III.

A new French Nobility, and new Orders of Knighthood introduced into Naples by King Charles I.

DURING the Reign of the Normans, as we have seen in the preceding Books of this History, many French Lords came to our Provinces, who had received military Honours, and had gained great Experience in War under those Princes, who came to us from Normandy, a Country of France; and as a Reward of their many and gallant Exploits, had Fiefs bestowed upon them, and were advanced to the chief Offices of the Crown: It was by them that a new Method of Succession to Fiefs was introduced among us, called Jus Francorum; which gave Rise to many other Usages and Customs. But these Barons did not fix in Naples, many of them settling in Sicily, and particularly in Palermo, then the Royal Seat. Others of them resided on their Estates with which they were invested; some honoured with Offices followed the Princes, or remained where their Posts required their Presence. But those French Captains and Warriors, who followed King Charles in the Expedition to these Kingdoms, residing for the most part in Naples, after the Conquest, fixed themselves altogether in that City; where by the Bounty of the King they received the Reward of their Labours: For Charles, after he had made his magnificent Entry into Naples, and had been received with Acclamations, together with his Queen Beatrice and his French Lords, spent many Days in feasting and rewarding all those that had served him; and after making a strict Enquiry after the Barons who had been of Manfred's Party, and confiscating their Estates, he began to divide them amongst these Lords, beginning with Guido Monfort, who had been Captain General of all his Armies; and besides making William Belmont his High-Admiral he invested him with the County of Caserta, and gave many Cities and Villages to others. William Etendard, William de Clinet, Ralph Colant, Martin de Dordan, Boniface de Galibert, Simon de Belvidere, Peter de Hugoth, John Galliard de Pies, Jordan d'Ile, Peter de Beaumont, Robert Enfant, Beltran de Balze, James Canteline, William de Tournay, Reinald d'Aquinas were rewarded, with many others, as may be seen in Cosanzo and *Summonte*¹, and more at large in Pier Vincenti in his Teatro de Protonotari del Regno, where he makes mention of Roberto di Bari, thro' whose Hands, as Protonotary of the Kingdom, all those Donations passed. And having likewise rewarded the Romans and other Italians, who had followed him, he took particular Care of those French Gentlemen whom he had brought from Provence and France, bestowing on them Cities, Towns, Castles, Dignities and eminent Offices in the Kingdom; the most renowned of which were those of the Families of Grandville, Artois, Appie, Etendard, Cantelme, Merlote de Lamagne; also the Families of Bourson, Marsiac, Ponsic call'd Acclocciamuri, Clairmont, Cabane and others. Naples therefore, both in Regard of her antient Nobility, and the many new French Lords that settled there, and possessed so many Fiefs, Prerogatives and Offices, became the most renowned City of the Kingdom; whence afterwards it justly acquir'd the Title of Noble, or Gentile.

Knights made by Charles in Naples.

BUT what rendered this City more illustrious than the rest, was Charles's honouring a Multitude of the Citizens with the Order of Knighthood; besides many others of the Kingdom, whereupon military Exercise became so familiar in it, that those who were exercised under his Discipline and that of his Captains were not at all inferior to the Veteran Soldiers which he had brought with him from France and Provence.

THE Order of Knighthood was in such Esteem among the Romans, that it made one of the Estates, whereof the Commonwealth was composed; Martia Roma triplex, Equitatu, Plebe, Senatu, says Ausonius. To wit, the Senate, Knights and Commons. The Senate for Council; the Knights for War; the Common People for providing and furnishing Necessaries for the Service of the Commonwealth.

THE Order of Knighthood had formerly been a Seminary for Senators; because, as Livy observes, the Senators were elected out of this Order; but after the Commons were made capable of the highest Offices, the Senators were chosen out of those who had been Magistrates. It was an antient Custom among the Romans to bestow the military Girdle upon those who were possessed of opulent Fortunes; whence those who had much Money might aspire to become Members of this Order, as well as that of Senators. Afterwards in the time of the Emperors it was with great Solemnity given only to Persons of Merit, but most frequently to those, who had neither Office nor publick Charge, being for the most part private Gentlemen who followed the Emperor's Court; and because they were of several Kinds, the Emperor Justinian, in one of his Constitutions, which we read in his Code¹, settled their Precedency; and after those who held any Office or Charge, he ranked in the second Place those of his Courtiers to whom he had given the Military Girdle; in the third Place, those to whom the Girdle had not at all been given; but to those only residing at Court, the Emperor gave barely Letters of Dignity; and in the fifth and last Place, those to whom he had only sent such Letters in their Absence. Therefore they took their Precedency according to that Order; whence it followed, that those who had no Office, nor publick Employment, and got this Girdle, were ever after intitled to wear a Sword, and consequently to enjoy the Privileges of military Men: Nevertheless it was more honourable to receive it from the Hands of the Emperor, than to have it sent; and the Girdle was preferable to the Letters of Dignity.

AFTER the Fall of the Roman Empire, and after new Kingdoms and Dominions were erected in Europe upon its Ruins, the Kings of France, for any thing we know to the contrary, were the first that thought fit to restore so commendable an Institution: They, in the same manner, when they found Gentlemen of Merit, and had no Office or publick Employment to bestow upon them, made them Knights, that is to say, declared them honorary military Men, in order to make them capable of enjoying military Privileges, although they were not enrolled in the Army. And the most part of the antient French Writers call a Knight in Latin Miles, and not Eques: So that when they had a Mind to make a riding Knight, they particularly declared him to be a Horseman in complete Armour, because in France the Horse-Service is much more esteem'd than the Foot. And in Token of their being made Gendarmes, they got the military Girdle on the most remarkable Days, and with the most magnificent and pompous Ceremonies imaginable; which was afterwards imitated by our Norman Kings, such as Roger I. and his Successors, and likewise by those of the House of Suevia, but especially by Charles of Anjou, and the other French Kings his Successors.

THE Days appointed for such Ceremonies were for the most part those of their Coronations; their publick Entries into Cities; great Festivals, and particularly that of the Virgin Mary; or upon Occasion of some publick Rejoicing². It was likewise an antient Custom to make Knights, either before a Battel, or when an Attack was to be made upon some Town, in order to encourage Gentlemen to behave themselves gallantly; or after a Battel, or the taking of a Town, for rewarding those who had behaved themselves with Bravery and Courage³. Knights were likewise made at the Marriages of Kings, or of their Children, or on the Birth-Day of a Prince, for honouring the Tournaments that were then made.

OUR Kings first of all were wont by an Edict to publish over the whole Kingdom the Day appointed for the Ceremony, that whoever had a mind to have the Girdle might come prepared with all the Requisites, which, according to our Constitutions, were necessary: For Roger I. King of Sicily had made a Constitution⁴, whereby he ordained, that no Person could pretend to the Military Girdle without the King's Licence, and who could not prove that they were descended from Knights; which was confirmed by Frederick II. in the following Constitution⁵, which ought not to be ascribed to Roger, as is commonly done, but to Frederick, who, by Avi Nostri, means Roger; and it is likewise mentioned by Riccardo da S. Germano in his Chronicle, where he says it was published by Frederick in a general Parliament, held in S. Germano in the Month of February 1232.

THE Kings of the Family of Anjou added other Requisites, requiring not only, Quod nullus possit accipere militare cingulum, nisi ex parte patris saltem sit Miles, as we read in the Register of Charles II. of the Year 1294, recorded by *Tutini*⁶, but that he and his Forefathers had been assessed, and had paid the Subsidies with the Nobility and Knights. But from a Gloss of Bartolommeo di Capua upon the above-mentioned Constitution of Roger, it appears, that in the Reign of King Robert, when he wrote, the Proof of being descended from a Knight was not required here, though in France it was observed; these are his Words: Non potest quis militare qui non est de genere militum ex parte Patris. Hoc in Regno Siciliae non servatur, sed bene audiivi servari in Regno Franciae. And we even read that the Girdle has been given to many of the Commonalty, who could not prove that their Forefathers had been Knights; and many such were knighted both in the City of Naples and other Parts of the Kingdom by Charles I. and II. his Son, and by Robert, as may be seen in *Tutini*⁷, whom he therefore calls milites ex gratia, because they had that Honour without the abovementioned Conditions.

IT was likewise requisite that the Candidate should be of Age. The Romans according to A. Gellius ¹, conferred the Honour of Knighthood from seventeen Years of Age and upwards; and, the Abbot Telefino ², in the Deeds of King Roger, in describing the Gracefulness and Ages of the Sons of that King, says, that both of them were capable of pretending to the Girdle, being already of Age: Habebat autem Rex Rogerius & alios duos liberos adolescentiores, forma speciosissimos, morumque honestate præclarissimos; nec non ad suscipiendum Militiæ cingulum jam utrosque adultos.

THEREFORE those who had a mind to be dubb'd Knights, demanded, that Information might be taken of their Qualifications, and the King intrusted the Governor of Naples, if they were Neapolitans, or the Justices of the Provinces, if they were Provincials, to form the Process; and Information being taken, and it appearing that they were qualified, they were dubb'd on the Day appointed; and before they received the Girdle they were called in the French Language Valets, which in ours signifies Pages. On the Day of the Solemnity they appeared all dressed in fine rich Habits, and in the Cathedral Church of the City; where the Solemnity was to be performed, there was a large Stage raised and handsomely deck'd, upon which an Altar was erected, at the Sides whereof were placed the King's and the Bishops Desks, and close by it another Seat over-laid with Silver, and cover'd with Silk. Upon the Altar, according to John of Salisbury ³, were laid the Swords wherewith the new Knights were to be girt.

THE King and Queen, with all the Court, Knights and other Nobility being come into the Church, those who were to be dubb'd were introduced and placed in the silver'd Seat. Then they were examined by some old Knights if they were found in their Bodies, and able to undergo the Fatigue of War; and after that was over, they were conducted to the Bishop, who sitting in his Desk, held the Book of the Gospels open, before whom kneeling, he call'd them by their Names, and said to them ⁴: Since you have a mind to receive the Military Girdle and be Knights, you must swear upon these holy Gospels, that upon no Account whatsoever you shall rise up in Arms against the King's Majesty here present or his Successors; and if hereafter you should be disloyal to your King (which God forbid) who is going to make you Knights, you ought first to return him the Girdle with which you are immediately to be honoured, and then you may make War against him, and none will reproach you with Treachery; otherwise you will be reputed infamous, and worthy of Death. You must likewise be faithful to the Catholick Church, respectful to the Clergy, Defenders of your native Country, and of the Honour of Virgins, Widows and Orphans, and other Persons in Distress ⁵.

THEY answered, that through God's Grace, they should be true and loyal to their King, and would perform what they had promised, and laying their Hands upon the Book of the Gospels, they swore to it. Then being conducted to the King by two old Knights, and there kneeling again, the King took his own Sword, and therewith touching each of them slightly on the Head, said, God make thee a good Knight. Others, such as Mennius ⁶ say, that the King lightly struck them with the Sword on the Shoulders, and not on the Head. Then the Valets remaining still before the King, there came seven of the Queen's Maids dress'd in white, carrying the Girdles in their Hands, which they first offered to the King, and afterwards girt on the Loins of the Knights: This done the Swords were taken off from the Altar, according to Peter of Blois ⁷, and by the Maids fixed to the Sides of the new Knights. After that came some Knights who put on their Spurs, and then their Military Cloaks made of green woolen Cloth, furr'd with Minever Skins. Then the Queen from her Seat offering them her Hand, they rose up, and went and placed themselves in their Seats; whereupon all the Knights and Noblemen there present congratulated them upon their new Dignity, and the Solemnity concluded with a Collation of Sweetmeats.

FROM that time forward they were no more called Valets, but Sirs or Knights, and enjoyed the same Privileges with military Men, and those likewise of private Gentlemen, that is to say, to be exempted from Taxes; to wear their Swords in the King's Closet; to have the Privilege of Hunting; to be free from the Penalties of the Plebeians; and not to be obliged to fight Duels with the Ignoble. Therefore on their Tombs their Images were carv'd, cloth'd with Coats of Armour, with the Girdle, the Sword and Spurs on their Heels, under which were two Dogs as Symbols of Fidelity, which was the Device of the Knights; and an infinite Number of such Marbles are to be seen in the Churches of Naples, none but Knights being allowed to have their Images engraven after that manner; for the Doctors had theirs engraven in long Gowns, with a Cowl or Hood upon their Heads, as may be seen in the great Church of S. Dominick in Naples on the Tomb of Niccolo Spinello da Giovenazzo, and likewise in other Churches: The Images of inferior sort of People, such as Merchants and Mechanicks, were engraven with a Garment down to the Calf of the Leg, with large Sleeves, and a piece of Cloth wrapped about their Heads; whereof there are many remaining in the Churches of *Naples*¹. It was incumbent therefore upon those, who had a mind to take Arms against a Prince by whom they were dubb'd Knights, to return the Girdle, otherwise they would have been deemed treacherous and infamous; to which purpose we have an Instance in Eugenio and *Tutini*² of the Princes of Bisignano and Melfi, of the Duke of Atri and the Count of Maddaloni, who were honoured by Lewis XII. King of France with the Collar of S. Michael, when he took Possession of this Kingdom; but it afterwards coming into the Hands of Ferdinand the Catholick, they sent back the Collars to Lewis.

THESE Solemnities being held in great Fame and Repute, were performed in such a pompous and expensive manner, that we read both in the common Law of France, and in the Laws of our Kingdom, that the Barons had Power to impose Taxes upon their Vassals, and to levy Subsidies for defraying the Charges they were to be at, when either they themselves or their eldest Sons were to be made Knights, in the same manner, as when they were to marry their eldest Daughters³. We have a Constitution of King William's under the Title *De Adjutoriis exigendis*⁴ pro faciendo filio milite. Frederick II. extended it afterwards to a Brother, as we read in the Constitution Comitibus under the Title, De Adjutoriis pro militia fratris. And among the Letters of *Pietro delle Vigne*⁵, we read one of that Emperor's directed to a Justice, ordering him to cause the usual Subsidy to be levied upon the Vassals of a certain Baron, whose Son was to be honoured with Knighthood: Item Justitiarius præfati Baronis juxta Constitutionem Regni Nostri subventionem fieri faciat congruentem.

SO likewise in the Reigns of Charles of Anjou and his Son we read many such Orders in the Archives; and in the Register of the Year 1268⁶, we see one sent in Favour of Filippo Brancaccio: Scriptum est Justituario Terræ Laboris, &c. Quod Philippo Brancaccio, qui nuper se fecit militari cingulo decorari, subventionem per hoc congruam a Vassallis suis faciat exhiberi. And in the Register of the Year 1294⁷ there is another in favour of Leonardo S. Framondo: Quod Vassalli Leonardi de Sancto Framondo, præstent eidem congruam subventionem juxta Regni consuetudinem, pro militari cingulo accipiendo. Adinolfo d'Aquino obtained the like Order for Cristoforo his Brother, when he was made Knight by Charles the King's eldest Son, then in France: *Adenulphus de Aquino petit subventionem a Vassallis pro Christophoro ejus fratre militari cingulo decorato a Carolo Primogenito in partibus Franciæ*⁸. From the Solemnity and Magnificence which were us'd in creating Knights, it became customary not only for mere Gentlemen, but also Princes, Brothers, and even the Sons of Kings to take upon them the Order of Knighthood; when therefore the Sons or Brothers of the King were to be created Knights, he could demand a Subsidy from all the Vassals of his Kingdom; and we are told by Andrea d'Isernia, that among the Stipulations of Pope Honorius it is declared, that the King could impose a Tax upon the Kingdom, whenever he had a mind to make either his Son or Brothers Knights, provided it did not exceed twelve thousand Ounces⁹.

BY Reason of so many splendid and pompous Ceremonies, as were performed in dubbing of Knights, not only private Gentlemen, and those who had neither Office nor publick Employment, but also Lords and Princes, and even the Sons of Kings were ambitious of the Honour of Knighthood; looking upon it, both as a Mark of great Distinction, and a powerful Motive to excite the Valour and Generosity of those who were desirous of receiving the Sword from the Hands of a Prince; which indeed was frequently practised both in France and by our Kings.

IN the Annals of France we see, that Charles the Great girt the Sword about his Son Lewis the Good, when he was upon the Point of going to the War. And the same Lewis did so by Charles the Bald his Son. The holy King Lewis dubb'd his eldest Son Philip III. Knight, and Philip did the same to three of his Sons. And History takes Notice, that in performing these Functions, the King had his Crown upon his Head, kept a full Court, and an open Table that Day for every Body.

OUR Norman Kings, and those of the Family of Anjou, who did not in the least depart from the Usages of the Kings of France, were wont to practise the same. So we read of Adelasia Countess of Calabria and Sicily, who, before her Son Roger was Count, who was afterwards first King of Sicily, would have him to be dubbed Knight; whence it is, that this Prince in his Writs takes first the Title of Knight, and then of Count, as may be seen in many Charters recorded by *Pirro*¹, in one of which we read thus: Ego Adalais Comitissa, & Rogerius filius meus Dei gratia jam Miles, jam Comes Siciliae, & Calabriae, &c. The same Roger, according to the Abbot *Telefino*², when he was King, Duos liberos suos ad militiam promovit, Rogerium Ducem, & Tancredum Barensem Principem, ad quorum videlicet laudem & honorem quadraginta Equites cum eisdem ipsis Militari cingulo decoravit: And Paolo Pansa, in the Life of Innocent IV.³, likewise relates, that the Emperor Frederick II. in the Year 1245 having gone to Cremona, created his Son Frederick Prince of Antioch Knight, and with his own Hand girt the Sword about him. This was afterwards imitated by the Kings of the Family of Anjou, and amongst the rest by Charles II. who, before he gave his Sons any other Titles, first made them Knights; thus in the Year 1289, before he created his eldest Son Charles Martel King of Hungary, he first dubbed him Knight. He did the like by Philip Prince of Taranto his fourth Son, whom he adorn'd with the military Girdle before he created him Prince of Taranto. And he did the same by Robert his third Son, who afterwards succeeded him in the Kingdom; for in the Year 1296 being in Foggia, he wrote to his Son Philip to proclaim by the usual Edicts, That on the second Day of February, the Feast of the Purification, he designed to dub his Son Robert Knight; and that all those Gentlemen that had a mind to be Knights should repair to Foggia, where together with Robert they should receive the military Girdle.

THE said Robert likewise resolving to make his only Son Charles Duke of Calabria Knight on the Feast of the Purification in the Year 1316 he published it over all the Kingdom, and wrote to the Justices of the Provinces, as may be seen in the Writ recorded by *Tutini*⁴, together with the other Instances above related.

FROM this Custom, which the Kings had, of making their Sons Knights, who were to succeed them in their Dominions, arose the Question, whether, that being neglected, those who succeeded in the Kingdom as Kings, were likewise Knights, though they had not received the Order. And from what they practised, it seems as if they had not been reputed such, since when they were Kings they would be dubbed Knights. Thus we observe in the Book of Pietro delle Vegne's Letters⁵, where we find a Letter, which King Conrad the Son of Frederick II. wrote to the Inhabitants of Palermo, in which he tells them, that he had a mind to be dubb'd Knight: Licet, says he, ex generositate Sanguinis qua nos natura dotavit, & ex dignitatis officio qua duorum Regnorum nos in Solio gratia Divina prefecit, nobis militaris honoris auspicia non deessent; quia tamen militie cingulum, quod reverenda sancivit antiquitas, nondum serenitas nostra suscepit, prima die presentis mensis Augusti cum solemnitate tyrcinii latus nostrum eligimus decorandum, &c.

WE likewise read in Sigebert, that Malcolm King of Scotland would have himself to be knighted by Henry I. King of France. And Otho Frisingensis says, that ⁵ Lib. 3. epist. 20. fol. 410.

William Rufus King of England caused himself to be knighted by Archbishop Lanfranc; for the Custom still continued in those Times, that not only Princes, but even Bishops and Prelates dubb'd Knights; which was afterwards forbid in the Westminster Synod celebrated in the Year 1102¹. Thus likewise did Henry II. cause himself to be knighted by the Marshal *de Bise*²; and Edward IV. King of England received the Honour of Knighthood from the Earl of Devonshire. Henry VII. received the Girdle from the Count of Evadolia; and Edward VI. from the Duke of Somerset. *Giovanni Villani*³ also relates, that Lewis of Taranto, the second Husband of Queen Joan I. received the military Girdle from the Hands of a German Captain; and we read in the Annals of France, that after the Battel of Marignano King Francis I. was knighted by Captain Bajart, who girt his Sword about him⁴; and Lewis XI. procured himself to be knighted by Philip Duke of *Burgundy*⁵.

BUT although History abounds in these and many other Instances, where we see, that when Princes had not been knighted in their Youth, whenever they became Kings they would needs have that Honour; nevertheless, as Loyseau wisely observes⁶, they did not want it, and were Knights without it; but they would be dubb'd for doing Honour to the Order of Knighthood, and giving it the greater Lustre. For a King, as the Fountain of all Honour, and as the Sun from whence all Light is derived, contains in himself all Dignities, and all the highest Prerogatives and Pre-eminencies.

THIS Order which was so illustrious in France, and being established in Naples, and our Provinces, by the Kings of the Family of Anjou, who made so great a Number of Knights, gave such Reputation to military Exercise, that there was not a Gentleman but aspired at that Honour, whence our Kingdom was furnished with brave and gallant Soldiers.

HOWEVER Charles I. of Anjou was not the first that introduced this Order into Naples and the Kingdom; it began in the time of Roger I. King of Sicily; but it was he who raised it, and especially in Naples, to a much higher pitch, and rendered it more numerous and flourishing.

ROGER I. King of Sicily was the first who introduced this Order into Naples, and it was at that time, when it is said, that having made his triumphant and victorious Entry into that City in the Year 1140, he created a hundred and fifty Knights⁷. And when he gave the Girdle to Duke Roger, and Tancred Prince of Bari his Sons, he dubb'd forty more⁸. Whose Example was afterwards followed by Tancred, who in the Year 1189 being crowned King of these Kingdoms in Palermo, together with his Son Roger, at that Solemnity he created many Knights of both the Kingdoms.

KING Manfred, according to *Matteo Spinello*⁹, was no sooner crowned in Palermo, than he made a Progress into Calabria, and dubb'd many Knights in the Cities of that Province; and afterwards coming to Naples, he made a solemn Entry and created thirty Knights, amongst which were Anselmo and Riccardo Caraccioli Rossi. And in the Year 1253 having gone to Civita de Chieti, on Christmas-day he gave the military Girdle to many Gentlemen of the Cities of Abruzzo.

BUT none of our Princes were so prodigal in bestowing this Order in Naples and the Kingdom, as Charles I. of Anjou. There happened no publick Solemnity, on which Charles with sumptuous Feasts did not create Knights. In the Year 1272, on Whit-Sunday he dubb'd a great many noble Neapolitans, amongst which were Bartolommeo dell' Isola, Landolfo Protonobilissimo, Marino Tortello, Liguoro Olopesce, Filippo Falconaro, Bartolommeo d' Angelo, &c. The Registers are full of Noblemen of the Kingdom created Knights by Charles, such as that of the Year 1269, wherein are set down a prodigious Number, and among the rest Pietro di Ruggiero da Salerno, Bernardo di Malamorte, Raimondo di Braccia, &c. Neither did this King confine himself to the Nobility only, but likewise bestowed this Honour upon the inferior sort of People both of the City of Naples and of the Kingdom, who had distinguished themselves by their Valour, or any other Endowment, of which there are many Instances in the abovementioned Register of the Year 1269¹⁰; insomuch, that this Prince adorned Naples and the Kingdom with so many Knights, that military Discipline, and the Exercise of Arms became much superior to that of Learning; and as now in our time the Support of Families depends upon the Application of Youth to Learning and the liberal Sciences, especially the Law; so at that time by the Value which Charles put upon the Order of Knighthood, there was not a Family that did not train up their Sons in the Exercise of War and Arms.

AFTER Charles's Example, all the other Kings of that Family his Successors did the same, such as Charles II. his Son, who in the Year 1290, at the Coronation of Charles Martel King of Hungary, made more than three hundred Knights ¹, and in the Years 1291, 1292, 1296, and 1300, a great many more ². So Robert his Grandchild gave the Girdle to many of the Inhabitants of the City of Naples, and of the Kingdom likewise; and in the Year 1309 to some of Aversa; in the Year 1310 to many of Salerno, Capua and Isernia; and about the Year 1312 being in Aquila, he created many of the Inhabitants of that City Knights. And the Kings of the second Race of Anjou did the same, such as Charles III. Lewis III. Ladislaus and others; all following the Footsteps of Charles I. Whence the Number of Knights became so great in the Kingdom, that by Reason of the Multitude, and the little Merit of some that were admitted, the Order of Knighthood began to be despised and undervalued.

THIS did not happen among us only, but likewise in France, and other Kingdoms, purely on account of the vast Multitude of Knights that were made; for it was so very easy to be made a Knight, that upon any publick Festival, as many as presented themselves before the King, so many were dubb'd Knights. And we read in the Annals of France, that Charles V. at the Siege of Berges made fifty Knights in one Day ³. And it is also said, that the Emperor Charles V. at his Coronation in Bologna by Pope Clement VII. knighted all those who were assembled before S. John's Church, without any other Ceremony, than by touching them slightly with his Sword upon the Shoulders.

Particular Orders of Knighthood.

FROM the easy access to the Honour of Knighthood, and from the Contempt which that occasioned, proceeded the Rise of particular Orders of Knighthood; from so great a Multitude, the chief and most remarkable Knights reduced themselves to a small select Band or Society; wherefore they invented certain new Orders of Knighthood, into which they admitted those only of the greatest Merit, either for Bravery or Descent, and refused those who had no other Quality or Title but of mere Knights.

AND to render those new Orders the more august and venerable they bound themselves to certain religious Ceremonies, and erected themselves into the Form of a Fraternity; and besides, that they might be the more remarkably distinguished from the simple Knights, they wore a Collar of Gold, or other Badge, which the King gives, and puts about them in conferring the Order, in place of the Collar of the ancient Knights. And these were distinct and different Orders from those of S. John of Jerusalem, the Teutonicks, Templars, Sword-bearers, of Jesus Christ, of the Commendatories of S. Anthony, S. Lazarus, and others recorded by Polydore Virgil, because these were Ecclesiastical Regular Orders; and therefore were called Knights Companions, and were likewise tied up by certain Vows, such as Chastity and Obedience, and by certain Rules of a Mixture between a monastick and secular Life.

THE first Order that was of any Duration in France (for that of the Gennete instituted by Charles Martel ought not to be number'd, because it soon disappeared) was that of the Virgin Mary instituted by King John in the Year 1351; and because they wore a Star upon their Hoods, and afterwards, when the use of Hoods was abolished, upon their Clokes, they were called Knights of the Star. Many Neapolitan Knights were of this Fraternity, and according to Eugenio ¹, Giacomo Bozzato, and some of the Families of Zurla and Aprana were likewise of it, as may be seen upon their Tombs.

THE second was the Order of S. Michael, instituted in honour of the Guardian Angel of France by King Lewis XI. who, in order to suppress the first Order, and to raise his own, gave the Badge of the Star to the Officers of the Horse-watch of Paris, and his Archers, or Marthals-Men. Our Knights were likewise honoured by the Kings of France with this Order, such as Trojano Ceracciolo Prince of Melfi, Bernardino Sanseverino Prince of Bisignano, Andrea Matteo Acquaviva Duke of Atri, and Gio. Antonio Carafa di Madaloni, who afterwards (as we have already mentioned) when Ferdinand the Catholick got Possession of the Kingdom, returned the Collar to the King of France.

LASTLY, Henry III. a great Inventer and Lover of new Ceremonies, besides having instituted the Military Order of the Virgin of Mount Carmel, to which Pope Paul V. granted many Prerogatives ², he instituted the Order of the Holy Ghost, in Remembrance of his having been born and made King on Whit-Sunday. And these Knights, besides the Badge of their Order which they wear upon their Clokes, carry another fixed to a blew Ribbon.

AFTER the Example of the Kings of France, for the same Reasons, other Princes have instituted new Orders of Knighthood, and our Kings of the Family of Anjou were the most forward in imitating them. A Lady, whom Edward III. King of England loved, having dropt one of her Garters, he took it up, and very courteously delivered it to the Lady, which occasioned a Report at Court, that the King had private Dealings with her; whereupon the King, in Vindication of the Lady, and to do Honour to the Accident, instituted the Order of the Garter; with this French Inscription upon the Garter, Honi soit qui mal y pense ³. The Kings of Castile instituted such another, called the Order of the Sash or Girdle; the Dukes of Burgundy that of the Golden Fleece; the Dukes of Savoy that of the Annunciation; the Dukes of Tuscany that of S. Stephen; the Dukes of Orleans that of the Porcupine; and the Kings of Spain and Portugal those of Alcantara, S. James, Calatrava, S. Benedict de Avis, and others.

BUT our Kings of the Family of Anjou, in Imitation of those of France, instituted many Orders. Lewis of Taranto King of Naples, the second Husband of Queen Joan I. on Whit-Sunday in the Year 1352, appointed a Festival in Memory of his Coronation, on which he instituted the Order and Society of Nodo (Knot) consisting of sixty of the most gallant Lords and Knights of that Age, under a certain Oath of perpetual Fidelity; and both the Kings and they wore a military Vest us'd in those Days with a Tassel made of Silk, Gold and Silver, which the King tied in a Knot to the Breast, according to Costanzo ⁴, or to the Arm, according to Eugenio ⁵, of the Knight, who entered into that Society. The Prince of Taranto King Lewis's elder Brother was of this Order, though Villani writes, that when the King sent him the military Vest richly adorned with Pearls and Jewels, with the Knot of Gold and Silver, he who was the elder Brother and had the Title of Emperor, offended at that, smiling said to those that presented the Vest, that he was tied to the King with the Knot of brotherly Affection, and therefore did not want one more strait. King Lewis sent this Order to Barnabo Lord Viscount of Milan, who very readily accepted of it. He gave it to Luigi Sanseverino, Guglielmo del Balzo Count of Noja, Francesco Loffredo, Roberto Scripando, &c. And their Institution was, that when a Knight had given any notable Proof of his Valour, he wore the Knot untied; and at the second Proof he tied it again, as it happened to Giovannello Bozzuto, who behaving himself gallantly in a Battel, gained the Honour of having the Knot untied, and went afterwards to Jerusalem to have it tied again; whence it is that we see on his Tomb, in the Cathedral Church of Naples, two Knots at the Sides of his Helmet; and on Costanzo's Tomb in the Church of S. Peter the Martyr, we see one Knot tied, and the other untied. Costanzo believes, that this Order of Knighthood was the first that was instituted in Italy; others were afterwards instituted by our succeeding Kings.

CHARLES III. in Emulation of Lewis, in the Year 1381 instituted a new Order, which he called Compagnia della Nave, or the Order of the Ship, aluding to the Ship of the Argonauts, that those whom he admitted into this Order might endeavour to vie with the Argonauts ¹. This King made himself Head of this Society, and chose for its Protector S. Nicholas Bishop of Mira, to whom he dedicated the Church near the Mole, and ordered, that the Knights of this Order should celebrate his Feast every Year. They wore upon their Soldiers-Coat, and their other military Ornaments a Ship painted in the midst of Waves, different in Colour from the King's, by some Interlacings of Silver ²; and this Order consisted of the most esteemed and valiant Knights in those Days; and among the rest were Giannetto Protevitale of Salerne, created Count of Aterra and High-Constable of the Kingdom by King Charles ³, Gurrello Caracciolo called Carafa Marshal of the Kingdom (whose Tombs with their Badges may be seen in the Church of S. Dominic in Naples), Erizzo Sanseverino Count of Melito, Romandello Orsino Count of Lecce, Angelo Pignatello, Gianluigi Gianvilla, Giovanni di Luxemburgo Count of Conversano, Tommaso Borcapianola, Giovanni Caracciolo, and others.

AFTER the Death of King Charles III. Queen Margaret his Wife with Ladislaus his Son in the Year 1388 fled to Gaeta, and left Naples at the Devotion of King Lewis of Anjou; and the Queen's Gallies frequently infesting the Coast of Naples, some Noblemen of the Tribunal of Portanuova, with other Neapolitans fitted out their Ships in order to oppose the Queen's Gallies; and that they might go on the more boldly and cordially, they instituted the Society of Argata (Scarf); and for a Badge they wore on their left Arm a Scarf embroidered with Gold in a Field-azure, like unto those Scarfs of Reeds, which the Ladies make use of in their womanly Exercises ⁴. Of this Order were many of the Knights of the different Tribunals and Families, such as those of Costanzo, Caracciolo del Leone, Dura and others ⁵.

THERE was afterwards instituted in Naples the Order of Leonza (Lioness) and the Badge was a Lioness argent, the Paws and Feet tied with a Tassel; and the Knights of this Order were almost all of the Tribunal of Portanuova, to wit, of the Families of Anna, Felipanz, Gattola, Saffona, Liguria and Bonifacia; and there were some of the other Tribunals likewise ⁶.

JOHN Duke of Anjou, the Son of Renatus King of Naples, having afterwards come with his Father's Army to attack the Kingdom, in order to gain over to him the Neapolitan Knights, and among the rest Roberto Sanseverino, after the manner of France instituted a new Order, which he called the Order of the Moon, and the Badge was a horned Moon, which all the Knights wore of Silver tied to their Arm. There were many of this Order, and among the rest Roberto Son of Giovanni Count of Sanseverino ⁷.

LASTLY, Ferdinand I. King of Naples, having escaped the Snares and Conspiracy of Marino Marzano Duke of Sessa, and Husband of one of his Sisters, and put him in Prison, was advised by some to put him to Death; but the King would not consent, looking upon it as an Act of Cruelty to imbrue his Hands in the Blood of his Brother-in-Law, though a Traitor. Afterwards having a mind to manifest this his generous Clemency, he chose for his Devise an Ermin, which prides itself so much in the Purity of its Whiteness, that rather than to have it stain'd, it chuseth to die. Therefore the King wore a Collar set with Gold and precious Stones, with an Ermin hanging at it, with this Motto; Malo mori, quam fœdari ⁸. Of this Order among others Hercules of Este Duke of Ferrara was one, to whom King Ferdinand sent the Collar by Gio. Antonio Carafa a Neapolitan Knight ⁹.

DURING the Reign of the Family of Anjou, on account of these Orders of Knighthood, the military Profession was truly in very great Esteem, whence the Nobility of Naples pursuing those generous Customs, spread their Fame over all the Parts of the habitable World; for many Neapolitan Knights impatient of Ease, and spurred on by the Love of Glory, joined together in diverse Bands, under different Badges; and the Knights-errant, while the Kingdom was in Peace, to give Proof of their Courage, went to sundry parts of the World, where they understood there was War; and they had some Ties of brotherly Love amongst them faithfully and respectfully observed; and Costanzo says ¹⁰, that notwithstanding the so great Emulation for Honour, there is not the least mention made, that Envy or Malice ever raised the least Dispute or Discord among them.

BUT in process of Time both the City of Naples and the Kingdom losing the Honour of being the Royal Seat, hence by the Absence of our Kings, the Order of Knighthood is not only quite extinct, but all these new Orders are likewise entirely vanished, and the Title of Miles is continued to the King's Officers of the Long-Robe only, such as the Presidents of the Chancery and Council, the Master of Accounts, and all Counsellors and Presidents of Courts, who at their Creation are honoured with that Title by the King¹. And as the first were adorned with the Sword, so are these with the Gown; to which not only the Nobility of Naples are admitted, but also the inferior People both of that and the other Cities of the Kingdom, provided they be Doctors; whence it comes, that as in the time of Charles of Anjou, and of the other Kings of that Family his Successors, every body was intent upon the Art of War, so now all turn their Thoughts to the Employment of the Gown; and their Number not only equals, but very much exceeds that of the Knights, who flourished in the time of the Kings of the illustrious Family of Anjou.

CHAP. IV.

The Seggi (Tribunals) of Naples repaired and beautified by Charles.

NAPLES a Greek City (as is above related in the first Book of this History) had from its Foundation its Porches, or Theatres, likewise called Tocchi, which are now called Piazze or Seggi, as all the other Greek Cities of these our Provinces had; for they were not peculiar to this City alone, as some have believed. They were nothing else but particular Places of the City, for the most part near the Gates¹, where some noble Families of that Ward or Quarter met to make merry and converse together, and by that Means took Occasion to discourse about the publick Affairs and other Concerns of the City, and likewise about their own private Business; and since few or none came to meet there but substantial Men, who lived upon the Rents of their rich Farms, and followed no Trade, or Employment, but the Military, or some other Office in the Republick; therefore by these Seggi a Division or Distinction was introduced amongst the Citizens, by which the Nobility came to be separated from the Plebeians, who being employed, either in the Study of Learning, or in Traffick, or as Mechanics, or Day-Labourers, or in Agriculture, or other Handy-crafts, could not have Leisure to meet in the Piazze to treat with the Nobility concerning the publick Affairs, or other necessary Business of the City.

THERE was no Greek City, but what had these Places of meeting, or Fraternities, which they called Phratriæ, in which the Citizens commonly met for transacting their Affairs. The same was practised at Cuma, likewise a Greek City, and had these Theatres or Phratriæ. Whence Pius II. in his Commentaries², is of Opinion, that the People of Cuma having been the first Founders of Naples, in Imitation of their own City, had instituted these Theatres in Naples, where the Nobility, in walking and diverting themselves, were wont to converse about publick Affairs: Cumanos quoque Theatra, deambulationes, conventusque frequenter posuisse.

AND

AND it is not to be doubted, as we have observed elsewhere, but that they are most anient in Naples, witness Strabo, who, in giving account of the Greek Rites and Customs, which in his time were still kept up in this City, among the rest says, that like all the other Greek Cities, Naples had its Porches, and that the Neapolitans in his time called them by the Greek Name Phratræ. And *Varro*¹ likewise mentions them, when he says, Phratría, est Græcum Vocabulum partis hominum, ut Neapolim etiam nunc; where Turnebius observes, that Naples being a Greek City, like Athens, had those particular Places of meeting called *Phratræ*².

WHAT the Number of these Seggi was formerly in Naples has been very carefully searched into by *Camillo Tutini*³ from the anient Wards and Streets, and many other Monuments; and it being the Custom of the Greeks to divide their Cities into four Parts, as *William Postel*⁴ testifies of Athens, it is reasonable to believe, that Naples was likewise divided into four principal Parts, which seems to be confirmed by the Word Quartiere, which is retained to this Day. Each of these four Wards or Quarters comprehended many other lesser Wards, which are as so many Members, of which the Body of the City is composed. It is easy to find out, that those four principal Wards, according to the anient Situation of this City, were the Capuana, Forcella, Montagna and Nido.

THE Ward Capuana, so called, because the Road from it led to Capua; besides the great Piazza, comprehended many other lesser Streets, or Lanes, which (as all those of the other three Wards) generally took their Names, either from the Families that lived in them, or from the Temples, or other publick Edifices built there. Thus in this Ward we read of the Lanes of the Sun, and of the Rays of the Sun, which had their Names from the famous Temple of Apollo, which stood there. The Streets of Dragonario, Corte Torre, S. Lorenzo ad fontes, Zucco, Corte Pappa cavallo, Ferrate, Santi Atosoli, Filimarini, Barclia, Gurgite, Rua de Fisanelli, Caracciolo, Biscapiano, Zurii, Carboni, Mansuccio, and Rua de Piscicelli.

BESIDES the great Seggio called Capuana, there were in this Ward five lesser, which took their Names, either from the Families that lived there, or from the Temples, or the common Name of the Place where they were built. Thus in this Ward we read of the Seggi of S. Stephen, of the Holy Apostles, of S. Martin; whence it comes, that this last being afterwards united to the great Seggio Capuana, in order to preserve the Memory of it, we see that Saint painted on Horseback on the Wall of the Seggio, the Seggio of Melazzi, and that of Monocci.

THE Ward of Forcella, by the anient Writers is called Regio Herculeusis, as S. Gregory calls it in his Letters⁵, because the Temple of Hercules was founded there; and sometimes its called Regio Thermensis, from the anient Baths that were there⁶. How it came afterwards to be called Forcella, the Opinions are very different. Some will have it to be from a Gibbet (Forca) that stood without a Gate near this Ward; others because Pythagoras had his School here, who had for his Devise the forked Letter Ipsilon. But others with more Judgment say, that that Gibbet, which we still see engraven upon an anient Marble over the Gate of the Church of S. Maria a Piazza, where of old the Seggio stood, was the particular Devise of the Seggio, and which gave the Name to the Ward.

THIS Ward comprehends many other lesser Wards, or Lanes, such as the Ercolense, Cupidine, Lampadio, Placido, Granci, Pizzofalcone, Regionario, Verde, S. Epulo, Pubblico Bajano, Fiscola, Cerario, Termense, Capo d' Agno, Corte Bagno nuovo, Corte Greca, Sennarino, degli Agini, degli Ormini, di S. Giorgio Cattolico maggiore, Cimbri, Pisafso.

IN this second Ward, besides the great Seggio of Forcella, which stood before the Porch of the Church now called S. Maria a Piazza, there were two other, viz. those of Cimbri and Pisafso.

THE third Ward was called Montagna, or the high Piazza, because it was in the highest part of the City. It was likewise called the District of the Theatre, and of the Courts of Justice, because these were within its Bounds; and also Regio Palatina from the anient Palace which was there, where publick Affairs were discussed.

THE lesser Piazze, or Lanes of this Ward were those of Luce, Bell'aere, Circolo, Piazza Augustale, Piazza Segno, Sopramuro, Marmorata, de Giudei, Casurio, Formello, Dodici Pozzi, Carmignano, Ferraro, Friggido, Burgaro, de Tori, de Maj, Verticilli, Casatino, de Marogani, de Masconi.

IN this Ward therefore, besides the great Seggio of Montagna, called likewise of S. Angelo, because it was near the Parish Church of that Saint, there were other eight lesser Seggi: The first of Talamo; second of Mamoli; third of Capo di Piazza; fourth of the Ferrari; fifth of the Saliti; sixth of the Cannuti; seventh of the Calandi; eighth of the Carmignani.

THE fourth Ward is that which we now call Nido, and by the Ancients was called Vestoriana, and Calpurniana. It was also called Alexandrina, because it was frequented by the Merchants of Alexandria, who, according to Giordano, when they came to traffick in Naples lodged in this Ward; or, according to Tutini, because there was a Church here dedicated to S. Athanasius Patriarch of Alexandrina. Therefore we find that the Figure of the River Nile had been placed here, which gave the Name to the Ward, and which it still retains, though by length of Time the Name be corrupted, and now called Nido.

THIS Ward has within its District many Streets and Lanes, such as S. Biase, Scorsuso, Fontanola, Capo di Monterone, Daniele, Cortegloria, Pretorio, Casanova, Camillo, Montorio, Scalese, Misso, degli Acerri, Offieri, Vulcani, Salvonato, Augustale, Arco Bredato, Ficarolo, della Giofa, Celano, Quatropozzi, a due Amanti, del Sole, della Luna, settimo Cielo, Capo di Trio, Don Orfo, Ursitato and Corte Pagana.

THIS Ward, besides the great Seggio of Nido, had other four lesser, viz. of Arco; of S. Gennarello ad Diaconiam; of Casanova near the Monastery of Monte Vergine, not as *Costanzo*¹ would have it, that this Seggio was the same with that of Portanova; and that it had changed the Word Casa into Porta; and that of Fontanola in the Lane now called Mezzo Canone.

THESE four Wards, with the other lesser Piazze of which they are composed, had, as we have seen, as many principal Seggi, and there were nineteen lesser, which being added to the four, make twenty three. All these were inclosed within the Walls of the ancient Naples; but the Compass of this City being enlarged by several Greek Emperors, under whose Dominion it long continued, by that Means many Villages and other Places, which were without the Walls, were enclosed; whence arose two other Wards, which were those of Porto, and Portanova, and consequently two other great Seggi, besides the lesser, were added to the former.

THE Ward of Porto, which was formerly a Village without the City; was so called, because it stood near the Sea, where the antient Port or Harbour of the City was. It comprehended many lesser Districts, such as Morocino piccolo, Severino, Monterone, Bagno di Platone, Aquario, Fusario, Scotelluccio, delle Calcare, della Lopa, Media, or Melia, Rua de Caputi, Serico, Volpola, Griffo, Appenino di S. Barbara, Albina, Petrucchiolo, Cervico.

BESIDES the great Seggio of Porto, it had two lesser, viz. that of Aquario, so called from the abundance of Water which was in that District; and that of Griffi, which took its Name from the Family of Griffa that lived there.

THE Ward of Portanova was formerly called the Sea-Gate, from an ancient Gate of the City which opened towards the Sea; but the City being enlarged, there was a new Gate made in the Walls, from whence it took this Name. It included these lesser Districts; Patrociano, Appenino de Moccia, de Costanzi, de Grassi, S. Salvatore, Acciapaccia, Giorgito, Alburio, Barbacane, Sinocia, Porta de Monaci, Ferula, delle Palme.

BESIDES its great Seggio, there were two lesser, viz. of Acciapacci and Costanzi.

IN the time then of Charles I. of Anjou, there were twenty nine Seggi in this City, six great and twenty three less, as we have said.

THUS disposed did Charles find all these Seggi, when he made himself Master of Naples and of the Kingdom; so that what some Writers have dream'd that Charles I. of Anjou instituted the Seggi in Naples, is altogether repugnant to Truth, as *Tutini*², from the Authority of the publick and antient Monuments, has at large demonstrated. Neither is it true, that this King from twenty nine reduced them to five, their present Number; for by the Writs recorded by the same Tutini, we clearly perceive, that even in the Reigns of Charles II. his Son, and of Robert his Grandson they were not as yet united. Neither ought Charles to be reputed the Author of the Distinction between the Nobility and the People, as if he had been the first that separated the Nobles of this City from the Populace; it being most evident, that, in all the Times both of the Romans, and of the Goths, Greeks, Longobards, Normans and Suevians, the Nobles of Naples were always a distinct Body from the People, as may be seen in the preceding Books of this History, by the many Inscriptions on Marbles recorded by *Grateras*¹, by the Letters of *Cassiodore*², by those of *S. Gregory the Great*³, Innocent III. and other *Roman Pontiffs*⁴.

NEITHER did Charles separate the Populace from the Nobility in the Seggi, as if they had been promiscuously composed of both; for as Tutini sufficiently proves, these Seggi were composed of the Nobles only, or of the chief Men of the City, although they were not so very nice then as now-a-days, not to admit any of the Commons amongst them, which was frequently done then, either when they lived nobly, or were related to any noble Family, or for any other conspicuous Quality were thought deserving.

CHARLES only made them more remarkable and famous, by giving them more shining Marks of Distinction from the People, and rendering the Seggi of Naples more eminent and illustrious, than all those of the other Cities of the Kingdom; whence the Neapolitan Nobility became more renowned and conspicuous than the Nobility of the other Cities of the Kingdom, which was owing to several Causes:

FIRST, to Charles's having honoured all these Noblemen with the military Girdle, and made them Knights. 2. To his having made this City by his Residence Head and Metropolis of the Kingdom, whither all the Barons, the greatest Lords and Feudatories of the Kingdom went to reside, and who were not only easily admitted, but even entreated to come to the Seggi, which made the Nobility more numerous and conspicuous. 3. To the Residence of the great Officers of the Crown and Army, who likewise added Lustre to these Assemblies, because unwilling to be numbered among the People, they enroll'd themselves among the Nobility. 4. To the so many French and Provensals, whom Charles brought with him from France and Provence, who being rewarded by him with Fiefs and publick Employments, fixed themselves in Naples, and were enroll'd amongst the Nobility; and thus on account so many French Families being incorporated amongst them, their Assemblies became the more august; in all which Charles had his End, because there was nothing passed in these Assemblies but what was agreeable to him.

AND lastly, To the many Prerogatives which Charles bestowed upon the Nobility of Naples with respect to the Collection of Taxes; for he would not allow them to contribute in common with the People, but separately; so that the Nobles collected among themselves, and the Commons did so likewise. And in order to engage the Affections of the Neapolitan Nobility the more, in the first Year of his Reign he confirmed the Privilege granted to them by Manfred, of dividing amongst themselves the sixtieth part of the Duty upon Merchandize that came to Naples, as well by Sea as by Land⁵, which was putting a very great Mark of Distinction between the Nobility and People.

BUT all these fine Prerogatives did not so much contribute to raise the Dignity of these Seggi above those of the other Seggi of the Kingdom, and make them so considerable as they are at this Day, as the severe Regulations that followed afterwards in admitting new Families, and the reducing of all these Seggi into five only.

FORMERLY, even in the Reigns of Charles, and of the other Kings of that Family his Successors, there was not so great Strictness observed in incorporating; the Populace and Strangers were indifferently admitted. Which Custom was of a very ancient standing; for Naples, as a Greek City, following the Example of the Thebans, who, as Aristotle says⁶, at last admitted amongst the Nobility those of the People that had acquired great Riches; and those likewise, who for a long time had lived in a genteel manner, and left off merchandizing, and such other Employments, receiving both Natives and Foreigners, and for some time observing the Decorum of Nobility, in Horfes and Arms. Thus in the time of Charles I. of which we are now treating, Fusco Favilla having lived nobly, and kept Horfes and Arms, begged of the King to allow him to contribute with the Nobility, to which the King consented, saying, Eo quod vivit cum armis, & equis, contribuat cum militibus ¹. We read the same of Marino di Madio, Ademaro di Nocera, and of Niccolo Canuto a Neapolitan Citizen ². And Charles II. his Son allowed M. Dono of Florence while he lived in Naples to be of what Seggi he pleased, and to contribute Cum militibus illius Plateæ, in qua habitaverit, usque ad Regium beneplacitum, ex gratia speciali ³. And we read many Instances in the Royal Registers of the King's admitting Families into the Seggi in the same manner; for the paying of Taxes with the Nobility was what distinguished the Nobles from the Plebeians.

BUT these Taxes being taken off, this manner of admitting into the Seggi ceas'd, and the Power of incorporating devolved to the Nobility; who, not being very nice, admitted indifferently all those, who for any considerable time had lived in Naples in a handsome manner, whether Citizens or Strangers, and had contracted Affinity with the Nobility: Thus the Family Saffone, by living in a handsome manner in Naples in the Ward of Portanova, and matching with the Nobility of the Place, was incorporated into the Seggio of Portanova. And we read in the Register of the Parliaments in the Year 1480 of the Admission of Julio Scorciato, who was a Stranger in Naples, then come from Castolluccia; and because he was a Doctor and Counsellor to King Ferdinand, and had his House in the Ward of Montagna, he was admitted into that Seggio. And this was the usual Method of Admission then, as we read in the Process of Ettore d'Anagni with the Seggio of Nido, That those who were well born, rich, learned, and who lived genteely, were invited to give their Votes in the Seggio of the Ward where their Habitations were ⁴.

WHENCE it came, that in Cases of Redintegration, the having had Houses in the Ward was looked upon as an actual Possession of Nobility in that Seggio; and thus were many Families restored, such as the Pandona, and the Mariconda to the Capuana; the Majorana to the Montagna; the Mastrogiudice to that of Nido, and many others.

AFTERWARDS by Degrees the incorporating came to be restrained; for the Nobles made some Regulations amongst themselves, whereby other Qualifications were requisite, without which none were admitted: Thus the Nobles of the Ward Capuana in the Year 1500, by a publick Act made a Resolution, that whoever had a mind to be admitted into their Seggio, must prove himself nobly descended for four Generations, without any Blemish: That he was lawfully begotten, and the Son of such a Father: That for a long time he had had Dealings with the Nobility, and likewise had matched with them: That he was not polluted with any Vice, that might derogate from the Nobility. Those of Nido also made many other Conditions both in the said Year 1500, and in the Years 1507 and 1524. In the Year 1420, those of Montagna likewise made theirs, and in the Year 1500 added others; all which may be seen in Tutini. And the Nobles of Porta and Portanova made their own Articles, but the ancient Books of these two Seggi being lost, it is not known what they were.

BY these Regulations the Nobility of the Seggi were the more valued, not only for the Strictness practised in Admissions, but because the most important Affairs were to be canvassed by the Nobles; and lastly, because the Viceroys in managing the King's Affairs, frequently wanted their Assistance; whence, though formerly these Aggregations were little minded, yet afterwards they became so valuable, that there was not a Family, nor Gentleman, nor King's Minister, who did not with all their Interest sollicite to be incorporated; insomuch that the Seggi, being plagued with so many Petitions, divested themselves of the Power of admitting, and resigned it into the Hands of the King; whereupon Philip II. ordained, that without his Knowledge and Licence none should pretend to be incorporated in, or restored to the Seggi of Naples; and whoever had a mind to be admitted, he was first to obtain his Majesty's Licence, and then all the Nobles of that Seggio being assembled, and the Petition presented, if they were all unanimous for him, he was admitted, but if only one of the Nobles dissented, he was rejected; which proved a very difficult Matter, and exposed a Person to a very doubtful Undertaking. Wherefore many chose rather to claim by way of Justice to be restored, by alledging, that some of their Forefathers had been admitted into these Seggi, than to expose themselves to be rejected by the Nobles; so that at present the King has appointed five Counsellors and a Fiscal for deciding these Cases, after the Parties have obtained the King's Licence for putting in their Claim of Restoration. After the Example of Naples, the lesser Cities of the Provinces, some of which have close Seggi, likewise obtained from the King, that without his Licence none might claim to be restored or incorporated.

THE other Occasion, whereby these Seggi became the more valuable, was the reducing them from twenty nine to five only, viz. the Capuana, Nido, Montagna, Porto and Portanova. When this Restriction was made, Opinions are various, for there are no Writs, whereby the precise time can be ascertained; but since this Union was not made all at once, it is probable that it was brought to Perfection in the latter end of King Robert's Reign. And the Method of uniting all those lesser Seggi with those five, was so natural and proper, that it would have been surprising if they had done otherwise; for almost all those Seggi were composed of six or eight Families, which perhaps was all the Number in those lesser Districts; and depending upon the great Seggio, in process of time it often happened, that the greatest part of the Families being extinct, the few that remained joined the principal Seggio, and the lesser became extinct, and the Nobles of the principal Seggio sold the Ground where the Theatre or Porch stood¹: Thus about the Year 1235 in the Reign of King Robert, we see that the Seggio of Melazi was sold by the Seggio Capuana as belonging to it, because the Families whereof it was composed were extinct. Also in the Year 1331, by order of King Robert's Queen, the Seggio of the Griffi was demolished. And the Seggio of Somma Piazza, otherwise called the Seggio of the Roschi, the Families whereof it was composed having failed, and it being a Receptacle of Thieves, Queen Joan II. gave it to Antonello Centonze of Tiano. The Nobles of Montagna likewise sold the Seggio of the Cimbri, as their Property to D. Fabio Rosso: And in this manner by Degrees they were all reduced to the greater Seggi.

BUT how, and at what time one principal Seggio was united to another, such as that of Forcella to that of Montagna, must now be related. Some are of Opinion, that in the time of King Charles I. many of the Families of the Seggio of Forcella being extinct, that Union was made afterwards in the Reign of Charles II. his Son. But as Summonte first², and afterwards *Tutini*³ have observed, that's a Mistake; for among the Collectors of the Year 1300, in the Reign of Charles II. we read that Niccolo Saduccio was Collector of Forcella; and in the Articles of King Robert, we find that Giacomo Chianula, with the other Nobles deputed by the other Seggi bought the Seggio of *Forcella*⁴.

THEREFORE Tutini is in the right in believing, that this Union was made in the latter end of King Robert's Reign, on occasion of the Discord arising between the Nobles of the two Seggi of Capuana and Nido, and the Nobles of the other Seggi; concerning which Robert having appointed some Settlement, recorded by *Summonte*⁵, and likewise by Tutini, and wherein there being mention made of six Deputies only, comprehending that of the People, it appears, that at that time the Seggio of Forcella was united to that of Montagna: Which is yet more confirmed by a Writ of Queen Joan I. recorded by Tutini, wherein she, in the beginning of her Reign, having appointed an Enquiry to be made of all the Feudatories of the Kingdom, those of the Seggi of Naples are set down one by one, and therein no mention is made but of five Seggi only.

IN which Union it is to be observed, that because the Seggio of Forcella was one principal Seggio, which was united to another of the same kind, therefore the Seggio of Montagna chose two Deputies, one for itself, and another representing that of Forcella; which is not to be found in the Union of the lesser Seggi to the greater, because the first depending on the last, one Deputy served for all. And in order purely to preserve their Memory, the Election of the Officers continues, which each of these five Seggi creates; and including their own five Nobles, they make the Number of twenty nine, to represent the antient Seggi ¹. These have Power to summon the Nobles for treating about the publick Affairs, they propose the Points to be deliberated upon, receive the Votes, and have great Authority in the Assembly, and are yearly created by the Nobles, and have the Title of Deputies.

ALL these Seggi being thus reduced and incorporated, the remaining five at different times began to enlarge their Theatres with magnificent Edifices, and to raise their Porches to that Stateliness we now see; and afterwards from time to time the City being augmented with new Buildings, and arrived to that prodigious Bulk which is now admired, the Wards grew in Proportion, and became more spacious. All the five are equal, and have no Superiority over one another; although those of Capuana and Nido, by the Splendor of their Nobility, who possess great Estates and Riches, pretend to excel the rest.

THE Nobles of those five Seggi have many Prerogatives; they not only chuse the Deputies, who with that of the People govern the City, and meet together in their Tribunal to treat about the publick Affairs, but likewise exercise many Jurisdictions, and among others that of declaring Plebeians to be noble Neapolitans, and of naturalizing Citizens. They have also the Power of creating the Syndic, who in general Parliaments, and in other publick Functions, in Presence of the Viceroy, represents not only the City, but the whole Kingdom. The Nobles of the Seggi of Capuana and Nido, when they meet to treat about publick Affairs, confer with one another, and can meet together in any one of the two Seggi, and give their Votes, but cannot bear any Office but in their own Seggio. They have also a Law among themselves concerning the contracting of Marriage, called the new Method of Capuana and Nida. And the Nobles of Montagna of old had likewise a new Method of giving Portions to the Gentlewomen of their Seggio. And in ancient Times there was likewise in Naples another Method of Marriage Settlement peculiar to the Countesses and Baronesses of the Kingdom.

THE City of Naples is made up of two States only, that of the Nobility, and that of the People; for the Ecclesiastical State, which in France makes one by itself, with us is not a separate State, but like that of the Magistrates, is diffused among the Nobility and People; therefore in the Government thereof none but the Nobility and People are admitted. Whence it is, that the Government of the City belongs no less to the People than to the Nobility, as it always did, as Tutini ² very fully proves; therefore besides the abovementioned five Seggi there is another of the People, which like those of the Nobles, chuses its own Deputy, makes its own Officers, has its own lesser Districts, which they call Ottine, and together with the Nobles partakes of the Government of the City, and of all other Honours and Prerogatives ³.

BUT on the other hand, there being many noble and illustrious Families residing in Naples, who are neither of the Nobility nor People; therefore those are looked upon as a distinct Body from the Citizens, and for the most part have their Origin from other Cities, both within and without the Kingdom. Such Nobility have neither Seat nor Place, because if they had they would partake of the Charges, and of the Honours with the other Noblemen of the five Seggi.

THEREFORE in the time of the Viceroyalty of D. Pedro de Toledo, many Families which had not been admitted into the Seggi, nor were a part of the People, resolved to petition Charles V. that since they were descended of illustrious Families, were honoured with Fiefs, for many Years were Lords of Vassals, and had matched with the Nobility of the Seggi, he would be pleas'd to admit them into the Seggi, or to allow them to erect a new Seggio, and to enjoy the Honours and Charges which the Nobles of their City enjoyed. But the Emperor being then engaged in the War of Sienna, had not Leisure to give them a decisive Answer; and in the mean time many of those Families being afterwards admitted into the Seggi, there was no other erected. But afterwards in the Year 1558 the Families that had not been admitted, and many Spanish Families renewed the Request to King Philip II. but he remitting the Affair to be decided by the Courts of Justice, they were cast. Lastly, in the Year 1637 many illustrious Families, such as the Aquini, Eboli, Filangieri, Gambacorti, Agerbi of Aragon, Coucobletti, Orsini, Marchesi, Franchi, Leiva, Mendoza, and others, brought upon the Carpet again the Project for erecting a new Seggio, for which they had recourse to King Philip IV. but after a tedious Attendance, according to the usual Slowness of the Spanish Court, out of all Patience, they never mentioned it any more, but were afterwards admitted into the ancient Seggi.

General Parliaments begun to be held in Naples.

IN the preceding Books of this History it may be observed, that the Kings of Sicily, when they had Occasion either to establish new Laws, or for other Affairs of the State to call General Courts, they did not appoint them to be held in Naples, but in divers Cities of the Kingdom; sometimes in Melfi, sometimes in Ariano, at other times in Bari, S. Germano, Capua, Barletta, and other Places. But after that Charles I. of Anjou who resided for the most part in Naples, invited almost all the Barons, Lords, and the great Officers of the Kingdom to take up their Abodes there: This City was looked upon to be the fittest and most proper for holding the general Parliaments, because most of the Barons lived there, and the Syndics of the other Cities and Towns of the Kingdom, came and joined the two States of the Nobility and People; for with us, as in all other Dominions of Christendom, excepting France, the Ecclesiastical makes not a separate State, but as the Romans did with respect to their Priests, whom they mixed among the three States, we rank them in the States of the Nobility and People; whence it is, that among us the Clergy has no distinct Place in Parliament; and if sometimes the Prelates are invited, they come there as Barons, as the Abbot of Monte Cassino, the Archbishop of Reggio, and many others, boast of their being the first Barons of the Kingdom. From this time forward, Naples having become the Head and Metropolis of the Kingdom, all the Parliaments that were afterwards called were held there, Tanquam in solemniori, & habiliiori loco, as Charles II. himself calls it ¹. And Queen Joan I. Charles III. Lewis II. Alphonfus I. and the other Kings their Successors continued to hold their Parliaments in this City ²; so that King Alphonfus having summoned a Parliament to be held in Benevento, the Neapolitans were highly offended, and ordered Matters so that it met in Naples.

The Kingdom of Sicily disjoined from that of Puglia, by the famous Sicilian Vespers.

AMONG all the Reasons already enumerated for the Rise and Grandeur of Naples, the chief was the Disjunction of these two Kingdoms; the Consequence of which was two Royal Courts, the ancient one of Sicily, and the new one of Naples. Palermo was continued to be the Place of Residence in Sicily by the Kings of Aragon, and Naples by the French in Puglia and Calabria. And it is worthy of Observation, that not only the Prosperity which had hitherto attended Charles, but likewife the Adversity which that Prince began to sink under, upon Pope Nicholas III.'s Election to the Papacy, contributed to the aggrandizing of Naples.

POPE John being dead, and the See vacant for six Months, during which time King Charles left no Stone unturned in order to procure the Election of a French Pope, the College of Cardinals in the Month of November 1277, elected Giovanni Cardinal of Gaeta of the Family of Ursini, who took the Name of Nicholas III. This Pope, who not only in a private Life, but while a Cardinal, was looked upon to be both a Man of good Morals, and of a Christian Life, had no sooner mounted S. Peter's Chair, than he shewed an immoderate Desire of raising his own Relations; so that in conferring the Prelature and Orders, and in bestowing both the spiritual and temporal Livings within the Dominion of the Church of Rome, he minded none but his own Kindred, or those whom they recommended¹; and moved by this Passion he sent to demand of King Charles one of the Daughters of the Prince of Salerno, for one of his Nephews. But that King who was used to have Popes for his Vassals and Inferiors, was offended at the Proposal, and answered, that it was not fit to put Royal Blood upon a Level with a Title, which, like that of the Pope's, ends with Life. This Answer so irritated the Pope, that without any more ado he declared himself Charles's Enemy, and in a few Days revoked the Privilege, granted and confirmed to him by the other Popes, of being Lieutenant of the Empire, saying, that since in Germany Rhodolphus had been elected Emperor, it was his Business to elect a Lieutenant, and that the Pope had no manner of Power to elect him, but when the Empire was vacant. Then he came to Rome, and finding that by the Favour of his own Relations he was able to do more than the other Popes had done, he stripped him of the Office of Senator; and he made a Law, that neither a King or the Son of a King should ever be capable to exercise that Office.

CHARLES did not value the Pope's Indignation a Rush, which, as we shall see, was one of the four Occasions of the Loss of Sicily; but being wholly intent upon the War against Michael Palæologus Emperor of Constantinople, had already made vast Preparations for it in the Kingdom, the Island of Sicily and in Provence; and had now fitted out for the Expedition a great Number of Gallies, and other Vessels for transporting Horses, and other Necessaries for a prodigious Army; and had intimated to all the Counts and Feudatories subject to him to make themselves ready to follow him; and besides, had written to all his Officers to pick out the ablest Soldiers and Horses, and at the first Order to come with them to *Brindisi*².

THE Rumour of such a vast Preparation much disheartened and terrified Palæologus, who knew well how great Charles's Power was; nevertheless he made what Preparation he could for warding off the impending Danger; but the Art and Valour of one single Man proved equal to the Assistance he could have promised himself from the greatest Army.

THIS was Giovanni di Procida a noble Salernitan, Lord of Procida, and of many Villages; he was a great Friend to the House of Suevia, and highly esteemed by Frederick II. on account of his many Virtues, accompanied with great Skill in Physick, which in those Days was not at all derogatory to Honour; for, as may be observed in the preceding Books of this History, that Science was professed by the most illustrious Nobility of that City; neither did the Prelates of the Church think it below them to practise it, such as Romualdo Guarna Archbishop of Salerno, and Bernardino Caracciolo Archbishop of Naples, who in the Inscription upon his Tomb recorded by *Summonte*³, did not disdain, among his other Encomiums, to have this put: Utriusque Juris Doctoris, ac Medicinæ Scientiæ periti. And *Tutini*⁴ reports, that he had seen in the Royal Archives a Writ, wherein Gualtieri Caracciolo asks Leave of King Charles II. to go to Sicily to get himself cured of a Distemper by Giovanni di Procida, then much advanced in Years. As he had been much esteemed by Frederick, he was no less by King Manfred, whose Party he was too headstrong in following; so that upon Charles's coming, his Estate being confiscated, and not thinking himself safe in Italy, by reason of the vast Number of King Charles's Adherents, he went to Aragon to wait upon Constantia the only remaining Branch of the House of Suevia, and Wife of King Peter, to whom, as the Symbol of the Investiture of these Kingdoms, the Glove had been carried, which, as we have related, Conrad threw upon the Market-Place, when King Charles caused him to be beheaded. He was most graciously received both by her and the King her Husband, who in Conversation having found him to be a Man of great Valour and Prudence, made him a Baron of the Kingdom of Valentia, and Lord of Luxen, Benizzano, and Palma. Giovanni seeing the Munificence of that Prince, turned all his Thoughts upon finding out Means for restoring him and his Queen to the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily; and he began to spend all the Revenues of his Barony in keeping Spies in both Kingdoms, where he had a great many Friends and Followers, and he wrote to those in whom he had the greatest Confidence.

BUT he soon found, that to attempt this in the Kingdom of Puglia was a thing impracticable and desperate; for by the Presence of King Charles, who had taken up his Residence in Naples, and made Progresses to the other Cities of the Provinces; by the Rewards he had given to his faithful Friends; and by the Vigour that had been used against the Rebels, no Memory had been left of Manfred's Faction. Therefore he bent all his Thoughts upon the Island of Sicily, where he found Matters better disposed; for King Charles being at a Distance, had entrusted the Government of it to his French Ministers, who, by treating the Sicilians in the most harsh manner, were detested by all the Islanders. Therefore Giovanni went to Sicily in Disguise, and beginning to treat of the Conspiracy with some of the most powerful Men, who had been the worst used by the French, they concluded amongst themselves to rise in Arms all at one time against the French, and to proclaim Peter of Aragon their King. But the Forces of the Island seeming not sufficient, and those of Peter but inconsiderable, it was therefore thought necessary to procure greater Assistance. Giovanni calling to mind the Hatred which the Pope and Charles bore one another, and that Paleologus being much afraid of Charles's Preparations for War, would be glad to enter into any Measures for diverting the Expedition to Constantinople, went immediately to Rome in the Habit of a Monk to feel the Pope's Pulse, whom he found extremely ready on his part to favour the Undertaking. From Rome he went in the same Disguise to Constantinople, and with most convincing Arguments demonstrated to Paleologus, That the most certain and secure way for his Safety, was to lend King Peter Money to forward the Expedition against Sicily, by which Means Charles would be engaged in a War at Home, and would not think of making one Abroad, of which the Emperor being persuaded, he very willingly offered to be at the Charges, provided King Peter would boldly take the Expedition upon him; and he sent with Giovanni one of his most trusty Secretaries with a good Sum of Money, which he was to carry to the King of Aragon, ordering him likewise to have an Interview with the Pope, to give him an Account of his Inclinations, and of his readiness to send Assistance. The Secretary and Giovanni arrived in Malta, a small Island not far distant from Sicily, where they staid for some Days, till the Heads of the Conspirators had Advice from Giovanni to come and welcome the Emperor's Secretary, and to assure him of the good Effects that would result from the Emperor's standing firm to his Resolution till the War should be at an End. Then the Conspirators departed and returned to Sicily to encourage those that were in the Secret. In the mean time Giovanni with the Secretary went to Rome, and having had an Audience of the Pope, they disclosed to him the whole Matter: The Pope, who was afraid of Charles's Power, and willing to be revenged of the Injuries done him, in Imitation of his Predecessors, who, with the Assistance of the French, had driven the Suevi out of Sicily, resolved, with the Help of the Forces of Aragon, to drive out the Princes of the Family of Anjou; so that he not only entered into the Alliance, but upon hearing that Paleologus had sent Money, likewise promised to contribute on his part, and wrote to King Peter, encouraging him with all Speed to be in readiness to assist the Sicilians, as soon as they had put their Conspiracy in execution, and taken Possession of the Kingdom, of which he would immediately give him the Investiture, and assist him in maintaining it. This was the Reason that made the King of Aragon, after he was Master of the Island, write to King Charles, that it had been surrendered to him by the Authority of the Holy Church, his Holiness the Pope, and the Venerable Cardinals. With these Letters and Promises, in the Year 1285 Giovanni went to Aragon, and having communicated to the King the Design of putting him in Possession of Sicily; Peter at first was afraid to engage himself in a War, out of which he doubted to be able to extricate himself with Honour: But Giovanni removed all Difficulties. I. By assuring him that the Emperor of Constantinople, who by his Secretary had sent him the Money, would for the time to come contribute towards all the Expences of the War. II. by delivering him the Pope's Letters, who assured him of the same; and that he would give him the Investiture of the Island. III. That the Sicilians, out of the implacable Hatred they bore the French, would with the utmost Readiness facilitate the Undertaking; and lastly he gave him to understand, that there was no need for his acting, till the Conspiracy in Sicily had taken effect. By these weighty Reasons, that King was prevailed upon to consent; and he was the more induced to it, because Queen Constantia his Wife not only solicited him to revenge the Injuries done to King Manfred her Father, and to Conrad her Brother, but likewise to recover the Kingdoms which belonged to her, all the Male Line of the House of Suevia being extinct: Therefore having convened his most trusty Counsellors, the Method of proceeding was debated; and it was agreed upon, That the King should fit out a considerable Fleet, under Pretence of making War against the Saracens in Africa; and that it should hover upon the Coast of Africa, and be ready to make Sail for Sicily, if the Conspiracy should succeed: That if it should miscarry, the War against the Saracens might be continued, without discovering that the King had any hand in it. And there are some who write^{*}, that King Charles, understanding that a much greater Fleet was ready to sail, than he imagined King Peter was able to fit out, sent to ask for what it was designed: and being answered, That it was for an Expedition against the Saracens of Africa; King Charles, either that he might have the Merit of assisting in a War against the Infidels, of whom he was always a bitter Persecutor, or in order to gratify that King, who was his near Kinsman, sent him twenty thousand Ducats for carrying on that Expedition.

WHILE Matters were in this Situation, and Procida was returned to Italy, Pope Nicholas dies; and by Charles's Intrigues, or rather by the Constraint the Cardinals were under, in the Month of February 1282, a French Pope, Charles's Creature, and most intimate Friend, was elected, whom some call Martin IV. others Martin II. because they call the two Predecessors, not Martini, but Marini. Therefore Giovanni di Procida, fearing lest the Emperor's Courage might be cooled, returned immediately to Constantinople, in order to encourage him; and passing through Sicily, together with the Secretary, both in Disguise, he had an Interview with some of the chief Men of the Conspiracy, to whom he gave hopes, by telling them what had been done; and that they ought not in the least to be disheartened because of the Death of Pope Nicholas: And he got them to declare to the Secretary, that the Sicilians would rather die, than live in the Slavery they were under; that he might report their Resolution to the Emperor, who would thereby be encouraged. Then they pursued their Voyage, and arrived safely at Constantinople. And it has been taken notice of by all Writers as a Miracle, that this Conspiracy, carried on by so many different Nations, and in different Parts of the World, for the space of two Years, was by the Art and Dexterity of Procida so managed, that tho' King Charles had Friends every where, yet he never had the least Suspicion of it.

ON the other hand King Peter, though the Death of Pope Nicholas, a principal and considerable Party in the Alliance, discomposed him a little; yet he would not drop the Undertaking, but sent an Ambassador to the new Pope, to congratulate him upon his Election, and to beg the Favour of him, that he would be pleased to canonize Fr. Raimond de Pegnasorte; but really to sound the Pope, by insinuating artfully, that he would rather chuse to prosecute the Right which Queen Constantia had to the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, by way of Process before the College of Cardinals, than to decide it by War. But the Pope having thanked the Ambassador for his Visit, and waving to answer him concerning the Canonization said to him, Tell King Peter, that he would do much better to pay the Church of Rome the great Arrears of yearly Tribute, which King Peter his Grandfather promised for himself and Successors to pay, as her true Vassals and Feudatories; and that he is not to expect any Favour from the Apostolical See, till he has first paid the Debt^{*}.

WHILE these things were transacting, Giovanni di Procida, under different Disguises, having returned from Constantinople to Sicily, went up and down through the principal Cities, soliciting the Conspirators, and always by secret Messengers, advised King Peter of what passed; and being apprized that Peter's Fleet was ready to sail, he carried on the Rebellion with so much Conduct and Diligence, that in the Month of March the third Day of Easter 1282, upon the Sound of the Bell for Vespers, in all the Towns of Sicily, where the French were, the People took up Arms, and killed them all with such an immoderate Desire of Revenge, that they spared not the very Women of the Island who had been married to Frenchmen, nor even those of them that were big with Child, nor their Infants; and nothing was heard but the Names of King Peter of Aragon and Queen Constantia: and this is what was, and is still called The Sicilian Vespers. This cruel Slaughter, in which about eight thousand Persons perished, was all over in less than two Hours; and if some few during that time had found means to hide themselves, that did not save them; for being searched after, and pursued with an immoderate Thirst of Vengeance, they were at last killed.

AN Account of this cruel Slaughter, and of so sudden a Change and Revolution was sent in a Letter by the Archbishop of Monreale to the Pope, at the time that Charles was with him in Montefiascone. The King was surprized and much dejected, at having in so short a time lost a Kingdom, and a great Part of his veteran Soldiers; and after he had recommended his Affairs to the Pope, he immediately returned to Naples; and the Fleet, designed against the Greek Emperor, being already in Order, he made sail with it towards Sicily, and laid close Siege to Messina.

ON the other hand Pope Martin, anxious to have the Island recovered, sent the Cardinal of S. Sabina to be Apostolical Legate in Sicily, with Letters to the Prelates and the Cities of the Island, exhorting them to return to Charles's Obedience; and ordering the Legate, that if these Letters had not Effect, to proceed not only to Excommunication and Interdiction, but to use all other Methods for favouring the King's Affairs.

THE Cardinal arrived at Palermo, at the same time that Charles came to Messina; but as the Legate's Excommunications and Interdictions made no Impression upon the obstinate Sicilians; so the Siege of Messina was carried on with so much Vigour, that at last the Inhabitants were willing to surrender upon Condition only of having their Lives saved; but King Charles was so transported with Rage, that he would not grant them that Condition. They sent Deputies to the Pope, begging of him to intercede for them with the enraged Prince; but they were denied Audience; so that reduced to the utmost Despair, they resolved to defend themselves to their last Breath.

GIOVANNI di Procida, who was in Palermo, impatient of King Peter's Delay, who had already with his Fleet gone over to Africa, and was besieging a City, which the Sicilian Historians call Andacalle, seeing the Straits the Messinians were reduced to, embarked in a Galliot with other three, who went with him under the Title of Syndicks for the whole Island to find out King Peter; and having informed him of the great Necessity of a speedy Relief, he was immediately persuaded to quit the Coast of Africa, and with his Fleet steered his Course towards Palermo.

THEN it was that Peter, no longer able to conceal his Design upon Sicily, was resolved to lay before those Princes of Europe, who were his Relations, the Justice he had on his Side; so that before he left Africa, in the Year 1282, he wrote a Letter to Edward King of England, which we read in the Acta Publica of that Kingdom published in the Reign of Queen *Anne*¹; in which he tells him, that being employed in the War against the Saracens, the Sicilians had sent Deputies, begging of him to come and take Possession of Sicily, which he was resolved to do, because that Kingdom belonged to Constantia his Wife. Then he set sail for Sicily, and on the last Day of August he landed at Trapani, whither all the Barons and Gentlemen of the Neighbourhood came to meet him: From thence he went to Palermo, where, with great Pomp and Magnificence, he was crowned King by the Bishop of Cefala; the Archbishop of Palermo, whose Office it was, being at that time with Pope Martin.

UPON the Arrival of King Peter, the Citizens of Messina took Courage, and vigorously defended their City; and not only those who were able to bear Arms, but the Women likewise and the old Men repaired in the Night-time, what was in the Day beat down by the Machines of War.

IN the mean time King Peter, by the Advice of Procida, ordered the famous Roger of Loria, Admiral of his Fleet, to go and attack that of the French, and to guard the Phare, in order to prevent any Provision coming to the French Camp from Calabria; and he himself, to animate the People, and keep up the Spirits of those of Messina, left Palermo, and came to Randazzo, a Town nearer Messina. From thence he sent three Catalan Knights his Ambassadors to King Charles, with a Letter, by which he acquainted him, that he was come to Sicily, which had been surrendered to him by the Authority of the Church, the Pope and Cardinals, and commanded him, upon Sight of this Letter, immediately to depart the Island, otherwise he would force him to do it. Charles having read this Letter publickly in Presence of all his Barons, they all expressed an incredible Disdain; and as much as the King was above the Barons in Power and Pride, so much the more Haughtiness did he discover; neither could he bear, that King Peter of Aragon, who was looked upon to be one of the poorest Kings in Christendom, should have dared to write to him with so much Arrogance, who took himself to be the greatest King in the World. They consulted what Answer to give; but Count Guido of Monforte was of opinion, that no Answer ought to be given, but immediately to go find him out, and chastise him for his Insolence: but the Count of Bretagne, who was then with the King, advised him to return an Answer in a much more haughty Style, which was done by a short Letter, wherein he called him saucy, and a Traitor to God and the Holy Roman Church. These two Letters are not only recorded by Villani and Costanzo, but are likewise to be seen in the foresaid Acta Publica of England, in the Italian Language, in which they were written¹.

THE two Kings being thus exasperated, they were very free in bestowing injurious Names upon each other. In the mean time Peter had conveyed Relief into Messina, and Roger de Loria had gone with the Fleet to the Phare to fight the French, and to stop Provisions. Errico Mari, Charles's Admiral, came to acquaint him that he could not pretend to face the Catalan Fleet, which was well provided with Men fit for a Sea-Engagement. Charles, who on all Occasions had shewed himself bold and intrepid, was now disheartened; and having called a Council, after a strict Examination it was concluded, that in order to prevent the Army's being starved by the King of Aragon's Fleet, they ought to raise the Siege, retire to Calabria, and delay the Undertaking till another time. Although Indignation and Pride pushed Charles not to depart so shamefully; yet he raised the Siege, full of Rage and Discontent, passed over to Calabria, with a Resolution to renew the War in the Spring with all his Forces; but his Men were scarcely landed at Reggio, when Roger de Loria attacked his Fleet, and almost in his Sight took thirty of his Galleys, and burnt above sixty other Transport-Ships; which so struck him to the Heart, that he was heard pray to God in French, That since he had raised him to such a high Station, and now was pleased to humble him, he would vouchsafe to do it by more gentle Steps. After he had quartered his Army among the Towns next to Sicily, he came to Naples, and in a few Days after went to Rome, to complain of his Enemy to the Pope, and left the Prince of Salerno Lieutenant of the Kingdom, to whom he gave prudent Counsellors, to assist him in the Government thereof.

BUT while Charles was losing time in complaining to the Pope, on the tenth of October King Peter made his Entry into Messina, and was received with universal Acclamations, and acknowledged and proclaimed King over all the Island. And having taken up his Residence there, he put all things in Order, and settled the Kingdom again; and all continued quiet and peaceable at his Devotion. But tho' the Cardinal of Parma, the Apostolic Legate, resolved to disturb him with Interdictions and Censures; he, after the Example of the Kings of Sicily his Predecessors, little regarding the Interdiction, forced the Priests to celebrate the divine Offices; and those Prelates of the Pope's Faction, who refused to celebrate in their Churches, were allowed to depart, and go to *Rome*². And soon after, having sent for Queen Constantia his Consort, his two Sons D. James and D. Frederick, and one of his Daughters, named D. Violante, to come to Palermo; he conjured the Sicilians to be faithful to Constantia, whose lost Kingdom he had recovered. Then being obliged to go to Aragon, and from thence to France, to meet King Charles at Bordeaux, and there, as had been appointed, to fight a Duel with him; he obliged all the Sicilians to swear to Don James his Son, as his lawful Successor and Heir: which was most readily done with great Feastings and Rejoicings.

THUS were these two Kingdoms disjoined; whence there came to be two Royal Seats, Palermo in Sicily for the Aragonians, and Naples in Puglia and Calabria for the French.

CHAP. VI.

The Officers of the Crown divided. The Tribunal of the High Court established at Naples; and of the Lieutenant's Court.

HO' in the Times of the Norman and Suevian Princes there was but one Royal Seat, and the Officers of the Crown were the same both in Sicily and Puglia: yet henceforward each Kingdom had its own; neither did those of the one interfere with those of the other. King Peter made his own for the Kingdom of Sicily, and King Charles retained the old, whose Jurisdiction was confined to the Kingdom of Puglia only. Thus the King of Aragon having appointed Alaimo di Lentino, who had been one of the Heads of the Conspiracy, to be chief Justice of that Island, two High Courts were erected, one in Sicily, of which Alaimo was President, another in Naples, whereof Luigi d' Monti was Chief Justice; whence it is, that Sicily still retains a High Court, without having a Court of Lieutenancy; for in that Island there was no such Court, as was in Naples, where it was instituted by Charles I. when he left the Prince of Salerno Lieutenant of the Kingdom, as shall be related. Thus at the same time that King Peter made Giovanni di Procida High Chancellor of Sicily, there was another in Naples. Roger de Loria was King Peter's High Admiral, and Errico di Mari King Charles's; and so of all the other Offices.

THEREFORE to this day Naples has its own Officers distinct from those of Sicily, although the two Kingdoms were reunited afterwards under Alphonfus I. What Sicily gained by this Division was, that the Popes being always Enemies to the House of Aragon, and ever desirous of restoring that Island to the Family of Anjou, the Aragonian Kings never required Investiture of the Popes; so that in time Sicily became independent of them; and Investiture was given only for the Kingdom of Naples.

BUT there is no truth in what *Monsterus*¹, *Freccia*², and *Summonte*³ have written, that because the City of Naples by so many Steps had been raised to be the Head and Metropolis of the Kingdom of Puglia, that therefore from this time this Kingdom was called The Kingdom of Naples; and that Charles I. of Anjou would have the Title of King of Naples; for not only Charles I. but Charles II. his Son, and Robert his Grandson, and all the other Kings his Successors, notwithstanding the Bull of Clement IV. who gave the Name of Sicilia citra & ultra Pharum to these Kingdoms, would not in their Writs alter one Jot of the ancient Titles; but would still be called Rex Siciliae, Ducatus Apuliae, & Principatus Capuae. And had it been for no other Reason, as the Kings of Aragon were in Possession of Sicily, but that they might not be thought to have given up their Claim to that Island, they, as well as those Kings, retained the Title of Kings of Sicily. And this Kingdom being afterwards called The Kingdom of Naples, and no more Puglia, did not commence at this time, but long after, when it was again divided from Sicily, in the Reign of Ferdinand I. of Aragon, the Son of Alphonfus and his Successors; for those Kings, being possessed of Naples only, and having no Pretensions to Sicily, took only the Title of Kings of Naples, or of Sicily citra Pharum. And in the Reign of the Family of Anjou, the Writers of those Times gave this Kingdom no other Name but that of Puglia; as is plain from Giovanni Boccaccio, besides several others who wrote in the Reigns of King Robert and Queen Joan I. and never call this Kingdom Naples, but always Puglia.

S E C T. I.

Of the Tribunal of the High Court established in Naples.

THE Establishment of this Tribunal in Naples is not purely owing to Charles the First's Residence in that City, but chiefly to the Division of this Kingdom from that of Sicily; which obliged both him and his Successors to keep it there: Not that this Tribunal owes its Institution to Charles, or to Frederick II. as some have believed; but, as is observed in the eleventh Book of this History, when we had occasion to discourse of the Lord Chief Justice, it was introduced by the Normans. Frederick by many Constitutions raised it, and very much enlarged its Jurisdiction, by making it the supreme Tribunal; and in imitation of him, the Kings of the Family of Anjou afterwards did the same. Formerly, besides the Lord Chief Justice, it was composed of four Judges; but Frederick added the Advocate and Procurator Fiscal, the Master of Accounts, many Notaries, and other inferior Officers. In this Tribunal were pleaded, not only civil and criminal Causes, but likewise Feodal, of Baronies, Counties, and Quadripartite Fiefs: the Examination of Deeds, and all the Causes of the other inferior Tribunals, and Justices of the Provinces, and even Causes from the King's Delegates were brought before it by Way of Appeal. All Counts, Barons, and all Persons in the Kingdom were under its Jurisdiction. It could likewise take Cognizance of High Treason, and of all the most weighty and important Causes of the State.

THE Kings of the Family of Anjou by their Regulations established a more methodical and fixed Form of Proceeding in this Tribunal; and among the rest Charles II. in the Year 1306. while Ermengano di Sabrano Count of Ariano was Lord chief Justice, sent him many other Regulations, whereby he gave him more particular Instructions in the manner of executing his Office; shewing him what a high Station he was in, and over how many Causes he could extend his Jurisdiction¹.

BECAUSE the Lord Chief Justice was the Head of this Tribunal, it was likewise called M. Curia Magistri Justitiarum, who formerly had Power of appointing his own Deputy, who presided in his Absence; which Power was afterwards taken from the Chief Justice, and given to the Viceroys, which they still enjoy.

NAPLES became likewise more conspicuous than the other Cities of the Kingdom, by the Establishment of this Tribunal; which, by Way of Appeal, drawing all the Causes of the Kingdom to it, where the most important Affairs of the Counts and Barons were transacted, made it of course more frequented and populous. Tho' by the Residence of the Kings of the Family of Anjou so august a Tribunal was established, yet that more ancient one of the Capitano was not suppressed. The Capitano of Naples had his Court composed of its own particular Judges, in which Justice was administered to the Neapolitan Citizens and Burghers². He likewise extended his Jurisdiction over the City of Pozzuolo; whence in the Registers³ of these French Kings, we read of some that were Capitani of Naples and Pozzuolo; such as Aymericus de Deluco Miles Capitaneus Neapolis, & Puteolis. And in the Reign of King Robert we also find Roberto di Cornai, Capitano of Naples and Pozzuolo: He was immediately appointed by the King; and therefore the President of the High Court could not hinder him from exercising his Jurisdiction in those Places. So we read in the Reign of Charles II. that Francesco d' Ortona Capitano obtained of the King, that the President of the High Court should not hinder him from exercising his Jurisdiction in the City of Pozzuolo.

IN the time of Charles I. of Anjou, as we have related elsewhere, the famous Marino di Caramanico was a Judge of the Capitano's Court in Naples; and we have frequent mention of it in the Registers of these French Kings. We read in the Register of that King for the Year 1298, a Writ directed, *Capitano, & universis hominibus Civitatis Neap. &c.*¹. And in the Registers of King Charles II. for the Years 1302 and 1303, we read, that the House of the Fellapani in the Ward of Portanova, which was then in the middle of the City, was chosen to hold this Court; from which the Church of S. John a Corte took its Name, as Summonte writes²; tho' *Tutini*³ believes it to have taken its Name from the Tribunal of the High Court, which he says was erected in that District. In the time of King Charles III. we have likewise a Record of this Court in a Writ of that King's, mentioned by *Tutini*⁴, directed, Magistro Justitiario Regni Siciliae, & Judicibus M. Curie Consiliariis; nec non Capitano Civitatis Neap. &c. There is also mention made of it in the last Years of the Reign of the Kings of the Family of Anjou; for Queen Joan II. speaks of it in her Customs of the High Court of the Lieutenancy⁵. But it being never mentioned afterwards, Tutini believes⁶, that this Court was suppressed by the Kings of Aragon; so that now the Tribunal of the High Court takes Cognizance of its Causes: and in the latter Times of the Family of Anjou it was much diminished; for it only took Cognizance of criminal Causes left, and could not determine the Validity of Deeds, as may be seen in the Usages of Queen *Joan II.*⁷ whereby we are convinced of Prospero Caravita's Error⁸, who believed, that as the Lord Chief Justice presided in the High Court, so this Capitano presided in the Court of Lieutenancy, before these two Courts were united; for the Court of the Capitano of Naples was quite distinct from that of the Lieutenancy, of which we are now going to treat.

S E C T. II.

Of the Lieutenant's Court.

THE Lieutenant's Court, commonly called the Vicaria, must be distinguished not only from that of the Capitano of Naples, but likewise from the High Court, as well with respect to the Origin, as the Persons whereof they are composed, and their Pre-eminencies. The Tribunal of the High Court is more ancient, as owing its Institution to the Normans. The Lieutenant's Court had its Rise from Charles I. of Anjou; but its Form and Perfection is owing to Charles II. his Son. Yet Frezza and Mazzella believed, that this Tribunal was instituted by King Robert Charles II's Son.

THE Rise of this new Tribunal ought to be attributed to the Anxieties and continual Troubles with which Charles I. was afflicted, when he found that Fortune had first frown'd, and then quite forsaken him; for no sooner was he attended with ill Success, than he saw his Subjects rebelling; and in a trice Sicily lost, and himself on that account involved in a new War with Peter King of Aragon, his bitter Enemy and Competitor. Charles, struck with so great a Blow, left nothing unattempted in order to recover Sicily: He marched all his Forces against the Sicilians, but in vain: He laid close Siege to Messina; but being forced to abandon it, he went to Rome, where he made heavy Complaints against King Peter, calling him treacherous and faithless; and there he upbraided his Ambassador, and challenged that King to fight a single Combat. The Challenge was accepted by Peter; and Bordeaux, then in the Possession of the King of England, was pitched upon to be the Place where the Duel was to be fought.

CHARLES therefore being obliged to make so long a Journey, and uncertain of his surviving so dangerous an Action, in order to prevent the Kingdom of Puglia from following the Example of Sicily, resolved to make the Prince of Salerno his eldest Son and Successor Lieutenant of the Kingdom, with absolute and independent Authority during his Absence. He likewise appointed the gravest Ministers, and the greatest Lords for assisting him as Counsellors, in deliberating upon the weighty Affairs of State. And the Prince managed that great Authority with so much Prudence, that he restored the Kingdom to a better Form of Government; making many Regulations, full of consummate Prudence and Beneficence towards the People, of which in their Places.

FROM this new Dignity of Lieutenant, and from the Officers appointed to be the Prince's Counsellors, arose this new Court, called the Lieutenant's Court ²; which was much greater and more magnificent than the High Court, that was represented by the Lord Chief Justice, who was one of the Officers of the Crown; but this Court was represented by the Person of the King's eldest Son, as Lieutenant of the Kingdom, which certainly made it to be of greater Dignity and Pre-eminency. Whence at present the Tribunal of the High Court derives the Prerogative of putting Criminals to the Torture when accus'd, because of its being united to the Lieutenant's Court; for otherwise the High Court alone could not do it ³.

BUT in the time of Charles I. the Lieutenant's Court was only in Embrio, and the first Draughts were but drawn; as almost all Charles's other Works were, which were brought to Perfection by his Successor.

Charles II. gave it a more noble Form, and a better Establishment, upon an Occasion which we shall relate. This Prince having promised in the Articles of Peace made for obtaining his Liberty, to return again to Prison, in case that Charles of Valois did not renounce the Investiture of the Kingdom of Aragon; and seeing the Renunciation delayed, he resolved to go to France in order to press the King of France and his Brother to perform it, with a firm Resolution to return to Prison, if he should not be able to obtain it. Being obliged therefore to undertake that Journey, in the Year 1294 he made Charles Martel his eldest Son Lieutenant of the Kingdom, as we read in the Book of the Archives for the Year 1294 ¹. And having delayed his Journey to France, he went to Rome to be present at the Election of the new Pope; from whence in the Month of April the Year following 1295, he sent more exact Instructions concerning the Government of this Court, and appointed Counsellors for his Son, and all other Officers of which it was to be composed, whence we likewise gather the Prerogatives of this Tribunal; for there were some of the supreme Officers of the Crown appointed to be Counsellors to the Lieutenant. And the first that were chosen were Philippo Minutolo Archbishop of Naples, the same whom Boccaccio ⁴ mentions in his Novels, Giovanni Monforte Count of Squilacci Chamberlain, Raimondo del Balzo Son of the Count of Avellino, Gottifredo di Miliagro Steward, Guglielmo Stendardo Marshal, Rainaldo de Avellis Admiral, Guido di Alemagna and Guglielmo de Pontiac Knights, Tommaso Stellato di Salerno Professor of the Civil Law, Andrea Acconciajoco di Ravello Professor of the Civil Law, and Vice-protonotary of the Kingdom, and Fr. Matteo di Roggiero di Salerno, and M. Alberico Clerks and the King's Domesticks. He likewise prescribed to them the Method of dispatching the Affairs belonging to their Offices, by setting down each of their Duties, as may be seen in his Diploma drawn up in Rome by the Hands of Bartolommeo di Capua, and recorded not only by Chioccarelli ⁵, but also by Tutini ⁶.

THE same Method was observed by the other Kings of the Family of Anjou his Successors; and Charles II. as soon as Charles Martel went to Hungary to take Possession of that Kingdom, chose Robert his other Son to be Lieutenant of the Kingdom ⁷. Robert having mounted the Throne, made his only Son Charles Duke of Calabria his Lieutenant, of whom as Lieutenant we have many Regulations, and a Constitution among the Usages of the High Court ¹. And in the latter end of their Reign we likewise read, that Queen Isabel was made Regent of the Kingdom by King Renatus her Husband, which Queen in the Year 1436 directed a Letter to Raimondo Orfino Count of Sarno Lord Chief Justice of the Kingdom, and to the President of the High Court of the Lieutenancy, which we read among the Usages of that Queen ².

IT was likewise the Custom, that the Lieutenants, in case of Absence, or other Impediment, were wont to chuse a Deputy to attend the Administration and Government of this Court; and to shew how much this Tribunal was raised in the Reign of the Family of Anjou, the King's Sons did not think it below them to be Deputies of it. So we read that Raimondo Berlingiero King Charles II's fifth Son was elected Deputy ³; and in the Year 1294 the said King made Pietro Bodino of Anjou Deputy; and in the Year 1306 Niccolo Gianvilla. King Robert likewise created several Deputies, such as in the Year 1326. Francesco Stampa di Potenza; and in the Year 1338 Giovanni Spinello da Giovenazzo. Queen Joan I. likewise in 1369 made Gomesio de Albernotis; and therefore he was called Regens Curiam Vicarie, & Capitaneus Generalis Regni Siciliae ⁴.

HENCE this new Tribunal of the Lieutenancy very much eclipsed that of the High Court; for with Regard to the Personages of which it was composed, it raised itself above all the rest, and was, as the Collateral Council of the Prince is to us at present. And as in the time of the Normans and Suevi we find that the High Court was the supreme Tribunal, so in the Reign of the Family of Anjou the Lieutenant's Court had the Ascendent. In the Reign of the House of Aragon the new Tribunal of the Sacred Council of S. Clare obscured them both; and in the Reign of the Family of Austria the Collateral Council became the most eminent of all, as we shall see in the Course of this History.

THESE Tribunals of the High Court and of the Lieutenancy were for a long time divided; for at the same time we read of Lords Chief Justices who presided in the High Court, and of Lieutenants, or their Deputies, who presided in their own Court. In the time of Charles II. we find Ermengano di Sabrano Chief Justice of the High Court, and Niccolo di Gianvilla Deputy of the Lieutenant's Court; and in all the Writs during the Reign of the Family of Anjou we observe those Writs of the Deputies of the Lieutenant's Court to run one way, and the Writs of the Chief Justices of the High Court another. We read those who presided in the first, thus; Regens Curiam Vicarii, and those who presided in the last, thus; In quo hospitio M. Curie Magistri Justitiarum Regni, regebatur, & regitur. In short the High Court was called, Curia Magistrum Justitiarum, and that of the Lieutenant, Curia Vicarii, seu Vicarie.

WHEN it was that these Tribunals were united, and reduced to one, and therefore called the High Court of the Lieutenancy, Opinions are various. Tutini ⁵ believed, that this Union was made by Charles I. but he is very widely mistaken; for he is so far from being the Author of this Union, that we can scarcely acknowledge him for the Founder of the Lieutenant's Court, he having only given us the first Draughts of it. And we cannot say that Charles II. united them, because he brought the Lieutenant's Court to Perfection, and made it more eminent than the High Court, on account of the Personages of which he would have it composed; and in the Writs of the other Kings of that Family, frequently when these Tribunals are mentioned, the one is called Curia Magistrum Justitiarum, and the other Curia Vicarii. For which Reason some have believed, that this Union was not made during the Reign of the Anjou Family; and Prospero Caravita ⁶ thinks, that even in the Reign of Queen Joan II. these Tribunals were still divided. Others say, that this Union was made in the latter end of the Reign of Alphonfus I. of Aragon, who having instituted the new Tribunal of S. Clare, joined these Tribunals into one, and called it the Lieutenant's High Court, which Toppi ⁷ affirms: But it is more probable, that this Union was not made hastily. The Ground and Occasion of these two Tribunals being by Degrees united, must be carried back to the Reign of Charles II. about the Year 1306. And there were greater Occasions given for this Union after the Lieutenancy of the Duke of Calabria King Robert's Son, but much greater in the Reign of Queen Joan II. so that in the latter end of the Reign of Alphonfus I. King of Aragon the Union was completed, and of two Tribunals one only was formed.

⁷ Toppi tom. 1. de Orig. Tribunal.

Charles II. himself was the original Cause of this Union; for, as we have said, he having in the Year 1306 drawn up some Articles ¹ concerning the Administration of the Office of Lord Chief Justice, which he directed to Ermengano de Sobrano Lord Chief Justice of the Kingdom of Sicily; among other things therein contained, he ordain'd, that the Lord Chief Justice should take Cognizance of all Causes of Violence, Injuries, Crimes, and of all that belonged to the Lieutenant's Court, Sicut Robertus primogenitus noster Dux Calabriae, nosterque Vicarius Generalis posset adiri. The Power of taking Cognizance, and the Prerogatives being thus perplexed, it was an easy Matter in time to bring about this Union, and to join these two Courts in one. But after the Lieutenancy of the Duke of Calabria, King Robert's Son, the Division was looked upon to be more useless; for after him we read of no other Lieutenants, excepting, that in the last Period of their Reign Queen Isabel was made Regent of the Kingdom by her Husband Renatus; so that the Division was unnecessary, seeing the Affairs of these two Tribunals could be dispatched with greater Ease when joined in one. Then Queen Joan II. by her Usages resolving to reform these two Courts, thought fit to unite them into one; whence it came, that the Lord Chief Justice, who was Head of the High Court in the time of the Normans, when these two Tribunals were united, became likewise Head of it. Whence it is, that all Writs and Orders that are sent from the High Court of the Lieutenancy, as well concerning the whole Kingdom as the City of Naples, are published in the Name of the Lord Chief Justice.

FROM hence it proceeded, that the Superintendency of these two Courts having been given to the Lord Chief Justice alone ², as he could appoint a Deputy for his own High Court, so he had likewise Power of appointing one for the Lieutenant's Court; and these two Dignities and Offices were lodged in the Person so appointed by him; of which Deputies, Niccolo Toppi has collected a long Catalogue down to his own time.

WHENCE it likewise came, that Queen Joan II. having a mind to reform and restore the Usages and Customs of these Courts; and finding, that in her own time they reciprocally communicated all their Authority and Prerogatives to one another, with one single Constitution she took care to provide for the good Government and Administration of them.

AND it is to be observed, that whereas the Usages which this Queen appointed were designed for the better Government and Administration of this Tribunal, made up of two Courts, therefore she sometimes calls it her Court, or the High Court of the Lieutenancy in the singular Number, and sometimes Courts in the plural. Thus she says in the Preface; In nostris Magnae, & Vicarii Curiiis. And in the first Usage; In praedictis nostris Magnae, & Vicariae Curiiis, & qualibet ipsarum. And elsewhere; Judices ipsarum Curiarum ³; and it is also remarkable, that in the Privileges granted by this Queen in the Year 1420 to the Neapolitans, and inserted amongst those Usages ⁴, it being her Pleasure that they should take place in all the Courts of Naples, I speak thus: Tam scilicet Magna Curia Domini Magistri Justitiarum Regni Siciliae, seu ejus locum tenentis; ac Regentis Curiam Vicariae; quam Capitaneorum, vel aliorum habentium merum, & mixtum Imperium, &c. thereby denoting, that this Tribunal was made up of two Courts, that of the Lord Chief Justice, and the other of the Lieutenancy. And Queen Isabel being made Regent by King Renatus her Husband, in the Year 1436, as we have said, directed a Letter (which is likewise inserted amongst those Usages ⁵) to the Officers of this Tribunal, and said, Raymundo de Urfinis, &c. Magistro Justitiarum Regni Siciliae, & ejus locum tenenti: Nec non Regenti Magnam Curiam Nostrae Vicariae.

WHENCE we may be convinced of the Mistake of those, and among the rest of Deputy Petra ⁶, who finding among the Usages appointed by Queen Joan II. for the High Court of the Lieutenancy, that this Tribunal was sometimes named in the singular, sometimes in the plural Number, believed, that when that Queen appointed those Usages to be drawn up, these were two distinct Courts, but before they were quite finished, they were united; so that in the first Usages they are named in the plural, and in the last in the singular Number. Which would be doing great Injustice to those Lawyers, who bestowed so much Care and Labour in collecting the said Usages, which Collection they published altogether in one Volume; and it would have been a great Oversight in them, if in the beginning they had separated these Courts, and joined them in the end. Besides, that not only Queen Joan II. in the Privilege granted to the Neapolitans about the end of her Reign, and placed at the end of these Usages, but likewise Queen Isabel, who lived after Queen Joan, separated these Courts at the very time that Deputy Petra will have them to be united; for she directs her Letter both to the Lord Chief Justice and his Deputy, and to the Deputy of the Lieutenantcy. These Courts in themselves were distinct, but at this time were united, making one Tribunal of two Courts.

AFTERWARDS in the Reign of Alphonfus I. there was not the least Token of Division remaining, either in speaking or writing, and the Union was fully completed, so that the plural Number was no more made use of, and it was reputed but one single Tribunal; and since it was made up of two Courts, it was therefore called, The Tribunal of the High-Court of the Lieutenantcy.

C H A P. VII.

Charles Prince of Salerno governs the Kingdom, as Lieutenant, during his Father's Stay in Rome, and while he went to Bourdeaux to fight Peter of Aragon.

ALTHOUGH the King of Aragon was persuaded, that his addressing himself to the Pope would avail him nothing, because the Pontiff was already determined with all his Might to assist Charles in recovering Sicily; nevertheless that Charles might not alone apply himself to the Pope; and in order, by some Treaty of Peace, to divert the War, he sent his Ambassadors to Rome to endeavour to justify himself before Martin and the College of Cardinals, by desiring them to consider, that he having resolved to recover that Kingdom which had devolved to his Wife and her Children, it was not in his Power by open Force to take it from Charles, who was the most potent King of Christendom; and therefore finding that the Sicilians being reduced to the utmost Despair by the cruel Usage of the French, had been forced to commit that Slaughter, he was willing to lay hold of that Opportunity, both to save the Lives of the Sicilians, and recover the Kingdom that justly belonged to his Wife; and that it became the Pope's Holiness, and the honourable Cardinals to lay aside all Passion, and to judge uprightly; that should they determine in his Favour, he would pay the Tribute to the Church of Rome, and be as good a Feudatory to her, as ever Charles had been; and if after having examined his Claim, they should decide against him, he would put the Island into the Hands of the Church.

BUT both the Pope and Charles quickly perceived Peter's Drift; whereupon the Ambassadors were dismissed, without any other Answer, than that the Pope knew very well, that these were Words of course in order to divert the War, and that he was fully resolved to give Charles all the Favour and Assistance in his Power, and they might assure themselves that the next Campaign Charles would attack the Island with all his Forces both by Sea and Land.

WHEREUPON King Peter, after having settled some Affairs in Sicily, by the Advice of Roger de Loria and Giovanni di Procida, went to Aragon to get ready a new Reinforcement to be sent to Sicily. The People of Aragon, who at first had grumbled at this Expedition, as undertaken without their Advice and Consent, whereby the Laws and Privileges of that Kingdom were infringed; yet now seeing that it had succeeded, and a Kingdom gained, in which many of them got Estates and Lordships afterwards, they began to think of assisting the King to the utmost of their Power, and in Council they persuaded him by all Means possible to endeavour to pacify the Pope, whereby the King was induced to send to him a second time Gismond de Luna as his Ambassador, who was to go to Rome, and there beg of the Cardinals one by one, that they would be pleased to soften the Pope. But behold, what Peter had with so much Earnestness in vain endeavoured to obtain before, now fortunately happened to him; for while his Ambassador was in Rome, and passing in the Streets, he was met by King Charles I. who, as soon as he saw him, being very impatient and subject to Passion, said to him, That King Peter had acted like a Villain and a Traitor, who, though he was his Cousin, had possessed himself of his Kingdom, of which Manfred never was lawful King, but an Usurper and Tyrant, and that he would maintain it in Battel Hand to Hand, or with a certain Number of Soldiers. Gismond, who was a prudent Man, answered, That he was come upon another Errand, and not to dispute whether the King his Master had done well or ill, though it was certain that he had done exceedingly well; but that he would write to him, and he doubted not but that he should have an Answer suitable to the Rank, Blood and Courage of such a King; he immediately therefore wrote what had passed to his King. King Peter soon returned him Answer, that he accepted the Challenge, and offered to the Pope, that in order to prevent the shedding of Christian Blood, he was not only satisfied to decide that Quarrel by single Combat, but with it also the Dominion of Sicily.

SOME have written that Charles, out of the Confidence he had in his own Person, and in many Knights of his Army, was rejoiced at Peter's Offer, and that with the Pope's Consent they began to treat of the Method that was to be observed in fighting; and that the two Kings agreed each of them to chuse twelve Knights for regulating the Time, the Place, and the Conditions of the Combat. These having met drew up some Articles, which were ratified by the two Kings. In these Articles it was agreed, that they should fight at Bordeaux a City in Gascony, at that time subject to the King of England: The Day of Battel was appointed, which was to be on the first of June 1283, when each of the Kings were to appear in that City, accompanied with a hundred Knights.

THESE Articles are to be found in the Acta publica of England, which Queen Anne caused to be printed¹; and as these Articles were never published before this Edition, some of our best Historians have committed several Blunders, to the great Prejudice of the King of Aragon's Reputation; for they believed, that the King of England had a Hand in framing the said Articles; and that being equally related to both the Kings, he had ordered the Field of Battel to be secured, and that therefore King Peter had nothing to alledge for his Excuse in not appearing publicly, as he did privately; for by these Articles, and by some of the King of England's own Letters we are convinced, that he was so far from having had a Hand in the Articles, or securing the Field of Battel, that he had rather used his utmost Endeavours for preventing the Duel. The Articles were solely drawn up by the Knights elected by both Kings; and some have likewise written that the Pope did not give his Consent. The Articles, as we read them in these Acta publica, are as follow:

1. THAT the Combat shall be at Bordeaux, in the Place that the King of England shall judge most proper, which Place shall be surrounded with a Barrier.
2. That the two Kings shall present themselves before the King of England in order to fight on the first of June 1288.
3. That if the King of England cannot be at Bordeaux in Person, the two Kings shall be obliged to present themselves before the Person, whom the said King shall have deputed to receive them in his Place.
4. That if the King of England should not be there in Person, nor send one in his Place, the two Kings shall be obliged to present themselves before his Governor of Bordeaux.
5. It is likewise agreed, that the said Combat shall not be in the fight of any Person whatsoever belonging to the King of England, unless the said King be actually present in Person, except that the two Kings, with mutual Consent, agree between themselves to fight in that manner, that is to say, in Absence of King Edward. 6. That if the King of England should not be in Person upon the Place, nor at the Time appointed, the two Kings are obliged to wait his coming for the Space of thirty Days. 7. In order by all Means possible to get the King of England to be present, the two Kings promise and swear faithfully, and without Fraud, to do their utmost to procure the said King's Presence at the Place, and on the Day appointed and to order Matters so that their Letters be delivered to him. After some other Articles concerning the Truce and Security, which the two Kings mutually gave one another, it was agreed. 8. That if either of the two Kings shall fail to be at the Place and on the Day appointed, let him be reputed as vanquished, perjured, false, faithless, and a Traitor, that can never any more take upon him the Title of King, nor the Honours due to that Dignity; let him for ever be deprived of the Title of King and Royal Honours, and be incapable of all Office and Dignity, as overcome, perjured, false, faithless, traiterous, and eternally infamous.

THESE Articles being agreed upon, both the Kings made haste to put the Affairs of their Kingdoms in order, that by their Absence on so long a Journey, or by their Deaths in so dangerous an Action, they might not suffer any Detriment. King Peter recommended to the Sicilians to be faithful to Queen Constantia: He gave the Title of Viceroy of that Island to Guglielmo Calzerano: He made Giovanni di Procida High-Chancellor: He gave the Office of Lord Chief Justice to Alaimo di Lentino, and bestowed bountifully great Favours and Privileges upon many others; and he made them all take an Oath to Don James as lawful Successor, Heir, and future King, which they all did with great Solemnity and Good-will.

ON the other hand King Charles left the Prince of Salerno Lieutenant of the Kingdom, and appointed able Counsellors to assist him in the Government; and, as we have said, established a new Council, which was called the Lieutenant's Court; and making more haste than his Rival, as soon as he had got the Pope's Blessing, he set out with his People, and on the Day appointed appeared with his hundred Knights on the Field of Battel near Bordeaux, where he continued riding up and down till Sun-set, and in the mean time caused his Herald to call frequently upon King Peter; but he not appearing, some say, that Charles went to the King of England's Marshal, who commanded in Bordeaux, and required him to bear Witnesses to what had passed; and hearing that the King of Aragon was still at a great Distance, he departed that very Day.

ON the other hand after King Peter had pitched upon his hundred Knights, he ordered them to set out immediately for Gascony, and he sent Gilbert Gruiglias before to learn if the King of England was arrived at Bordeaux, or if his Lieutenant was there, and had secured the Field of Battel, and he himself with three gallant Knights followed at some Distance; but finding that no Person had secured the Field, it is said, that he disguised himself, and privately entered Bordeaux under the Name of one of the Lords of his Court; and after Charles had been gone, he went that same Evening and presented himself before the Marshal of Guienne, took him to witness that he had appeared, and in Testimony whereof he left his Arms with him; and that then in all haste he returned to his own Dominions, being afraid of the Snates which it was whispered Charles had laid for him.

THIS Conduct has given Ground to the French Historians of accusing him of Cowardice, and of not having the Courage to face his Enemy. But the Mistake proceeds from the constant Opinion as well of the French and Italian Historians, as of the Spanish, that Edward had secured the Field of Battel; and being deceived by Charles's having presented himself with his hundred Knights at Bordeaux, they have not been able to comprehend, why that Prince would have come with his Attendants ready to fight, and have staid at Bordeaux from the Sun-rising to the Sun-setting of the Day appointed, if he had not believed that the Field was secured, and that he was to fight.

BUT we read in the abovementioned Acta Publica of England, Vol. I. Page 239. a Letter from King Edward to Charles, by which he gives him to understand, that he would not come to secure the Field for the two Kings, if it should gain him the two Kingdoms of Aragon and Sicily; nor suffer the Duel to be fought in any part of his Dominions, nor in any other if it was in his Power to hinder it. In another Letter which he wrote to the Prince of Salerno (Page 240.) he tells him, that it was far from being true, that he had granted his Father what he demanded concerning that Combat, on the contrary he had refused him downright (tout outre) which is the Term he makes use of, these Letters being written in French.

THEREFORE there's no room to believe, that Edward gave his Consent to this Combat, either by his Presence, or by sending any Person to represent him, or by giving a safe Conduct to the two Kings, or in fine by preparing a Place for them; and yet the Historians take it for granted, when they say, that Charles came to Bordeaux, that he went to the Field, and that he remained there from the Sun-rising to the Sun-setting, without seeing his Enemy appear.

THE Truth of the Matter is, that on the Day appointed Charles actually came to Bordeaux; that he staid there till towards the Evening, and that hearing that the King of Aragon was still at some Distance, he returned the same Day. But he was scarcely gone, when Peter, who was in the City disguised under the Name of one of the Lords of his Court, went and presented himself to the Marshal of Guienne; took him Witness that he had appeared, and in Testimony thereof he left his Arms with him, and then in all haste returned to his own Dominions. If we consider the Tenor of the Articles agreed upon between the two Kings, this Conduct will not bear the Name of Cowardice; for the appearing of these two Princes before the Marshal of Guienne, was only to fulfill the fourth Article, and not to fight; because by the fifth they were not to fight, unless the King of England was present; and by Edward's Letter abovementioned, nothing was farther from his Thoughts, than to be present at that Combat. That the King of Aragon was afraid is not to be doubted, but the Fear he had was not that of fighting his Enemy; for by the Articles he was not obliged, except in the Presence of the King of England, who was to secure the Field. Of whom then was he afraid? The French Historians, who upon other Occasions have been very ready to undervalue this Prince, as an Enemy to the House of France, have not cared to explain the Cause of his Fear; but the Sicilians and Neapolitans have done it; and tell us, that King Peter had been informed that Charles had not only brought his hundred Knights with him to Bordeaux, but that he likewise had, some say, three thousand, other five thousand Horse within a Day's march of that City; and some add, that his Nephew the King of France was at the Head of them; which Mezeray cannot altogether deny, but says, that Peter retired, pretending to be afraid of being attacked unawares by the King of France; for if the King of France had not had Troops near Bordeaux, how could Peter, when he was in the Dominions of the King of England, pretend to be afraid of being surprized by the King of France?

IN order then to justify the King of Aragon two things must be examined: First, whether he performed the Agreement; and none who has read the abovementioned Articles will doubt of it: Secondly, Whether he had just Grounds to suspect Charles and the King of France. As for the first of these Princes, the Neapolitan and Sicilian Historians say, that he had bragged publickly of his having resolved to have the King of Aragon assassinated, which was a sufficient Ground of Fear to him, who was in a Country far distant from his own Dominions, and in the Neighbourhood of those of the King of France, and without a safe Conduct from the King of England, or any other Security, but the Word of an Enemy, upon whose Faith he could not rely, because he had threatened to have him assassinated. As for the King of France, the Italian Writers assert that he had a Body of three thousand, some say five thousand Horse within a Day's march of Bordeaux. Mezeray and the other French Historians, who could not be ignorant of what the Italians advance, do not deny it, but think fit not to mention it; so that it is as likely to be true as false. Lastly, Even granting that King Peter had been seized with an ill-grounded fear of some Surprize from the King of France, he did not on account of his Conduct deserve those Reproaches and Scoffs from the French.

ON the other hand some Spanish Historians have shewed themselves too great Braggadocios, and among the rest Caribay, who certainly was ignorant of the Agreement made between the two Kings; for he takes upon him to say, that the King of Aragon appeared at Bordeaux, and returned again, because he did not find King Charles there; these are his Words: After the King Don Peter had made himself Master of the Kingdom of Sicily, he remained there five Years; and when he had settled the Affairs of his new Kingdom, he returned to Spain, where having found a Challenge from King Charles, he went in Disguise through the Province of Guipuscoa to Bordeaux, which being at that time in the Dominions of the King of England, was pitched upon for the Field of Battel; and because King Charles did not appear there, the King Don Peter returned to Aragon and Catalonia.

AMONGST the Variety of Opinions, that of our most grave Writer Costanzo ¹ ought not to be passed over in Silence, which is likewise supported by an antient Annotation in Manuscript, which he says he had found; to wit, that King Peter, who always laid great Stress upon Troops, never had a mind to hazard the Kingdom upon that Issue; and that after the Day appointed was over, discoursing upon that Subject, he declared, That he had clogged that Combat with so many Conditions and Articles, on purpose to make Charles lose a Campaign, and to gain time to strengthen himself, and give his Kingdoms leisure to recover themselves; and that he laughed at Charles for believing that he would have ventured the Kingdom of Sicily, which was his own, unless Charles on the other hand had been engaged to lose the Kingdom of Puglia in case he had been worsted.

IN fine the Combat being thus over, Pope Martin found that Charles had been baffled, and that King Peter had avoided the War; whereupon full of Rancour he excommunicated him with all his Ministers and Adherents. He likewise excommunicated and anew interdicted the Sicilians, and declared them with all their publick and private Abettors to be Enemies to the holy Church; he deprived Peter of, and deposed him from the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valencia, and excommunicated all those who should obey him, or call him King; and he bestowed these Kingdoms upon Charles of Valois, second Son of Philip III. King of France ²; he sent the Cardinal of S. Cecilia Apostolick Legate to France with the Investiture of these two Kingdoms, and to treat with the King about sending a powerful Army into Aragon in order to drive Peter out of those Kingdoms. The Legate was received in France with great Honour, and he immediately set about preaching up the Crusade, and to grant Indulgences to all that would take up Arms against King Peter; and the King of France was not slow in drawing together a great Army, with which he went upon that Expedition. And Charles being returned from Gascony to Provence, proud of his having rid over the Field of Battel, but laughed at for having lost time, set out from Marseilles with sixty Gallies and many Ships for Naples, with Design together with the Gallies of the Kingdom to sail for Sicily before Autumn.

ON the other hand Peter King of Aragon was daily sending Reinforcements of Men and Ships to Roger de Loria his Admiral; and little minding the Curles and Depositions of the Pope, out of Derision he called himself, Peter of Aragon, the Father of two Kings, and Lord of the Sea.

C H A P. VIII.

The Prince of Salerno taken Prisoner; and the Death of King Charles his Father.

WHILE these things were transacting in France, Roger de Loria having had Intelligence that William Carnute a Provensale with twenty two Gallies had gone to reinforce and store with Provisions the Castle of Malta, which held out for King Charles, sailed with eighteen Gallies from the Port of Messina in order to find him out; and just as he had landed the Men and Provisions, and was riding in the Harbour of Malta, Roger arrived, and sent a small Frigat with a Trumpetter to order the French Captain to surrender, or rather to prepare for an Engagement:

The

The Provensale, who was a brave Man, and had certain Information that the Enemy's Fleet was inferior in Number to his, sailed out of the Harbour and attacked Roger; but at last, after a great deal of Slaughter, he was defeated and killed, and of all his Gallies only twelve escaped by flight to Naples; the other ten were taken, and carried to Messina by Roger to the great Joy of all the Island. The Malteze surrendered themselves, and Roger gave the Command of the Island to Manfred Lancia one of his Officers ¹.

BUT Roger not content with this Victory, having already conceived in his Mind the other great Things he afterwards did, in all haste assembled all the Gallies of the Island, and steer'd his Course towards Naples, in order to find out an Opportunity of doing another gallant Action; which very luckily happened, for having sailed along the Coast of Calabria with forty five Gallies, he came to Castellamare di Stabia, and after he had there refreshed his Fleet, in the Month of June 1283 he stood in for Naples, and in order of Battel drew nigh the Walls, and began to throw Darts and other Instruments of War into the City; whereupon all the Inhabitants took themselves to their Arms, believing that Roger had a Mind to attack the City; but as Roger's Intention was only to entice and provoke the Gallies that were in the Harbour to an Engagement, after the Sicilians had upbraided and provoked the Neapolitans that were upon the Walls, and in the Gallies within the Harbour, he coasted along by Resina and Torre del Greco as far as Chinja and Posilipo, burning and destroying those fine Villas and pleasant Places.

THE Prince of Salerno, who had been left by his Father Lieutenant of the Kingdom, not able to bear so great an Indignity, ordered James Bruson a Frenchman, who was then Captain General of the Gallies, immediately to get them in readiness to put to Sea in order to fight Roger, and told him that he himself would accompany him. Gerardo di Parma the Apostolical Legate, who was then at Naples, exclaimed against the Prince's going, and the exposing of the Fleet to an Engagement; but the Prince, highly resenting the Insult, by all Means would embark; and not only the French Veteran Soldiers, and all the other hired Troops embarked with him, but there was not a Nobleman, or any Citizen of Distinction able to bear Arms that did not cheerfully go with him. Roger indeed no sooner saw the Neapolitan Fleet advanced some Miles from the Harbour, than he set sail with his Gallies, seeming to fly, but with Intention to draw the Enemy so far out, as they should not be able to avoid an Engagement. The Prince taking it to be a real Flight was overjoyed, and all the Soldiers of the Gallies, especially those who had but little Experience in War, huzza'd, as if they had been sure of Victory; but when Roger found that they were a great many Miles from the Land, he ordered his Gallies to bring to; and, after he had visited them one by one, made them tack and stand towards the Enemy who were advancing, and with full sail went to meet them. The Battel began with great Fury on both sides; but after they had been for a long time so closely engaged, that they could scarcely know one Galley from another, at last the Gentlemen of the Prince's Gallies having fought with all their Might, overcome with Heat and Fatigue, began to give Way; but the Admiral's Galley, in which the Prince was, stood it out to the last; for though she was so hemmed in that she could not disengage herself and leave the Battel, as many others did, and fled towards Naples, yet she made a gallant Resistance, being manned with the Flower of the Nobility and Gentry, who chose rather to die than yield and see their Prince taken Prisoner. But Roger, in order to put an end to the Battel, sent his Carpenters and some Sailors in Boats, with Augurs and other Instruments, who quickly bored the Prince's Galley in many Places, insomuch, that such a great Quantity of Water entered, that she was ready to sink; which the Prince and the rest perceiving, surrendered to Roger, who had importuned them so to do; and he offered his Hand to the Prince, entreating him in all haste to come aboard of his Galley. With the Prince were made Prisoners Burson the Admiral, William Stendard, and many other Italian and French Lords, and ten Gallies were taken ².

THIS Defeat put the Neapolitans into a terrible Consternation, for they saw Roger return and post himself before the Walls of the City, and encourage the People to revolt. And the Mob had already begun to make Disturbance, and to cry out, Down with King Charles, and up with Roger de Loria. And Costanzo writes, that if the Nobility, and the Citizens of greatest Credit had not interposed, and taken upon them to guard the Gates of the City, some great Mischief would have ensu'd. The Populace then being restrained, and the City quieted, Roger retired to the Island of Caprea; and he got the Prince to give Orders for setting at Liberty Beatrice King Manfred's youngest Daughter, who had been Prisoner fifteen Years in Castello del Nuovo, where her Mother and Brothers had likewise died Prisoners, and then he returned to Sicily; and in a triumphant manner, to the great Joy of all the Sicilians, he presented Queen Constantia with her Sister now at Liberty, and the Prince a Captive, who, with all other Prisoners of Quality, was put in the Castle of Mattagrifone in Messina.

THE Sicilians had a mind by way of Reprisal, to serve the Prince the same Way, as Charles had served King Conrad; for which end the Syndicks of all the Cities of the Island being conven'd, they condemned him to be beheaded, and sent Word to Queen Constantia, that she ought to be revenged in that manner. But that great and magnanimous Queen, abhorring such Cruelty, gave them to understand, that in a Matter of so great Importance as the Death of the Prince, she would not take upon her to decide any manner of way, without the Advice of King Peter her Husband, who was then in Aragon; whereupon, in order to convey him out of their sight, and to preserve his Life, she sent him Prisoner to Aragon, where he was for many Years kept close Prisoner. As this noble, magnanimous and generous Action has been transmitted to Posterity with Admiration and Praise, so King Charles's Cruelty has thereby been rendered the more detestable, because Compassion and Clemency had more Sway in the weak and tender Breast of a Woman, than in the savage Soul of that King, branded with Infamy throughout all Ages, and by all Writers.

NEVERTHELESS, about two Days after the Battel, King Charles, on his way from Marseilles, arrived at Gaeta, where with infinite Grief he received the News of the Defeat, of his Son's being Prisoner, and of the Tumult that had happened in Naples. He wrote immediately to the Pope, begging his Assistance and a Supply of Money in so great a Distress; then full of Rage and Resentment at the Neapolitans he hastened to that City, and seizing a hundred and fifty of the most guilty, he caused them to be hanged; but at the Intercession of the Noblemen and chief Citizens who had guarded the City, he pardoned the rest. This was about the beginning of July, when resolving to make a fresh Attempt upon Sicily, he sent seventy five Gallies to pass the Phare, and sail round to Brindisi to join the other Gallies that had been fitted out in the Adriatick Sea; and he himself went over Land to Calabria to besiege Reggio, which was then in the Possession of the King of Aragon; but not succeeding in that Enterprize he returned to Puglia, and was wholly intent upon fitting out a vast Number of Ships for transporting his Army to Sicily.

BUT in the mean time King Peter had come from Aragon to Messina in order to defend the Island; and knowing that the Pope was grievously offended with him, yet on account of the Defeat, and the Imprisonment of the Prince, dissembling his Hatred, had sent two Cardinals to Sicily to treat about the Prince's Liberty and Peace, he was resolved with the same Cunning to flatter him; for after having with the greatest Honour imaginable received the Cardinals, he gave them so great Hopes of an honourable Peace for King Charles, that they sent him Word not to move; and by this Means, after Charles had lost another Campaign, he very dexterously and prudently broke off the Treaty; whereupon the Cardinals being thus deceived and amused, after they had a second time cursed and excommunicated King Peter and the Sicilians, they departed and returned to the Pope.

CHARLES seeing himself thus bubbled, resolved in the middle of December to have an Army ready for recovering his Son's Liberty and the lost Kingdom; but as he was on his Way from Naples to Brindisi to see his Fleet refitted, he was taken ill at Foggia, where being oppressed with Melancholy, occasioned by the many Misfortunes that had befallen him, he died in the Month of January 1284. Theodore of *Nismes*², who flourished in the Reigns of Charles III. and King Ladislaus, speaking of the Death of this Prince, says, That he was so much oppressed with Melancholy, that one Night overcome with Despair he strangled himself with a Halter. His Body was carried to Naples, and with Royal Pomp buried in the great Church, where his Tomb is still to be seen.

C H A P. IX.

Of the new Laws introduced by Charles I. and the other Kings of the Family of Anjou his Successors, which we call the Regulations or Statutes of the Kingdom.

HIS Prince, besides many other Monuments whereby he rendered this Kingdom illustrious, and the City of Naples much more so, left us new Laws; which, after the manner of France, were not called Constitutions, but Statutes, or the Regulations of the Kingdom. In the famous University instituted by Frederick II. in Naples, and afterwards by Charles I. adorned with greater Privileges; the Pandects, and the other Books of Justinian drew in our Professors to study them; insomuch, that not only the Doctors, who were then called Masters, taught them there, but even the Advocates quoted them publicly in the Courts of Justice for the Decision of Causes. And when these Laws did not clash with the Longobard Laws, or the Constitutions of the Norman Kings, and of those published afterwards by Frederick, or with the approved Usages of the Kingdom, they had gained so much Force and Authority with the Judges, that according to their Purport Causes were decided; not that they had the Sanction of any written Law, but by Degrees and Custom they began to acquire the Force and Authority of Laws; first by the Strength of Reason, afterwards by the Connivance of our Princes, who would have them to be publicly read in their Universities, and explained with Commentaries by the Lawyers; and of course they likewise recommended them to be observed in the Courts of Justice; and lastly, by the Constitutions of Frederick II. who not only frequently made use of their Authority, but in many of his Constitutions ¹ he expressly commanded them to be observed, provided they did not clash with the Longobard Laws, and the Constitutions and Usages of the Kingdom. And in process of Time their Force and Authority became so great, that they got the better of the Longobard Laws, which were in a manner laid aside. Marino di Caramanico, who flourished in these Times, and wrote on this Subject, says thus ²: Licet vero Regnum deserit subesse Imperio, tamen jura Romana in Regno per annos plurimos, conniventia Regum, qui fuerunt pro tempore, servata diutius consensu tacito remanserunt &c. Imo expressim servantur, & corroborantur in compilatione Constitutionum istarum, ubi neque Constitutiones hæ, seu approbatæ Regni Consuetudines non obsistunt.

HOWEVER, the Authority of the Roman Laws did not prevail so far in these Times, as to turn the Longobard Laws quite out of the Courts of Justice; they were still in force in the Reigns of Charles I. and his Successors of the Family of Anjou, although by Degrees they grew out of Use. And Caramanico himself, who was one of the greatest Lawyers of these Times, and as we have said, in the Reign of this Prince in the Year 1269 was a Judge of the Capitano's Court of Naples ³, attests, that these Laws were still observed in his Time: Ad quod concordant Longo- barde Leges, quæ in Regno similiter obtinent. Biaſe di Morcone, who flouriſhed in the Time of King Robert, among his Works upon the Law, has left us one, wherein he treats of the Difference between the Roman and Longobard Laws¹, compiled in Imitation of Andrea da Barletta, in order to wean the unwary Advocates of his own time from their too great Affection for the Roman, and their Neglect of the Longobard Laws, which occasioned Loſs to their Clients, and Shame and Reproach to themſelves, when by the Ignorance of the Longobard Laws they loſt their Cauſes in the Courts of Juſtice. We have likewiſe a Writ² recorded by *Tutini*³, taken out of the Royal Archives of the Mint, drawn up in S. Germano in the beginning of King Charles's Reign; wherein, according to the Longobard Laws quoted in that Writ, the Monastery of Monte Caſſino and its Abbot, yields to the King the Pretenſion which they had to take Cognizance of criminal Cauſes with reſpect to their own Vaſſals. And it was not only in Terra di Lavoro, and the neighbouring Provinces of Abruzzo and the County of Moliſe that theſe Laws were obſerved, but likewiſe in thoſe of Puglia, ſince the Uſages of Bari, which are derived from the Longobard Laws, were collected in the time of Charles I. by theſe two Lawyers, viz. Andrea di Bari and Sparro both Judges; the latter was in ſo great Eſteem with Charles, that from Juſtice of that Province he raiſed him to be Great Protonotary of the Kingdom. Hence it is that in Principato, Salerno, and in other Provinces of the Kingdom we find the ſame; and the Reaſon why there is no Veſtiges of them in the Provinces of Calabria is, becauſe thoſe Provinces having been long poſſeſſed by the Greeks, and but a ſhort time by the Longobards, they could not take ſuch deep Root, ſo as to be of long Duration.

AS King Charles made no Alteration during his Reign with reſpect to the Authority of the Roman and Longobard Laws, ſo he would have thoſe Conſtitutions publiſhed by the Emperor Frederick, before he was deprived of the Empire and the Kingdom of Sicily by the Council of Lyons, inviolably obſerved. But in the Year 1271 he revok'd and annul'd all the Donations, Locations, Conceſſions, Deeds, and Privileges granted by Frederick after his Depoſition; and likewiſe thoſe granted by Conrad, Manfred, and their Officers, which had not been confirmed by him, looking upon theſe Princes as Uſurpers and Tyrants, who had been deprived of the Kingdom by the Apoſtolick See, which had inveſted him with it⁴. Juſt ſo as the Emperor Juſtinian did, who did not annul the Deeds of all the Gothic Kings, particularly thoſe of Theodorick, Athalarick, and Theodate, but he repealed thoſe of Tejaſ, Totila and Vitiges, who having made War againſt him, and with all their Intereſt oppoſed him in the Conqueſt he intended to make of Italy, were reputed by him as Tyrants and Uſurpers.

CHARLES therefore, after he had defeated and killed Manfred, and made himſelf Maſter of the Kingdoms of Puglia and Sicily, reſolved with new Laws to reſtore the State of theſe Kingdoms, by removing the Diſorders which the preceding War and Revolutions had occaſioned. His Laws, like Frederick's Conſtitutions, were made for both Kingdoms, whence they were called Capitula Regni Siciliae; and he likewiſe made ſome particular Laws for the Iſland of Sicily alone, which are recorded by *Inveges*⁵. But the Sicilians, after the famous Sicilian Vespers, having thrown off the French Yoke, acknowledged no other Laws but what they received from the Kings of Aragon; ſo that thoſe made by Charles, and the other Kings of the Family of Anjou were binding only in the Kingdom of Puglia, called Sicily on this ſide of the Phare: For Charles Prince of Salerno his Son, expreſſly declares, that the Laws eſtabliſhed by him during his Lieutenancy were made for the Kingdom of Sicily on this ſide of the Phare, and not for that Iſland.

THESE Statutes were collected, and afterwards printed in ſuch a confuſed and diſorderly manner, that we think the Pains we are going to take, in diſtinguiſhing them according to the Times and Occaſions in which they were publiſhed, will be well beſtowed; becauſe it is neceſſary for us to know, whence proceeded ſo great a Difference, as is obſerv'd between the Maxims of the Norman and Suevian Kings in their Conſtitutions, and thoſe of the Princes of the Family of Anjou in their Statutes. For Charles by holding this Kingdom of the Apoſtolick See as a real Fief, and having declared himſelf to be its Liege-man, had thoſe hard and severe Conditions above mentioned laid upon him in the Investiture. Therefore the Roman Pontiffs were all very vigilant, in making of new Laws, not only not to derogate from their pretended Immunity and Liberty, but that every thing should be done agreeable to their Maxims and Instructions; and even when they found a fit Opportunity, they made bold to establish Laws themselves; as we shall observe: we shall therefore see new Laws contrary to Frederick's Constitutions; and from thence it proceeded, that the Writers who flourished in the times of these Kings, trained up in these Maxims, stuffed their Commentaries with Doctrines most prejudicial to the Regalia and Prerogatives of Kings; and in many respects struck at the Rights of the Empire of our Princes. It ought not to seem strange to find these Kings, who were French, suffer so many Indignities; for France, as we have seen in the preceding Book, in those times was no less oppressed than Italy; and the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction had made wonderful Progress in that Kingdom: nor was it before the Edict of the Year 1539, that the Incroachments of the Clergy were retrenched, and reduced within the Bounds of Reason.

S E C T. I.

The Statutes of King Charles I.

ALL Writers agree, that Charles's Reign lasted only eighteen Years and a few Days; but some of our Professors^a by a manifest Error, have dated it from the Year 1265. for 'tis very evident from the best Authors, that this Prince was crowned King in Rome by Pope Clement on the sixth Day of January 1266. the Feast of Epiphany; and that on the twenty eighth of February the same Year he put Manfred to death, and took Possession of the Kingdom. Others have mistaken the Year of this Prince's Death; for they write, that he died on the seventh of January 1285, which is false; for he died in Foggia in January 1284. Whence proceed so many Errors in the common Edition of these Statutes, by not knowing how to fix the Years of this Prince's Reign; as we shall hereafter observe.

WE likewise find many Errors in computing the Years of his Reign as King of Jerusalem. Some have believed, that he got the Title of King of Jerusalem, at the same time that he was crowned King of Sicily in Rome. Others, who knew this Mistake, tho' they confess that Charles acquired that Title long after, by the Cession of Mary, yet they are not agreed about the Year, which was certainly 1277, as we have before observed.

THOSE who collected these Statutes in the manner we now read them, have neither observed the Order of Time nor of Matter, but have huddled them into a confused Heap. Antonio de Nigris^b, who wrote Comments upon them, was sensible of the Confusion, but did not know how to mend it, and went on with his Comments as he found them. Therefore, being resolved to follow the Order of Time, we shall begin with that Statute which Charles made for reforming the University of Naples. It was drawn up in the Year 1266. the first of his Reign, by the famous Roberto da Bari, Protonotary of the Kingdom of Sicily in Nocera, whither Charles had gone with his Wife Beatrice, who died, and was buried there. King Robert his Grandchild inserted it amongst his own Statutes, under the Title of, Privilegium Collegii Neapolitani Studii; where we read it dated thus: Dat. in Castro Nuceria Christianorum (there being another Nocera, called de' Pagani) per manus Domini Roberti de Baro, Regni Protonotarii, anno 1266. We have already treated at large of this Statute, in speaking of the restoring of the University of Naples by Charles.

IN the second and third we read of none, but in the fourth Year of his Reign, to wit, 1269, we find some Statutes made, under these Titles: De furtis, De assecurandis hominibus illorum, qui turbationis tempore Conradini a fide regia defecerunt. De pœna, & vindicta proditorum, &c. All these were made in Trani, and the same Year some were renew'd in Foggia, after the Defeat of Conrad; by which those who had sided with that Prince were promised Indemnity, upon asking Pardon, and returning to their Allegiance, excepting the Germans, Spaniards, Catalans and Pisans, who were immediately to depart the Kingdom. Other Provision was also made this Year for repairing the Disorders that had happened during this troublesome time; and severe Penalties were imposed upon those who should conceal the Rebels.

IN the sixth Year, to wit, 1271, while the King was in Aversa, there was another Statute published against those who should dare to contract Matrimony with the Children of Rebels without a Licence from his Court, under this Title, Quod nullus contrahat matrimonium, &c. and it is dated in Aversa, A. D. 1271, and by an Error we read Regni nostri ann. 7. in place of anno sexto.

IN the seventh Year, to wit, 1272, many more were published; some in Naples, some in Aversa, and others in Venosa. Those established in Naples in the Month of March, as also in Aversa, this same Year, are to be found under these Titles: De Violentiis, De pœna violentorum, &c. By these Statutes the Disturbers both of the publick and private Peace were proceeded against with the utmost Severity; and those, who during the late Troubles had been accustomed to live by Rapine and Violence, and had the Boldness still to disturb the State, now in Peace, were crushed. That dated in Aversa under the Title, De pœna violentorum, in the common Edition bears this Date: Datum Aversa, A. D. 1262, anno octavo: where we find two Errors; the first, instead of A. D. 1272, goes back ten Years; whereas at that time King Charles had not so much as thought upon the Expedition to the Kingdom. The second Error is in setting down the eighth, in place of the seventh Year of his Reign. The other Statute dated in Naples bears the right Date, to wit, A. D. 1272, Regni nostri anno septimo. We read another Statute of Charles's, dated at Venosa in the Month of June of the same Year, under the Title, De occupantibus res Demanii. In this the King's Royalties are taken care of, whereof Charles was very jealous and watchful. It bears the right Date, viz. Datum Venusis A. D. 1272. Regni nostri anno septimo.

IN the eighth Year of his Reign, viz. 1273, we read another of his Statutes, under the Title, De testimonio publicorum disrobatorum, &c. wherein a Rule is laid down for the Proof of that Crime; and it is established, that the Testimony of three Malefactors shall be as valid as that of two honest Men. It is dated thus: Dat. Cav. A. D. 1273, &c. Regni nostri anno 9. 'Tis no wonder to see de Bottis, who begins Charles's Reign in 1265, fall into this Mistake; but it ought to be, Regni nostri anno octavo.

IN the ninth Year, to wit, 1274, ought to be placed the first Statute established in Naples, which we find in this first Volume, dated in the Month of February, 1274, under the first Title, Statutum editum super Portubus. De Bottis, still in the same Mistake, adds to the Date, Regnorum nostrorum anno decimo, in place of anno nono. In this great care is taken about exporting Salt and Provisions out of the Kingdom; and some Instructions are given to the Collectors of the Customs concerning the same. The other Statute that follows is to the same purpose, under this Title Aliud Statutum super extractione victualium, made in Brindisi; and 'tis very probable, that it was made the same Year.

IN the three following Years we find no Statutes of this Prince; but in the thirteenth Year of his Reign in the Kingdom of Sicily, and the second of Jerusalem, to wit, 1278; he made many Statutes in Naples, which we read under the Title, Quod officiales jurare debent, with the three following, which bear this Date: Dat. Neap. A. 1278, die 26 Januarii. The rest that follow to the Title, De pœna rei ablate, were also this Year made in Naples, and dated thus: Dat. Neap. 2 Decembris. In these are many Provisions made concerning Justices and other Officers; amongst which there's one prohibiting under severe Penalties the giving them any Gifts, notwithstanding any Custom whatsoever. In this Year ought to be placed that Statute of this King, which we read at the end of the Statutes of King Charles II. under the Title, Ad obviandum fraudibus. It was made by King Charles while he was making a Progress to S. Eramo near Capua, and bears this Date: anno D. 1278, Mense Aprilis sept. ejusdem 6 Indictionis. Regnorum nostrorum, Hierusalem anno secundo, Siciliæ vero decimo tertio.

IN the fifteenth Year, viz. 1280, we read two Statutes made at Lago Penfile, the first under the Title, De non mittendo ignem in refluchiis camporum, dated the twenty seventh of July this Year; the second on the ninth of August, and in the vulgar Edition bears this most uncorrect Date: Data apud Lacum Penfilem. Anno D. 1222. die 9 Augusti, 7 Indictionis: Regnorum nostrorum, Hierusalem anno tertio, Siciliae vero decimo quinto: it ought to be, A. D. 1280, & Hierusalem anno quarto.

IN the sixteenth, viz. 1281, we read another Statute published against Coiners of false Money, under the Title, De poena infligenda falsariis monetarum. This was made in Brindisi, of this Date: Dat. Brundusii A. D. 1281. mense Januarii &c. Regnorum nostrorum, Hierusalem an. 4. Siciliae vero 17. which ought to be, Hierus. an. 5. Siciliae vero an. 16.

IN the seventeenth Year of Charles's Reign, to wit, 1282, very many Statutes were made by this Prince in Naples, which were his last. They begin from this Rubrick: Constitutiones aliae factae per praedictum D. Carolum Regem Siciliae super bono statu: to which he makes a long Preface, wherein he enlarges much upon the Care and Diligence his Officers ought to take in discharging their Duty; and assigns to each of them the Parts they were to act, and prescribes Bounds to them, which they were not to exceed, and enjoins them to perform their Duty without Avarice or Ambition. These Statutes, placed under different Titles, amount to the Number of fifty eight. Princes seldom think of governing their Subjects with Justice, but when they are warn'd of it by some Misfortune, whereby they are reduced to Extremity, and want their Assistance. The Revolution of Sicily moved Charles to give these new Laws to his Subjects, in which many commendable and prudent Provisions are made for the right Administration of Justice, and preventing Fraud and unjust Exactions in Officers, and for the Good of the Commonwealth; for which end he ordered them to be published in every District, City, Town and Village of the Kingdom. They were with consummate Wisdom and Prudence established in Naples, and bear this very just Date: Actum Neapoli A. D. 1282. mense Junii 10. ejusdem 10. inditt. Regnorum nostrorum, Hierusalem anno 6, Siciliae vero 17.

THESE were the last Statutes of Charles, who this Year, to his great Mortification saw Sicily revolt, and himself exposed to many Disasters; being therefore diverted by Matters of greater Importance, his Thoughts were afterwards otherwise employed, than about making Laws. Great and weighty Affairs obliged him first to go to Rome, afterwards to France, and then to Bordeaux; and leaving the Government of this Kingdom to the Prince of Salerno his Son, he made him his Lieutenant with full and absolute Power and Authority. This Prince during his Lieutenancy made many wise and provident Laws for the good Government of the Kingdom, of which it stood more in need at this time than ever.

S E C T. II.

The Statutes enacted by the Prince of Salerno during his Lieutenancy, while his Father King Charles was absent.

SINCE, by the famous Sicilian Vespers, Sicily had revolted from King Charles, the Prince of Salerno perceived, but too late, that one of the chief Causes of it was the severe Government of the French in that Island; and understanding that King Peter, on the contrary, had freed the Sicilians from the Taxes and Exactions introduced in his Father's time, and that he had provided that Kingdom with good and wholesome Laws; in order therefore to gain the Love and Affection of the People of the remaining Kingdom, and to remove the bad Opinion they had conceived of his Father, he was resolv'd to furnish them with salutary and useful Laws: which makes good the Maxim, that Princes recollect themselves, when they are induced by Adversity to have recourse to their Subjects, and when they are doubtful of their Loyalty: Considering also the Obligations he lay under to Pope Martin, who was a great Favourer of King Charles, and wholly intent upon recovering the lost Kingdom; by these new Statutes he purposed to please both the Subjects and the Pope, by enacting Laws favourable to the Church and Ecclesiastical Persons, and to the Barons and People. Therefore this Year 1283, having called a Parliament, consisting of the Prelates, Counts, Barons, and many other Subjects, to meet in the Plain of S. Martino, a Town situated in the hither *Calabria*¹, (not in Abruzzo, as Moles believed², where he was with his Army after his Father's Departure) with whose Advice he enacted forty six Statutes, which bear this Title: Constitutiones illustris D. Caroli II. Principis Salernitani. To which he prefixed a long Preface, wherein he launches out upon the Care and Concern that both he and his Father had always had for the good Government of his People, and for relieving them from the Oppression of his Ministers; but that being diverted by weighty and serious Affairs, they had not been able to put their Designs in execution; but now, that this favourable Opportunity had offer'd, he, as the Executor of his Father's Will, was ready to reward them for their Loyalty; of which the Sicilians, by their Rebellion, had rendered themselves incapable and unworthy to be Partakers.

THEN follow twenty Statutes concerning the Privileges and Immunity of Churches and Ecclesiastical Persons, under this Rubrick: De privilegiis & immunitatibus Ecclesiarum, & ecclesiasticarum Personarum. First, in strong and precise Terms he enjoins the Payment of Tithes, which are due to the Churches and Ecclesiastical Persons. II. That according to the Agreement made between the Apostolical See and his Father, (meaning the Articles agreed upon, when Pope Clement gave him the Investiture) the Clergy shall not be obliged to appear before a secular Magistrate, excepting in Matters relating to Fiefs. III. That the Churches over all the Kingdom shall enjoy the Privileges granted them by the common Laws; that is to say, that Criminals who take Sanctuary in them, shall not be taken out, except in Cases allow'd by Law. IV. That the Houses of Prelates, Religious, and other Ecclesiastical Persons shall not be possessed by Officers on account of Hospitality; that criminal Sentences shall not be put in execution in them, even tho' the Owners should consent. V. That the Officers, Counts, Barons, or any other Laick whatsoever, shall not intermeddle themselves in the Elections of Prelates, the Collation of Ecclesiastical Benefices, or in whatever belongs to Spiritual Matters, unless it be by virtue of some Privilege, or the Right of Patronage. VI. That the Clergy, who live a religious Life, shall not be obliged to contribute with the rest towards Taxes, or any other Exactions whatever, either with respect to their Ecclesiastical, or Patrimonial Goods. VII. That all Persons may freely give, or leave to the Churches by Testament, their Lands or other Goods, provided they do not hold them of the King; and if the Tenure happen to be such, that it may not hinder the Alienation, they shall be understood to be conveyed to the Churches with the same Incumbrance. VIII. That the Vassals of the Churches, who are bound to perform personal Service to them, shall not, without the Licence of their Prelates, be forced to accept of Offices, or rather of personal Employments, either by the Court of Lieutenancy, the Counts, Barons, or any other Person whatever. IX. That all Rights and Privileges granted to the Churches, and Ecclesiastical Persons by the Catholick and ancient Kings of Sicily, and which they now possess, shall be preserved safe and untouch'd; as for those, of which they are not in Possession, Justice shall immediately be done them by competent Judges. X. That the Prelates shall give Information to his (the Lieutenant's) Court of all those who shall obstinately and contumaciously continue under Excommunication above a Year, that condign Punishment may be inflicted upon them by his Court. XI. That the Officers and Commissaries of his Court shall not presume against Justice to disturb the Possessions and Goods of the Churches, and much less to rob them of the said Goods. XII. That the Officers, or other Lay Persons, shall by no means intermeddle in the Cognizance of Ecclesiastical Crimes; nor hinder the Prelates and their Officers from taking Cognizance, and punishing them according to Law. XIII. That the Prelates, and other Ecclesiastical Persons, shall be at liberty to transport by Sea from one Place to another within the Kingdom, Grain, Pulse, and other Provisions, being the Product of their own Farms, without paying the Duty of Export. As for Goods bought, they shall be obliged to pay the Dues of the Custom-house, and not the Duties of Export; provided however they come from lawful and established Ports in small Barks, and likewise go to unload in licensed Ports. XIV. That the Justices, or other Officers, shall not summon the Vassals of the Church to appear before them, except in criminal Cases, or for exporting Arms, or the Breach of other penal Laws, and for other Crimes whereof the Cognizance belongs to the Royal Court, and its Officers. XV. That the Prelates and Ecclesiastical Persons, or their Officers, by lawful Means may force their Debtors to pay their Debts. XVI. That if the Vassals of the Church, who are tied to personal Services, shall fly from the Places where they ought to remain, the Prelates and Ecclesiastical Persons may force them to return to the Places from whence they fled, and oblige them to remain there. XVII. That the Jews, who are Vassals of the Church, shall not be entrusted with any Office, neither are they to suffer any Vexation or Oppression. XVIII. That as to Injuries and Offences done to the Religious, Clergy, and other Ecclesiastical Persons, even tho' they should not be Accusers, his Court shall proceed ex inquisitione, & officio, to the end that the guilty Persons may receive condign Punishment. XIX. That in order to make Marriage free, he abolishes and annuls Frederick's Constitution honorem nostri diadematis, and makes it lawful for Barons, Counts, and others possessed of Fiefs, and in general for all Persons, themselves and Sons freely to contract Marriage, and to give their Daughters, Aunts, Sisters and Neices in Marriage, without the Consent of his Court; provided nevertheless, they give not Fiefs for Portions, and contract not Marriage with suspected and disloyal Persons. XX. That the Prelates of the Churches, who, as such, hold Fiefs, as also the Counts, and all other Barons, in the Cases established by the Constitutions of the Kingdom, may exact the due and moderate Subsidies from their Vassals, without any other particular Writ; this Edict being published for that end.

PRINCE Charles having thus pleased the Pope, and the Ecclesiasticks of the Kingdom, his Business now was to gain the Affections of the Barons; therefore he granted them many Privileges, which we read under this Rubrick: De privilegiis, & immunitatibus Comitum, Baronum, & aliorum Feuda tenentium. First he ordered, That they should not be obliged to attend at his Court above three Months at their own Charges; but if his Service required their Attendance after that time, they shall receive their Salaries and ordinary Pensions. II. He likewise, out of Favour to them, repealed the Assent required by Frederick's above mentioned Constitution honorem, &c. that thereby they might freely marry. III. That without a particular Writ of Licence, they might exact the due and moderate Subsidies from their Vassals. IV. That when they have a Suit at Law, whether criminal or civil, depending before the Royal Court, whether Plaintiffs or Defendants, Accusers or Accused, they shall be judg'd, absolv'd or condemned by their Peers; and their Causes shall be quickly determin'd. V. He strictly commands the Steward, and other Officers of the Court, not to employ Barons in any Service about Court, which is not suitable to their Rank and Dignity.

IT only remained now, to ingratiate himself with the Citizens, Burghers, and in general with all the other Subjects of the Kingdom, that all might be reliev'd from the late Oppressions, and partake of his Clemency and Bounty; therefore in order to gain the Affections of all, he granted them many Privileges, and by means of many useful Regulations he put the Affairs of the Kingdom upon a better footing, by redressing many Grievances and other Hardships. These Statutes are under this Rubrick: De Privilegiis, & immunitatibus Civium, Burgensium, & aliorum hominum, a Faro citra.

THE first and principal was thought by all to be the relieving the People from the heavy Taxes wherewith they were loaded. Therefore by a particular Edict, which was to be inviolably observed, he ordered and appointed, that in the Collections, Taxes, general or special Subsidies, under whatever Name, the same Methods and Customs should be observed, as in the time of King William II. were practis'd, and are more fully contained in the Agreement made between the Apostolick See and the King his Father, at the time of his being placed upon the Throne; and since the same Methods and Customs do not now appear, few or none being alive that can declare what they were; the Prince ordain'd, that what Pope Martin should declare, determine and direct, should be observed: and in order speedily to obtain his Determination, he promised immediately to send Ambassadors to the Pope, so that they might be with him some time in the Month of May following; in which time the People of any Province whatever had liberty to send two Ambassadors of the best, richest, and most trusty of the whole Province, to assist and request the said Determination: and when obtain'd, he promised for his Father's Part, his own, and his Heirs, inviolably to observe it. Moreover, from this time he remitted all Arrears of Taxes whatever, which any Provinces or Cities owed, and they were not to be in the least molested before the said Determination. In fine, he promised not to demand any thing, except in the Cases comprehended in the Constitutions; nor even to ask any thing by Way of Loan.

and

THIS Determination was not made in Pope Martin's time, but in that of Pope Honorius his Successor, as shall be mentioned; and when it appeared, it took no Effect; for in Napodano's time, which was next to this, it was not in the least observed; insomuch that this Writer exclaims, that six Taxes were exacted every Month, and the King's Officers squeeze'd the Subjects, usque ad Sacculum & peram, & regularum exactionem ¹.

SECONDLY, he order'd new Money to be coined with a good Impression, for which he did not burden the People with new Taxes; but that it should be given to the Merchants and Dealers in Exchange, who would willingly take it; and that it should not be altered, but that its Value should be perpetual and fixed. III. He lessened the Punishment usually inflicted for clandestine Murder. IV. He ordained, that the Statute made for the Barons concerning the Freedom of Marriage should be general, and indifferently comprehend all Persons. V. That calumnious Accusations should no more be received by the Officers of his Court. VI. That no Person, who is in Possession of any Farm belonging to the King, shall be deprived of it, before he be heard, and the Case decided by Law. VII. That the People shall not be obliged to serve the Court in any thing not suiting their Quality and Condition. VIII. That nothing shall be pay'd for the signing of Sentences pronounced either by the High Court, or any other Tribunal. IX. That the generality of the People shall not be obliged to make up the Loss by Robbery committed by particular Persons. X. That the Generality of the People shall not be bound on their own Expences to carry Money to the Exchequer, but it shall be at the King's Charges. XI. That they shall not be burdened with furnishing Provisions for the Officers when they make their Circuits. XII. A Rule is laid down, and the Fees for the King's Writs and other Acts and Dispatches fixed. XIII. That the Officers of the King's Court shall not buy Horses or Mules in the Province where they shall happen to be, but shall provide themselves elsewhere. XIV. That the Daughters of Rebels, who have not followed, nor do follow the wicked Example of their Fathers, may be married without a Licence from Court, if they do not possess Fiefs. XV. That nothing shall be pay'd for the Seal of the Chief Justice, or other Officer. XVI. That the Keepers of Prisons shall exact no Fees from Prisoners, but what were settled by King Charles his Father. XVII. That the Office of Master Jurat, and that of the Bailiwick, shall not be exposed to Sale. XVIII. That the Wives of those, who for their Crimes have been banished the Kingdom, shall no ways be troubled with respect to their Portions. XIX. That none shall be bound to repair the King's Ships at a certain Price. XX. That from the Cities in general appointed for repairing the Castles, no more Money shall be required than shall be sufficient, neither shall they be obliged to make any new Buildings. XXI. That in order to prevent the King's faithful Subjects from being oppressed by the Foresters, diligent Search shall be made for finding out the ancient Bounds of the Forests, and they shall be confined to certain Limits, as well as their Keepers. Lastly, That the Justices of the Provinces shall not entrust the Inspection of Fairs to their Domesticks; but the Master Jurats of the Places where they are held, shall have the Charge of them.

THESE Statutes being thus established, Prince Charles ordered, that together with his Father's new Constitutions published in Naples the preceding Year 1282, they should be inviolably observed, and which he also confirmed after he was King; and that they might effectually from this time forth be put in execution, he sent them to the Prelates, Barons, and to the Corporations of the most remarkable Cities, in order to have them every where published. He expressed himself in the end thus: *Ut autem ea quæ communi utilitate sancita sunt, communiter sciantur ab hominibus, & generaliter observentur, de eisdem constitutionibus singulis Prælati, Baronibus, ac locorum universitatibus sub sigillo pendente Vicariæ copiam fieri volumus, & mandamus. Immunities, and having altered some things by his particular Bull, while Charles II. was Prisoner in Spain, likewise confirmed them, and ordered them to be inviolably observed. The original Bull is preserved in the Archives of the Trinity of *Cava*¹; and King Ferdinand in the Year 1469 caused them to be inserted in Pragmatica 2. de Clericis, seu Diaconis Sylvaticis, which we read in the first Tome of our printed publick Acts. These are likewise commonly call'd, The Statutes of Pope Honorius, but it is a gross Mistake; for they are not the Statutes of Honorius, which he made the same Year, while King Charles was Prisoner, and the Cardinal of Parma was Legate in the Kingdom; but are quite different, as we shall shew, when in the following Book we shall have occasion to discourse upon those Statutes of that Pope.

S E C T. III.

The Statutes of King Charles II.

THESE were the last Laws, which the Prince of Salerno made as Lieutenant of the Kingdom, for his Imprisonment interrupted the Course of his Government; and his Father being dead, and he still Prisoner in Spain, nothing else was done the following Years, only that by the Means of the King of England, a Treaty was carried on for setting him at Liberty; at last upon the Conditions which we shall relate in the following Book he obtained his Liberty, and returned to Italy, where he was honourably received by Nicholas IV. who had succeeded Honorius; and on Whit-Sunday the twenty ninth of May 1289, was crowned King of Sicily and Puglia. Then he left the Pope's Court and returned to Naples, where being received with great Pomp and Rejoicing, he immediately set about to repair the past Disorders.

ALTHOUGH it be not consistent with the order of Time to treat in this Place of the Statutes of this King, or of those of the other Princes of the Family of Anjou his Successors; yet that we may not have occasion to return again to discourse of the Statutes of the Kingdom, which at present make one of the principal Parts of the Laws of our Country; I shall therefore join them here altogether, that we may have an entire and complete History, both of the Laws and of the Authors, who have illustrated them with various Notes and Comments.

DURING the five Years that Charles was Prisoner, the Kingdom having been exposed to many Changes and Disorders, he was no sooner restored to it than he resolved with new Laws to re-establish it. In the Preface prefixed to those Laws he tells us, That it was after they had been thoroughly considered and examined by the Prelates, Counts, Barons, and the wise Men of the Kingdom that he had established them. They begin from the Title, De Inquisitionibus; and the many Laws under the subsequent Titles are entirely designed for regulating criminal Processes, and how they were to be founded; what Proofs were requisite; of what use Torture, and the Confessions of Criminals were; the Punishment of those who carried prohibited Arms, and of Murderers is fixed; in short, all that concerns Crimes, the Manner of proving them, and their Punishment are regulated.

AFTER he had dispatched criminal Matters, he goes on to civil. To pledge ploughing Oxen was prohibited¹. He made a commendable Law concerning the finding of Treasure, different from that of King William; for by this the Finders are not to be troubled, if it was found in their own Ground; if it was in Lands belonging to the Publick, or the King, he gets Half; if in another Man's the King has nothing, but the one half goes to the Finder, and the other to the Master of the Ground; at the same time it was declared, that Mines of Gold, Silver, and other Metals, or Salt-Pits were not meant by Treasure². He enjoins the Payment of Tithes³. He established a pecuniary Mulct upon those who continued above a Year under Excommunication¹. He preserved the Method of appointing Guardians, either when a Feudatory left a Will, or died intestate². He took care of Women's Portions, and made useful Provision against some foul Practices³. He likewise confirmed by new Laws all the Statutes, which during his Lieutenancy he had made in the Plain of S. Martin, thus : *Capitula eadem Constitutione presenti in perpetuum valitura, de nostra mera scientia, confirmamus, Et defectum omnem, si quis eis tunc infuit, qui Regni potestate Vicaria, non Dominica fungebamur, Regis dignitatis auctoritate supplemus*⁴. And that his People might be sensible how much he had Justice at Heart, and the restoring of the Provinces to a better State, he ordained⁵, That the Chief Justice, and the Judges of the High Court should go the Circuits six Weeks every Year through such Provinces as he should appoint, viz. over all Abruzzo, Terra di Lavoro, Principato, Capitanata, Basilicata, Terra di Bari, and Terra d'Otranto. And that during their Stay in these Provinces they were to curb the Irregularities of the Justices thereof and their Officers ; and if they found that they ought to be turned out, they were to give him an exact Account, that he might act accordingly.

IN order to ingratiate himself with the Counts and Barons, he enlarged the Degrees of Succession to their Fiefs⁶. And to remove the Disputes and Quarrels that happened about the Bounds of the Lands of Barons, Churches, and private Men, he ordain'd two Books to be formed out of the Registers of his Archives concerning Marches, one of which to be kept in his Exchequer, and the other to be fixed with an Iron Chain in the principal Church of the City⁷. He put a Stop to many Abuses in collecting the Taxes ; lastly, his whole Study was to see that his Subjects were not oppressed by unjust Exactions.

ALL these Statutes were made in Naples the same Year that he returned from being Prisoner in Spain, and therefore bear this Date ; Data Neap. A. D. 1289.

BESIDES these, we read many other Laws of this Prince's scattered up and down amongst those of King Robert his Successor, and which were made in the subsequent Years, such as that which we read under the Title, Quod in pœnis pecuniariis, &c, another under the Title, Quod sit licitum accusatori, &c. a third under the Title, Exceptione excommunicationis, &c. and some others ; and lastly, that which was published the last Year but one of his Reign, and we find it amongst King Robert's Statutes, under the Title, Littere Domini Regis ; and it bears this Date, Dat. Neap. per D. Bartholomæum de Capua A. D. 1307. die 12. Decembris 11. Indiēt. Regnorum nostrorum anno 22.

THIS Prince did not employ Andrea d'Isernia to draw up these Laws, as Giovanni Antonio Nigris believ'd⁸ ; but they were penn'd by the famous Lawyer Bartolommeo di Capua, Protonotary of the Kingdom, whom he and his Successor Robert raised to the first Dignities and Honours of the Kingdom.

The Statutes of King Robert.

THIS Prince, who for his Wisdom was reckoned another Solomon, left us also many prudent and useful Laws ; he made none while he was his Father's Lieutenant, but only after he was crowned King. His Son Charles Duke of Calabria, whom he appointed his Lieutenant, emulating his Father's Wisdom and Justice, made some also in his Father's Life-time. *Fabio Montelione da Gerace*¹ writes, that King Robert during his whole Reign made only fifty of those Statutes ; which Number we exactly see in the Vulgar Edition ; but there are many more in the original Manuscript, which, as de Bottis writes ¹, was in his time in the Hands of Barattuccio the Advocate Fiscal; and Goffredo di Gaeta ² in his Treatise on the Customs of the Royal Chamber of Accounts likewise mentions some others.

ROBERT began his Reign in the Year 1309, and his first Laws were likewise penn'd by Bartolommeo di Capua Protonotary of the Kingdom, in which Post he was not only confirmed by Robert, but raised to greater Honours, for having been of so great use to him in the famous Dispute, which this Prince had in Avignon with his Nephew about the Succession to the Kingdom.

Bartolommeo was made Protonotary of the Kingdom in the Year 1284, which was the first of King Charles II.'s Reign, and possessed that high Post till the Year 1328, when he died. We find his Death to have happened this Year by the Inscription on his Tomb, which at first was placed in his own Chapel in the great Church of Naples, where he was buried; and though that Stone has been removed to some other Place since Summonte wrote ³, yet we read the Inscription (besides in Summonte, in Cesare Eugenio ⁴, and Toppi ⁵) in Pietro Stefano ⁶, who wrote before the Stone was removed, where amongst other things we read these Words:

Annis sub mille trecentis Bis Et Octo, Quem capiat Deus, obiit bene Bartholomæus.

BUT we must observe, that Pietro Stefano translates these Words of the Inscription: Annis sub mille trecentis bis Et octo thus: In the Year one thousand three hundred and sixteen; so that Summonte, Pier Vincenti ⁷ and Toppi were induced likewise to write, that Bartolommeo di Capua died in the Year 1316, which is repugnant to many of King Robert's Statutes, penned by Bartolommeo after that Year, such as in the Years 1318, 1324, and 1326. Whence some ⁸ interpret those Words, bis Et octo, twenty eight, and not sixteen, because in that Case it ought to have been bis octo, not bis Et octo; for according to the foolish way of writing in those Times, by adding three hundred to a thousand, and to that two, and then other eight, made exactly one thousand three hundred and twenty eight.

THE first Statutes of King Robert are those penned by Bartolommeo di Capua, and they begin from the third Year of his Reign, thus: Cap. Robertus, &c. Ad quietem publicam, under the Title, Ut Comites, Et Barones, &c. made in the third Year of his Reign; the vulgar Edition is dated wrong, for instead of A. D. 1311. it ought to be 1326. Cap. Robertus, &c. Privilegia, &c. pro bono statu, under the Title, De exceptione excommunicationis. Cap. Importuna petentis, under the Title, De non creandis Judicibus in perpetuum. Cap. Robertus, &c. Ne per exemptionis, under the Title, Quod testes excommunicati debent absolvi ad cautelam, which we now call, cum reincidentia. Cap. eodem studio, under the Title, Quod in causis criminalibus, &c. Cap. Robertus, &c. Quia nulla legis, under the Title, Quod Justitiarius possit cognoscere de civilibus causis Ecclesiæ, &c. Cap. Robertus, &c. Nolumus, under the Title, Quod Barones, vel feuda tenentes, &c. Cap. Robertus, &c. Licet contra, under the Title, Quod receptatores pari pœna punire debent, qua Et Malefactores. Cap. Statuimus, under the Title, Quod liceat specialibus personis, &c. Cap. Robertus, &c. Frequenter ex abundanti, under the Title, Confirmatio Constitutionum per Genitorem Regis Roberti editarum. Cap. Juris censura, under the Title, Capitulum de arbitrio concessio Officialibus, which, as de Bottis very well observes, was penn'd by Bartolommeo di Capua in the Year 1313. Cap. Robertus, &c. Si cum Sceleratis, under the Rubrick, Litera arbitralis, and is dated in 1313. the fifth Year of King Robert's Reign. The famous Cap. Ad Regale fastigium, under the Title, Quod Justitiarius possit cognoscere de gravaminibus illatis per Prælatos, vel alias Ecclesiasticas personas, drawn up by Bartolommeo di Capua in the Year 1314, the sixth of King Robert's Reign, as de Bottis very justly observes. Cap. Robertus, &c. inter belli discrimina, under the Rubrick, Capitulum contra exceptionem hosticam, &c. which, in the vulgar Edition, is most in-Ordinata justitia*, under the Title, Quod Bajuli Judices exercent officia, &c. which was made while Bartolommeo di Capua was alive, since we have his Notes upon it. Cap. Robertus, &c. Salubrem statum, or, Frequenter ex abundanti, under the Rubrick, Hoc Capitulum est ad confirmationem Capitulorum factorum per Regem Carolum; and Cap. Robertus, &c. Alienationis Actus, under the Rubrick, Non est Capitulum, sed litera declarans juris ambiguitatem, &c. likewise penned by Bartolommeo di Capua, A. D. 1326. die 5. Decemb. 10. indict. Regnor. nostr. A. 18.

THESE are the Statutes established by King Robert from the third Year of his Reign to the Year 1326 inclusive, which was the eighteenth of his Reign, and were penn'd by Bartolommeo di Capua his Great Protonotary. We likewise read some other Statutes of this Prince, but since they related to his own Royal Patrimony, they were not penn'd by the Protonotaries, but by the Masters of Accounts, whose Province it was; for, as Pier Vincenti, in his Treatise of the Protonotaries of the Kingdom¹, very well observes, the same was afterwards practised in the Reign of the Kings of the House of Aragon. These are, Cap. Robertus, &c. Novis Morbis, under the Title, De compilatione, & compositione rationum Officialium, drawn up in Naples in 1317, the ninth Year of King Robert's Reign, by the Masters of Accounts, as may be seen by the Date: Data Neap. per Magistros Rationales magnæ Curie nostræ, A. D. 1317. die 20. Septembris, 1. indict. Regnorum nostrorum anno nono. Cap. Robertus, &c. Fiscalium functionum, under the Title, De appretio, & modo faciendis in terris, & locis Regni; which likewise bear this Date: Datum Neap. Per eosdem Magistros Rationales Magnæ Curie, &c. A. D. 1333. die 7. Augusti, 1. indict. Regnorum nostrorum anno vigesimo quinto. And the famous Cap. Apud Fogiam, under the Title, Quid fiet mortuo Barone.

ALL the other Statutes made by King Robert are penn'd by Giovanni Grillo of Salerno Vice-protonotary of the Kingdom, in which we find some Errors in the Dates of the vulgar Edition. Bartolommeo di Capua dying in the Year 1328, although King Robert, in his Father's Life-time, had raised his Son Giacomo di Capua to the Honour of Protonotary, with a Salary of a hundred and eight Ounces of Gold yearly, so that without any Precedent there were two Great Protonotaries; yet Giacomo having died before his Father, who afterwards died loaded with Honour and Years, that great Office for a long time continued vacant, till in the Year 1343 it was filled up by *Ruggiero Sanseverino*². In the mean time the Office was exercised by Vice-protonotaries; so that after Bartolommeo's Death, Niccolo Frezza, Andrea Comino, and Giovanni Grillo succeeded one another in that Office; all the following Statutes of King Robert are penn'd by Grillo. The two first of which we read under the Title, De non procedendo ex officio, nisi in certis casibus, & ad tempus; and bear this Date, Data Neap. per Joan. Grillum de Salerno Juris civilis Professorem, Vicegerentem Prothonotarii Regni Siciliae A. D. 1328. (but it ought to be read) die 10. Feb. 12. Indict. Regn. nostrorum anno 20. The other is under the Title, De indebitatoribus Victualium, & Usuris, which bears the same Date with that which was made on the twenty fourth of July the same Year. The fourth is, Cap. Ut inter subiectos, under the Title, De prohibita portatione armorum; penn'd by the Vice-protonotary Grillo the Year following, which was the twenty first of Robert's Reign; so the Date in the vulgar Edition ought to be corrected, and instead of A. D. 1200, it ought to be 1329.

Then follow three Edicts published by Robert the Year following, viz. 1330; the two first in the Month of May, and the third in June. The first is under the Rubrick, De non componendo super receptatione bannitorum cum Universitate, personisque singularibus. The second has this Title, Tenor secundi Edicti, de damnis emendandis per Universitatem; and the third under the Rubrick, Tenor tertii Edicti, de familia Officialium quali- ter esse debeat. These Edicts bear the true Date 1330, the twenty second Year of King Robert's Reign. Two other Statutes were made the same Year, the first of which we read under the Title, De non componendo super crimine capitali; and the second under this Title, Quod possit Regi Curia in Terris non Jurisdictionis.

THE following Year 1331 King Robert made that famous Statute drawn up by Grillo, whereby he prohibited the Exportation of the Silver Carolins out of the Kingdom, which we read under the Rubrick, De prohibita extractione Carolenorum argenti de Regno; and the Date ought to be corrected, and in the room of A. D. 1303 it should be 1331, which was the twenty third Year of King Robert's Reign.

IN the following Year 1332 was published by Robert, and penn'd by the same Hand, that other famous Edict, in order to put a Stop to the frequent and scandalous Disorders which were practis'd in Naples by some lewd Persons, who, under pretence of Marriage, assembled in the publick Places of the City, dragged Virgins out of their Houses, and ravished them; by which Edict, under the most severe Punishment, he prohibited such enormous Crimes, of which Summonte makes mention in his History, as also of the Surnames of the Nobility of the Seggi of Capuana, Nido, Portanova, Mercato, Porto, Somma Piazza, Salito, Arco and S. Arcangelo. We read this Edict under the Rubrick, Statutum contra Neapolitanos maleficos rapientes Virgines sub colore matrimonii; and the Date ought to be corrected, and in the room of Regnorum nostrorum A. 14. it should be A. 24.

IN the Year 1334 two other Statutes were made; the first in August, under the Title, De non componendo in delectis corporaliter puniendis; and the second in October, as an Explanation of the first under the Rubrick, De declaratione Constitutionis prohibentis compositionem in criminalibus; both which in the vulgar Edition bear very true Dates, exactly denoting the twenty sixth Year of King Robert's Reign.

IN the following Year 1335 five famous and remarkable Edicts were published by King Robert, and penn'd by Grillo. The first in January under the Title, De revocatione occupatorum Demanii Regii ad ipsum Demanium; the Date ought to be corrected and read, Data Neap. per J. Grillum A. D. 1335. die 16. Januarii 3. Indiēt. Regnorum nostr. anno 27. and not 26. as we read it in the vulgar Edition. The second in the same Month and Year, under the Title, De pecunia Fiscali non tenenda per Officiales post amotionem ab officio; where the Date ought likewise to be corrected, and read, Regnorum nostrorum A. 27. We find the third under the Rubrick, De non recipiendis Vasallis Demanii in Terris Baronum; the fourth under the Title, Quod Clerici conjugati solvant collectas Regias; and the fifth under the Title, Quod non extrahantur lignamina extra Regnum.

THEN follow those famous Statutes, whereby a Remedy is provided against the Encroachments of the Ecclesiasticks. Those Statutes which we commonly call Remedia, or Conservatoria, are four in Number. The first was made by King Robert in the Life-time of the famous Lawyer Bartolommeo di Capua, and drawn up by him as Protonotary of the Kingdom, and begins, Ad Regale fastigium, and of which we have already taken Notice. The other three published afterwards follow. The second begins; Charitatis affectus, directed by Robert to the Justices of Apruzzo, ultra flumen Piscarie, and we read it under the Rubrick, Conservatorium pro Laico contra Clericum: The third begins, Finis præcepti charitas, directed to the Justices of Val di Crati, and Terra Giordana, under the Rubrick, Conservatorium pro clerico contra clericum: And the fourth, which was directed to the Deputy of the Lieutenant's Court, and his Judges, begins, Omnis prædatio, under the Title, De spoliatis pro Laico contra Clericum. We shall have Occasion to treat at large of these Statutes in the following Books, when we come to discourse of the Reign, the Justice and Wisdom of King Robert; as also of the Quatuor literæ arbitrales, of which this Prince was likewise Author, and which, amongst these Statutes, we have only barely mentioned.

LASTLY, We have that other famous Statute of King Robert's, whereby he takes particular Care of reforming the University of Naples; it begins, Grande fuit, and we read it under this Title, De reformatione Studii Neapolitani, & interdicendo particulares scholas in utroque jure ubilibet infra Regnum. That other Statute which begins, Pondus æquum, and which is commonly attributed to Queen Joan, Robert's Grandchild, is to be found under this Rubrick, Litera Regine Joannæ; and de Bottis takes it to be likewise King Robert's, and says, He found it in the Register begin-

WE must not forget another Edict of Robert's, whereby the Clergy are prohibited to carry Arms; and if after they have been thrice admonished they still continue to do it, the Arms are to be taken from them. We have it not amongst these Statutes, but it is to be found amongst our Pragmaticks¹; and though the contrary be now practised, yet it is partly by disuse, and partly because in process of time the Bishops were allowed to have their Families arm'd; of which afterwards.

THESE are King Robert's fifty Statutes, which are printed with the Body of the Laws of the Kingdom, and have all Force and Authority with us, both in the Tribunals of the Cities and Kingdom; and all of them that have not been repeal'd by posterior Laws, or fallen into Disuse, are to be inviolably observed.

NOW follow the Statutes of the Duke of Calabria King Robert's Son, which he made while he governed the Kingdom as his Father's Lieutenant.

The Statutes of Charles Duke of Calabria Lieutenant of the Kingdom.

KING Robert being obliged sometimes to go to Provence, sometimes to Florence, and often upon Expeditions to Sicily, perceiving in his Son Charles many shining Virtues, especially Religion, Justice, and Wisdom, he almost from his Infancy entrusted him with the Government of the Kingdom, by making him his Lieutenant; and the Duke acquitted himself so well and so prudently in his Office, that his Father was highly satisfied with him. He rendered the Tribunal of the Lieutenancy more splendid and conspicuous, by making Filippo Sanguineti Chief Justice of it with a Salary of a hundred and fifty Ounces of Gold yearly, and ninety Ounces yearly for the Pay of ten Horsemen, and sixteen Foot Soldiers for a Guard and greater Ornament to that Tribunal¹. He was wont every Year to make a Progress over the Kingdom in order to discover if the Barons and the King's Ministers oppressed the People. And by Means of several Edicts, which we have inserted amongst the Statutes of King Robert his Father, he made prudent Regulations concerning the good Government of the Kingdom, and the right Administration of Justice, of which he was a most strict Observer.

THE first of his Statutes is against the Barons and others who harboured Banditti, and other profligate Men, who disturbed the Peace of the Kingdom, whereby he makes it Death, and the Forfeiture of their Estates: This was directed to the Justice of Terra d'Otranto, and penn'd by Bartolommeo di Capua, and upon which we have some of his Notes; it is dated, apud Hospitale Montis Virginis, a Sanctuary in Terra di Lavoro, made very famous then by the Bounty and Piety of the Family of Anjou, who often took up their Residence there.

THE second, likewise penn'd by the said Bartolommeo, is the remarkable Cap. Ex presumptuose, which we read under the Rubrick, Quod Feudatorio decedente absque legitima prole, possessio Feudi usque ad anni circulum in modum sequestri stet penes Fiscum. The Author of this Statute was Charles II. his Grandfather, but because it had never been published, Charles the Grandchild by this Edict ordered it to be proclaimed, and strictly observed.

OTHER three of his Constitutions follow, likewise drawn up by Bartolommeo di Capua, concerning the Time, and the Manner of examining the Accounts of the Officers, which we read under the Rubrick, Quod tempus Syndicationis non labatur, donec acta sunt compilata, & assignata.

THEN follow other four; the first begins, Legem veterem Digestorum; the second, Voluntas libera; the third, In forma Sigilli; and the fourth, Accusatorum temeritas; all penn'd by Bartolommeo di Capua, and bear this Date; Dat. Neap. per

Bar. de Capua, &c. A. D. 1324. die 8. Febr. 7. Indict. Regnorum Domini patris nostri anno 15.

WE have another Statute of the Duke's among those of Queen Joan, made for the Bishop of Chieti, concerning a Law Suit which the Bishop had with Roberto Morello, which begins; Carolus illustris, &c. Ne personarum Casu, &c. This was likewise penn'd by Bartolommeo di Capua in the Month of September 1322.

AMONGST the Usages of the High Court of the Lieutenancy we find another Statute of the Duke's, which begins, Detestantes, under the Rubrick, De supplendis defectibus causarum, directed to Giovanni de Aja, Deputy of the High Court, and bears this Date, Dat. Neap. A. D. 1320. die 28. Decembris 3. Indict. Regnorum dicti Domini Patris nostri, anno 11.

WE likewise read amongst his Statutes one drawn up by the Masters of Accounts; it relates to the Royal Prerogatives, and was made against those who counterfeited the *Gigliati, and the Carlini, and therefore the Name of the Protonotary, or Vice-Protonotary, is not mentioned in the Date, but only, Data per Magistros Rationales. It begins, Carolus illustris, &c. Jam saepe, and is under the Title, De demolientibus, & falsantibus Liliatos, Carlenos, & incidentibus.

* A Coin with
on it.

THESE are the Statutes left us by this wise and just Prince, who dying in the Year 1328, and King Robert having no other Sons on whom he could bestow the Title of Duke of Calabria and the Lieutenancy of the Kingdom, he resumed the Government himself, and, as we have observed, established many other Statutes penn'd by Grillo the Vice-protonotary; but in the Year 1343 dying without Sons, he left the Kingdom to Joan I. his Grandchild, the Daughter of Duke Charles, the Source of many Disorders and Confusions in the Kingdom; insomuch, that both she and her Successors living in continual Troubles, and in the midst of Armies, they had not time to think of Laws. For which Reason we have but few Laws of Queen Joan's, which she made for reviving Statutes that had fallen into Disuse, as she says herself: *Condita sunt Capitula infra scripta modica, & quasi nulla statuentia nova. Sed solum rememorantia, & reformantia Jura antiqua, & Capitula quæ per abusum malorum Officialium minime fuerunt observata modernis temporibus*¹. And we have no other Laws of the Kings of the Family of Anjou her Successors, excepting that famous Statute of King Ladislaus, whereby he prohibits Notaries that were Vassals to draw up the Writs of their Barons; and another of Queen Isabel's as Regent of the Kingdom for her Husband King Renatus, which we read amongst the Usages of the High Court of the Lieutenancy.

THESE are the Laws whereof the Volume of the Statutes of the Kingdom is now composed; and these are the Authors of them, viz. Charles I. Charles II. Robert, Charles his Son, and Queen Joan; one by Ladislaus, and another by Isabel.

FROM the time they were published, some have explained them with Notes, and others with full Comments. The first was Bartolommeo di Capua, who made some short Notes. Giovanni Grillo of Salerno also a famous Lawyer of those Times, who after the Death of Bartolommeo was Vice-Protonotary of the Kingdom. The celebrated Andrea d'Isernia made some Notes too. In the Reign of Queen Joan I. Sebastiano Napodano, and Niccolo da Nopoli, Sergio Donnoroso, who was Master of Accounts of the High Court, and Vice-protonotary², and Luca di Penna likewise made some Notes. And afterwards Niccolo Superanzio, Pietro Piccolo of Monforte, Giov. Crispino Bishop of Chieti, Fabio Giordano, Gio. Angelo Pisanello, Marc' Antonio Pulverino, and Giacopo Anello de Bottis did the same. Lastly, not to mention some, who made very small Notes of little Moment, Gio. Antonio de Nigris of Compagna, a City in the hither Principato, not a mean Lawyer, in the latter end of the Reign of Charles V. in the Year 1546, to the Notes of Bartolommeo di Capua, of Sebastiano, of Niccolo di Napoli, and of Luca di Penna, added his own most ample Commentaries.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXI.

AS the Death of Charles I. which happened in Foggia in the beginning of the Year 1284 was serviceable to Peter King of Aragon, not only because it fixed him in the Kingdom of Sicily, but likewise removed the Danger he was in of losing his paternal Kingdoms, which were invaded by Philip King of France, so it was a severe and lamentable Stroke to our Kingdom of Puglia, and to Prince Charles his Son; for the Kingdom was not only exposed to the Invasion of Roger de Loria, who having taken Cotrone, and Catanzaro, and some other Places of that Province, threatened the neighbouring Provinces, but was likewise without a King, and without Government, the Prince of Salerno who was to succeed, being still kept Prisoner in Spain. And there being none left to take care of the Kingdom, but the unfortunate Princess Mary, the Prince's Wife, and Charles Martel his Son, who was then but thirteen Years of Age, Pope Martin, in order to take Advantage of the Opportunity, immediately sent back Girardo Cardinal of Parma Apostolick Legate to govern the Kingdom jointly with the Princess. But Philip King of France, who was grievously afflicted for the Death of his Uncle, lest the Influence of the Legate with a Woman and a Child, might be of Prejudice to the Sovereignty of the Prince, quickly dispatched Robert Count of Artois his Son¹, to take care of the Royal Family, and assume the Government of the Kingdom. Nevertheless the Legate, by his own Cunning, and the Necessity the French then had of the Pope's Favour, was not only not excluded, but of his own Authority that very Year called a Parliament in *Melphis*¹, consisting of many Prelates and Barons, and made some Statutes for the good Government of the Kingdom, which were to be communicated to Pope Martin, and being confirmed by him, they were to be published, and observed in the Kingdom as his Laws, of which afterwards.

IN the mean time King Peter, on Charles's Death, seeing himself secure of the Kingdom of Sicily, in all haste set out for Aragon with his Sicilian Forces to oppose the victorious King of France, who had already taken Perpignan, Girona, and many other Cities of that Kingdom, which he was resolved to conquer for Charles, of Valois his second Son, who had got the Title and Investiture of it from the Church of Rome; and though Peter's Army was far inferior to that of his Enemy, yet out of his great natural Courage, improved by the Smiles of Fortune hitherto, he would needs come to an Engagement; but his Army was put to the Rout, himself wounded, and with great Difficulty he made his escape to Villafranca, where a few Days after, on the sixth of October 1285 he died. A King, most worthy of all Praise and eternal Memory; for with a handful of Troops, with Art and Industry, he alone defended two Kingdoms, far distant from one another, against two most powerful Kings, and a Pope his bitter Enemy; and was always ready with his Person, wherever the Necessity of Affairs required his Presence. He left four Sons, Alphonfus, James, Frederick, and Peter, and two Daughters, Isabel and Violante. To Alphonfus he left the Kingdom of Aragon, and to James that of Sicily, with this Proviso, that if Alphonfus should happen to die without Sons, James was to succeed to both Kingdoms.

BY the Death of King Peter, the Kingdom of Aragon would have certainly fallen into the Hands of the French, had it not been on the one Hand for a grievous Pestilence that seized the King of France's Army; and on the other for the wonderful Valour of Roger de Loria, who went and burnt the French Fleet in the very Harbour of Rosès, which obliged King Philip to retire to Perpignan for want of Provisions, with which he had been before furnished by his Fleet; and falling sick in Perpignan, on the eighth of October the same Year he departed this Life, and was succeeded by Philip the Fair his Son.

THIS Year was likewise mournful on account of the Death of Pope Martin, who died in Perugia the twenty fifth of March 1285², and Honorius IV. a Roman, of the noble Family of the Savelli, was immediately elected in his Place.

POPE Honorius, though an Italian, followed the Example of his Predecessors, by favouring the Family of Anjou, and at the same time, by the means of his Legate Girardo, providing for the Necessities of the desolate Kingdom; and the Count of Artois, who had heard of King Peter's Death, and that by his Will he had divided the Kingdoms, conceiving Hopes of recovering Sicily from King James, his whole Thoughts were employed upon that Undertaking; therefore Honorius, making Advantage of the Opportunity, was likewise resolved to intermeddle with the Civil Government of the Kingdom, and to provide it with new Laws conformable to the Wishes of the Barons, and in general of all the Subjects of the Kingdom; but especially to re-establish the Privileges and Immunities of the Churches, and Ecclesiastical Persons thereof. Notwithstanding, by a particular Bull drawn up the seventeenth of September 1285, he confirmed those Statutes made by the Prince of Salerno in the Plain of S. Martin, when he was Lieutenant of the Kingdom, but those only that regarded the Immunity and Privileges of the Ecclesiasticks; which Bull, taken from the Original which is preserved in the Archives of the Trinity of Cava, was likewise inserted in our Pragmaticks by Ferdinand I. of Aragon, and is quite different, as we have said, from that, of which we are now going to discourse.

C H A P. I.

Of the Statutes of Pope Honorius IV. and of what Use and Authority they were in the Kingdom.

WHETHER will but consider to what a lamentable Condition the Misfortunes of Charles I. and the Imprisonment of the Prince his Son reduced this Kingdom, he will cease to wonder how Pope Honorius was able to work up his Authority in it to such a pitch, as not only at his Pleasure to impose Laws upon our Barons, and the other Subjects, but even upon the Kings themselves, treating them as his Subjects, and mere Vassals. Our Princes stood so much in need of the Favour of the Popes in those calamitous Times, that Prince Charles, when he was Lieutenant of the Kingdom, was forced to put it under the Protection of Pope Martin, then alive, to whom he gave full Power to regulate the Government thereof, and left it to him to impose Taxes, to order the Method of collecting them, to reduce them to what they were in the time of good King William, and to redress the Grievances of the Subjects. The Cardinal of Parma discharged his Part very well, but he had not brought the Work to Perfection in Martin's time, as he did in that of Honorius, who not only took upon him to lay down Rules for the levying of Money, but made Regulations concerning Matters of greater Importance, such as the Succession to Fiefs, and other Points purely belonging to the supreme Authority of the Prince.

HOWEVER, we must look farther back for the Origin of these Encroachments, viz. the severe and hard Conditions with which Pope Clement IV. clogged the Investiture he gave of the Kingdom to Charles I. While that Prince was in his Prosperity, he did not much regard them; and as for Taxes and other Subsidies he continued them in the same manner, as they had been in the time of King Manfred; but as to the Rights of his Exchequer he shewed himself a more strenuous Assertor of them, than any of his Predecessors. But the Misfortune of the Loss of Sicily happening afterwards, the Prince of Salerno his Son, in order to gain the Hearts of the Subjects, by those Statutes made in the Plain of S. Martin, ordained the Taxes to be the same as they were in the time of good King William; but there being none alive then who could declare what was practised at that time, it was, as we have said, left to Pope Martin to fix them, according as the Syndicks of the Cities and Towns should inform him of the State of their Corporations.

POPE Martin by Reason of the Death of King Charles, and the Imprisonment of the Prince of Salerno, immediately sent back the Cardinal of Parma his Legate to Naples; who had no sooner arrived than he resolved to do what in him lay for the Benefit of the Ecclesiasticks; whereupon, he ordered the Prelates of the Kingdom to meet in Melphis, and on the twenty eighth of March 1334 the fourth Year of Martin's Pontificate, he made some Statutes in favour of the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction and Immunity, which he got to be enlarged as much as was possible for him¹. And those Statutes were neither confirmed by Honorius, nor Martin, because they were made by Cardinal Gerardo at the very time that Martin died; so that when *Matteo d'Afflitto*¹ quotes them, he calls them the Statutes of Gerardo, as we see in the Constitution presente, where he quotes one Ex Capitulis Gerardi, which begins, *Cupientes Ecclesiarum & Locorum, &c.*². It is probable that those Statutes of Gerardo were in Manuscript in Matteo's time, since we have no Account of their having ever been printed, and that afterwards all Memory of them was lost, as useless; and the Statutes of Honorius, wherein were contained more numerous and exact Regulations, eclips'd them entirely.

BUT the Count of Artois arriving afterwards in Naples, having been sent by the King of France as Guardian, to take care of the Royal Family, and govern his Cousin's Kingdom, the Legate managed Matters so, as not to be quite excluded from the Government; but by his own Artifice, and much more by the Necessity there was then of the Pope, he was joined in the Government with the Princess Mary and the Count. But the latter being wholly taken up with military Preparations for a War he then intended for the recovering of Sicily, could not apply himself to the civil and political Government; so that Pope Martin being dead, and Honorius elected in his room, this new Pope, by the Directions of Gerardo the Legate, set about to establish new Statutes, which are the genuine Statutes of Pope Honorius.

HERE we must take notice of the sundry Errors into which our Doctors have fallen concerning the History of those Statutes, of which Deputy Moles himself was not free³, though he wrote more correctly than all the rest; for he believed that the Count of Artois had been appointed Guardian of the Kingdom by Honorius, to govern jointly with the Cardinal of Parma, and that therefore those Statutes had been directed by Honorius as well to the one as to the other. Much greater were the Errors of Deputy *Gio. Francesco Marciano*⁴, who says, that the Prince of Salerno, when he was Lieutenant, desired Pope Martin to send him an Apostolick Legate, in order to reform the State of the Kingdom, and to put it upon the same footing it was in the time of King William, and that therefore he sent him the Cardinal of Parma; whereas that Reformation ought to have been made where the Pope resided, whither the Prince had ordered the Syndicks of the Cities to be sent. This Cardinal was first sent to Sicily on account of the Revolt, and afterwards he went to Naples. But it was after the Prince's Imprisonment, and Charles's return from France, that the Cardinal was sent by the Pope; and he was recalled by Martin upon the Death of King Charles, in order to take upon him the Government of the Kingdom; and then hearing the Complaints of the Subjects about the Exactions and Taxes, and the Desire of the Barons to have the Degrees of Succession to Fiefs enlarged, concerning all which he drew up several Directions and Informations, and sent them to the Pope to have them redress'd; he likewise sent the Statutes, which the Prince of Salerno had made in the Plain of S. Martin. But the Pope's Death prevented his doing any thing in that Matter; whereupon Honorius was elected in his room, who being then at Tivoli on the seventeenth of September 1285, by a particular Bull confirmed those Statutes made by Charles in the Plain of S. Martin, in favour of the Ecclesiastical Immunity; which, as we have said, are inserted amongst our Pragmaticks, and the same Day he made those new Statutes, which he sent to the Cardinal of Parma his Legate, and they are the true Statutes of Pope Honorius; because those confirmed by his Bull, which we read amongst our Pragmaticks, are not his, but Charles Prince of Salerno's.

MANY were the Statutes which Pope Honorius made on this Occasion, partly concerning the manner of collecting the Taxes, partly in favour of the Barons, and partly for the general Good of the Kingdom; as for the Immunity and Benefit of the Ecclesiastical State, he had made sufficient Provision for these by his confirming the Prince of Salerno's Statutes.

IN relation to the levying of Taxes and Subsidies, he ordain'd, that in four Cases only it should be lawful for the King to impose them upon his Subjects, which was exceeding the Power given him by the Prince of Salerno, who only left it to him to reform, but not to establish Cases wherein it should be lawful to impose them. The Cases were these. 1. For the Defence of the Kingdom, in case it should happen to be invaded, or if a Rebellion, or a lasting, not a sham civil War should fall out. 2. For ransoming the King's Person from the Hands of his Enemies, in which two Cases he ordained the Sum of fifty thousand Ounces of Gold. 3. When it shall happen that the King has a mind to knight himself, his Brother, or any of his Sons, in which case he ordered that the Sum should not exceed twelve thousand Ounces. 4. For marrying his Daughter, or Sister, or any of his Kindred in a direct Line, he appointed the Sum of fifteen thousand Ounces. And in all these Cases but once in a Year, and no more was to be imposed, excepting in Cases of Necessity, or other Circumstances, which were to be made known to him.

HE made likewise many other Statutes concerning the Alteration of the Coin, Murder, Theft, and the King's not alienating the Demesnes of the Kingdom. He likewise stript him of the Power he had over Feudatories, who held simple Fiefs: That Marriage ought to be free, abolishing the King's Consent, which the Barons were formerly obliged to have when they married. He likewise made other Provisions concerning Reliefs, Free-gifts, and other Subsidies given by the Barons to the King: He enlarged the feudal Succession in favour of the Barons, that the Jus Francorum should take place, as well in the Succession of Brothers, as of Sons. He made Regulations concerning the Election of Officers, and diverse other Points, which may be seen in his Bull, and also in Bishop *Liparulo*¹, and *Gio. Francesco Marciano*².

DEPUTY *Moles*³ declares, that these Statutes were long preserved in the Royal Archives, and quoted as Laws by our Professors. Deputy *Marciano*⁴ in like manner attests, that an authentick Duplicate of them is preserved in the Archives of the Trinity of Cava, together with the original Bull of Pope Honorius made in Confirmation of the Prince of Salerno's Statutes established in the Plain of S. Martin; and *Moles*⁵ says, That he had a Copy from these Archives of the said Bull extracted from that Original⁶. And Gio. Francesco Marciano says, That Deputy Moles, and Counsellor Orazio Marchese sent Marcello Marciano his Father then an Advocate to that Monastery to take Copies of the said Bull and Statutes, which he did; and that these two famous Lawyers made large Comments upon the said Statutes in order to be printed. But the Book being sent to the House of Counsellor Gizzarello, who had been pitched upon to revise it, a Fire happening one Night in the Library of the said Counsellor, it was burnt with all his other Books. And what had cost the Labour and Toil of so many Days was thus destroyed in one Night.

WE have had the good Fortune to be possessed of an antient Vault, which belonged to Marcello Marciano, wherein was this Copy in Manuscript, which he had extracted from the Archives of Cava, and which we have compared with the Original preserved there; we have therefore thought fit to print it here, being conformable to that, which *Rainaldo*⁷ printed in his Annals, which he says he extracted from the Archives of the Vatican.

Capitula Papæ Honorij.

HONORIUS Episcopus servus servorum Dei ad perpetuam rei memoriam. Justitia & pax complexæ sunt se, ita societate indissolubili sociatæ tuentur, sic se comiratu individuo comitantur, ut una sine altera plenè non possit haberi, & qui lædit alterutram, pariter offendat utramque. Hinc complexus earum graviter impeditur injuriis, per eas etenim læsa justitia, pax turbatur, ipsaque turbata, facile in guerrarum discrimina labitur. Quibus invalescentibus justitia inefficax redditur, dum & debitum sortiri nequit effectum; sicque ipsa sublata, nimirum pax, tollitur opus ejus, & ipsius fructus subducitur seminandus in pace, ac proinde complexis deficientibus necessariò deficit & complexus, in horum vero defectu licentia laxata dissidiis multiplicantur bella, pericula subeant, animarum & corporum crimina frequentantur. Nec rerum vastitas præteritur. Hæc in Præsidentium injuriolis processibus, & inductarum in subditos oppressionum excessibus patent apertius, & evidentiùs ostenduntur. In quorum multiplicatione sauciantur corda læsorum; & quanto minùs datur opportunitas licitè propulsandi, quæ illicitè inferuntur, tanto rancor altiùs radicatur interiùs, & periculosius prorumpit exteriùs opportunitate concessa. Fiunt enim plerumque hostes ex subditis, transeunt auxilia securitatis in metum, munitiones in formidinem convertuntur, nutant Regnantium solia, redundant Regna periculis intestinis, quatiuntur infidiis, extrinsecis insultibus impetuntur audaciùs, & regnantes in eis, qui operantes justitiam exaltationis gloriam merentur, humiliati propter injustitias frequenter in opprobrium dejectionis incurrunt. In præmissis & si Scripturæ nos instruant, efficacius tamen notis docemur exemplis. Quantis enim tempore, quo Friderici olim Romanorum Imperatoris propter illatas Regnicolis afflictiones illicitas, & oppressiones indebitas in Regno Siciliae non absque immensitate gravaminum inductas ab ipso, Regnum ipsum tempestatibus fluctuarit; quot, & quantis rebellionibus concussum extiterit, quot invasionibus attentatum, quantum per ipsum, & posteros suos depauperatum opibus, quot incolarum exiliis, & stragibus diminutum, nullum ferè angulum Orbis later; quam præcipiti Fridericus idem, & genus ipsius ruina corruerunt, probat notorius casus ejus, & manifestum eorundem exterminium posterorum. Verùm adeò Friderici ejusdem in dictis continuata, & aucta posteris, ac in alios exemplari derivatione transfusa processit iniquitas, quod per eum inventa gravamina usque ad hæc tempora duravisse, nec non & augmentata dicuntur aliqua eorundem, & adjecta nihilominus alia non minora; propter quod nonnullorum supponit opinio, quod claræ memoriæ C. Sed etiam ne similia oriantur in posterum, diligentem curam, & curiosam diligentiam adhibere, præacta gravamina eorundem periculorum, ut veritati concurrat expressio, manifestas occasiones, & causas congruæ provisionis beneficio abrogando. PRIMUS est, pro defensione terræ, si contingat invadi Regnum invasione notabili, sive gravi, non procurata, non simulata, non momentanea, seu transitura facilè, sed manente, aut si contingat in eodem Regno notabilis rebellio, sive gravis, similiter non simulata, non procurata, non momentanea, sive facilè transitura, sed manens.

SECUNDUS est, pro Regis persona redimenda de suis redditibus, & collecta, si eam ab inimicis captivari contingat.

QUARTUS est, pro maritanda sorore simili conjunctione sibi conjuncta, vel aliqua ex filiabus, aut nepotibus suis, seu qualibet alia de genere suo ab eo per rectam lineam descendente, quam, & quando eam ipse dotabit. In prædictis enim casibus (prout qualitas tunc imminentis casus exigerit) licebit Regi collectam imponere, ac exigere a subjectis, dum tamen pro defensione, invasione, seu rebellionem prædictis, aut ipsius Domini redemptione, quinquaginta millium, pro militia duodecim millium, pro maritagio verò quindécim millium unciarum auri summam collectæ universalis totius Regni ejusdem, tam ultra Farum, quam citra quantitas non excedat. Nec concurrentibus etiam aliquibus ex prædictis casibus, collecta in uno, & eodem anno, nisi una tantummodo imponatur.

SICUT autem collectæ quantitatibus prædictas summas in suis casibus limitatas excedere, ut præmittitur, prohibemus, sic nec permittimus indistinctè ad ipsas extendi, sed tunc tamen, cum casus instantis qualitas id exposcit, & ut in prædictis etiam casibus possit Rex, qui pro tempore fuerit eo vitare commodiùs gravamina subditorum, quo uberiores fuerint redditus, & obventiones ipsius, cum à demaniorum donatione volumus abstinere, id sibi consultiùs suadentes.

SIMILI quoque prohibitione subjecimus mutationem monetæ frequentem, apertius providentes, quod cuilibet Regi Siciliae liceat semel tantum in vita sua novam facere cudi monetam, legalem tamen, & tenetæ, secundum consilium Peritorum in talibus competentis, sicut in Regnis illis observatur, in quibus est usus legalium monetarum, quodque usualis moneta sit valoris exigui, & talis quod in eodem valore sit apta manere toto tempore vitæ Regis, cujus mandato cudetur, nec pro ea, vel aliqua magna moneta, quam idem Rex semel tantum in vita sua fecerit expendenda, fiat collecta, vel distributio, sed campforibus, & aliis mercatoribus volentibus eam spontè recipere tribuatur; & hoc ita præcipimus perpetuis temporibus observari.

IN homicidiis clandestinis providendo præcipimus, nihil ultra poenam inferiùs annotatam ab Universitatibus exigendum, videlicet, ut pro Christiano, quem clandestinè occisum inveniri continget, ultra centum augustales. Pro Judæo vero, vel Saraceno, ultra quinquaginta nil penitus exigatur. Augmento, qui circa eandem poenam idem Rex dicitur induxisse omnino sublato: præsertim cum memorati Rex, & primogenitus dicantur idem per suas constitutiones noviter statuisse, quas quoad hoc decernimus inviolabiliter observandas, & hæc intelligi tantum pro homicidiis verè clandestinis, in quibus ignoratur maleficus, nec aliquis accusator apparet. Adjicientes, quod non nisi tantum in locis magnis, & populosis exigi possit quantitas supradicta, in aliis verò infra quantitatem eandem pro quantitate locorum exactio temperetur.

EIDEM provisioni adjiciendo præcipimus, Universitates ad emendationem furtorum, quæ per singulares personas contingit fieri nullatenus compellendas.

NEC ad mutandum Regi, aut Curia suæ, aut Officialibus, vel Ministris ipsorum, aut recipiendum aliquatenus Regiæ massariæ custodiam, sive onus, seu possessionum regalium procuracionem, aut gabellæ, vel navium, seu quorumcumque Vassellorum fabricandorum curam, quicumque cogendum invitum: Usurpationibus, quæ contrarium inducebant penitus abrogatis, maximè cum dicti Rex, & primogenitus ad relevanda, non tamen plenè gravamina in præmissis inducenda, Constitutiones varias promulgasse dicantur.

CONCEDIMUS autem, ut si casus emergat, in quo sit necessarium, naves, vel alia Vassella pro utilitate publica fabricari, liceat tunc Regnanti, committere curam fabricationis hujusmodi expensis Regis faciendæ personis idoneis, videlicet hujus rei peritiam habentibus, & quos Officium tale decet, & ipsis satisfiat pro susceptione curæ prædictæ de competenti mercede, & idem servari præcipimus in faciendo biscotto.

AD Captivorum custodiam, Universitates, vel singulares earum personæ nullatenus compellantur, præsertim cum hoc ipsum dicatur ejusdem Regis Constitutione provisum, quod præcipimus inviolabiliter observari.

GRAVAMEN, quod in pecunia destinanda Regi, vel Regali Camera, seu ad loca quæcunque alia Universitatis alicujus expensis per aliquas personas ejusdem Universitatis periculo eligendas inferri dicti Regni Universitatibus dicebatur, provisione simili prohibemus ipsis Universitatibus, vel singularibus personis earum de cætero irrogari, maximè cum dicatur idem quoad Universitates dicti Primogeniti prohibitoria Constitutione provisum, quam in hac parte decernimus inviolabiliter observandum.

ILLUD, quod in eodem Regno dicitur usurpatum, videlicet, quod Incolæ ipsius Regni ad reparanda Castra, & construenda in eis, expensis propriis nova ædificia cogeantur, emendatione congrua corrigentes providendo præcipimus, ut nil ultra expensas necessarias ad reparationem illorum antiquorum Castrorum, quæ consueverunt hætenus incolarum sumptibus reparari, & ædificiorum, quæ in hujusmodi Castris fuerant ab antiquo, ab eisdem Incolis peti possit, & Constitutio, quam circa hoc idem Primogenitus edidisse dicitur, in hujusmodi antiquis Castris & Ædificiis solummodo intelligenda servetur. Antiqua vero Castra intelligi decernimus in hoc casu, quorum constructio annorum quinquaginta jam tempus excessit.

CIRCA personas accusatas, quæ in eodem Regno injustè capi dicebantur, si etiam idoneos fidejussores offerent, licet dictus Rex aliquid statuisse dicatur ad gravamen hujusmodi temperandum : Nos tamen, ut nulla super hoc querela supersit, providendo præcipimus jura civilia observanda, & eadem observari jubemus.

CIRCA destitutionem possessorum Comitum, Baronum, & quorumlibet aliorum, qui per Regalem Curiam, & Officiales ipsius, ac alios alienigenas feuda tenentes in Regno suis possessionibus, si quando Curia, Officiales, vel alienigenæ prædicti jus habere prætendebant, in illis spoliari, sive destitui dicebantur, & de possessoribus effici petitores, nullo juris ordine observato, nec non & cum aliquis dicitur invenisse thesaurum, & etiam cum quis apud eandem Curiam pro alio fidejussit, ita quod nec aliquis suæ destituatur possessionis commodo, vel spoliatur, aut destituatur eadem, nec quoad illum, qui difertur, aut convincitur de inventione thesauri, nec quoad fidejussores Curiae datos, aliter quam eadem jura statuunt procedatur.

REGIBUS futuris prò tempore in Regno prædicto, & memoratis incolis, qui de inordinata passuum ejusdem Regni custodia querebantur se immoderatè gravari, similiter de passu providentes eidem custodiæ moderamen competens adhibemus, videlicet, quod tempore impacato, seu imminente turbatione, aut verisimili turbationis suspitione, & contra ipsum Regem, aut dictum Regnum, seu in Regno eodem Rex facere possit, passus eodem ad evitandum pericula custodiri. Tempore vero pacifico Incolis Regni habitantibus in eodem, ac aliis non suspectis liber sit ex eo exitus, & ingressus in illud, ita tamen, quod equi ad arma nullo tempore sine Regis licentia extrahantur exinde ad vendendum.

VICTUALIA vero quælibet de suis possessionibus, vel massariis, seu oves, boves, & alia animalia humano competentia usui de gregiis propriis, armentis, vel redditibus habita extra Regnum, dum tamen non ad inimicos eorundem Regis, aut Regni, unusquisque liberè mittat, etiam ad vendendam, nisi sterilitas, aut præactæ turbationis instantia, seu verisimilis suspicio suadeat, circa missionem hujusmodi per Regem ejus temporis aliud ordinandum. Si vero prædicta victualia, vel animalia ex negotiarionis commercio habeantur, etiam fertilitatis tempore absque Regnantis licentia extra Regnum mittere, vel ex ipso extrahere non liceat sic habenti. In omnibus præmissis missionis, seu extractionis casibus, jure, quodcumque Regi competit, per omnia semper salvo. Infra Regnum verò etiam per mare liceat cuilibet.

ECCLESIASTICÆ, sæculariæ personæ frumentum, & alia blada, nec non & legumina de propriis terris, massariis, atque redditibus habita, sine jure exituræ, fundici, seu Dohanæ in loco, in quo victualia recipiantur, vel deponantur præstando, de uno loco deferre, seu facere deferri ad alium, a Rege, seu ipsius Officialibus licentia non petita. Emptitia verò jure exituræ, ac fundici non soluto, sed alio si quod Regi debetur, dummodò emptitorum delatio de portu licita, ad similem portum, & cum barca parvis centum solummodò salmarum, vel infra capacium tantum fiat, & deferentes, seu deferri facientes præmissa emptitia, dent particulari Portulano loci, in quo fiet oneratio eorundem, fidejussoriam cautionem, quod literas testimoniales de ipsorum victualium, & leguminum extractione à simili Portulano loci, in quo exoneratio ipsa fiet habeant infra certum terminum pro locorum distantia præfigendum, & hæc omnia perpetuò præcipimus observari.

ABUSUM contra naufragos, ut fertur, inductum in eo, quod bona, quæ naufragium evadebant, capiebantur per Curiam, nec ipsis naufragiis reddebantur, bantur, ejusdem provisionis oraculo penitus abolemus, præcipientes bona hujusmodi illis restitui, ad quos spectant.

QUERELAM gravem hominum Regni ejusdem super eo nobis exhibitam, per Curiales stipendiarii regii, & alii regalem Curiam sequentes in civitatibus & locis, ad quæ cum dicta Curia, vel sine ipsos declinare contigit domos civitatis, seu locorum eorundem pro suo arbitrio Dominis intrabant invitis, & interdum ejectis eisque in aedilibus animalibus, & aliis bonis eorum, & quandoque horum occasione in personis ipsorum graves injurias inferebant, sopire competentis provisionis remedio cupientes, prohibemus, ne aliquis curialis stipendiarius, vel alius sequens Curiam memoratam, domum, vel hospitium aliquod capere, sive intrare propria autoritate præsumat, sed per duos, aut tres, aut plures, prout civitatis, aut loci magnitudo poposce-rit per eandem Curiam, & totidem, a locorum incolis electos, autoritate tamen regia deputandos, hospitia memoratis curialibus, stipendiariis, & aliis assignentur. Idem autem curiales, stipendiarii, & alii nulla bona suorum hospitem capiant, nec in illis, aut in personis eorum ipsis aliquam injuriam inferant, nec ipsorum aliquis pro eo, quod sibi hospitium fuerit aliquando taliter assignatum, si eum aliis ad eundem locum cum Curia, vel sine Curia venire contingat, sibi jus hospitandi vendicet in eodem, aut ipsum intrare audeat, nisi fuerit sibi simili modo iterum assignatum. Hujusmodi autem hospitia taliter assignata, præfati Rex, & illi de domo, & familia sua gratis semper obtineant; reliqui vero, sive stipendiarii, sive quicumque alii per unum mensem solum, si tanto tempore in eodem loco contingat Curiam residere, si verò ultra resederit, vel ipsos stipendiarios, aut alios ad aliqua loca sine Curia venire contigerit, satisfaciant Dominis hospitiorum, seu ipsorum actoribus de salario competenti per deputatos, ut præmittitur, moderando.

SIMILITER prohibemus, ne in locis, in quibus vina, & victualia possunt venalia reperiri, quisque ea per regalem Curiam, aut Curiales, seu per quoscunque ministros ipsorum, vel quoscunque alios invitus vendere compellatur, nec aliqua bona nolentibus vendere, auferantur, nec eorum vegetes consignentur, & si de facto fuerint consignata, signa eis imposita liceat Dominis autoritate propria remove, præsertim cum præfatus Rex hoc ipsum de remotione hujusmodi statuuisse dicatur; si vero in loco, ad quem Curiam, Curiales, & alios prædictos declinare contingit, talia venalia non habentur, abundantes in illis per aliquem, vel aliquos ad hoc a regali Curia, & totidem à locorum incolis electos, autoritate tamen regia deputandos omnia hujusmodi, quæ habent ultra necessaria suis, & familiarum suarum usibus, non solum Curia, sed Curialibus, & aliis eam sequentibus cogantur vendere pretio competenti per deputatos, ut præmittitur, moderando.

IN matrimoniis, in quibus volentibus ea contrahere varia impedimenta contrahendi adimentia libertatem per regiam, & suos ingeri dicebantur, Apostolicæ provisionis beneficium deliberavimus adhibendum; ideò provisione irrefragabili prohibentes regnicolis regni habitatoribus, matrimonium inter se contrahere volentibus per Regem, vel suos Officiales, aut alios quolibet inhibitionis, seu cujuslibet alterius obicem impedimenti præstari, declaramus, & declarando præcipimus, libera esse matrimonia inter eos, ita quod bona mobilia, vel immobilia, feudalia, vel non feudalia, liberè sibi mutuo dare possunt in dotem, nec iidem regnicolæ regni ut præmittitur, habitatores ejusdem super matrimonio inter se contrahendo, aut in dotem dando bona quælibet, licentiam petere teneantur, nec pro eo quod matrimonium esset cum bonis quibuslibet, aut dote quantacunque contractum fuerit a rege licentia non petita contrahentibus, aut alterutri eorundem, vel parentibus, consanguineis, sive amicis ipsorum in personis, aut rebus impedimentum, dispen-dium, aut gravamen aliquod irrogetur, nulla in præmissis constitutione, vel consuetudine contraria de cætero valitura.

PROVIDENDO præcipimus, ut si quando in regno prædicto contra certam personam fuerit inquisitio facienda, nisi ea præsentem, vel se per contumaciam absentante, non fiat, si vero præsens fuerit, exhibeantur sibi capitula, super quibus fuerit inquirendum, ut sit ei defensionis copia, & facultas; simili provisione præcipimus, ut pro generalibus inquisitionibus, nihil, vel sub compositionis colore, vel aliàs ab universitatibus exigatur; sed si procedendum fuerit, justè procedatur ex eis, præsertim cum dictus Rex C. hoc idem statuisse dicatur.

HUJUSMODI præcepto adjicimus; ut quoties inter fiscum, & privatum causam moveri contingit, non solum in examinando jura partium, sed ad diffinitivam sententiam justè ferendam, sive pro privato, sive pro Fisco, necnon ad ipsius executionem nulla in hoc difficultate ingerenda per fiscum efficaciter procedatur, itaque nec in prædicto examine, nec in prolatione, vel executione sententiæ injustam moram, vel aliam injuriam patiatur per fisci potentiam justitia privatorum.

PROVIDENDO districtiùs, inhibemus forestas per Regem, aut Magnates suæ Curia, vel Officiales, seu quoscunque Ministros in Terris fieri privatorum, vel aliquarum forestarum occasione per Regiam Curiam, Magistros, vel Custodes forestarum ipsarum aliquem in cultura terrarum suarum, seu etiam perceptione fructuum impediri, sive ipsis propter hoc damnum aliquod, vel injuriam irrogari; factas vero de novo forestas hujusmodi omnino præcipimus amoveri.

OMNES Ecclesiasticæ, secularesve personæ regni Sicilia liberè suis salinis utantur, & præsentis provisionis oraculo prohibemus, ne illis per Regem, Officiales, aut quoscunque Ministros ipsius usus, aut exercitium interdicatorum earum, neque quisque prohibeatur sal de salinis ipsis proveniens emere ab eisdem.

ABUSIONES Castellanorum, per quos homines dicti regni ad portandum eis paleas, ligna, & res alias etiam sine pretio cogebantur inviti, & iidem Castellani de rebus, quæ circa, seu per castra eadem portabantur pedagia exigebant, præsentis provisionis beneficio prohibemus.

EJUSDEM provisionis edicto præcipimus, ut pro literis regiis, & sigillo nihil ultra ipsius regni antiquam consuetudinem exigatur, videlicet, ut pro literis justitiæ nihil omnino, pro literis vero gratiæ, in qua non est feudi, vel terræ concessio, nihil ultra quatuor tarenos auri ab impetrante solvatur, nulla in præmissis distinctione habita inter clausas literas, & apertas.

PRO literis autem super concessione feudi, vel terræ confertis, necnon & pro privilegiis aliis pro concessione seu privilegii qualitate, aut benevolentia concedentis Curia satisfiat; dum tamen summam decem unciarum pro quolibet concessio feudo integra satisfactio non excedat, sed nec prætextu sigilli regii justitiæ, sive gratiæ literis in aliquo casuum prædictorum impressi, vel appensi forsitan impetrans ultra quam præmittitur,olvere compellatur.

ANIMALIA deputata molendinis, quæ centimuli vulgariter nuncupantur, per regalem Curiam, vel Officiales, aut ministros ipsius, eamve sequentes, stipendiarios, vel quoscunque alios nullo modo ad aliquod eorum ministerium Dominis capiantur invitis, nec alia etiam, sed pro competenti pretio, de quo conventum fuerit inter partes, à volentibus conducantur, & hæc ita de cætero præcipimus observari, maximè cum ipse Rex statuisse dicatur, quod Justitarii, & Subofficiales eorum, ac Stipendiarii, & Subofficiales non capiant animalia deputata ad centimulos, sed cum est necesse, inveniantur alia habilia ad vecturam, & loerium conveniens tribuatur, & si contrafecerint, restitutis animalibus cum toto damno eorum Dominis, poenæ nomine, & pro qualibet vice, & quolibet animali solvant Curiae unciam unam auri; præmissam quoque Constitutionem dicti Regis, similiter observari præcipimus.

DE creatione Officialium præsertim extraneorum, qui propter ignorantiam status regni, & favorem, qui eis a regali Curia præstabatur subjectos, impunè gravabant; consultè suggerimus, quod Rex creare studeat Officiales idoneos, qui subjectos injustè non gravent.

SUPER eo, quod regnicolæ querebantur, videlicet, quod eis gravatis pro revelationis obtinendo remedio ad regem aditus non patebat, suademus per regem taliter provideri, quod querelæ subditorum ad eum valeant liberè pervenire.

PROHIBEMUS, ne quisque pro animali sylvestri extra defensam, vel limites defensæ invento sine aliqua invenientis impulsione, arte, vel fraude, aliquatenus puniatur, etiamsi illud capiat, vel occidat.

NULLUS Comes, Baro, vel alius in Regno prædicto de cætero compellatur ad terridas, vel alia quæcunque vassella propriis sumptibus facienda. Per hoc autem juri regio in lignaminibus, vel marinariis, vel alio servitio vassellorum, quæ à quibusdam universitatibus, & locis aliis, sive personis singularibus dicti regni deberi dicuntur, nolumus in aliquo derogari.

SI contingerit Baronem aliquem mori, filio, vel filia superstitis, ætatis, quæ debeat cura balii gubernari, providendo præcipimus, quod Rex alicui de consanguineis ejus balium concedat ipsius, & quod ad hoc inter consanguineos proximior, si fuerit idoneus, præferatur.

SI aliquem feudum à Rege tenentem in capite, vel etiam subfeudatarium nullo hærede legitimo per lineam descendantem, sed fratre, aut ejus liberis superstitis, mori contingat, si decedentis feudum ab aliquo ex parentibus sibi, & fratri communibus pervenerat ad defunctum, idem frater, aut ex liberis suis usque ad trinepotem, ille qui tempore mortis supererit defuncto proximior in feudo succedat, habiturus illud cum onere servitii consueti.

AD Successionem feudi omnibus personis feudatario, aut subfeudatario defuncto simili gradu conjunctis eodem ordine admittendis.

IN successione verò præmissa inter feudatarios, & subfeudatarios viventes in Regno jure Francorum sexus, & primogenituræ prærogativa servetur, ut inter duos eodem gradu feudatorio conjunctos foeminam masculus, & juniorem major natu præcedat, sive sint masculi, sive foeminæ concurrentes, nisi forsan duabus concurrentibus esset primogenita maritata, & junior remanserit in capillo, tunc enim junior, quæ in capillo remanserit primogenitæ maritatæ in successione hujusmodi præferatur. Sed si nulla remanente in capillo, duæ, vel plures fuerint maritatæ, majori natu jus primogenituræ servetur, ut aliàs in dicta successione procedatur.

SI verò feudum, de quo agitur, non ab aliquo parentum processerat, sed inceperat à defuncto, tunc solus defuncti frater in eo succedat, nisi lex concessionis in præmissis aliud induxisset, & hæc ita de cætero præcipimus observari, qualibet contraria consuetudine, vel constitutione cessante.

NULLUS Subfeudatarius pro feudo, quod ab aliquo feudatario Regis tenet, compellatur ipsi Regi servire, sed si aliquod aliud feudum ab ipso Rege tenet in capite, pro eo sibi serviat, ut tenetur.

SI contingat, subfeudatarium crimen committere, propter quod publicanda fecerint bona ejus, aut ipsum sine legitimis hæredibus fati munus implere, si feudum ejus fuerit quaternatum, nihilominus immediatus Dominus illud cum onere servitii consueti personæ concedat idoneæ Regi post modum præsentandæ, ut ejus super hoc habeatur assensus. Si vero quaternatum non fuerit, sic ad eundem immediatum Dominum revertatur, ut ipsum hujusmodi personæ pro sua voluntate concedat, nec eam Regi præsentare, aut ejus super hoc requirere teneatur assensum; iis ita deinceps ex nostro præcepto servandis, constitutione, vel consuetudine contraria non obstante.

VASSALI Baronum per Curiam, vel Officiales ipsius ad aliqua privata officia non cogantur, & si ea voluntarii subeant ratione debiti ex hujusmodi officii receptione, vel gestione contracti, vel delicti forsan in ea commissi Baronibus eorum Dominis in bonis Vassalorum ipsorum, vel aliis præjudicium nullum fiat.

IN Terris Ecclesiarum, Comitum, & Baronum regni prædicti Magistros juratos poni de cætero prohibemus, & positos exindè præcipimus amoveri.

AD novas communantias Vassali Baronum, vel aliorum ire non compellantur inviti, sed nec voluntarii admittantur, si sint ascriptitiæ, similivè fortunæ, vel ratione personæ, non rerum tantum personalibus servitiis obligati. Si verò ratione rerum tantummodò servitiis hujusmodi teneantur, & ad easdem communantias transire voluerint, res ipsas Dominis suis sine contradictione dimittant.

BARONES, vel alii extrà Regnum, nec servire personaliter, nec addohamenta præstare cogantur. In casibus quoque, in quibus inter Regnum servire, vel addohamenta præstare tenentur, servitia exhibeant, & addohamenta præstent antiquitus consueta, videlicet, ut vel tribus mensibus personaliter serviant cum numero militum debitorum, vel pro singulis militibus, ad quos tenentur pro quolibet trium mensium prædictorum tres uncias, & dimidiam auri solvant, & hæc ità de cætero inconcussè de nostro præcepto observentur.

CÆTERUM, ut contra pericula, quæ sicut prædictum est, propter gravamina illata subditis excitata creduntur, nè (quod absit) recidant in tanto periculosius residuum, quanto residenti solet esse deterius, qui cadenti eo magis sit regnantibus in Regno prædicto securitas, quo minùs erit libera eadem gravamina irrogandi facultas, provisioni præmissæ subjungimus ad perpetuum sui roboris fulgimentum, quod si ventum fuerit in aliquo contra eam, licitum sit Universitatibus, & gravato cuilibet liberè ad Apostolicam Sedem habere pro sua querela exponenda, & obtinenda illati gravaminis emendatione reversum. Adjicientes inter illa, in quibus contra provisionem eandem fieri contingerit congrua distinctione delictum, videlicet, ut si ea fuerint, quæ per ipsam prohibitoriè, vel præceptoriè sunt provisa, & principaliter factum regnantis respiciunt, nec solet absque ipsius autoritate præsumi, ut est collectarum impositio, monetæ mutatio, matrimoniorum prohibitio, vel impedimentum aliud eorundem, nisi Rex ejus temporis illa infra decem dies revocaverit per seipsum, eo ipso Capella sua ecclesiastico sit supposita interdicto, duraturo solum, quousque gravamen fuerit revocatum. In reliquis verò prohibitoriis, & præceptoriis, & specialiter, si universitas, singularivè persona gravata, volens propterea recurrere ad sedem eandem, per Officiales Regios, seu quoscunque Ministros, vel quoslibet alios fuerit impedita, vel ipsos aut alios pro eis exindè damnum passum, nisi satisfactione læsis præstita, impedimentum infra mensem postquam ipse Rex scriberit, revocetur, ex tunc sit Capella eadem similiter interdicta. In quolibet autem casuum prædictorum, si regnans interdictum hujusmodi per duos menses sustinuerit animo contumaci, ab indè loca omnia, nia, ad quæ ipsum, uxorem, & filios suos declinare continget, donec ibi præsentés fuerint, simili interdicto subjaceant, & si deindè per sex menses interdicta hujusmodi substinuerit animo indurato, exinde sit excommunicationis sententia innodatus, quàm si per alios menses sex contumacia obstinata substineat, ex tunc Subditi ad mandatum Sedis ejusdem ipsis propterea faciendum in nullo sibi obediant, quamdiù in hujusmodi obstinatione persistet. Ad majorem quoque provisionis hujusmodi firmitatem eidem specialiter adjicimus, quod quilibet Rex Siciliæ, quando juramentum fidelitatis, & homagii præstabit summo Pontifici, solemniter eidem, & Ecclesiæ Romanæ pro se, ac suis hæredibus in Regno sibi successuris eodem, promittere teneantur, qui provisionem præsentem in omnibus, & per omnia, quantum in eis erit, observabunt inviolabiliter, & facient ab aliis observari, nec contra eam, vel aliquam partem ipsius per se, vel per alium quoquomodo aliquid attentabunt, & super hoc tam ipse, quam quilibet eorundem successorum dent ipsi Pontifici, & Ecclesiæ suas patentes literas sui pendentis sigilli munimine roboratas, licet autem præmissæ provisionis verba gravamina certa respiciant, de quibus ad nos querela pervenit, Reges tamen, qui continuanda temporum, & successionum perpetuitate regnabunt in Regno prædicto, non propterea existiment gravandi alios subditos arbitrium sibi fore concessum; sed sciunt potius se debere ipsos in bono statu tenere ab omnibus illicitis exactionibus, & indebitis eorum oneribus per se, ac alios abstinendo. Sanè si quod in eadem provisione, vel aliquo ejus articulo dubium non tam sollicitatur, quam rationabilem dubitationem continens oriri contingat, interpretationem dubii hujusmodi nobis, quanquam etiam de jure competat, reservamus expressè. Decernimus ergo, ut nulli omnino hominum liceat hanc paginam nostram provisionis, constitutionis, inhibitionis, præcepti, declarationis, abolitionis, & abrogationis infringere, vel ei ausu temerario contraire, si quis autem hoc attentare præsumpserit, indignationem omnipotentis Dei, & Beatorum Petri, & Pauli Apostolorum ejus se invenerit incursum.

'TIS a great question among our Writers, whether this Bull was ever receiv'd in the Kingdom, and had any Force, or Authority of Law. Some indeed have been induced to believe that it had, because our Professors, such as Andrea d' Isernia, Angelo, Baldo, Luca di Penna, Paris de Puteo, Aretino, Soccino, Afflitto, Capece, Loffredo, Camerario, and many others, frequently quote the Statutes therein contained in their Works. But none strains more to curry Favour with the Popes than *Rainaldo*¹, by asserting in his Ecclesiastical Annals, that it had full Force and Authority, and was observed in the Kingdom. And 'tis certain, that during the Imprisonment of Prince Charles, both the Cardinal of Parma, and the Count of Artois, caused it to be observed in the Kingdom; for we read, that Pope Honorius sent it to the Cardinal with a particular Brief, and charged him to see it put in execution; and in the same Author we read two Letters written by the Count of Artois, one of which is dated in Foggia, and directed to the Justice of Basilicata; and the other dispatched from Barletta on the twenty second of October 1288, and directed to the Prefects of Puglia, by which he orders them to see the Pope's Statutes super statu, & regimine regni, duly executed; so that afterwards, in order to avoid the Displeasure of the Popes, in such Letters as were sent to the Officers, it was introduced as a Set-Form, to add, That they were to observe, and cause to be observed the Constitutions and Statutes of the Kingdom, and likewise those established by the Apostolick See.

BUT after Prince Charles was set at liberty, and crowned King by Nicholas IV. who succeeded Honorius, upon his Return to Naples in the Year 1289, finding how prejudicial Honorius's Bull was to his Rights and Royal Prerogatives, tho' he was unwilling to disoblige the Pope, who was so much his Benefactor, by expressly repealing the Bull, yet he would not allow it to be of any Force in the Kingdom. And *Pietro Piccolo*² of Monteforte, an ancient and famous Doctor of his Age, writes, That Charles II. out of the respect he was obliged at that time to pay to that Pope, begg'd of him, that he would be pleased to suspend it, and that Pope Nicholas did actually suspend it. And tho' Rainaldo restrains the Suspension to the Penalties therein threaten'd only, as not including the rest; yet, by what followed, we see that it was not put in execution at all; for not only with regard to the Penalties, but in many other Points, it was neither observed nor received. In fine, Charles II. after he returned to Naples, resolving to reform the State of the Kingdom, made many new Laws, and confirmed those Statutes only which he had established in the Plain of *S. Martin*³: But as for those of Pope Honorius, as being most prejudicial to the supreme regalia of the Crown, he did not so much as mention them; on the contrary, in his Reign, they by no means answer'd the Ends for which that Pope had established them. For notwithstanding the Prohibition to alienate the King's Demesnes, he still disposed of them as he thought fit; and even Andrea d' Isernia could not but confess, that it was not in Pope Honorius's Power to restrict our Kings in that Matter. This very Andrea, who was the Compiler of the Usages of the Royal Chamber of Accounts, witnesseth, that tho' Honorius in his Bull⁴ had ordained, that every Man might freely make use of his own Salt-Pits, and sell the Salt thereof to others; yet the Statute of Frederick II. relating thereto was observed, and not that of Honorius. Moreover, as to the levying of Subsidies in those four Cases allow'd by Honorius, nothing was observed; and all our Authors declare, that as well before, as after the Reign of King Alphonfus I. it was always in the Power of our Kings to impose them in all Cases, when they found the Necessity of the State required it.

NEITHER was the feudal Succession altered, but the Statutes of the Kingdom concerning the same, and the Privileges granted afterwards to the Barons by our Princes were observed; and those of Honorius were not received, except in some Cases, where Equity and Justice took place, and where they were thought to be reasonable. Whence the same Andrea d' Isernia says: Quod illa non servantur, nisi quatenus sunt rationabilia; so that he calls these Statutes Hortatoria, because with us they had not the Authority of Laws; but some of them were observed rather by the Strength of Equity and Reason, than of Law.

SEBASTIANO NAPODANO believed, that these Statutes lost all their Force in the time of King Robert, of which opinion Rainaldo seems to be, when he says, That the Non-observance of these Statutes afterwards brought those Miseries and Calamities, which Summonte ¹ laments; but from what we have before observed, 'tis plain, that long before King Robert's time, in the Reign of Charles II. they were not observed.

WHENCE also it came, that the Compilers of the Statutes of the Kingdom excluded them from that Collection, and inserted those only made by Prince Charles in the Plain of S. Martin, together with the other Statutes of all the Kings of the Family of Anjou. And when James King of Sicily established his Statutes in that Kingdom; being willing that the Sicilians should partake of what had been granted to the Inhabitants of our Kingdom, he made use of some of these Statutes of Honorius; and that they might have the Force of Law in that Island, he caused them to be inserted amongst his own Statutes, such as Cap. si aliquem, cap. 2. de collectis, De frequenti mutatione monetarum, cap. 10. De matrim. liberè contr. cap. 32. and the like: whence Cunia, who made Comments on these Statutes, speaking of cap. si aliquem, said, that it was not observed in the Kingdom of Naples, but was by that King's Order in Sicily. And whence Deputy Tappia, in his Collection of the Laws of our Kingdom, very prudently excluded these Statutes, as having no Force of Law in it.

FOR the same Reason we likewise see, that in the time of the Kings of the House of Aragon, when the supreme Tribunal of the High Court was erected, and that they were quoted by the Advocates, Deputy Moles testifies, that no Cause was ever decided by vertue of these Statutes; wherefore we cannot but wonder that Deputy Ponte, who is unjustly reputed one of the most strenuous Asserters of the royal Jurisdiction, in his Treatise, De potestate Proregis ², did not blush to say, that it was rather by Disuse, than the Want of the Authority of Laws, that these Statutes were not observed: and besides he adds, that Pope Honorius, as absolute Lord of the Kingdom, with the Consent of Charles II. who was Lord Possessor of it, had power of establishing Laws in it.

AT last Rainaldo ³ ends his Discourse with an Advice to Princes, wherein he insinuates, that whenever the Popes set about to reform their States, they ought to subject themselves to their Laws, and gives them as a Precaution this Instance, that as the Non-observance of these Statutes, in his Opinion, had brought so many Calamities and Miseries upon our Kingdom, so they ought to be obsequious and submissive to the Laws of the Popes, if they did not desire to see their Governments unhinged, and their Kingdoms desolate and involved in Ruin. Nevertheless, we shall likewise conclude this Discourse with an Advice of the same Nature to Princes, to beware of entrusting the Care and Government of their States to any others, than their faithful Ministers; for if, either out of Respect, or Necessity, they allow the Popes to intermeddle ever so little, yet by their exquisite Cunning, what was at first only Advice and Friendship they convert into Authority and Dominion; and manage Matters so, that in place of Fathers they become Lords; and Princes, instead of Sons, become Servants: and therefore they ought to take example from what happened to our Kingdom in the time of the Normans, and much more in the Reign of the Family of Anjou, when the Popes pretended to exercise much greater and more absolute Sway than our Princes themselves ever dar'd to take upon them; and not only over the Barons, and other Subjects, but they had even the Confidence to extend it with a high and imperious Hand over the very Kings themselves.

C H A P. II.

Treaties made in England, and Oleron in Bearn, for setting Prince Charles at Liberty; his Coronation, and a Truce made with James King of Sicily.

WHILE a hot War was carried on in Sicily and Calabria, between the Count of Artois, and King James, who had been crown'd King in Palermo; the Prince of Salerno considering that the War might be spun out, and being impatient of returning to his paternal Kingdom, desired the Princess his Wife to dispatch Ambassadors to Pope Honorius, and Edward King of England, to beg of them that they would be pleased to treat with King Alphonfus about his Liberty. Edward very affectionately and readily began to treat of it; first by the Means of Ambassadors, and afterwards in Person, having gone to Oleron in Bearn to meet with Alphonfus, whither the Pope likewise sent an Apostolick Legate. In the Acta publica of England, in our time, printed by order of Queen Anne, we read many Transactions and Letters relating to Edward's Negotiations for this Prince's Liberty; the chief of which are those Articles agreed upon at Oleron between Edward and the King of Aragon. The Articles and Conditions, stipulated after long Debates, were these:

THAT before the Prince should go out of the Borders of Aragon, three of his Sons were to be delivered up as Hostages, viz. Lewis the second Son, who was afterwards Bishop of Thoulouse, and since canoniz'd; Robert Duke of Calabria the third, who was afterwards King; and John the eighth Son, who was afterwards Prince of the Morea, with sixty Provensale Knights at the choice of the King of Aragon.

THAT he should pay thirty thousand Marks of Silver.

THAT he should get the King of France to make a Truce for three Years; and that Charles of Valois that King's Brother, who had been invested by Pope Martin IV. with the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valentia, should yield to King Alphonfus all his Rights, and restore all those Places, which Philip his Father had taken in the Counties of Roussignon and Ceritania, and were still in his Possession.

THAT in case the Prince should fail in performing all the above Articles, he should be obliged within the Space of a Year to return to Prison.

THAT he should quit the Kingdom of Sicily to King James, and give him his Daughter Blanch for a Wife.

Giovanni Villani, and many other Italian Authors make not the least mention of these Articles of Peace agreed upon in Oleron; but besides Costanzo, the Acta publica of England clear this Passage of History.

WHILE these Things were transacting at Oleron, in the Month of April 1287 Pope Honorius died, and a Year after a Dominican Friar was elected in his Place, who took the Name of Nicholas IV. Although this Pope was a Native of Ascoli in Marca, yet no French Pope exceeded him in Love and Affection for Prince Charles and his Family; for understanding that the Articles agreed upon were to advantageous to King Alphonfus and King James, and that Alphonfus had a mind to sell the Prince's Liberty too dear, he disapproved of the whole Treaty, and published a Bull which we read in the said Acta publica of England^a, wherein he condemns these Articles; and he sent the Archbishops of Ravenna and Monreale with a Brief to Aragon, by vertue of which, as Apostolick Legates, they required King Alphonfus, under the Pain of Censure, to set the Prince at Liberty, and to forbear giving Assistance to King James the Usurper of Sicily, and a Rebel to the Holy Church¹.

THE King of England, who had a great Affection for the Prince his Cousin, and longed extremely to have him set at Liberty, seeing that the Pope did not approve of what had been done, interested himself very much, and went again to meet the King of Aragon, with whom he took great Pains to obtain more reasonable Conditions. Alphonfus, unwilling to reject the Intercession of the King of England, who had come into his Dominions to have an Interview with him; and in order to comply in some measure with the Pope, confirmed the first Articles, and excluded the last, making no mention of King James, nor the Kingdom of Sicily.

THEREFORE he was content to accept of the abovesaid Hostages, the thirty thousand Marks of Silver, and the Promise that the Prince should procure a Peace with the King of France, and the Cession of Charles of Valois; and in case the Treaty was not put in execution, the Prince was to return to his Prison. The King of England became Guarantee for the Performance; and upon these Conditions the Prince obtained his Freedom.

CHARLES being thus set at Liberty, both out of the Love he bore his Sons, who had been left Hostages, and as he was naturally a most faithful Prince, immediately went to the King of France's Court; where, though he was received with all the Tokens of Affection and Esteem, yet afterwards when he came to treat about performing the Conditions of the Peace, he found vast Difficulties; for the King referred every thing to his Brother's Approbation, who having no Dominions, was not willing to divest himself of the Expectation of two Kingdoms, and of the Possession of those Places, that his Father had conquered in the War of Perpignan; so that finding all his Labour lost he set out for Provence, where he had great Respect paid him; and then went to Italy, where he was kindly received by the Guelf Cities, and especially by the Florentines, and at last he came to *Rieti*², where he found Pope Nicholas, who, with the Approbation of the whole College, on the twenty ninth of May 1289 in the great Church of that City, crown'd and anointed him King of both Sicilies; in Memory of which Solemnity, on the twenty second of June the same Year, King Charles gave to the said Church, out of the Royal Revenues of the City of Salmona, twenty Ounces of Gold yearly for ever³.

THEN he set out for Naples, and in all Places of the Kingdom as he pass'd, was received with incredible Joy and Acclamations, on account of his Clemency and Generosity when he was Lieutenant of the Kingdom. And after he had been some time in that City, he began that Year by new Laws to reform the State of the Kingdom, which during his Imprisonment, by a Mixture of new Government had undergone several Alterations; then it was that he made those Statutes, of which we have treated in the preceding Book.

KING James seeing his Brother the King of Aragon involved in so many Wars, had sent to desire him to mind his own Interest, by concluding a Peace the best Way he could, without mentioning Sicily, which he hoped to be able to maintain with his own Forces; but when he saw afterwards that the new Pope was so much attach'd to King Charles's Interest, and that the Investiture given him comprehended both the Sicilies, he repented that he had not been included in the Peace; whereupon he resolv'd, in order to prevent a War in Sicily, to begin it in Calabria, where both Parties fought with equal Bravery and Courage; but King James finding that this Expedition was not attended with great Success, he set sail with his Fleet towards the Coast of Gaeta, and besieged that City, which being quickly relieved by King Charles, he was more closely besieged than Gaeta; but as Fortune would have it, Ambassadors from the Kings of England and Aragon arrived at that very time in Charles's Camp to treat about a Peace; and though Charles's Council strenuously oppos'd it, yet such was the Diligence of the Ambassador of Aragon, and so strong were the Arguments of the English Ambassador, that King Charles, contrary to the Opinion of all his Friends, agreed to a Truce for two Years, notwithstanding ing that the Count of Artois had told him plainly, that that Truce would for ever put it out of his Power to recover the Kingdom of Sicily. King Charles alledged to him and his other Counsellors for Excuse, that he could not do otherwise, considering the Obligations he lay under to the King of England, who in so friendly a manner had procured him his Liberty, and had been at the Trouble to go to Spain on purpose; and besides, that he could not pretend to perform his Promise, in getting the King of France to make Peace with the King of Aragon, and Charles of Valois to give up his Claim to the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valentia, of which he had got Investiture from the Pope. The Truce being thus concluded, the Count of Artois, and the other French Lords, who had been five Years taking care of the Kingdom, and King Charles's Children, went away in Disgust, judging it impracticable to perform any glorious Action. On the other hand King James, glad that the Danger was over, set sail for Sicily. And Charles, after having for the Space of ten Years exempted the Gaetans from all Taxes, on account of their gallant Behaviour during the Siege of their City, returned to Naples.

C H A P. III.

Charles Martel crown'd King of Hungary. Peace concluded between King Charles and the King of Aragon; and Frederick crown'd King of Sicily.

CHARLES, upon his return to Naples, found there Ambassadors from the Kingdom of Hungary, who had come to desire him to send and take Possession of that Kingdom, which by lawful Succession belonged to Queen Mary his Wife, King Ladislaus her Brother dying without Issue. King Charles received the Ambassadors with all Marks of Honour, and answered them, That he would immediately send thither his eldest Son Charles Martel, to whom his Mother Queen Mary would yield her Rights to that Kingdom; with which they being very well satisfied, Charles sent to beg of the Pope, that he would be pleased to send a Prelate to Naples as his Legate to crown his Son. Charles did this for no other End, but only that by such a Solemnity he might have occasion to cheer up Naples, and the Kingdom with a sumptuous Feast, after so much Toil; not that he believed the Coronation to be necessary for maintaining the Rights he had, or acquiring new ones; for he knew very well, that according to the Custom of that Kingdom he must be crown'd again in Vicegrad with the ancient Crown of that Kingdom, which is kept there, in order to his being acknowledged as lawful King of that People[†]. Pope Nicholas following the Example of his Predecessors, who never minded whether they had a Right to do a thing or not, if they were desired, they always undertook it, out of an Opinion which still prevails, that they had Power to do every thing, immediately sent a Legate to Naples, who, in the Presence of many Archbishops and Bishops, crown'd him King of Hungary. This Coronation was celebrated in Naples on the eighth of September 1292, whereat were likewise present the Ambassadors of France, and of all the Princes of Italy, amongst whom the Florentines made the greatest Figure. The Feasts, Tournaments, and other Shews were most magnificent, but what made the brightest Appearance of all was the King's Beneficence and Generosity; he first knighted his Son Charles Martel before he was crown'd, and then gave the military Girdle to above three hundred Neapolitans and other Gentlemen of the Provinces of the Kingdom. He exempted the City of Naples from all Taxes, and likewise remitted a part of them to all those Places that had suffered any Damage by the Sicilian Army. Then he began to appoint a Household for the King his Son, by placing wise Counsellors, and trusty Servants about his Person, with a great Number of other Domesticks and noble Pages.

BUT while they were thus feasting in Naples, some Barons of the Kingdom of Hungary had proclaimed for their King one Andrew, a remote Relation of the late King's, and had got a great part of that Kingdom to submit to him. For which Reason King Charles put off the sending his Son to Hungary, and kept him in Naples for some Years after, and made him his Lieutenant when he returned again to France; and in the mean time, in order to support his Right, and enable him to drive the Usurper out of that Kingdom, he sent Giacomo Galeota Archbishop of Bari his Ambassador to the Emperor Rodolphus I. of the House of Austria, to treat about a Marriage between one of his Daughters and Charles Martel King of Hungary; which being happily concluded, the new King with a great Number of Barons and Knights set out for Germany to celebrate the Marriage, and then went to Hungary; and though he carried a good Army with him, yet he got not Possession of the whole Kingdom, because while his Rival Andrew lived, he still kept Possession of a part of it; he was received by his own Party with Royal Pomp, and great Demonstrations of Joy; and those Neapolitans who had accompanied him, magnified to Charles the Opulency of that Kingdom.

BUT Charles's Felicity in seeing his Son possessed of so great a Kingdom, was disturbed by continual Messages sent by Edward King of England, soliciting him to fulfill the Conditions of the Peace made with the King of Aragon, who at the same time was making his Complaints to Edward, that having set the Prince of Salerno at Liberty upon his promising to get the King of France to desist from undertaking any thing against his Kingdoms, yet he was now more hard put to it than ever by that King. And in the Acta publica of England lately printed¹, we read two Letters written by King Alphonfus to King Edward, wherein he complains of King Charles's Prevarications upon that Head.

CHARLES, as a very just King, and a Man of great Probity, seeing himself thus pressed, not only by the King of England, but by Alphonfus himself, resolved to go to France in Person, and there to use his utmost Endeavours to get the King and his Brother to lay aside their Designs upon Aragon, as he had promised in the Articles of Peace, with a firm Resolution to return to his Prison, in case he did not succeed. And, as we have said, having left his Son Charles Martel Lieutenant of the Kingdom, he set out, and among others took with him the famous Bartolommeo di Capua Great Protonotary of the Kingdom; and upon his Arrival found, that the Kings of France and Majorca were making great Preparations to invade the Kingdom of Aragon, the one by the way of Navarre, and the other by Rouffillon; and having waited many Days to no purpose, he had in a manner given over all Hopes, not only of persuading them to lay aside the Expedition, but even of delaying it, because those Kings having already been at great Charges, were unwilling to be disappointed. And in the said Acta publica of England we find a Certificate of King Charles's being arrived at a certain Place, in order to surrender himself Prisoner².

WHILE Charles was in this Perplexity of Mind, Cardinal Colonna and the Cardinal of S. Sabina Apostolical Legates very opportunely came to France, who, with the Authority of the Pope's Name, which was then much respected by the King, and the French Nation, obliged the King of France to wait the Result of the Peace, which they were about to treat on. And having retired to Montpellier, they conven'd the Ambassadors of England and Aragon, those of King Charles, the King of Majorca, James King of Sicily, and likewise those of the King of France, and began to treat about a Peace. But the more warmly it was discuss'd, the more difficult it seem'd to bring it to a Conclusion; for on the one hand the Sicilian Ambassadors declared that their Master was resolved not to part with Sicily; on the other hand the French Ambassadors said, that their King would not lose the Charges he had been at, nor would Charles of Valois give up his Claim, since King James was determined to keep Possession of that Island acquired so unjustly, and with the Slaughter of so many Frenchmen. The Pope likewise had ordered his Legates by no means to conclude a Peace, if the Kingdom of Sicily was not restored to King Charles, alledging, That if the violent Possessors of the Lands of that Island should go unpunished, it would be of great Prejudice to the Apostolical See. Matters being thus embroiled, Bartolommeo di Capua, who was one of King Charles's Ambassadors, an able Doctor, and a Man of great Judgment and Skill in managing Affairs, demonstrated to the Cardinal Legates, that there was only one way left for concluding a Peace, which was to exclude King James from it, and to persuade Charles of Valois, in lieu of the Hopes he had of conquering the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valentia, to marry Clementia King Charles's Daughter, with whom he should have the Dukedom of Anjou as her Portion. The Cardinals began to treat about the Matter with the Ambassadors of Aragon, whom they found very much inclined to exclude King James, because it was necessary for the King of Aragon to have the Peace concluded, who by no means was able to resist so many powerful Enemies; for besides the War which the Kings of France and Majorca threatened, he was attacked on the other side by Sancho King of Castile; and which was worse, his own Subjects were risen up in Arms, as they said, because they were interdicted from the Holy Offices, but much more on account of the Charges they were at in maintaining the War; and they insisted, that provided the War with France was at end, and the Pope pacified, King Charles's Sons ought not to be detained to please King James, but ought to be immediately set at Liberty, in order to pave the Way for Peace. There was nothing else remaining to be done, but to satisfy Charles of Valois; so that the Legates, and all the Ambassadors left Montpellier, and went to wait upon the King of France, and after much Debate the Peace was concluded on these Conditions:

THAT Charles of Valois should marry the eldest Daughter of King Charles, and have the Dukedom of Anjou for her Portion, and that he should renounce the Investiture of the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valentia.

THAT the King of Aragon should set at Liberty King Charles's three Sons, with the other Hostages, and pay to the Church of Rome the Tribute for the Kingdom of Aragon, which had been discontinued many Years.

THAT he not only should not assist King James, but should order all his Subjects, that were either in Calabria or in Sicily in the Service of that King, to quit it, and depart.

THAT on the other hand the Pope should receive the King of Aragon into the Bosom of holy Church as a dutiful Son, and take off the Interdiction from his Subjects.

THE Peace being thus concluded, the Articles thereof were immediately put in execution; for King Charles had no sooner got back his Sons, and the other Hostages, than he returned by Sea to Italy, and was honourably received in Genoa, where he made an Alliance with that Republick, which promised to assist him with sixty Gallies for the recovering of Sicily; and Charles of Valois sent to Naples for Clementia, who was conducted to France and married.

BUT Alphonfus dying soon after without leaving Children, the so much desired Peace was again interrupted; for James King of Sicily as lawful Heir being called to the Throne of those Kingdoms, without any Delay, took shipping for Spain, left his Brother Don Frederick Lieutenant of the Island, and took Possession of his Kingdoms. The Pope, the Kings of France and England at the earnest Desire of King Charles sent Ambassadors to represent to King James, that since he had succeeded to his Brother's Kingdoms, he ought to fulfill the Conditions of Peace lately concluded, and restore the Kingdom of Sicily, or not to assist the Sicilians; but to order all his Subjects serving in that Island to return to Spain, because otherwise the Peace would be looked upon as violated, and the Renunciation of Charles of Valois as void; and the Pope would again interdict his Kingdoms. King James answered, That he had succeeded to those Kingdoms, as the Son of King Peter, and not as the Brother of Alphonfus; and that therefore he was not bound to fulfill those Conditions, to which his Brother had consented, to the great Prejudice of the Crown of Aragon. Thus all Parties concluded the Peace to be broken, and a new and obstinate War was again begun in Calabria between King Charles and King James.

NEVERTHELESS the King of France and the Pope importun'd King James to part with the Kingdom of Sicily; and his Subjects of Aragon and Valentia begged of him to do it; but the Death of Pope Nicholas, which happened this Year 1292, was the Reason why he did it not, but waited to see what Time might bring about. And the Cardinals having disagreed among themselves, they left the See vacant for the Space of two Years and some Months; the King of France did not move, but lived in Peace almost two Years. But in the beginning of the Year 1294 the Cardinals came to a Resolution to elect a poor Hermit, named Fr. Pietro di Morrone, who lived in a little Hermitage two Miles from Salmona, upon the Skirts of the Mountain of Majella; and indeed it was thought, that both on account of the Sanctity of his Life, and his want of Experience, he would not accept of the Papacy. King Charles hearing of the Election, went immediately to wait upon him, and persuade him to accept of it; and he prevailed so far with him, as to induce him to send for the College of Cardinals to come to Aquila; and it was an easy Matter to persuade him, not that he was covetous of reigning, but merely because of his Humility, and great Simplicity. The Cardinals came to Aquila, just as the King, with Charles Martel his Son and the new Pope, had arrived; and on the ninth of August, with great Solemnity, and in presence of a prodigious Number of Spectators, being crown'd, he took the Name of Celestine V. King Charles thank'd and commended all those who had made so good a Choice, and very generously and magnificently furnished them with all manner of Provisions, and bore all their other Expences. All the World was astonish'd at the Novelty of the thing, seeing a Person, from so mean and abject a Condition, rais'd to the Pinnacle of human Dignity.

THIS Pope discovered himself to be more charmed with a contemplative Life, than his new Dignity; for he very soon began to declare his Desire of returning to his Hermitage; at which King Charles was exceedingly troubled, because he thought himself very happy in having one of his Subjects elected, and who was a Man of holy Life, from whom he expected to obtain whatever he desired; and finding that the Cardinals were willing that Celestine should return to his Hermitage, he persuaded him to come to Naples, in order to cajole and sooth him. Celestine came to Naples, but the Charms of that City, and the Caresses and Persuasions of King Charles, were not powerful enough to make him change his Resolution; so that in a few Days in the middle of December in the great Hall of Castel Nuovo he resign'd the Papacy into the Hands of the Cardinals, and returned to his Hermitage. We read in the Royal Archives ¹ a Charter of Donation made by King Charles to a Brother and two Nephews of Celestine's of twenty Ounces of Gold yearly for ever, payable out of the Bailiwick of Foggia, which was afterwards made payable out of that of Salmona.

AT this time Cardinal Benedetto Gaetano was a Man pretty much esteemed, both for the Nobility of his Family and Learning, as also for his Skill in managing secular Affairs; who seeing that King Charles by his Magnificence and Generosity had gained the Hearts of all the Cardinals, went to wait upon him to beg his Assistance for his Promotion to the Papacy, and in a manner demonstrated to him with strong Arguments, that there was not a Cardinal of the whole College that would be so ready to assist him, both in the recovering of the Kingdom of Sicily, and in every thing else; and the King being persuaded that it was true; for besides his other Qualities he was a mortal Enemy of the Ghibellines, he promised to do it; as indeed he did, for he went to all the Cardinals one by one, and got their Consent; so that on the Eve of Christmas he was unanimously elected, and called Boniface VIII.

BONIFACE, who was of a quite different Temper from that of his Predecessor, trusting to the Relation he had to many Roman Princes, went immediately to Rome in order to be crown'd, very well satisfied with Charles; for besides his having made him Pope, he spar'd no Charges to do him Honour; and therefore as soon as the Coronation was over, he began to shew his Gratitude for so many Obligations, by sending an Apostolick Legate to King James, to order him immediately to give up the Kingdom of Sicily; and also to threaten, that by a Sentence he should be deposed from the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valentia, in case he continued under the Interdiction, and refused to obey.

ON the other hand King Charles sent Bartolommeo di Capua to France, to sollicite Charles of Valois to begin the War by virtue of his Investiture of the Kingdoms of Aragon and Valentia, because the Cession which he had made upon the Peace with Alphonfus, in favour of James, ought not to be valid, because James did not comply with the other Conditions. Bartolommeo, upon his Arrival in France, found not so great Difficulty to persuade Charles to begin the War, as to persuade the King his Brother to be at the Expences of it; nevertheless, the Apostolical Legate coming from Valentia to France, and declaring, That though King James had given fair Promises that he would obey the Pope's Order, yet he seemed to demurr, because he found his Subjects uneasy under the papal Interdiction, encouraged the King to comply with Bartolommeo's Request, proclaim War against King James, and put his Army in readiness to attack him.

THEN King James began to be of another Mind, and to know, that he was not in a Condition to carry on so many Wars at once; and in order to gain the Affection of the Barons of his Kingdoms, he called a general Parliament, in which he declared, That it was against his Inclination, that either himself or they should be under Interdiction, and that he desired to obey the Pope; but that on the other hand the strict Union between him and King Charles was to be feared; and that therefore he was of Opinion, that four Ambassadors ought to be sent to beg of his Holiness in the Name of himself and of his Kingdoms, that he would be pleased to set a Treaty on Foot, which, upon just and honourable Terms, he would accept of; and in the same Parliament Ambassadors were nominated, with full Power to assist at the Treaty of Peace. As soon as these Ambassadors had arrived in Rome, and declared to the Consistory the good Intentions of King James, the Pope answered them very graciously, and promised, that he would divest himself of all Passion, and would enter upon a Treaty that should be equally honourable for both Parties.

KING Charles, whom the Pope had advised of this Treaty by a Brief, ordered Bartolommeo di Capua, who was returning from France, to stop in Rome, and to assist as Ambassador at the Treaty of Peace, which was managed by the Pope with so great Dexterity, that the most ticklish Article, viz. the Restitution of the Kingdom of Sicily, was easily agreed to by the Ambassadors of Aragon; and it is thought the Reason was, because King James was not in a Condition to enter upon a War with France, for his People being all bent upon Peace, would not contribute towards the Expences of it; so that on the fifth of June 1295 the Peace was concluded on these Conditions. That King James should deliver up the Island of Sicily to King Charles, as entire as Charles I. had possessed it before the Revolution. That he should restore all the Places, Forts and Castles possessed by his Officers in Calabria, Basilicata and Principato; and on the other hand King Charles should give him to Wife his second Daughter Blanch with a hundred thousand Marks of Silver in Portion; and that those who had served either of the Parties should have a full Indemnity both as to their Goods and Persons; and that the Pope should absolve and receive into Favour both King James, and all his Subjects and Adherents, by removing the Ecclesiastical Interdiction, and absolving them from his Censures. The King of France's Ambassadors entered into the Peace for their King, whereby he was obliged to get the King of Castile likewise to come into it.

THIS Peace was a great Surprize to all the World, because it seemed impossible that King James, who for so many Years had maintained the Kingdom of Sicily with its own Forces only, now that he was possessed of two other Kingdoms, and many other Dominions in Spain, would be so mean as to make such a Peace; but Men of Judgment thought, that he had acted very prudently, because the Accession of these Kingdoms had made it impossible for him to defend them all, and they had proved more chargeable than profitable, having been obliged to fight in Spain with the Kings of Castile and France, and in Sicily with King Charles; so that he would have been obliged to maintain three Armies, and be in three Places at the same time, which was equally impossible, besides the Pope's Enmity, who made War no less upon him than the rest: It is further said, that he was induced to it by the Pope's promising to invest him with the Kingdom of Sardinia, and to get King Charles to assist him in the Conquest of that Island, as also of the Island of Corfica.

UPON the News of this Peace, which was soon carried to Sicily, Don Frederick, who was his Brother's Lieutenant, and a Man of great Spirit, began to aspire at the Dominion of that Kingdom, and dissembling his Design, he first sent Ambassadors to the Pope to signify to him, that as for himself, he had always been ready and willing to live under the Protection and Obedience of the Church, and to beg of him to receive him as such; the Pope having heard the Message, graciously received the Ambassadors, and answered, That they might tell Don Frederick, that he took their Embassy very kindly, and that he was very desirous to see him, and to do him what Service lay in his Power. D. Frederick went immediately to Rome, and took with him Roger de Loria, and Giovanni di Procida. After the Pope had received him very honourably, seeing his Disposition and the Comeliness of his Person, and the Wit he discovered in his Conversation, he in a manner despaired of gaining upon him, because he seemed to be well carved out for Government, and knew how to maintain the Kingdom; yet he did not fail to lay the Peace before him, and to exhort him to conform himself to the Will of his Brother King James; and he entreated him, that upon his return to Sicily, he would make no Difficulty in giving up that Island, because in return he would take a special care of him, whom he knew to be most worthy of the greatest Empire; promising to use his utmost Endeavours, that Philip the Son of Baldwin Emperor of Constantinople should give him his only Daughter for Wife, with a promise of the Succession to some Provinces which he possessed in Greece, and of the Rights of recovering the Empire of Constantinople; and he likewise promised that he would get King Charles to assist him, and that all the Forces of the Church should be at his Service. D. Frederick for the present thought fit to accept of the Offers, and promised to do what in him lay for the giving up of the Island, and departed.

BUT D. Frederick had no sooner acquainted the Sicilians with the Certainty of the Peace, than all in Despair and Discontent, as expecting nothing from the Hands of the French, their mortal Enemies, but Ruin and Destruction, met to consult what Course they had best to take; and with that Boldness, which commonly proceeds from Despair, they determined rather to undergo the utmost Danger, than subject themselves to such dismal Circumstances; whereupon they elected four Ambassadors to go to King James, and request him to give up all the Castles and Forts of the Kingdom to be guarded by the Natives thereof; and that since the King was resolved to restore the Island to King Charles, he would be pleased to return them their Homage, by freeing them from their Oath of Fidelity and Subjection; and to tell him plainly, that upon such an Exigent they were not bound to obey him.

THESE Ambassadors arrived at the same time with King James's Bride; and after the King had hear'd their Message, he answered them, That for the Sake of Peace, and the Security of his paternal Kingdoms, he had been forced to restore the Island to King Charles his Father-in-Law, therefore he commanded them to give it up without Opposition.

THIS Answer struck the Ambassadors to the very Heart, who having replied to the King, that he had no Power to sell them, they returned him his Homage, and protested, that from that time forth their Kingdom was free, and the Inhabitants were released from their Oaths, and that they would have another King, who out of Gratitude and Affection would protect them, and with that they departed, and in all haste returned to Sicily.

IN the mean time Giovanni di Procida, and Manfredi di Chiaramonte, waiting their return, had retired into some strong Holds, and taking it for granted that D. Frederick would gladly lay hold of so fair an Opportunity, they persuaded him not to let it slip, but immediately to call a general meeting in Palermo. D. Frederick forgot all the Pope's Promises, judging, that in order to maintain Sicily he was only obliged to be upon his guard at Home, but to gain Constantinople he must go well armed, and wrestle with many Difficulties, and be at Charges in foreign Dominions; so that he ordered an Assembly to be called, and invited to it not only the Barons, but the Syndicks of all the Cities and Towns, to whom the Ambassadors reported King James's Answer, and caused to be read a Copy of the Articles of Peace which they had brought with them. Terrible was the Outcry they all made, and then Roger de Loria and Vinciguerra di Palizzi gave it as their Opinion, that D. Frederick ought to be proclaimed King of Sicily, and were the first that offered to swear Allegiance to him; the Multitude did not wait till the other Barons had followed in order, but with a loud Voice cried out, God bless D. Frederick King of Sicily; and on the twenty fifth of April 1296 he was solemnly crown'd, and both very prudently and boldly ordered Men and Money to be raised; and he not only prepared for the Defence of Sicily, but likewise for the Continuance of the War in Calabria.

IN the mean time King Charles being gone to wait on the Pope at Anagni, he entreated him to send an Apostolical Legate along with King James's Ambassadors, to order the Sicilians to deliver up the Island, which accordingly he did; but they were no sooner arrived at Messina, than they were given to understand that that City, and all the Island belonged to King Frederick of Aragon; and that they were to proceed no farther, because they might perhaps meet with what would not please them. The Ambassadors and Legate being surprized, returned first to Naples to wait upon the King, and then to Anagni on the Pope, and gave them both an Account of what had passed. Charles, who was a most upright Prince, expected no such thing; but the Pope, from the very time that he had seen Frederick, and considered his Proceedings, had always suspected him: They therefore resolved to send a Legate and Ambassadors to King James, to get him to employ all his Power for the effectual restoring of that Island.

WHILE the Legate and Ambassadors were on their way to Spain, King Charles, with the Advice of the Pope, and the most prudent of his Barons, in order to prevent King Frederick's gathering more Strength, and not to depend altogether upon King James, resolved to make War upon him; whereupon the War was carried on with equal Vigour and Courage for a long time in Calabria, where Charles, with alternate Fortune, strove in vain to recover those Places, which Frederick possessed in that Province; on the contrary Frederick was so bold, as to invade the Province of Otranto; he took and pillaged Lecce, fortified the City of Otranto, and went and encamped under the Walls of Brindisi. All the Loss that Frederick suffered by this War was, that out of Disgust Roger de Loria left him, and went over to King Charles.

THE Pope hearing of King Frederick's prosperous Success, and that Charles, with all the Forces he then had, was scarcely able to defend the Kingdom of Puglia, and that the recovering of Sicily was like to go on heavily, if more Forces were not sent him; partly in order to maintain the Authority of the Apostolical See, which he was resolved to raise as high as he could, and partly out of the Affection he had for King Charles, he laid aside the Care of all other Things, and was wholly bent upon having that Island restored to him; and to engage King James to act with Vigour, he sent him the Investiture of the Kingdom of Sardinia, and made him Standard-Bearer of Holy Church, and Captain General of all the Christians that were fighting against the Infidels, and sent to beg of him to use his utmost endeavour to fulfil his Promise. King James, besides his Engagements by the Articles of Peace, finding himself under Obligations to the Pope, ordered great Preparations to be made in his Kingdoms for fitting out a Fleet, and came to Rome to excuse himself to the Pope, and to swear before him, that he had no Hand in his Brother's Contumacy and Fault, and that he would demonstrate it to all the World with Sword in Hand; and for the present he sent Peter Comaglies a Monk of the Order of Preaching Friars to Sicily to discourse with his Brother, and to persuade him to obey the Pope. Friar Peter not being able to obtain the Restitution of Sicily, advised King Frederick at least to part with those Places he was possess'd of in Calabria, to which he had not the least Title, either just, or pretended; for although he had a Mind to keep Possession of Sicily, because the Sicilians had elected him, or because of the last Will of King Alphonfus his eldest Brother; yet as for the Kingdom of Puglia, though King Peter had the same Title to it as he had to that of Sicily, they both being King Manfred's Inheritance, nevertheless, by the Cession made by King James at the Peace, all Right was devolved to King Charles, even though the Investitures and Confirmations of so many Popes were to be reckoned of no Force. All that Friar Peter got by this Message was, that before he left Sicily King Frederick sent to recall Roger de Loria, and promised to withdraw all the Garrisons from the Cities of Puglia. The Friar returned and gave the Pope and King James an account of what he had done, with which neither of them being satisfied, James sent the Bishop of Valentia to entreat King Frederick, that he would be pleased to come and confer with him either in the Island of Procida, or Ischia, where they might set Matters to rights. King Frederick answered, That he could not move without the Advice of his Barons; and having asked some of them what was fit to be done, Roger de Loria advised him to comply with his Brother, and go meet him; but the King, by the Insinuation of Roger's Enemies, became diffident of him, which he understanding, he spoke with so great Rage, that the King commanded him not to stir out of the Palace; but at his earnest Entreaty the King let him go, so he immediately departed; and there were Means found afterwards to get him to enter into King Charles's Service.

MEAN while new Ambassadors came from King James to Sicily, with Orders, that if the Bishop of Valentia had not prevailed with King Frederick to come and speak with him, they were to conduct Queen Constantia, and the Infante Donna Violante to Rome, where King James expected them. Frederick, unwilling to disoblige his Brother in that, said to his Mother, That it depended upon herself either to go, or stay in Sicily, and that if she went, she might likewise take his Sister along with her. That prudent Queen, who loved both her Sons, chose to go, though she knew that she was to see King Charles, the Son of him who had put her Brother to Death, and killed Queen Sibilla her Mother, and her only Brother in Prison, because she was in hopes to assuage King James's Wrath against Frederick; and thus she and her Daughter took Shipping and sailed for Rome. It was truly a singular Instance of the Vicissitude of human Affairs to see that Queen, accompanied by Giovanni di Procida, and Roger de Loria, who had waited at Sea with his Gallies till she embarked, pass in sight of King Charles, to whom they had done so many remarkable Mischiefs. King James received his Mother and Sister with the utmost Respect, and told them, That by the Pope's Means he had promised to give his Sister in Marriage to Robert Duke of Calabria, who was expected the Day following. His Mother was satisfied, hoping, that the more they were tied by Affinity, it would be the more easy in time to conclude a Peace amongst them. Two Days after, King Charles with the Duke of Calabria and three other of his Sons arrived with so great Pomp, that it was a new and strange Sight in Rome; for besides a vast Number of Counts, and the King's Officers and Counsellors, it was a beautiful thing to see each of the Sons attended by an infinite Number of Gentlemen in excellent Order, and Pages and Armour-Bearers cloathed with most rich Devices; and the Pope, who was likewise of a princely Spirit, for his part would have the Marriage Ceremony performed in his Presence, and ordered his Nephews most nobly to regale both the Kings, and their Sons; but when the Feasting was over, he brought upon the Carpet the Expedition which they were to make against King Frederick for the recovering of Sicily; and the first and most important Points agreed upon were, that Roger de Loria should enter into King Charles's Service with the Title of Admiral of both Kingdoms; that King James should return to Catalonia, and King Charles to Naples for giving Orders to rig out their Fleets; but before Charles left Rome, to shew his Gratitude to the Pope, he gave in Marriage Giovanna dell' Aquila, Heiress of the County of Fondi, and of six Towns in Compagna di Roma, to Giordano Gaetano the Pope's Nephew by his Brother; and at the very same time died in Rome Giovanni di Procida, a Man famous over all the World both for his Courage and Conduct.

BUT to return to King Charles, he had no sooner arrived in Naples, than he granted most ample Privileges and great Honours to Roger de Loria, and not only restored him all his ancient Lands in Calabria, Basilicata, and Principato, but gave him many others; and also ordered all the Governors of Provinces, and other Officers to take their Orders from him concerning the fitting out of the Fleet.

ON the other hand King Frederick, who was appriz'd of what had pass'd, and was preparing against him, likewise made Preparation to ward off the impending Storm. He caused Roger de Loria to be summoned, and condemned him as a Rebel, and immediately deprived him of the Lands he had in Sicily. King James, after he had recalled all the Aragonese and Catalans that were in Sicily and Calabria, had fitted out a good Fleet, with Intention to join that of King Charles, not only to force his Brother to quit Sicily, but likewise to conquer the Kingdom of Sardinia, whereof he had received Investiture from Pope Boniface. He set sail from Barcelona, and arrived at Civitavecchia; and from thence he went to Rome, where he found the Pope, who received him with all Marks of Esteem and Gladness.

NO Pope had ever had so high and extravagant Notions of the Papacy as Boniface VIII. He was persuaded, that he was no less absolute Monarch of the Universe in Temporals, than in Spirituals. For the greater Proof of it, in the Year 1300 having published a Jubilee, which he ordered to be renewed every hundred Years.

Years, whereby having drawn a vast Concourse of People to Rome, in order to make the more shining Figure, he appeared at all the Ceremonies with the Triple Crown, and clothed with an Imperial Mantle, taking for his Device, Ecce duo gladii hic; whereby he believed he had Power to give and take Kingdoms at his Pleasure. He invested the King of Aragon with the Kingdom of Sardinia: He had promised King Frederick the Empire of Constantinople; and Roger de Loria by his Valour having acquired Gerba and Karkim, two Islands on the Coast of Africa belonging to the Kingdom of Tunis, and not to Sicily, Boniface, upon Roger's promising to pay him fifty Ounces of Gold, Sicilian Weight, yearly as a Quit-rent; gave him the Investiture of them for him and his Heirs, and ordered Fr. Bonifacio Calamendrano Great Master of the Knights of Jerusalem to receive the wonted Oath of Fidelity and Homage. We read the Investiture given to Roger of these Islands on the eleventh of August 1295, the first Year of his Pontificate, in Tutini^{*}, who copied it from the Archives of the Vatican. So now upon King James's Arrival in Rome, with great Solemnity he made him Standard-Bearer, and Captain-General over all the World against the Infidels, and delivered him the Standard.

KING James left Rome, accompanied by Cardinal Marmaldo Apostolick Legate, and in a short time arrived in Naples, where he found Robert Duke of Calabria his Brother-in-Law with thirty six Gallies, and a greater Number of Ships of War and Transports; and this Fleet being joined with that of Catalonia made up eighty large Gallies, and more than ninety other Ships; besides lesser Vessels, such as Tenders and small Barks. With this great Fleet on the twenty fourth of August 1298, the King, the Duke, Roger de Loria, and the Apostolick Legate set sail from Naples, and in different Places landed and invaded Sicily. At first the Expedition seemed to be successful, for Patti, Melazzo, Nucara, Monteforte, and Castello di S. Pietro, with many other Places of that Valley surrendered.

ON the other hand King Frederick, with Corrado Doria a Genoese, whom he had made Captain-General of his Sea-Forces, in all haste set about to fortify the Places of greatest Consequence, and to prevent the Enemy from getting Provisions; whereupon King James, seeing Affairs go but slowly on, and that the Season was already far advanced, did not think fit to venture so great a Fleet on that Coast exposed to the North-wind, but pass'd the Phare, and sailed for Syracusa, where there was a spacious Harbour; but arriving there about the end of October, he found that Giovanni di Chiamonte was in the City with a Garrison, who seemed not at all inclined to surrender; so that he began to lay waste the Country, and sent part of his Army to take Possession of the Towns in the Neighbourhood of Val di Noto: And some Priests who were in Syracusa, in order to make Court to the Apostolick Legate who was in the Camp, having laid a Plot to deliver up to Roger de Loria a Tower of the City, they managed it so foolishly that it was discovered, and Giovanni di Chiamonte brought the Traitors to condign Punishment.

IN the mean time this Siege going on heavily, King Frederick assembled all the Sicilian Cavalry, and with frequent IncurSIONs infested all those Places that had surrendered to King James, and sent Provisions to his Camp. The Citizens of Patti seeing that Syracusa held gallantly out, and that King James's Army sunk daily in its Reputation, declared for King Frederick, and laid Siege to the Castle of that City, whither the Garrison left by King James had retired. During the Siege of this Castle there happened several Skirmishes, in which King James's People being always worsted, it put him in the utmost Consternation; insomuch, that seeing the Winter at Hand, and his Army for the most part sick through the Fatigue of the Siege, and lest the Enemy should be so bold as to come and encamp over-against him, he raised the Siege of Syracusa, and set sail for Naples with much more Confusion than Honour; but with a Design to return as soon as possible, and to carry on a more vigorous War; when being overtaken by a most violent Storm near the Island of Lipari, which dispersed the greatest part of his Fleet, with great Difficulty he arrived at Naples with the rest. He had no sooner landed than he was seized with a great Infirmary both of Body and Mind, contracted no less through the Fatigues of War and the Storm at Sea, than the Grief occasioned by so unfortunate an Expedition, and his having been so long in Danger of his Life; at last being enlivened by Queen Blanch's bringing him a Son, who was afterwards his Successor in these Kingdoms, about the end of this Summer 1299, he took Shipping with her for Spain, and in a few Days arrived safely in the Harbour of Roseto: He spent all that Winter in making necessary Preparations for renewing the War with more Vigour in the beginning of the new Year, and to be able to invade the Island sooner than had been done the preceding Campaign. And indeed this Prince shewed himself to be a Man of a generous Spirit, being most eager in employing his utmost Force in order to perform what he had promised to the Pope, and King Charles his Father-in-Law. On the other hand King Charles tho' naturally a peaceable Man, and not of a warlike Disposition, yet pushed on by his Sons, bold and martial Youths, he with the like Application fitted out that part of the Fleet which came to his Share; and on the last Day of April 1300, King James arriving with his Fleet at Naples, on the twenty fourth of the following Month set sail for Sicily; and at the same time was followed by Robert Duke of Calabria, and Philip Prince of Taranto, King Charles's Sons; then by the unanimous Consent both of the Princes and of King James, Roger de Loria was made Admiral of both the Fleets.

C H A P. IV.

The War renewed in Sicily. The Death of Charles Martel King of Hungary; and Peace concluded with King Frederick.

THE last Year of this thirteenth Century was not less remarkable for the many Battels which happened in Sicily, than for the undaunted Courage of King Frederick, and the many glorious Actions of so many gallant Princes, and excellent Commanders, and especially of the famous Roger de Loria; which being so minutely and lively described by the celebrated *Costanzo*¹, that observing our usual Method, we shall content ourselves with only touching upon them lightly here, and refer those, who want to be more particularly informed, to that most grave Historian.

KING Frederick was no sooner delivered from this first Attack, than he reduced to his Obedience those Places of the Island that had surrendered to the Enemy; and being apprised of the vast Preparations that were making against him, caused immediately to be fitted out in all parts of the Kingdom as many Gallies as was possible, with a Design to go out and meet his Enemies, and with unparallel'd Bravery to venture all in one Engagement.

WE ought not to pass over in Silence a judicious Remark of the foresaid Writer², That it was truly very surprising (considering the Difficulty he saw in his own time, and which is still greater in ours, to fit out Fleets) how those poor Kings were able at that time in so short a Space to put to Sea so great a Number of Gallies, as were employed during the War of Sicily; some say, that King Frederick had fifty eight in good order; nay it seems to be even incredible, that in so short a breathing time as he had between the two Wars, he should be in a Condition to equip such a Number.

FREDERICK then hearing that the Enemy's Fleet was to be at Sea in a few Days, sailed out of Messina in order to fight it, trusting to the Courage and Resolution of the Sicilians, who no sooner had discovered it, than with a Huzza they were immediately for engaging. The King restrained them till the dawning of the next Day, when he in the Admiral Galley posting himself in the Center of the Fleet, they advanced with terrible Shouts towards the Enemy. Roger de Loria, seeing that the Rashness of the Sicilians had given Frederick hopes of Victory, posted in the Center of his Fleet the Admiral Gallies of Aragon and Naples, in which were the Duke of Calabria, and the Prince of Taranto, and advancing towards the Enemy began the Battel. They fought a long time with equal Courage and Boldness, but not with equal Skill; for Roger making as if he fled, drew the Enemies Gallies into a Place where he could easily hem them in; so that he broke the Fleet, and they were all either taken or sunk; and only Frederick, with twelve Gallies that follow'd him, made his Escape by Flight to Messina.

BY this notable Defeat, so much to Roger's Glory, the Sicilians were reduced to so lamentable a State, that every body then believ'd, that in a few Days Sicily must fall into the Hands of King Charles; but human Judgment is frequently liable to be deceived; for King James, thinking that he had so much depress'd and weaken'd the Power of the King his Brother, that King Charles's Army, under the Conduct of Roger de Loria, had nothing more to do, but in a few Days to take Possession of the Island, would proceed no further; being of opinion, that he had satisfied the World, the Pope, and King Charles, by having in two Wars been at so great Charges; in the first of which he had expos'd his own Person, and been seiz'd with Infirmities, and in this Battel had been wounded. After his Wound had been dress'd, the Duke of Calabria, the Prince of Taranto, and Roger coming to visit him, he spoke to them thus: That it having pleas'd God to make good his Promises by so notable a Victory, and there being nothing more wanting but the taking Possession of Sicily, it was now time for him to return to his own Kingdoms in Spain, in order so to dispose his Affairs, that his Subjects, who had been impoverish'd in supporting these Wars, might recover themselves, by having an end put to their Burdens; therefore he left them to enjoy the Fruit of the Victory. The Duke, who was a Youth of twenty three Years of Age, greedy of Glory, taking all the King said to be in good earnest, both commended and thanked him in the Name of the King his Father, and wish'd him a prosperous Voyage: and the King was no sooner gone, than he was overjoy'd, believing that the Honour of bringing the Expedition to its desired Issue would redound to him: But Roger was much more glad, thinking, that as he had had the Glory of the Victory, so he should likewise reap the Honour of its Consequences. Some have said, that King James withdrew rather out of brotherly Affection, than because he judg'd King Frederick's Affairs to be desperate.

NEVERTHELESS, Frederick with his twelve Gallies arriving at Messina, was encourag'd and intreated by those Citizens not to abandon them; and upon Advice that King James had separated, and was sail'd for Spain, being still more animated, he endeavour'd to assemble all the Foot and Horse he could; and with his whole Army posted himself at Castro Giovanni, a Place very strong by Nature, and from whence he could soon relieve any Place in Danger. On the other hand the Duke of Calabria took Chiaromonte, and after a stout Resistance Catania at last surrender'd. The News of the Surrender of this City was not only spread abroad, but that two thirds of the Island had declar'd for the Church and King Charles: whereupon Pope Boniface, who believ'd it, flattering himself, that without the shedding of Christian Blood he would be able to reduce the whole Island to the King's Obedience, immediately sent thither the Cardinal of S. Sabina as Apostolick Legate, in his Name to promise, that if the Sicilians would surrender, they should be kindly treated; and to threaten, that if they did not, they should be anathematiz'd and interdicted. But Roger de Loria, knowing the invincible Obstinacy of the Sicilians, which would yield to nothing but the Force of Arms, gave the Duke to understand, that in order to put an end to the War, other Assistance, than what the Legate had brought, was necessary; and that the Enemy was to be subdued by Force, and not by the tingling of a Mass-Bell, and Excommunications. Therefore new Supplies were demanded from Naples, and other twelve Gallies, with many Ships of Burden, were sent them by King Charles; and the Prince of Taranto, with six hundred Horse and a thousand Foot, came to an Engagement at Falconara, where he was taken Prisoner, and his Men were routed. After the taking of this Prince, Frederick carried on the War with more Vigour; and having discover'd a Conspiracy against his own Person, he immediately suppressed it, and punished the Guilty. The Duke of Calabria went and laid Siege to Messina; but it being reinforced by Frederick, and the Duke seeing his Army afflicted with Famine and Sickneſs, he rais'd the Siege. Then it was that by means of Violante Dutcheſs of Calabria, Frederick's Siſter, a Truce was ſet on foot, which was concluded for ſix Months; and during that time the Duke went to Naples to ſee his Father, and left the Dutcheſs Violante with a Son, of which ſhe had been delivered in Calabria, in order to make his Partizans believe, that he had not abandoned the Undertaking, but was to return with greater Force.

DURING this Truce a new Incident fell out, which by the means of Pope Boniface turn'd to King Charles's Advantage, it was this: Charles of Valois's firſt Wife, who was King Charles's Daughter, being dead, he had married a Daughter of Philip, the Son of the laſt Baldwin Emperor of Conſtantinople, and Heir of many Provinces in Greece, and of the Title and Right to the Empire, which had been poſſeſſed by Palæologus; and with the Aſſiſtance of the King of France his Brother, and the Pope, he had undertaken an Expedition upon Conſtantinople. And upon his March thither arriving at Florence, which was then in great Confuſion by reaſon of their wonted Faſtions, he was requeſted by the Citizens to reconcile their Differences; but inſtead of that he ſow'd more Diſſention than had been before, and went for Rome, where Pope Boniface perſuaded him, that his Deſign upon Conſtantinople would be the more eaſily compaſſed, if he aſſiſted King Charles in the Recovery of Sicily; for then Charles, by reaſon of the ſmall Diſtance between Puglia and Greece, would be in a Condition to afford him more ready Aſſiſtance and Relief than the King of France. Charles of Valois took his Advice, and marched immediately for Naples with his Men, where he joined his Gallies and Ships to thoſe that were fitting out there; upon which they embark'd a ſtrong Army, and with a proſperous Voyage, he and the Duke arriv'd in Sicily juſt as the Truce was expir'd. No doubt but, upon ſeeing ſo great a Number of Enemies in that Iſland, every body believ'd Frederick's Affairs to be deſperate; but that Prince, with his ſingular Preſence of Mind and Prudence, in which he excel'd all the Kings in his time, divided the few Troops he had into the Places of greateſt Conſequence, and thus waited till time ſhould diminiſh the Forces of his Enemies. And at laſt, Charles of Valois having ſpent many Days without reaping any conſiderable Advantage, King Frederick conceiv'd great hopes of being victorious without fighting.

THIS Year 1301, while theſe things paſſed in Sicily, the untimely Death of Charles Martel King of Hungary happened in Naples. This Prince the Year before, upon account of the new Jubilee publiſhed by Pope Boniface, had come to Rome to viſit St. Peter's Church, and afterwards to Naples, to pay his Reſpects to his Father; and perhaps, his Father being old, to ſecure his Succeſſion to the Kingdom of Naples; leſt, while he was at a diſtance, his Brothers ſhould poſſeſs themſelves of it: but it was his Fate to die firſt, not without Suſpicion, according to Carafa, that his Brother Robert, out of Ambition to reign after his Father, had cauſ'd him to be poiſoned. He died at the Age of thirty Years, univerſally lamented by the whole Kingdom, upon account of his Generoſity and Meekneſs; and many noble Neapolitans, and others of this Kingdom, who liv'd ſplendidly at his Court, were depriv'd of that Support. He left by Clementia his Wife, the Daughter of the Emperor Rodolphus, a Son named Carobertus, who ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of Hungary. He was buried in the Cathedral Church of Naples, near the Tomb of Charles I. his Grandfather, where his Monument is to be ſeen with his Arms, and thoſe of the Houſe of Auſtria, which are his Wife's; whence, in the Reign of Philip III. Count Olivares, the Viceroy, was induced to put in a more eminent place above the Gate of that Church, and in a more magnificent Form, thoſe two Monuments, together with that of the Queen his Wife.

BUT to return to the Affairs of Sicily: King Frederick perſiſting in his Reſolution, never appear'd in the Field, but was wholly intent upon guarding the fortified Places; becauſe he ſaw, that ſo great an Army, as that of the Enemy, muſt ſoon dwindle away, either for want of Pay, or Proviſions. Nevertheless, with his uſual good Conduct, and the Aſſiſtance of the Sicilian Cavalry, who ſtood him in good ſtead, he never failed to be preſent wherever there was an Opportunity of attacking the Enemy's Convoys that were carrying Proviſions. It was not long before the Neceſſaries of Life became very ſcarce in the Camp, and the Soldiers fell ſick in great numbers; whereupon Charles of Valois began to think of making Peace, becauſe if his Army ſhould be too much diminiſhed, he would not be in a Condition to purſue his Deſign upon Conſtantinople. Some ſay, that it was by the the Interposition of the Dutchess Violante, that a Peace was propos'd. Therefore Persons of Note were chosen on both Sides, with full Powers to negotiate it. King Frederick, and the Sicilians, upon account of the great Poverty of the Kingdom, were very desirous of it. Thus on the nineteenth of August 1302, a Peace was concluded to the Satisfaction of all Parties, and especially of Frederick, as being very honourable for him. But the Dutchess Violante, to the great Grief of her Husband and Brother, died before the signing of the Articles of Peace, which were as follow :

THAT King Frederick, during his Life, should be King of Sicily ; and afterwards it should return to King Charles, and his Heirs.

THAT he should not call himself King of Sicily, but of Trinacria.

THAT in the space of fifteen Days, all the Places possessed by King Charles in Sicily, should be restor'd to Frederick ; and on the other hand, in the same space of time, all the Cities, Towns, and Forts of which he was possessed in Calabria, should be deliver'd up.

THAT both Parties should set all Prisoners at liberty without Ransom.

THAT King Frederick should marry Leonora, King Charles's third Daughter.

THAT King Charles should get the Pope to ratify the Peace, and also to give King Frederick the Investiture of Sardinia, or of Cyprus, where hereafter the Children born of this Marriage should fix themselves. And upon King Frederick's getting Possession of either one or other of those Kingdoms, he should go thither to reign ; and immediately resign the Kingdom of Sicily to King Charles, who upon that Event was to pay him a hundred thousand Ounces of Gold as a Portion with his Daughter.

THUS ended the War of Sicily. The Prince of Taranto, and the other Barons that were Prisoners, were set at liberty ; and King Frederick went to the Camp to pay a Visit to Charles of Valois and the Duke of Calabria, and with great Affection they embraced each other, and jointly sent to King Charles to get the Peace ratified, and the Bride sent to Sicily. King Charles, who was naturally of a peaceable Disposition, being well advanced in Years, and very weary of the War, agreed to the Articles of Peace ; and after he had ratified them, he sent his Daughter with John Prince of the Morea, his eighth Son : and such Feasts were made in Sicily, as the Circumstances of the Times would allow, where joyful Hearts serv'd for Pomp and Magnificence : and Charles of Valois, with the Duke and Prince, and the other Barons, return'd to Naples ¹.

THIS Peace was look'd upon throughout all Europe to be very advantageous and honourable for King Frederick, and his Valour was extolled to the very Skies ; because, with the few Troops of a small Kingdom, he alone had been able to withstand and defend himself against so many powerful Enemies ; and tho' the Article, whereby he was to be King during Life, seem'd to be honourable for King Charles ; yet Men of Judgment consider'd, that after his Death, Possession must be got rather by the Force of Arms, than by vertue of that Article. On the other hand it was looked upon to be very dishonourable for Charles of Valois ; and Giovanni Villani writes, that he was bantered over all Italy, for having gone to Florence to make Peace, where he fomented new Quarrels ; and that he had gone to Sicily to make War, and left it by a dishonourable Peace.

CHARLES of Valois being returned to Naples, spent many Days in refitting his Fleet, and giving time likewise for preparing that of King Charles, who as a Friend was resolv'd to assist him, and to send along with him to Greece the Princes of Taranto and Morea his Sons. But it far'd with this as it usually does with all great Enterprizes ; a cruel War breaking out between Pope Boniface and the King of France, against whom the Pope stirr'd up the King of England to make War ; Charles of Valois was not only depriv'd of the Assistance of the Pope and the King of France, but also was obliged to return home to the Relief of that Kingdom ; and he never had an Opportunity afterwards to go upon that Expedition : But in process of time having two Daughters by his Wife, who was Grandchild to the Emperor Baldwin, he married the one to the Prince of Taranto, who by her Right took the Title of Emperor of Constantinople ; and many Years after the other was married to Charles Duke of Calabria, the Son of Robert.

ROGER DE LORIA, who thought that he had not been so much taken notice of in this Peace, as his great Services deserved, tho' King Charles had given him large Possessions in the Kingdom, in place of those which he had lost in Sicily, return'd to Catalonia loaded with Glory, where he afterwards died, with the Reputation of as great and successful a Sea-Commander as any of those celebrated by the Greek or Latin Historians.

BUT to return to the Peace; some others say, that the Apostolical Legate being present at the making of it, obliged King Frederick to promise a certain Acknowledgment to the Apostolick See; but whether that be true or false, it never took effect; for Pope Boniface, soon after his Imprisonment, died of Grief in Rome on the twelfth of October 1303; and Benedict XI. born in Trivigi, of the Order of Preaching Friars, was elected in his room; and on the eighth of June 1304 died, not without Suspicion of having been poison'd, and left the College in great Discord; for it was divided into three Factions, the Head of one was Francesco Gaetanus, Boniface's Nephew, whom his Uncle had made very powerful, both in Riches and Adherents; the Head of another was Napoliore Orsino; and of the third Cardinal di Prata; so that the See was vacant for thirteen Months; and at last on the fifth Day of July 1305, the Archbishop of Bordeaux, a Frenchman, was elected, who was then in France, and was call'd Clement V.

IT was this Pope, who, either by the Persuasion of the King of France, or out of Love to his native Country, instead of coming to be crown'd in Rome, translated the Apostolical See to Avignon, and sent for the Cardinals to come to that City; where, to the great Detriment of Italy, it continued for more than seventy Years, till Gregory XI. restor'd it to Rome: and in complaisance to that King, he was crown'd at Lyons, where Charles of Valois, and many other Ultramontan Princes were present. The Pope soon after sent three Cardinal Legates to Rome with Senatorial Power, in order to govern that City, and the Ecclesiastical State.

FROM this Year 1305 to 1309, in which he died, King Charles passed his time in great Tranquillity in the Kingdom of Naples, and applied himself to the beautifying the City of Naples, and to other Works of Peace, as shall be related. And it seem'd as if Fortune had a mind by another Way to retrieve the Reputation he had lost by the Peace made with King Frederick; for the Florentines, upon account of their intestine Broils, came and begg'd him to send the Duke of Calabria to Florence, to whom of themselves they offer'd the Government of their City; with which he comply'd, and the Florentines receiv'd him as their Lord. The Duke shortly after went to visit the Pope in Avignon; and after he had transacted some Affairs with him in favour of the Guelfs, he made a Progress over Provence, where those People made him very rich Presents; and at the same time he married a second Wife, who was Daughter to the King of Majorca of the House of Aragon, and Cousin German to the Dutchess Violante his first Wife: and with the Consent of Charles his Father, he gave his fourth Sister Mary in Marriage to the King of Majorca's eldest Son. While these Marriages were on foot in France, others were concluded in Naples; for Beatrice, King Charles's youngest Daughter was married to Azzo Marquis of Ferrara, and the Daughter of Charles of Valois to the Prince of Taranto; with which Lady the Title and Rights to the Empire of Constantinople were made over to the Prince of Taranto; for Valois having laid aside all thoughts of being able to pursue that Enterprize, he gave it up to the Prince, a warlike Man, who, with the Assistance his Father was able to give him, was capable of making some Conquest in that Country. *Tutini*¹ says, that these Rights came not to the Prince by Charles of Valois's Daughter his second Wife, but by the third, who was Katharin, the Daughter of Baldwin Count of Flanders, and Emperor of Constantinople; and he quotes a Charter of Investiture made by the Prince and Katharin, wherein they take the Title of Imperatores Constantinopolitani; and by which Charter they create Martinus Zacharias Lord of the Island of Scio King of Romania, and Asia Minor, and Lord of all the Counties, Baronies, and adjacent Islands, and grant him all royal and lordly Prerogatives: that he should drink out of a golden Cup, wear a Crown, Scepter, and red Buskins, with other royal Ensigns, as shall hereafter be related.

C H A P. V.

The City of Naples enlarged by Charles II. and render'd more magnificent by stately Edifices; the Splendor of his Royal Palace, and other famous and remarkable Works of Piety performed by him not only in this, but in other Cities of the Kingdom.

HIS Prince being more inclined to Peace than War, and he, as his Father had done before him, having fixed his Royal Seat in Naples, and consequently made it more populous, he resolved to enlarge it; and having caused many Gardens, which were about it, to be demolished, he ordered Buildings to be erected upon the same Ground; and enlarging the Circuit of the Walls of the City, he made the Gates to be remov'd farther off; so that those Places, that were formerly without the Walls, were now enclosed within them, whereby the City was much enlarged: And to invite more Inhabitants, he freed the City from all Duties payable to his Exchequer. At the Request of the Citizens he ordered the Tax, called del buon denaro, to be applied for repairing the Streets, and for other publick Uses, as may be seen in the Statutes of the Kingdom of the Year 1306¹. For the Encouragement of Commerce, and the Security of Ships, he caused the Mole to be built, which now is call'd the little Mole, because of the greater built by the Kings of the House of *Austria*². Some have likewise written, that he caused the Castle of S. Eramo to be built, which takes its Name from the little Church, which formerly stood upon that Hill dedicated to that Saint; tho' Colenuccio and others will have it, that it was built by his Son Robert. The two supreme Tribunals of the High Court, and of the Vicariate being established in this City, for the Convenience of the Judges and Parties, he caused a costly Palace to be erected near Castel Nuovo, in which these and all other Courts of Justice were to be held³; which Palace being afterwards converted into a Church in Honour of our Saviour's Crown by Queen Joan I. these Tribunals were remov'd to the Piazza of Nido, and held in the Hospital of Venice, as *Tutini*⁴ gathers from a Writ drawn up in the Year 1431, wherein we read these Words: In quo Hospitio M. C. Magistri Justitiarum Regni regebatur, & regitur ad presens. From thence they remov'd to the Street of S. George the Greater to a Palace adjoining to the Steeple of that Church, which to this day retains the Name of The Old Vicariate; till in the time of D. Peter of Toledo in the Year 1540, they were all remov'd to Castel Capuano, where 'tis the most surprizing Sight not only of Italy, but of all Europe, to behold such an infinite Number of Parties, Judges, and Advocates.

IN order to render this City yet more magnificent than his Father had done, he enlarged the Privileges of the University, and to add to its Lustre, he invited to it the most famous Professors of Italy, and gave them large Salaries. He brought from Bologna the famous Lawyer Dino de Muscellis, and gave him a yearly Salary of a hundred Ounces of Gold⁵. He likewise invited from Bologna Giacomo di Belviso, and gave him the same Salary which his Father had appointed, which was fifty Ounces of Gold yearly. In the Year 1302 by a large Salary he induced to come and teach the Canon Law M. Benevenuto di Milo a Canon of Benevento, and another famous Canonist of those Times, who was Biaso di Morcone's Master ¹. In the Year 1308 he also invited Filippo d'Isernia, a renowned Lawyer to read the Civil Law. And it being a Custom in those Days, which is still kept up in Spain, that the Professors from the Chair stepped to the Gown and the Mitre, the Canonist Milo was afterwards made Bishop of Caserta; and Filippo d'Isernia was called to the King's Council, and in the Reign of King Robert was made Attorney General. He likewise gave a Call to Filippo di Castrocelli to be Professor of Physick, and augmented the Salary from twelve, which his Father had made it, to thirty six Ounces of Gold yearly. Accorsino da Cremona, famous for his Knowledge in the Liberal Sciences, and other learned Professors were invited to teach Logick ². And in order to keep up that Lustre, which Frederick II. had given the University, he renewed the Prohibition made by that Prince, whereby Professors were forbid under the Penalty of fifty Ounces of Gold to teach in private, or in any other Place, except publicly in that University; and in the Royal Registers of this Prince's Reign we find many such Prohibitions ³. For it having been represented, that some Persons took upon them to teach the Canon Law in Solmona, at the Instance of the Neapolitan Professors he dispatched a rigorous Order forbidding it, as a thing that belonged to the University of Naples only ⁴.

HE not only adorned this City, but the Kingdom also, with stately Churches, and large Monasteries, some of which he rebuilt, and enlarged others. Besides his having brought to Perfection, and enlarged the Cathedral Church of Naples, and the Church of S. Lorenzo, to which he added a very large Convent of Friars Conventuals of the Order of S. Francis, Works begun by his Father, but not finished, he rebuilt from the Foundation the Church and Convent of S. Peter the Martyr belonging to the Dominicans. He also rebuilt another Church which he called Magdalena, though it retains the Name of S. Dominick from the Monks of that Order, and its being dedicated to that Saint. The Church of S. Augustin ⁵, and that of S. Martin upon Mount S. Eramo were likewise of his founding; though the most exact Writers make Charles Duke of Calabria his Grandchild the Founder of this last ⁶.

HE built the Church and Convent of the Dominican Friars in Aversa, and dedicated it to S. Lewis King of France his Uncle, and endowed them with rich Revenues. But the most flagrant Monuments both of the Piety and Magnificence of this Prince are those three famous Churches of the Kingdom, viz. that of S. Nicholas in Bari, the other of S. Mary in Lucera, and the third formerly founded by the Emperor Frederick II. in Altamura; in which it is to be observed, that the Roman Pontiffs were so prodigal, not only in granting to our Kings of the Family of Anjou, but likewise on their Account, to these Churches so many Privileges and Prerogatives, as if they had vied with one another: And as the Kings were profuse in bestowing temporal Riches upon these Churches, so the Popes were equally lavish in granting spiritual Pre-eminencies and Favours.

Of the Church of S. Nicholas of Bari.

THE Royal Church of S. Nicholas of Bari, as has been related in the preceding Books of this History, was founded in the Year 1087, when some Merchants of that City transported from Myra a City of Lycia to their native Country the sacred Relicks of that Saint. Pope Urban II. about the end of September 1089, accompanied with a great Number of Cardinals and Bishops, who had been present with him in the Council assembled in Melphis, solemnly consecrated the great Altar of the low Church, where the holy Relicks are deposited, which he himself clearly witnesseth in his Bull drawn up in Bari the ninth of October 1089, the second Year of his Pontificate, recorded by Baronius and Ughellus.

THIS Church, from its first Foundation, was built in the ancient Palace of the Catapani, where they kept their Residence while they governed Puglia in the Name of the Emperors of the East: Puglia being afterwards taken from the Greeks by the Normans, it came under the Dominion of Robert Guiscard, the first Duke of Puglia, and afterwards of Roger his Son, this Church, from its Foundation, was free and exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Ordinary; which the Exemption granted to it by Alessandro Count of Cupertano and Catanzaro by order of Roger King of Sicily sufficiently witnesseth, and which is recorded by the same Ughellus; as also the Bull of Paschal II. directed to Eustachio II. Abbot, who succeeded the first so much renowned Elias, obtained by the Intercession of Boemond Prince of Antioch, and Lord of Bari, Roger's Brother in the Year 1106¹, and the Bulls of Boniface VIII. in 1296², of Clement V. Paul III. Pius V. and other Popes³.

KING Charles II. being made Prisoner, and his Fleet destroyed, was, as we have said in the preceding Book, in great Danger of being beheaded; but having escaped Death, and being set at Liberty, mindful of so signal Benefits, which he believed he had received by the Intercession of this Saint, to whom he was a great Votary, he resolved to augment the Worship and Devotion which he paid him, by enriching his Church with most ample Revenues, in making many Donations to it, and reserving to himself the Power only of distributing them, as a Canon of this Church, where he sat in the Choir with the other Canons. By the Means of the Prior Guglielmo Longo of Bergamo, who was made Cardinal Deacon of S. Nicholas in carcere, in the Year 1294 this Prince obtained of Boniface VIII. ample Privileges, Exemptions, and Immunities in favour of this Church, for the Service of which he appointed a hundred Clergymen, including the Canons and other Dignitaries, besides the Prior, and declared it his Chapel Royal.

HE obtained of the same Boniface VIII. in the Year 1296 a Bull, whereby he was empowered to annex to this Royal Cathedral, such of the Churches and Chapels in his own Gift as he thought fit, which, as well as those to which they were annexed pleno jure, should belong to him; and the Abbey and Monastery of all Saints were annexed to it⁴.

IN the Year 1298 he assigned, as a perpetual Endowment of this Church, three hundred Ounces of Gold yearly, to be paid out of the Taxes and Customs of the City of Bari, to which Sum, three Years after, he added another hundred Ounces, eighty of which were given to the Prior, twenty to the Treasurer, and the remaining three hundred were divided amongst the Priests and Ministers of the Church; but because his Officers were often backward in payment, he gave to the Church in exchange for this Sum three Villages, which had devolved to him, viz. Rutigliano, S. Nicandro and Grumo, with which he invested the Treasurer for the time being, and his future Successors.

⁴ Bulla apud Beatil. histor. S. Nicol. lib. 2. cap. 17.

IN the Month of October of the same Year 1298, by vertue of the Power given him by Boniface he annexed the Archpriestship of Altamura with all its Churches, Chapels, Rights and Appurtenances to the Office of Treasurer, which he confirmed by another Grant dated the second of December 1301, whereby he likewise annexed the Churches of the Trinity of Lecce, and of S. Paul of Alessano to the Office of Chanter, and the Church of S. Mary of Casarano to that of Subchanter.

ON the eighteenth of January 1301 he appointed fourteen Officers to serve in this sacred Temple, whereof eight were to attend and guard the Doors of the Choir on festival Days with a Royal Silver Mace in their Hands, whence they took the Name of Mace-Bearers, and six for more inferior Offices, such as repairing the Fabrick, mending the Benches and Seats, and such like Things, called therefore Masters of the Fabrick, whom he exempted from Taxes, and the secular Courts in civil Cases, by putting them under the Jurisdiction of the Treasurer, with Power to appeal from the Decrees of his Court to that of the Chaplain Major; which Exemptions and Immunities were confirmed by King Robert in the Year 1340, and by King Ladislaus in 1403; and the other Kings his Successors after his Example enriched this Church with a Multitude of Grants and Prerogatives.

HAVING thus endowed this Royal Church, there was a new Form of Service introduced like that used in the Royal Chapel of Paris, and in reciting the Divine Offices, he would likewise have his Ministers to make use of the ancient Parisian Breviary, which Philip III. by his Letters dated the last Day of December 1603 ordered to be left off; and that for the time to come they should make use of the Roman Breviary, commonly called Pius V's.

BY a particular Writ dated the twentieth of June 1304 he appointed, that in this Church, besides the Prior, there should be three Dignitaries, viz. the Treasurer, whom he made the first and most honourable of the three, the Chanter and Subchanter, and a hundred beneficed Priests, forty two Canons, twenty eight middling Clergy, and thirty inferior, as they are called in the Writ, with many particular Regulations concerning the Prior and Treasurer.

AFTER King Charles II. had appointed the Dignitaries, the Number of Canons, and other inferior Clergy of this Church, assigned the Revenues, and ordered all that he thought was proper for the good Government and Regulation thereof; he reserved to himself and his Successors in the Kingdom the Dignity of Treasurer, with the Prebend annexed thereto; so that whenever he should happen to be in Bari, he was to sit in the Choir as Treasurer, in the Seat built over against that of the Prior; upon which the Royal Arms are carved, and in Letters of Gold is written, Sedes Regalis, with the Image of this most pious Prince in the Habit of Treasurer, with the Inscription below it; a lasting Monument of his having reserved to himself and Successors the first canonical Dignity, and that of Treasurer ¹.

KING Charles had learnt this from the French, and especially those of his own Family of Anjou; and accordingly in reciting the Offices, and in other things relating to the Worship of this Church, he would have them to be performed in the same manner as in the Church of France. We read in Eginard ² that Charles the Great took great Delight in singing with the rest in the Choir; and in the Chronicle of England we read the same of Fulk III. surnamed the Good Count of Anjou, who in the Year 960 was admitted a Canon of S. Martin's Church, and was frequently present at the canonical Hours in his canonical Habit ³. Inglerus Consul or Count of Anjou (for he promiscuously made use of both Titles) likewise after he had obtained to be Prebendary of the Church of S. Martin in Tours, he was declared Treasurer, that Office being then vacant, Defender of the Church, and Guardian of her Possessions; and while he lived he possessed the Treasurer's Seat, in which Dignity the Kings of France succeeded the Counts and Dukes of Anjou, and possessed that Lay Canonship ¹.

IN the preceding Books of this History it may be observed, that many French Customs have been introduced among us by our Kings, beginning from the Time of the Normans; and a great many were brought us by the Kings of the Family of Anjou; so that it is not to be wondered at, that some of them, quite different from those of all the rest of Italy, still continue among us. In France, as Coppin witnesseth ², the Treasurer of the Royal Chapel of Paris, besides his exercising Jurisdiction over the Canons thereof, has the keeping of the sacred Vessels, the Ornaments, and also all the Writs, Privileges, and Concessions relating to the Fiefs, and other Possessions given to that Church. The Treasurer of the Church of Bari has likewise the Charge and Keeping of all that; and as this City was long under the Government of the Greeks, many Greek Customs still prevail; for we see that the Offices of Chamberlain, and Master of the Records of this Church are lodged in the Treasurer; and as in the East there were two Chartophylaces, or Masters of the Records, one of which had the Charge of the Charters and Records of the Church, and had the Direction of the Archives; and the other had the Care of the Revenues of the Church, and kept account of the Expences ³; so in Bari the Treasurer of this Church has the Charge and Direction of all that. And as in some Places it was the Treasurer's Duty not only to keep the Records and Ornaments of the Church, but likewise the Royal Diadem ⁴; so some taking that Fable to be true, that our Kings were wont to be crowned in Bari with the Iron Crown, have written that the Treasurer of this Church, among the Ornaments of it, likewise kept that Crown ⁵.

TO this Prince therefore our Kings owe the many Prerogatives and Pre-eminencies acquired not only by Foundations and Endowments, but likewise by the Grants of Popes, of which they are at present in Possession, whereby they are looked upon as Heads and Governors of this Church, which is in the Royal Gift, they confer the Priory, and other Dignities of it, and appoint a Judge of Appeals, who is the Chaplain-Major, who revises the Processes of the Prior and Treasurer, and is altogether independent upon the Archbishop of Bari.

ACCORDING to the ancient Discipline of the Church, all Cathedrals, built within the Diocese of a Bishop, were subject to him ⁶. But from Charles the Great's time the Popes by their Grants and Exemptions began to alter the ancient Polity; and in order to induce Princes to enrich the Churches with temporal Estates, and to make them the more devoted and submissive to the Apostolick See, they granted them, and the Churches they founded, ample Privileges and Prerogatives, mutually communicating to one another what was in their Power. But in that the Princes came always off losers; for after they had enriched and founded the Churches, there frequently happened great Contests with the Ordinaries, and the Dispute was not about the Goods already given to the Church, but about the Privileges given to the Princes; the Popes, who assumed to themselves the Power of interpreting, moderating, and often of revoking those Privileges, always sided with the Ordinaries; and when that did not succeed, they drew the Controversy to Rome, and took Cognizance of it themselves; of which we need no better Proof, than the obstinate Dispute which happened upon that account between the Prior of this Church, and the Archbishop of Bari, which, notwithstanding the so many Privileges and Exemptions during the Course of no less than two hundred Years, has never been quite determined ⁷. In like manner the Dispute on the same Account was no less between the Archpriest of Altamura, and the Bishop of Gravina; and the same happened to other Churches in the Royal Gift. This ought to be a warning not only to Princes, but to private Persons, to leave to the Church and her Ministers what belongs to them, and not to intermeddle with such Affairs, nor trouble themselves about regulating Chapters, and Religious Societies, as if they had not Business enough of their own to employ themselves about; for Experience hath taught us, that though at first such things were undertaken by the Impulses of Devotion, yet they afterwards end in vain-glory, there being nothing in them spiritual, but worldly and carnal. And on the other hand, after they have enriched Churches and Chapels, the Priests and Monks will have the Management of the Revenues, demand an account of them, and will have such of their Tools and Underlings to take care of them, as they can lead by the Nose to do whatever their Ambition and Avarice prompt them to. Which is owing to that pernicious Custom, for an Age backwards hitherto too much practised in this City and Kingdom, of having so many Fraternities of Laicks and Tradesmen, who, instead of minding their Business, and doing Justice to their Neighbours, are altogether taken up with what they call Devotion in their Chapels and Fraternities, with Processions, bearing of Standards, Crosses, Censers and Torches, and obtaining Devices from Rome for their Habits, which many procure of a purple Colour, in order to appear the more gaudy at Solemnities; and they are so puffed up with the Title of Prior, Dean, or Coadjutor, that they believe they have fulfilled the Duty of good Christians. And the most surprising thing is, that after they have chanted their Prayers in their Congregations, heard the Father preach, and walked through the City with Crosses and Standards on Sunday; yet on Monday Morning when they open their Shops, they endeavour to cheat the first Customer, by imposing upon him in the Price of their Goods, or Handy-work.

WHENCE the Priests and Monks, looking upon them not to be altogether Laicks, if there happen to be any Dispute about Precedency, the keeping of the Vessels and Ornaments, the Administration, Accounts, or other such things, will have the Cognizance of these Causes, and bring them before the Ecclesiastical Courts, for which they have particular Congregations erected; whence they are still kept wrangling not only before the Ecclesiastical Tribunals, but also before the Delegate of the Royal Jurisdiction, and when they ought to be minding their Employments, they spend their time in attending those Trifles. Much good may such Exercises do them; for as if their was a Scarcity of Priests and Monks, they will be meddling with Functions no ways belonging to them, not considering, that after they have consumed both their Time and Substance, they are not bettered either with Respect to their Souls or Morals, but live in continual Distraction and everlasting Contention, which breeds Hatred and Animosity amongst them, and often ends in Disorder and Confusion.

Of the Church of S. Mary of Lucera.

AFTER King Charles had defeated Manfred, and routed the Saracens, who were in his Pay, the miserable Remains of these retired into Lucera in Puglia, and fortified themselves in that Castle; and although Manfred had entirely lost the Kingdom, yet when they surrendered, King Charles by Paction, allowed them to live there with their Families; but Charles his Son, a pious Prince, and most zealous for the Catholick Faith, knowing, that by the living of those Infidels in that City, the Divine Worship was vilified, the Cathedral Church almost ruined, and Religion reduced to a very bad State, resolved to drive them out altogether, and invite new Christian Inhabitants, both which he performed; and to the end that the City might be quickly peopled, he assigned much Land to the Christian Inhabitants which he shared out according to their Qualities and Conditions; and that the City thus purged might be reputed quite new, he would have it to be no more called by the ancient Name of Lucera, but of Santa Maria, after its own Cathedral Church. Because this Church was situated in a Place little frequented, and without the Wall of the City, and was like to tumble down; and had so small a Revenue, that the Bishop had not wherewithall to subsist, as the Pastoral Dignity required, and by Reason of the small Income it was likewise in want of Ministers: Charles II. built a new one much more magnificent within the City, and in the Year 1303 he ordered the Governor of the old Castle to give certain broken Metal, which was there for making a Bell ¹. He endowed it with large and rich Revenues, and at the same time he allotted to it a hundred Ounces of Gold yearly out of his Royal Revenues he received from that City, for the Maintenance of the Canons, which he increased to the Number of twenty, and bound them to Residence, to be present at the Divine Offices, as well in the Night as in the Day time, and to divide equally amongst them the Revenue, which he had assigned; so that each of them was to have five Ounces of Gold of yearly Income. He reserved to himself and Successors the Collation of the half of the Canonships, and the other half was to be in the Bishop's Gift; so that the first Vacancy was to be in the King's Gift, and the next in the Bishop's alternately. Moreover he instituted in the same Church the Dignities of Deacon, Archdeacon, Treasurer and Chanter, and allotted for them thirty Ounces of Gold yearly, which Dignities were to be in the Royal Gift ².

POPE Benedict XI. commended the King's Piety and Munificence; and by his Bull dated the twenty eighth of November the same Year 1303, approved and confirmed the Institution, granting to the King, his Heirs and Successors the Power of presenting to the Bishop the Persons, whom they had a mind to raise to the Deaconry, Archdeaconry, and Chantery, to whom the Bishop was to give Institution and Confirmation. He likewise granted them Power in the Pope's stead to confer the half of the Canonships abovementioned when they became vacant, with Power likewise to dispose of the other Dignities. Moreover, if it should happen that the King should please to create other Canonships, he might freely do it, upon Condition that when they became vacant half of them was to be filled up by the Bishop and his Successors. And lastly, out of special Favour, though by the Agreement made with Charles his Father, the Assent that was formerly necessary in the Election of Bishops was taken away: He granted, that when a Bishop of this City was to be elected, the Chapter ought first to ask the Assent of the King and his Successors, before they demanded Confirmation of the Bishop elect, without which Assent he could not be confirmed; as we read in the Bull transcribed by Chioccarelli, which Tommasino has also recorded ³. This we see likewise practised in the Reign of King Alphonfus I. which is plain from two Letters of that King, one written to the Bishop of Naples in the Year 1450, and the other to the Pope, recorded by Chioccarelli ⁴.

THIS Prince not thinking that he had done enough for this Church, the following Year 1304 he resolved to enrich it more, by giving to Stefano Bishop of this See, and his Successors the Lands of Apricena, Palazzuolo, and Guardiola lying in the Province of Capitanata, and he gave them in Fief-noble, being satisfied with the Oath of Fidelity only, without any other personal or real Service, excepting that the Bishop and his Successors were bound to give the King every Year a Silver Basin, with twenty five Pounds of Wax, viz. the first Year at the Feast of Christmas, and the second at Whit-Sunday; which Basin was usually returned to the Bishop, who was obliged to convert it into Vessels for the Divine Service of the said Church. Moreover he ordained, That in this Church there should be a Dean, Archdean, Treasurer, Chanter, and besides the Canons, eight Clerks; that the Dean should have fifteen Ounces of Gold yearly, the Archdean as much, the Treasurer twelve Ounces, the Chanter the same, and each of the eight Clerks four Ounces; and the Treasurer should have likewise four Ounces for the Lights. He ordered, That these Sums should be raised out of the Bailiwick and other Royal Duties and Revenues, which the King's Court possessed in the said City; and that the Dignities of Dean, Archdean, Treasurer and Chanter, as they became vacant, should be filled up by the King and his Successors; but that the one half of the Canonships should be in the King's Gift, and the other half in the Bishop's alternately as above; that the other Clergy should be appointed by the Bishop; that the Dean should give the King and his Successors for himself and Chapter twelve Pounds of Wax; and that the Persons enjoying these Dignities and Parsonages together with the Canons should elect the Bishop, and present the Elected to the King, and ask his Assent: Which Grant was confirmed by Charles himself the Year following, and in 1332 by Robert his Son ¹.

AS Charles II. had appointed in the Church of Bari, that in celebrating the Divine Offices, the French Rites should be observed, so he likewise would have the same to be practised in this Church of S. Mary of Lucera; whereupon on the twenty fifth of November 1307 he wrote to the Bishop and Chapter of that City; and told them, that being desirous of forwarding both the temporal and spiritual Concerns of this his Church founded by him; therefore he would have it to be governed according to the approved Rites of the Cathedral Churches of the Kingdom of France; for which end he prescribed and appointed some Rites which were observed in France concerning the Celebration of the Divine Offices, and other Ceremonies of the Church ².

OUR Kings still retain these Prerogatives over the Church of Lucera, excepting that since the time of Alphonfus (notwithstanding the Bull of Benedict XI.) the Assent required in the Election of the Bishop came to be controverted, which by dexterous Management, and sundry Contrivances is now quite lost; as on the other hand the Lands given by this Prince are taken from the Bishop; so that the Tribute of the Silver Basin and Wax is no more paid.

Of the Church of Altamura.

ALTHOUGH the Church of Altamura was founded by the Emperor Frederick II. and by his Grant dated in Melphis in the Year 1232, afterwards confirmed by a Bull of Innocent IV's dated in Lyons in 1248 was exempted from the Jurisdiction of all Ordinaries whatever. Nevertheless Charles II. took it under his Protection, when Sparano da Bari Protonotary of the Kingdom, under Pretence, that King Charles his Father had given him Altamura, endeavoured likewise to usurp the Property of this Church, which was of Royal Patronage; and he wrote very pressingly to his Son Charles Martel King of Hungary, to order the Protonotary not to meddle with any thing belonging to this Church, as being his Chapel Royal, and to bid him take care not to provoke him; and he commanded his Son, without shewing any Regard to the said Sparano, to put his Orders in execution¹. He took it yet more under his Protection, when the Bishop of Gravina endeavoured to subject it to his Jurisdiction. In the Year 1299 he commissioned the Bishop of Bitonto, and Lupo Judge of the same City to go to Altamura, and to examine the Bishop's Pretensions; and after having thoroughly canvassed the Matter, it was compounded thus: That the said Church was a Royal Chapel: That the Collation belonged to the King: That both the Chapels and Clergy thereof should be exempted: That the Jurisdictio spiritualis contentiosa should belong to the Archpriest: and That what concerned the Episcopal Order should belong to the Bishop's Jurisdiction, to whom the King gave likewise seven Ounces of Gold yearly for ever ².

THIS Church being declared a Royal Chapel, and exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Ordinary, King Charles's Successors took care to adorn it with other Prerogatives; in the Year 1485, at the Request of Pietro del Balzo then Prince of Altamura, Innocent VIII. by his Bull, from a Parochial raised it to be a Collegiate Church, with all the Badges and Dignities thereto belonging: Power was likewise given to create new Dignities in it, viz. an Archdean, Chanter, and Treasurer, with twenty four Canons, in the Gift of the Archpriest. To him was granted the Episcopal Rights and Privileges, such as to wear the Rochet, the Mitre, the Ring, and all the other Pontifical Badges; to give the solemn Blessing, with Power likewife of conferring the lesser Orders on those under his Jurisdiction and Authority, to punish all his Priests, and absolve his Parishioners in all Episcopal Cases. And seeing the Popes likewise assumed to themselves the Power of erecting Towns and Villages into Cities when they created Bishops in them, Innocent putting its Archpriest almost upon a Level with a Bishop, declared Altamura a City, and ordered, that for the time to come it should be so named, as we read in his Bull recorded by Chioccarelli ¹.

THE Church of Altamura and its Archpriest being raised to such Dignity, therefore our Princes boast of that singular and great Prerogative of creating the Archpriest without any other Provision from the Pope; for upon his obtaining the Royal Letters, he exerciseth Jurisdiction in his Diocese over all the Priests and Clergy of this Church, and its Vassals, and enjoys all the Episcopal Rights, and all the other Prerogatives abovementioned; and although our Kings have the Presentation of many Cathedral Churches, by naming both the Archbishops and Bishops; yet their bare Presentation and Nomination makes them not such, but the Pope's Provision is likewise necessary, which ordains and confirms them in their Sees, which is not required in the Case of the Archpriest of Altamura: Whence it is, that our Kings have never suffered this Collegiate Church to be made a Cathedral, nor its Archpriest to be made a Bishop.

BUT notwithstanding that the Grant of Frederick II. confirmed by Innocent IV. the Provision of Charles II. and the Bull of Innocent VIII. had so much favoured this Church, yet they were not sufficient to prevent the Disputes, which the Bishop of Gravina, favoured by Rome, brought again upon the Carpet about the Year 1605, for he pretended to visit the Archpriest and his Church, and had obtained Provisions for it from Rome; but being stopped from making use of them, he publickly excommunicated both the Chapter and Magistracy of Altamura, and affixed Schedules of Interdiction against the whole City, which contained no less than eighteen thousand Souls; and these Disputes were so strenuously maintained by the Bishop, favoured by Rome, that Persons of the greatest Credit, and the most able of the King's Ministers were employed in settling them, which, after they had lasted twenty two Years, were at last compounded; and it was declared and agreed, that in the Visitation the Bishop, as Delegate of the Apostolick See, could only examine and admonish, but not chastise or punish; and that the Clergy of Altamura should not be allowed to have a Judge of Appeals in partibus from the Decrees and Sentences of the Archpriest, but as the Custom had been, they were to appeal to the Court of the Chaplain Major. The Counsellor Gio. Baltista Migliore had a great Hand in this Affair, having been sent for that purpose to Rome by Cardinal Zappala then Viceroys; by whose Vigilance, after the City had been interdicted, and the Chapter and Magistracy thereof excommunicated for the Space of eighteen Years, an end was put to that Affair, which was looked upon to be of the greatest Importance. The Process of this Controversy, and the many Consultations and Allegations concerning it, together with the Brief of Pope Gregory XV. confirming the Agreement, are recorded by Chioccarelli in the sixth Tome of his M. S. Giurisdizionali.

OUR Princes have the Collation of many other Churches and Chapels; and in the Year 1300 Charles II. ordered a distinct and complete Inventory to be made of them; by whose Example the Kings his Successors, and particularly King Philip II. in order to preserve the Remembrance of them, did the same. Their having erected from the Foundation many Churches in the Kingdom, and endowed others with very ample Revenues made them deserve such a Prerogative; and as the Right, which the most serene Kings of Spain enjoy of presenting the Bishops to the Cathedral Churches, is grounded, according to Bishop Covarruvias ², only upon their having founded and endowed them; so our Kings, as may be observed in the preceding Books of this History, and in those that follow, likewise founded and endowed with great Revenues a vast Number of Churches; whence, either by the Concessions of Popes, or by Custom and immemorial Prescription ³, they obtained the Collation of those Churches, without having recourse either to the Bishop, or even to the Pope¹. Which ought not to seem strange, particularly with respect to Kings, who are not reckoned purely Laicks; since for many Ages that spiritual Ceremony has been practised among Christian Princes, that when they are crowned by the Bishop, he likewise anoints them with the sacred Oil; and by this holy Unc-tion their Persons become sacred, and capable of these and the like Dignities and Prerogatives².

WHENCE it comes, that besides the Right of Presentation, by vertue of the Royal Patronage, which our Kings have to many Churches in the Kingdom, even to some Cathedral Churches, of which we shall discourse in a more proper Place, they have the Collation of many Royal Churches and Chapels founded and endowed by them, such as in Naples the Church of S. Niccolo del Porto, of S. Chiara, S. Agnello, S. Angelo a Segno, S. Silvestro, SS. Cosma and Damiano, S. Severino, and many others. And in all the Provinces of the Kingdom, such as in Lecco the Chapel of the Trinity, the Chapel of S. Angelo in the Castle of that City, and others; in Abruzzo the Abbey of Santa Maria della Vittoria; in the Diocess of Sarno, the Abbey of S. Maria di Real Valle; in Salerno the Chapel of S. Pietro in Corte, of S. Catarina, and others; in Bari the Abbey of S. Lionardo; in Barletta the Church of *S. CHAP. VI.

Of the Royal Family; its Splendor and Magnificence; and of the Officers of the King's Household.

THE Royal Family of Naples never appeared in so great Splendor and Magnificence, as in the Reign of this Prince, either with respect to the Lustre of the numerous Royal Family, and the Grandeur of the Barons, or to the Number and splendid Appearance of the Officers of the Court; which not only contributed to raise the City of Naples, but the whole Kingdom, and made it famous above all the other Dominions of Europe.

THIS Prince saw his eldest Son Charles Martel King of Hungary, and he dying, his Son Carobert, his own Grandchild, settled King of that Kingdom, having defeated his Adversaries. He saw all his other Sons raised to the height of Grandeur; for Lewis his second Son, though in his Youth he was made a Friar Minor in the Convent of S. Lorenzo in Naples, he was afterwards made Bishop of Thoulouse, and on account of his holy Life was at last put in the Catalogue of the Saints Confessors by Pope Gregory XXII. Robert his third Son, who succeeded him in the Kingdom, was Duke of Calabria, Lieutenant of the Kingdom, and had the chief Command of his Armies. From this time it was thought that the Title of Duke of Ca- labria was more suitable to the next in Succession to the Crown, than that of Prince of Salerno; for Charles II. having many Sons, some of which he had adorned with the Title of Prince, such as Philip, who had been made Prince of Taranto, Tristan Prince of Salerno, and John Prince of Achaia; he judged it therefore more proper and graceful to give the Title of Duke of Calabria to the Heir of the Kingdom; an ancient Title taken by the first Normans, and which was not confined to a single City, but comprehended two large Provinces. From henceforth this Title was given to the eldest Sons of our Kings; and as in France the eldest Son has the Title of Dauphin, in Spain that of Prince of Asturia, so in the Royal Family of Naples the eldest Son was called Duke of Calabria; for this Reason it was that Robert gave this Title to his eldest Son Charles; and thus it was practised by all the Kings of the House of Aragon; and afterwards when this Kingdom was united to the Crown of Spain, the eldest Sons of the Kings of Spain were not only called Princes of Asturia, but Dukes of Calabria.

PHILIP the fourth Son was Prince of Taranto and Achaia, Lord of Romania, High-Admiral of the Kingdom, and by Right of his Wife had the Title of Emperor of Constantinople; and though he did not possess that Empire, yet he made a King, and a Lord in Romania, and Asia Minor. *Tutini*¹ found in the Archives of the Great Dominicans in Naples the original Letters Patent, which he has inserted in his Book of the Admirals of the Kingdom, wherein Philip, and Katharine his Wife, who take the Title of Emperors of Constantinople, create, and make Martinus Zacharias of Castro Lord of Chio, King and Lord of Romania, and of Asia Minor called Anatolia, granting him Investiture for himself, his Heirs and Successors, with all the Counties, Baronies and Cities thereof, with the adjacent Islands, viz. Plænotia, Marmora, Turnero, Mitileno, Chio, Siamo, Mitanea, Lango, and other Islands; besides, they gave him all Royal and Lordly Prerogatives, viz. to drink out of a golden Cup, to wear a Crown, Scepter, and red Buskins both within and without the Palace of Constantinople; these are the Words of the Patent: Infra vero Palatium ipsum, caligas Despotales, & alia insignia Regalia, & Despotalia deferre, ac portare possit, & valeat, secundum Regalem, & Despotalem usum, & consuetudinem Constantinopolitani Imperii; for according to the Oeconomy of the Imperial Household of Constantinople related by *Leunclavius*², the first Officer of the Palace was the Δεσπότης, or Lord. Philip would have the Kingdom to hold of him in Fief, and therefore he caused Homage to be paid, and the Oath of Fealty to be taken by Friar Jureforte a Constantinopolitan of the Order of Preaching Friars, King Martinus's Proxy and Ambassador for that purpose. The Patent was drawn up in Naples by Roberto Ponciaco Civilian, Counsellor and Domestick of the Emperor, and it bears this Date: Datum Neapoli per manus D. Roberti de Ponciaco J. C. Professoris, dilecti Consilarii, & familiaris nostri. A. D. 1305. die 24. Maii 8. Indiēt. Philip died in Naples in the Year 1332, and was buried there in the Church of the Dominicans of the Order of Preaching Friars, where his Tomb is to be seen at this Day.

Raimond Berlingier his fifth Son, for his great Justice and Prudence was made Deputy of the Vicariate, and he was Count of Andria, and Master of the Order of Monte S. Angelo, who died afterwards with the Character of a good Man. John his sixth Son died in holy Orders while he was a Youth. Tristan his seventh Son, so called, because he was born in a sorrowful time when his Father was Prisoner in Spain, was Prince of Salerno. John his eighth Son was Prince of Achaia, and Duke of Durazzo in Greece; Durazzo a City situate in Peloponesus now called the Morea, of which we have an exact Description in Thucydides; it was a Metropolis City, and its Metropolitan was subject to the Patriarch of Constantinople, and according to *Leunclavius*³, he had many Suffragan Bishops under him; John was afterwards Count of Gravina as Successor to his younger Brother. Peter the youngest Son was Count of Gravina, and was nothing inferior to the rest both in Virtue and military Valour.

THE female Progeny of this Prince was no less illustrious than numerous, being married to some of the most conspicuous Princes of Europe. Clementia was married to Charles Count of Valois, the King of France's Brother. Blanch to James King of Aragon; Leonora to Frederick King of Sicily; Mary to James King of Majorca; Beatrice the youngest to Azzo d'Este Marquis of Ferrara, and then to Beltramo del

Balzo Count of Montescaglioso and Andria, and lastly to Robert Dauphin of Vienne. His Royal Household was also graced with many great and illustrious Barons; such as the Orsini Counts of Nola; the Gaetani Counts of Fondi and Caserta; the Balzi Counts of Avellino and Andria; the Chiaramonti Counts of Chiaramonte; the Counts of Lecce, of Chieti, and many other renown'd Barons.

BY such a Number of illustrious Sons, King Charles had not only the Pleasure that attends the Father of virtuous and excellent Children, but he likewise gain'd the Hearts of the People of Naples. The Lustre which they reflected upon the King's Family, and the Magnificence of so many Courts, not only adorn'd the City, but brought great Advantage to the Citizens; for by their living in so sumptuous a manner both the Tradesmen reap'd great Profit; and those of higher Degree, who were employ'd in their Courts, were afterwards rais'd to higher and more considerable Offices in the King's Household, which at this time were so numerous, and so various, that they deserve to be particularly mention'd in this Place.

S E C T. I.

Of the Officers of the King's Household.

THERE is no occasion to confound the Officers of the King's Household with those of the Crown; of which we have spoken in the eleventh Book of this History. These last were not liable to be changed upon a Revolution, or on the Death of a King, as the others were; their Office not being limited to any Place or Province, but was in general extended over the whole Kingdom; and properly they were Servants of the State, not of the King's Person: On the contrary, the first were Servants of the Household, because they attended daily upon the King's Person; and therefore these of whom we are treating, are really the King's Officers, because they immediately serve and wait upon his Royal Person.

WE must likewise distinguish them from those, who are also the King's Officers, upon whom the King confers publick Offices, such as Judges and other Magistrates; for they are not Officers of the King's Household, nor are they his Domesticks; whence it is, that in the Civil Law ¹ the Domesticks of the Emperor were called Palatini.

FORMERLY all the Officers of the King's Household were subordinate to the Officers of the Crown, and each of them, according to his Office, was subordinate to him, who was in the same Rank of Dignity. Therefore the Officers of the Crown had Substitutes under them, who officiated in the King's Household, and commanded the lesser Officers, as in the ancient Empire under every great Officer there was another called Primicerius Officii, who had the Title of Spectabilis, at the same time the great Officers had that of Illustres.

SO likewise in France, which was imitated in Sicily, those of the first Rank were called Officers of the Crown, and the others Great Officers only, or Superintendants of the King's Household. But in the Empire of old, and in the Kingdom of France, both the Officers of the Crown, and those of the Household were called Comites, that is to say, Companions of the Prince, or rather his Courtiers; the Prince's Court in Latin being called Comitatus ². But seeing there were likewise Counts both in the Provinces and Cities, so call'd, because they were chosen out of the principal Courtiers: in order to distinguish them from those employ'd in the chief Offices of the Court, the first were call'd Comites Palatini. Whence, the better to express their Quality, to the Title of Comes, the Name of their Office was added, such as Comes Palatii, Comes Stabuli, Comes Sacrarum Largitionum; whence in France these Officers were call'd Count of the Palace, Count of the Stable, to denote the Courtiers, who had the Charge of the Palace, and of the King's Stables, or his Equerry; so that Comes signified the Head of an Office: And lastly, Comes Palatii by the Civil Law, and Cassiodorus is call'd Magister Palatii. Whence in France he was call'd Master of the King's Household; and with us the Officers of the Crown were formerly call'd Masters, such as Master Justice, Master Steward, and afterwards Great Justice, Great Steward, Great Admiral, &c. And the Title of Master was only given to the inferior Officers; such as Master Porter, Master Pantler, &c.

FORMERLY the great Officers of the King's Household were under some of the Officers of the Crown; but many since have been exempted from obeying any but the King: yet with us many have acknowledged the Great Steward for their Head, who is the same with the Great Master of the King's Household in France, as we shall see in enumerating these Officers.

THE Great Steward, as we have observed in the eleventh Book of this History, was great Master of the King's Household, and at the same time was number'd among the Officers of the Crown; because tho' his Office regarded the Government of the King's Household, as that of the Great Constable the Direction of War; that of the Lord Chief Justice the overseeing of Justice; and that of the Great Chamberlain the Inspection of the Finances; nevertheless, his Authority was not confined to any Place or Province, but extended over the whole Kingdom; neither was it alterable upon any Change of a King: and therefore he was said to serve the State and the Publick, and not the King's Person only.

UNDER the ancient Empire he was call'd Magister Officiorum, and therefore had under him in the King's Household many great, as well as inferior Officers. At last the great were exempted from obeying any other but the King; whence came other Officers, who cannot be said to be of the Crown, but still great Officers; of which hereafter.

CAMILLO TUTINI^{*} made a Catalogue of the Names of these Officers of the royal Household of Naples, and promised a Treatise upon it, but it has never been published: He collected the Names from the Statutes of the Kingdom, and the Archives of the Mint, which contains the Deeds and publick Acts of the Kings of the Family of Anjou, during whose Reigns, and particularly in that of King Charles II. there was a prodigious Number of such Officers about the Royal Family of Naples. And as this Prince did every thing in Imitation of France, so after the Example of that Kingdom, he introduced many of these Officers: And he not only imitated France in his Household, but likewise, as we have seen, in the Churches he founded and endow'd.

TUTINI has not been so exact in that Catalogue, as might have been expected from him; for in it he does not distinguish the Officers of the Crown, and those subordinate to them, from the Officers of the King's Household, and those under them. Having found the Officers of the Royal Household of Naples to be exactly the same with those of the Household of France, we shall follow the same Order, that those who have treated of the Offices of that most august House, have observ'd.

SECT II.

Of the Great Officers.

THE Officers of the King's Household were divided into Greater and Lesser Officers. The Greater, who were under the Great Steward, were, The chief Master of the Household, or Palace, whom Tutini calls Master of the King's Lodgings, and others, Steward of the Royal Lodgings: The chief Master of the Pantry, with which Office we find in the Registers^{*} of King Robert, that that King honour'd Giacomo Ulcano: The chief Cup-Bearer; and the chief Carver, or the King's Sewer.

UNDER the Great Chamberlain were, The first Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, whom Tutini calls the Major-domo of the King's Household: The Master of the Wardrobe: The Master of the Ceremonies: The Master-Porter: The Introducer of Ambassadors, and the Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber in ordinary. In France these Officers obey none but the King, from whose Hands they take the Oath, and they pay respect to the Great Chamberlain out of Complaisance only.

SOME, according to *Loyseau*¹, likewise put the First Physician of the King's Household, and his Library-Keeper under the Great Chamberlain; others don't allow them the Rank of Great Officers, only because they are, as the French say, of the Long Robe: but these last are widely mistaken; for the Physicians of the Emperor's Palace under the ancient Empire were as much Officers of the Court as any of the rest, or the Counts Palatins. In Constantinople, after they had taught for twenty Years in that University with a publick Salary, they were admitted into the Palace, and were enrolled into the first Class of Courtiers; not as Professors, but because they were Physicians of the Emperor's Palace; and they were also reckon'd to be intra Palatium Militare, as the Emperors Honorius and Theodosius describe them². Therefore they were called Physicians of the Sacred and Imperial Palace, and not of the Emperor. When the Prince chose one of them to take care of his own Person, that one was advanced in Dignity, and was call'd the Prince's first Physician, Judge and Chief of all the other Physicians; and this was not introduced by any of the Emperors, but by our Theodorick the Ostrogoth King of Italy, as we read in *Cassiodorus*³, who represents that Prince speaking thus: Huic peritiæ deesse Judicem, nonne humanarum rerum probatur oblitio? Et cum lascivie voluptates recipiant Tribunum, hoc non meretur habere primarium! Habcant itaque Præsulem, quibus nostram committimus sospitatem. Sciant se huic reddere rationem, qui curandam suscipiunt humanam salutem.

THE very same Custom was practis'd in Persia, where the first Physician of that King was both Head and Judge of all the other Physicians, and without whose Approbation none could practice Physick in that Kingdom; and by the Persians he was call'd *Hakim Pasci*⁴; as by the Testimony of Alpinus, in the City of Cairo, the chief Physician, who has the same Power, is likewise call'd Hakim Pasci. Hakim in the Arabick Language signifies Wise, or Doctor; whence the Spaniards in a degree of Excellency call a Physician Doctor, as the French call a Midwife, whom they reckon among the Number of Physicians, Sage-femme.

WITH us the chief Physician was call'd Protomedico; and in the Reigns of the Kings of the Families of Anjou and Aragon we find frequent mention of him under that Name; and in the famous Act of Indemnity of Queen Joan I. recorded by *Summonte*⁵ we find, that Carlo Scondito was then first Physician; and in the Reign of the Family of Aragon, Pannuccio Scannapeto, Sylvestro Galeota, and others were successively first Physicians: of whom Toppi in his Bibliotheca has made a Catalogue. Theodorick granted him great Authority and Prerogatives; that all those who practis'd Physick were to give an Account to him of their Skill in their Employment; that in case of Disagreement amongst the Physicians about the Cure of the Sick, he was to determine it; and they were to stand to his Decision: And lastly, that he was to be the Prince's Physician⁶.

WE had also a Proto-chirurgus, but that Office was suppress'd, and annexed to that of first Physician, who is made by the King, or his Lieutenant, and ought to be a native of the Kingdom; and not only the Surgeons, but the Midwives are under his Cognizance, as also the Apothecaries, whom he appoints and licenses, and whose Shops he visits; and he has the same Authority that Frederick II. by two Constitutions gave to his Officers and Physicians, to take care that the Syrups, Electuaries, and other Medicines, be rightly prepar'd, and to regulate the Prices of them⁷; and therefore he is Head of the College of Apothecaries, call'd The College of Eight. He has a Tribunal, and with his Assessor takes Cognizance of Complaints against the Midwives, Apothecaries, &c. and against those who

THE Great Master of the Horse (an Office likewise in the Empire of the East known by the Name of Scuterius) had under him the first Gentleman of the Querry.

THE Great Huntsman, whom the Greeks reckon'd likewise an Officer of the Palace of Constantinople, and was called Primus Venator, whom we now call Montiere Maggiore, had under him the Great Falconer; the Master of the Waters and Forests, of whom there is frequent mention made in the Statutes of the Kingdom ²; and the four under Huntsmen.

WE cannot expect to find such Officers in the ancient Empire; for the Romans, as they delighted in Agriculture and pastoral Affairs, so they despised hunting; whence Salust ³ reckons Hunting among the servile Exercises; and Tiberius branded with Infamy a Captain of a Legion, because he had sent some of his Soldiers a hunting ⁴. Our Scipione Ammirato ⁵ has examined into the Reasons of this, among which these are of some Weight: In order to take the Pleasure of Hunting, the Romans would have been obliged to go a whole Day's Journey from Rome, because that City for many Miles was surrounded with Villages, Gardens, and other Places of Pleasure; and because they had so many Games, and publick Shews, such as Gladiators, and many other military Exercises, at home, they had no occasion to have recourse to Hunting. On the contrary, the foreign Princes, whom they call'd Barbarians; such as the Kings of Macedon, Persia, Parthia, and many others, valued themselves upon being exquisite Hunters; but above all the German and Northern Princes, who in the Decay of the Empire conquered Europe, took great Delight in it; whence it came, that our Princes despised Agriculture and pastoral Exercises, and were so much taken with that of Hunting. These People, as the Abbot de Fleury ⁶ has wisely observed, lived in Countries covered with Woods, where there was neither Corn, nor Wine, nor good Fruit; so that they were forced to live upon the Game they could catch, as the Savages of the cold Countries of Armenia continue to do. After they had passed the Rhine, and been settled in a better Climate, they were willing to reap the Benefit of Agriculture, Arts, and Commerce, but they could not apply themselves to them. They left these Professions to the Romans, whom they had subdued, and follow'd their own Customs; and as they neglected Agriculture, so they extolled Hunting, which was in no Esteem among the Ancients. They made it a great Art, and brought it to the utmost Perfection; insomuch that the Nobility employed most of their time in Hunting.

IT was likewise look'd upon to be a fit Exercise for those who professed Arms, because it inured Men to rise early, to suffer Cold and Heat, to Fasting, Travelling, and Coursing, and to endure all the Hardships incident to War; and therefore they would bear them the better in the Army. The Princes themselves were persuaded, that Hunting was a most beneficial Exercise to them, as well for accustoming their Bodies to Hardship and Fatigue, as for learning the Situation of Mountains, Defiles, Passes, and Plains, the Course of Rivers, and where marshy Grounds lay; which was a double Advantage to a Prince, because thereby he not only knew the Situation of his own Country, which made him know the better how to defend it; but he likewise might have a Notion of the Situation of other Countries, all bearing some Resemblance one to another; which Knowledge could not fail to turn to Account in many respects, especially in leading Armies, in chusing proper Grounds for Camps, and taking Advantage of an Enemy.

HOW much our Princes, whether Goths, Longobards, Normans or Suevi, applied themselves to Hunting, may be observ'd in the preceding Books of the History; and especially the Emperor Frederick II. and Manfred his Son, who wrote particular Books upon Hunting. The Kings of the Family of Anjou follow'd their Example; for having fixed their Royal Seat in Naples, and that City in these times not being surrounded with so many Villages and Gardens, nor its Plains so well cultivated, as at present, but the Province of Terra di Lavoro being full of large Forests and Woods, their ordinary Exercise was Hunting; whence many Officers of the Royal Household were appointed for attending the King at that Sport, who had their Head, call'd the Great Forester, who had under him many Master-Foresters, and these had many Huntsmen subordinate to them *.

THE Authority and Jurisdiction of this Officer, with us call'd Montiere Maggiore, in the Reign of the Family of Anjou, were not so extensive as they were made afterwards in the Reign of the Spanish Kings; for in those times the Jurisdiction of the Great Master of the Forests was extended over the King's patrimonial Forests only. But Hunting being afterwards established as the Prince's Royalty, his Authority became boundless; insomuch that he granted Licences to Sportsmen to carry Arms, and to hunt over all the Kingdom, (although the Barons by their Investiture were invested with their Forests, and a Right to hunt) and he has his own Judge, and particular Tribunal *.

Of the Inferior Officers.

THE Inferior or lesser Officers were so call'd, not that they were little in themselves, but in comparison of the Greater Officers abovemention'd. In the ancient Empire they were call'd Militie, or Posts and Offices upon the same footing, because there were many of each sort, whereas the Great Officers are in a manner all singular in their kind. We find these Militie frequently mention'd in Justinian's Code and Novelle *; and Cujacus *, and Vinnius have treated of them most accurately, and have rejected the Opinion of Laelius Taurellus concerning the Militie ex casu.

THEY were of two sorts, the one given to Gentlemen, and the other to Plebeians.

THOSE given to Gentlemen are the Places of Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber; the Gentlemen of the Game; and as for the Pages (by Tutini call'd Valets) they receiv'd no Salary, but got the King's Livery only. The Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber, who in the ancient Empire were call'd Decuriones Cubiculariorum, commanded the other inferior Officers, and there was a great number of them. The Gentlemen of the Game were those who attended the King at Sport, and were different from the Royal Huntsmen, who were Plebeians, and had the Charge and Direction of the Sport. The Gentlemen of the Falconry, who had the Charge of that Sport, were different from the Falconers of the Royal Household, who had the appointing of the Sport. As we have said, we need not look for these Officers in the ancient Empire, because the Emperors were not so much in Love with Hunting, as our Kings were.

THE Royal Chamberlains, who undressed the King, and put him in Bed, and were of his Privy Chamber; the Archers of the King's Guards; the Grooms who attended the King's Person; the Grooms of the Stable, by the Civil Law call'd Stratores, and in France Marechaux, Farriers, a German Word, which signifies an Officer belonging to the Horse, whom Tutini calls the King's Master Farrier; whence we call those Mariscalchi, who cure and shoe Horses, who are different from the Marescialli degli alloggiamenti, Quarter-Masters.

THE Quarter-Masters, who in time of War had the Charge of lodging the Soldiers, follow'd the Great Constable; and the Officers who succeeded to their Office were call'd Grooms, and also Grooms of the Stable, to distinguish them from the Grooms who attended the King's Person.

THERE were likewise Masters of the King's Pensioners, whose Business it was to keep an account of those in his Majesty's Pay, and of whom there are yet some Footsteps remaining ; for in the Church of S. Nicholas in Piozzo bianco we read an Inscription, which shews the Founder of that Church to have been Errico Barat, a Domestick of King Charles I. ac Stipendiariorum Regiorum Magistrum ¹ : Whose Office, and that of Quarter-Master of the Army, in the Reigns of the Aragon and Spanish Kings were transferred to the Royal Secretary of Accounts, of whom we shall treat in the Reigns of those Princes.

THERE was also the Master of the King's Studs, whom we now call Cavallerizzo Maggiore, the first Gentleman of the Querry ; which Officer, during the Spanish Government, as shall be related, raised his Jurisdiction to a great Pitch, and had his own Auditor, and particular Tribunal.

THE Dependents upon the King's Secretaries were very numerous. Those who in the Empire were in the Militia of the Tribunes of the Notaries, and as Cassiodorus witnesseth, were likewise called Candidati ², in the Kingdom of Sicily acknowledged the Great Protonotary for their Head ; who was one of the seven Officers of the Crown, as we have said in the eleventh Book of this History. He was the Head of the Notaries, and in the ancient Empire called Primicerius Notariorum ; he was of the Proconsular Dignity, and after he had exercised his Office two Years he became illustris. In the ancient Empire there were likewise three Sorts or Degrees of Notaries, which are clearly distinguished in the Theodosian Code ³. The first had the Title of Tribuni Prætoriani, & Notarii, and were of the Dignity of Comites. The second were only called Tribuni, & Notarii, and they were of the same Dignity with the Vicarii ; and the third were called Notarii familiares, or domestici, and were of the same Rank and Dignity with the Presidents of Provinces. We need not confound these with those we now call Notaries, who were quite different, and were called Tabelliones, or Tabularii, as we observed in the foresaid Book.

IN France, according to the Writers of that Kingdom, there are likewise three Sorts of King's Notaries, also Secretaries after the Example of Vopiscus, who calls the Notaries of the ancient Empire, Notarios Secretorum, and by the Civil Law are intitled A Secretis ⁴. Therefore they are differently called, Secretaries of State ; Secretaries of the King, and Secretaries of the King's Household. The Secretaries of the Cabinet are intrusted with the Dispatches, Cubicularii qui emittebant Symbola, sive Commonitoria, as they are named in Justinian's Novellæ ⁵. In France the Secretaries of the King, of the Household, and of the Crown for dispatching all the Letters Patents of the Chancellery were sixty in Number. And seeing all Grants and Privileges pass through their Hands, it was but reasonable in them to obtain from the King so many in their own Favour.

IN the Reign of the Family of Anjou there were likewise many of these Secretaries and Notaries of the King in the Royal Household of Naples. There were the Notaries of the King's Household, and at this time Niccolo d'Alife was Charles II.'s Notary, and was a famous Lawyer of that Age : There were the Masters and Inspectors of the Subscriptions of the Letters of the Royal Exchequer. The Notaries of the Royal Treasury ; the Sealer of the King's Letters ; the Writer of the King's Patents ; and other inferior Officers in the Secretary Office.

AMONG these Officers we ought likewise to reckon the Master of the Royal Armoury ; the Master Groom of the Stables ; the Master of Arrests ; the Overseer of the Officers of the Royal Hospital ; the Master of the Wardrobe ; the Master of the Royal Chamber of Accounts (amongst which, in this King's time, were Andrea d'Isernia, and the said Niccolo d'Alife) and other such like Officers, of whom there is frequent mention made in the Statutes of Charles I. and II. ⁶.

IN the last Place follow the lesser Offices left to the Ignoble, which are those for dressing the Victuals of the King, the Princes, and their Domesticks, which in France are called the Seven Offices ; not from the Employments, but from the Kitchens where they are exercised, and they are called Offices of the Households of the King and Princes. In the two Kitchens, the Heads are called Grooms of the Kitchen, and their Assistants Master Cooks.

⁶ Capit. Regni sub rubr. de Offic. Magistrorum Massariorum, cum tribus seq.

SO likewise with us, those that dressed the Victuals of our Kings and Princes were called Overseers of the Royal Kitchen, and the King's Master Cooks; whence it is said that those three Frenchmen, John Dottum, William Burgund, and John Lyons, who founded the Church and Hospital of S. Eligio, were three Cooks to King Charles I.

THERE were also the Overseers of the King's Pantry, Scullery, Fruiterie, and Butchery; these had many Assistants under them; the Groom of the Bason, and many other such under Officers.

IN this Class ought to be placed the Royal Standard-Bearers; the Porters of the King's Bed-chamber; the King's Huntsmen; the King's Falconers, that is to say, those who have the Management and Direction of the Sport and Flight; the King's Bird-keeper; the forty Soldiers of the Royal Hospital, and other such inferior Officers.

Camillo Tutini in the Catalogue of these inferior Officers reckons some, who belong not in the least to the Royal Household, or the Great Officers of the Palace, but depend solely upon the Officers of the Crown; such as the Marshals of the Kingdom, the Constables of Provinces, and the Castellans, who were subordinate to the Great Constable. The Master of the Royal-Port, and the Port-reeves, or Vice-Admirals, who are under the Great Admiral. The Royal Treasurer, and the Secretaries of Provinces, who are subordinate to the Great Chamberlain; and the Justices of Provinces, and of the Students, who acknowledge for their Head and Superior the Lord Chief Justice.

WITH so many and so honourable Posts was the Royal Household of Naples adorned in the Reign of Charles II. who with an impartial Hand distributed these Offices for the most part amongst the Neapolitans and Natives, as we read in the Royal Archives; for he had as great a Value for the Subjects of this Kingdom, as for those of his other paternal and maternal Dominions; and if sometimes we find that he likewise gave the Subjects of those Dominions Posts in this Kingdom, we also find, that he provided for our Natives and Neapolitans in the same manner in Provence, Forcalquier, and Piedmont, as we read in the said Archives; and the Arms of the Neapolitans who have governed in those Places are still to be seen there. And although in every thing he imitated the Kingdom of France, and was much inclined to gratify those of his own Nation, yet in Affairs of State he did not regard Nations, but followed the Advice of the most knowing and prudent Men.

BUT as soon as Naples lost the Honour of being the Royal Place of Residence, all these Officers in a manner vanished, and but very few remained; for in the Reign of Ferdinand the Catholick, and much more in that of the House of Austria, a new Polity being introduced, from which sprung new Offices; and as those above-mentioned were introduced by the French Kings in Imitation of those of France; so the Spanish Kings were pleased to introduce new Officers in Imitation of those of Spain; of which in their Reigns we shall give a particular and distinct Account.

S E C T. IV.

Of the Master of the King's Chapel, whom we now call Chaplain-Major.

THE Master of the King's Chapel must not be numbered amongst the Officers of the King's Household; for though he may be reckoned among them, as having the Inspection of the King's Oratory, which is within the Palace, yet as he had the Direction of Ecclesiastick and Sacerdotal Affairs, he was distinct from those, who had the Direction of the Affairs of the Government, and of the King's Household. In order to establish the Royal Household of France upon a more splendid and magnificent Footing, it was thought prudent to introduce into it all the three States of the Kingdom, and that not only that of the Nobility, and the third State should share in it, but likewise the Ecclesiastical, which in that Kingdom is a separate State, which is quite different from what is practised with us, where the Ecclesiasticks clerical are mixed with the two States of the Nobility and People. From the Nobility they took, as we have seen, the Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber; of the Hunting, of the Falconry, and others, with which they filled up the Places of the King's Household. From the third State they took the Registers, Secretaries, Clerks, and all those to whom the inferior Offices were left. So likewise of the Ecclesiastical State they took the Great Almoner, the Master of the Chapel, or Oratory, and the King's Confessor in Ordinary; and in the time of the Kings of the first Race, the Authority of the King's Chaplain, also called Archicapellanus, was so great in the Royal Household, that he and the Mayor of the Palace divided the Government of the Kingdom between them; this Office being suppressed during the second Race, and the King's Household under another Form of Government, the Authority of the Archchaplain was very much diminished, and the Great Almoner stepped over his Head, and had under him both the Master of the Oratory, and the King's Confessor¹.

IN the Kingdom of Sicily, the Normans having fixed their Royal Seat in Palermo, the King's Chaplain, like that ancient one of France, had extended his Jurisdiction over all that Kingdom, not excepting the Almoner, nor the King's Confessor. Amongst the Letters of Peter de Blois, we read one directed *Ad Capellandum Regis Siciliae*², wherein he puts him in mind, that by his Office he ought to admonish the King not to give the Bishoprick of Agrigento to an unworthy Person.

SINCE Christian Princes thought fit to have their own Oratories within their Palaces, of course there started up the chief Priest of the Court Clergy; and wherever they fixed their Royal Seat, there he was to reside; whence it is, that with us we find no Record of a Royal Chaplain, till the Kings of the Family of Anjou fixed their Residence in Naples, and began to have a Royal Chapel. Formerly the Norman and Suevian Kings had their Royal Seats fixed in Palermo in Sicily; whence it is, that the Royal Chaplainship of Sicily is more ancient than that of Naples.

BEFORE the Kings of the Family of Anjou fixed their Royal Seat in Naples, there was no such Office among us as the Master of the King's Chapel; and from that time to the Reign of Ladislaus he was called Magister Regie Cappelle, or Magister Sacrae Cappelle, and often *Protocappellanus*³, as being the Head of all the King's inferior Chaplains, as with the Greeks the chief Priest of the Court Clergy was called Protopapa of the Palace; of whom we find frequent mention in Codinus, Zonara, Cedrenus, and in the Notitiae Imperii; to him was committed the principal Care of performing Functions and Solemnities in the Chapel of the Imperial Palace, where he had the Inspection of the spiritual Offices; of whom Tommasino has likewise treated in his Book upon Benefices⁴. In like manner the Master of the Royal Chapel of Naples had the chief Care of the King's Oratory, and had the Inspection of all the Clergy of the Royal Palace; and in the time of Charles II. we read that Pietro was his Royal Chaplain, who was present at the Absolution from the Oath, which Pope Boniface VIII. gave to Leonora Charles II.'s third Daughter, for dissolving the Marriage she had contracted with Philip Lord of Tusciaco, and Admiral in the Reign of *Charles I.*⁵; and in the time of King Robert we read, that Landulfo di Regina, a Doctor and Canon of *Naples*⁶ was his Chaplain. And from this Reign, not from that of Alphonfus I. as, contrary to Freccia's Opinion, we observed in the eleventh Book of this History, the High Chancellor was excluded from exercising Jurisdiction over the Clergy of the Royal Palace; and all was lodged in the Person of the Chaplain Major, as chief Priest of the Court Clergy.

HIS Authority grew much greater in the Reign of Charles II. for it had been an ancient Custom, that Princes should have their Royal Chapels, not only in the Metropolis where they resided, but in any other City where they used to remain for some time, and likewise could declare any Church for which they had a particular Respect to be a Royal Chapel, and accordingly endowed it as such, as remains upon Record since the time of Count Roger; who, among other Things, which he gave to S. Bruno, in the Year 1094 gave the Church of Santa Maria di Arsofia, his Chapel, which he held in Calabria, exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Ordinary;

the Charter of which Donation is recorded by Taffoni ¹, where we likewise find that Falcone was his Chaplain; from that time the Royal Chapels multiplying in our Kingdom, of course the Authority of the Royal Chaplain increased. The Church of S. Nicholas of Bari was declared a Royal Chapel, and therefore as the Prior and the Chapter were exempted from the Ordinary, so they were subordinate to the King's Chaplain Major. The Church of Altamura was likewise declared a Royal Chapel, and therefore the Archpriest and his Clergy, as Royal Chaplains, pretended to be independent of the Bishop of Gravina, and to acknowledge none for Superior but the King's Chaplain Major ². A great many other Churches to which the King collated, being declared Chapels Royal, of which we have discoursed in the preceding Chapter, likewise pretended Exemption from their Ordinaries, not owning any other for their Superior, but the Chaplain Major.

AFTERWARDS those Chapels that were built within the King's Castles were also reckoned Royal; therefore as their Number multiplied in the Kingdom, the Royal Chapels likewise multiplied. There was yet another Cause of the Increase of their Number; for our Princes having obtained of the Popes many Privileges and Exemptions to them, such as not to be bound to Residence, though they held Benefices with Cure of Souls; not to be subjected to the Payment of Tithes, which the Popes imposed upon the Ecclesiasticks, and other such like things ³, every one endeavoured to get themselves declared King's Chaplains; for a Custom had crept in, that many who did not actually serve in the King's Chapels, and were at a Distance, used to obtain Letters from the King, whereby they were declared Royal Chaplains, which when they had obtained were of great Service to them; because whenever Tithes were imposed upon the Ecclesiasticks, the Chaplains had recourse to the King for being exempted, and accordingly they got Protections, many of which we read in the second Volume of Chioccarelli's M. S. Giurisdizionali; and among the rest one granted at the Desire of the Archbishop of Otranto, who represented to the King, that he being one of the ancient Chaplains of the Royal Chapel, and that when he had been in Naples he had always officiated in it, he ought not to be liable to the Payment of Tithes. So that the Popes being sensible of this bad Practice made several Bulls, ordaining, That those only were to enjoy the Privileges and Exemptions granted to the Royal Chaplains, who actually served in the Chapel Royal, but those Bulls being too stinting, especially those of Leo X. and Clement VIII. they were not received without being discuss'd and explained. From henceforth the Authority of the Chaplain Major over all the Castles of the Kingdom, and over the Churches declared Chapels Royal increasing, it gave Rise to the many Disputes between him and the Archbishop of Naples, the Bishop of Cotrone, and many others, of which the second Volume of Chioccarelli's M. S. Giurisdizionali is full.

IN the time of the Kings of the House of Austria his Authority was augmented, by his getting the Charge and Inspection of the Royal University, and a part of that Jurisdiction over the Scholars, which formerly their own Judge had; and the Collateral Council frequently referred to him the Causes brought before them by Ecclesiasticks for Injuries or Violence done them by Laicks; and Jurisdiction was likewise given him over the Musicians of the Royal Chapel ⁴, of which we shall occasion to discourse more at large, when we come to the Reigns of those Princes.

C H A P. VII.

Of the Usages of the City of Naples, and of Bari, and of some other Cities of the Kingdom.

AMONGST those Advantages hitherto enumerated, whereby it pleased King Charles II. so much to favour and raise the City of Naples, that of the Collection of its Ufages ought not to be look'd upon as the least. Before these were digested into order, and put in writing, the Citizens were involved in continual Pleas and Discord by Reason of their Uncertainty; every one alledged for themselves the Ufages, and to prove their Allegation produced their Testimonies; and according to those Proofs the Plea was decided. It happened in such Cases, that by relying on the Proof of those Testimonies, in another Judicature the contrary was proved, by which Means a different Decision was the Consequence; whence it was, that they were always uncertain and doubtful, and involved in perpetual Pleas and Controversies. In order to remove so great Confusion, Charles II. resolved to apply a Remedy.

HE had a very recent Example of this, set him by his Father King Charles in the City of Bari, and another in the same City long before by the famous Roger I. King of Sicily. That City having been long under the Dominion of the Longobards was governed by their Laws; and particular Ufages had been established there, for the most part agreeable to those Laws. The People of Bari, that they might not fall into the same Confusion, under which they saw Naples at that time labouring, caused those Ufages to be put in writing; and their City having been taken by Roger, they presented them to him, who (as we read in the Preface) Et laudavit, Et servavit illesus; imo potius suo magno favore firmavit, Et eis perfectis, demum robur sue constitutionis indulxit *. But in the time of Charles I. they had the good Fortune to have two of their own Citizens famous Lawyers, who very succinctly and elegantly, considering the Age, collected them into a small Volume, and in a tolerable Style transmitted them to Posterity; and it is that Volume, which is now so common; which deserved a more learned Commentator, than Vincenzo Massilla, who being ignorant of the Longobard Laws, from which they are taken, in a very insipid Style, and full of Puerilities, in the Year 1550 wrote Comments upon them.

THE two Lawyers that collected them into the Form we now see them, were Andrea di Bari a Judge, and the famous Spairo, or Spurano, likewise a Judge of Bari. This last was one of the greatest Lawyers that flourished in the time of Charles I. and was by that Prince much honoured and esteemed; for besides his having made him first Justice of Terra di Bari, and then Master of Accounts of the High Court, after the Death of Roberto di Bari, he was made Great Protonotary of the Kingdom. He was likewise made President of the Tribunals in the Counties of Provence and Forcalquier; and had the Title of Vir Nobilis, in those times given to Men of Quality, and Persons of the first Nobility; and lastly he knighted him, and enriched him with many Fiefs.

* In procem. Consuet. Bari.

Andrea li Bari, in that Book which he wrote, followed, as much as was fitting, the Order and Method of Justinian's Code, and in some measure imitated the Pandects. Therefore, after a pretty tolerable Proem, in Imitation of Justinian, he began with the Title De Sacrosanctis Ecclesiis, where he treats of things concerning the Cathedral Church of Bari, and that of S. Nicholas. In Imitation of Tribonianus in the Pandects, he ends his Work with the Title De Regulis Juris, wherein he likewise follows the Example of the Compilers of the Decretals.

S PARANO, with no less Elegancy, to Andrea's Book adds another of his own, and follows a different Method. Knowing, that these Usages were for the most part taken from the Longobard Laws, he thought it more fit to follow the same Order, which the Collectors of those Laws had observed; and therefore as they had begun their first Book of the Longobard Laws with criminal Affairs, so he begins his with the same. It is likewise said of this Lawyer, that he composed other Works; but these two only have reached us, viz. this Collection, and a little Book intitled: Rosarium Virtutum, & Vitiatorum; which, with the Appendix of the Abbot Paslo Fusco da Ravello, in the Year 1571 was printed in Venice.

CHARLES II. then having raised Naples to such a pitch of Grandeur, would not allow Bari to excel it in this. Therefore finding that its Usages had not been put in writing, which was the Occasion of the abovementioned Confusion, he first gave it in charge to the Archbishop of this City, and directed him to call for twelve Men of known Probity, and well skilled in the Usages of their City, and with them to begin the Work. Filippo Minutolo was then Archbishop of Naples, who, on account of his Wisdom and Learning, had been appointed chief Countellor to Charles, when his Father had left him his Lieutenant in Naples; so that he was equal to the Work, and from whom a happy Issue was to be expected¹. At the same time he ordered the University of Naples to chuse such Men as were not only of undoubted Probity, but most knowing in the Usages of their native Country, who were to search into the Usages of the City, and those especially that were most genuine, ancient, agreeable, and most approved of in the Judicatories; and after having carefully examined them with the Testimony of Men of Probity and Integrity, they were to put them in writing into one Volume; which being revised and examined by the Archbishop, and those twelve Persons appointed for that end, it was to be presented to him, that these only might be confirmed and approved by his Constitution, and all others rejected; so that they were to have no Force in any Judicature, or otherwise.

THE Archbishop and those Delegates put their Orders in execution, and in name of all the Citizens presented ahe Book to the King, that he might confirm it. At that time the Ecclesiasticks had not as yet pretended, as they strongly insisted upon afterwards, to be free and exempt from these Usages. Then Charles caused the Book to be revised by Bartolommeo di Capua, at that time Protonotary of the Kingdom, who having taken out some things, and added others, put it into a better Form, and in the Stile we now read it. Which being done, these Usages were approved by the King, and except such as were contained in this Volume, it was declared unlawful to quote any other, either in the Courts of Judicature, or out of them; this was done in the Year 1306, the Archbishop Minutolo being then dead.

IF the Usages of Naples were to be compared with those of Bari, we should certainly find, that the two Judges Andrea and Sparano penn'd those which the People of Bari presented to King Charles I. in a more elegant Stile, than Bartolommeo wrote those presented by the Neapolitans to Charles II. The Stile of the first was not so insipid and perplex'd as that of the last, which may be observed by any that will be at the Pains to read both; but Charles in his Preface excuses Bartolommeo, by saying, that he thought fit not to alter the Stile and Terms peculiar to the Country, that they might be the better understood by the Citizens: *In stilo distaminis eorundem Civium: ut magis propriè illarum usualia verba remaneant*².

THERE appears another Difference between those two Collections; for as Bari was long under the Dominion of the Longobards, so the Usages of that City for the most part are derived from the Laws of that Nation. On the contrary Naples was never subject to the Longobards, but was originally a Greek City; and during all the time that the other Provinces of the Kingdom were under the Dominion of the Longobards, it was under that of the Greeks and the last Emperors of the East; so that the Usages of Naples are derived from the Grecian Laws.

KING Charles having said that these Usages were most ancient, some therefore have believed that they were the Remains of those ancient Laws whereby Naples was governed in the time of its Archontes and Demarchi, as we said in the first Book. Others, with greater Probability, and without having recourse to Times so remote, have believed, that they were derived from the Novellæ of the last Greek Emperors; which Opinion is supported by the many Rites and Customs of the later Greeks, which are still observed, and by the many Words of that Nation still in use.

THE Order and Method observed by Bartolommeo di Capua were likewise quite different from those, which Andrea and Sparano followed. These, at least as far as was possible, imitated Justinian, and the Collectors of the Longobard Laws, as we have said; Bartolommeo of his own Head took a new Method. In the first Place he treated of the Order of Succession ab intestato, and then of that ex testamento; of the Power, which by vertue of these Usages the Sons of a Family have of making Wills, and of what Goods; of the Power which married Women have when they are no longer under the Tuition of their Fathers, to bequeath their Portions; how much of them they can so, or otherwise dispose of; of the Maintenance which Fathers and Mothers ought to give their Children. Then he goes on to treat of Dowries, and of the fourth part of the Husband's Goods due to the Wife; of Contracts between Husband and Wife; of Instruments, which in those Times were wont to be drawn up by the *Curiali, and of their Authority; and in short, of all that concerns the Materia * Certain Officers belonging to the Pope. Dotalis, and the Wife's fourth Part.

BEFORE he proceeded to the other Contracts, he intermixt eight Titles; in the first he treated of Cases, in which one Person of his own Authority could pledge the Goods of another; in the second de ratione congrui; in the third he examines of what Credit the Word of a Colonus partiarus may be; in the fourth he discusseth the Testimony of Clowns, and what Credit it deserves; in the fifth he treats of Servitude; and in the three following, of Things thereto belonging. Then he returns to Contracts, and discourses of Leases, Pledges, Buying and Selling, and Earnest Money; but those Titles are intermixt with others, such as De Communi dividendo, & Glande Leggenda.

AT last he concludes with these Titles, De ripa, vel efrico, and De restitutione in integrum. Such was the Order that Bartolommeo di Capua observed in his Collection of the Neapolitan Usages, which was finished and confirmed by the King on the twentieth of March 1306, as we see by the Date: Data Neapoli per Manus ejusdem Bartolommei de Capua Militis Logothetæ, & Prothonotarii Regni Siciliae. Anno Domini 1306. die 20. Martii 4. Indict. Regnorum nostrorum anno 22.

THESE Usages were by King Charles ordered to be placed in his Royal Archives, that the Neapolitans, by having them thus set down in writing, and confirmed by his Authority, might no longer be involved in so many Disputes, and might know whither to have recourse for a Decision¹.

OUR Doctors began afterwards to write Comments upon them, and forty four Years had not passed, after they had been collected by Bartolommeo, when Napodano Sebastiano di Napoli appeared, who was the first that employed his Talents upon them in the Reign of Queen Joan I. Great Grandchild to King Charles, in the Year 1350. He flourished in that Queen's time, and was reputed one of our ablest Professors; he was a noble Neapolitan of the Sebastian Family, which boasted as much of its being descended of S. Sebastian, who was Lieutenant General to the Emperor Dioclesian; or if they were mistaken in that, of that other Sebastian, who was Prætor in the Time of the Emperor Zeno; or when they could do no better, of the Lords of Sebastæ, a City of *Samaria*²; as Matteo d'Afflitto did of the Descent of his Family from S. Eustathius, and Sannazaro of his from S. Nazarius. While the Bishop of Florence was Chancellor, Lorenzo Poderico Professor in the University, and Sergio Donoroso Vice-Protonotary of the Kingdom, Napodano underwent a public Examination in the College of Naples; and having applied himself to the Study of the Law, he became the first Lawyer of that Age. The first thing he did was to write Comments upon the Constitutions, and Statutes of the Kingdom; afterwards by that fatal Pestilence, which happened in Italy in the Year 1348, with great Beauty and Eloquence described by Boccaccio, having lost all his Children, in order to alleviate his Grief, he retired to a Villa near Naples, and in that Solitude applied himself to write a Comment upon these Usages, and finished his Work on the fifth of April 1351, as he says in the End of it. *Scipio Januarius*¹, who made some Additions to this Comment of Napodano, declares that he had heard from his Fore-fathers, who said that they had it from theirs, that the Villa, to which Napodano retired to write this Comment, was the very same, that in his time was possessed by D. Luisa Roffa Widow of Doctor D. Paolo Marchese, and is situate in the Entry of the Street that leads to S. Martino.

THE Comment, which this Lawyer wrote upon the Usages, acquired so great Authority with our Doctors, that it has at present no less Force and Authority than the Text itself; and by our Professors is as much explained and commented on, or with some Notes illustrated. Eleven Years after he had finished this Work, on the twentieth of August 1362 he departed this Life, and was buried in the Church of the Great Dominicans in Naples, where his Tomb is to be seen².

AFTER Napodano, these Usages were illustrated either with Notes or Additions, or with sundry Decisions of the High Court of the Royal Chamber of Accounts, or of the High Court of the Vicariate, by other famous Lawyers, who flourished in the following Ages. The first were Antonio Alessandro President of the Royal Chamber of Accounts and Viceprotonotary of the Kingdom; Stefano di Gaeta; the famous Matteo d'Afflitto; the Counsellor Antonio Capece, and Marino Freccia; the Counsellor and President of the Royal Chamber Diomede Mariconda; Antonio di Vivaya, and in the Year 1518, Scipio Januarius; who having compared the Copy which he had with Napodano's Original, caused it to be printed in Naples with the Additions, which the preceding Year he had made to the Comment on it; and this is the oldest Edition of these Usages.

THERE were other Editions published afterwards with new Glosses and Additions, such as those made by the Counsellor Vincenzo de Franchis, Camillo Salerno, Antonio Barattucci, Bartolommeo Marziale, and Cesare Vitelli, by Coluccio Coppola, Gaspere di Leo, and Gio. Angelo Pisanello; by the Counsellor Felice Scalaleone, Giacommo Anello de Bottis, and Felice de Rubeis; by the President of the Royal Chamber Scipione Buccino; by the Deputy Francesco Revertero; by Tommaso Naclero; by Provenziale; by Caputo, and lastly by Carlo di Rosa, who collected into one Volume the greatest part of all their Notes and Additions.

BESIDES these, we likewise had in the last Age other Writers, who, either by way of Dispute, or Decision, or Reasoning, or in Treatises, have written very fully upon these our Usages, amongst whom the famous Molfesio is in the greatest Esteem, and has written several Volumes upon them; so that at present, to our Professors, the Law, with respect to these Usages, is become one of the most necessary parts of the Practice of the Courts, which like other Professions, has its own Subtleties and Intricacies, all owing to the exorbitant Number of Writers; and therefore requires the greatest Learning and Skill to manage it well.

THE other Cities of the Kingdom followed the Example of Bari and Naples; the Usages of Aversa were also put in writing, which, with the Comment of Nunzio Pelliccia, are now very common. Flavio Ventriglia a Capuan Gentleman wrote a Comment upon those of Capua. Gaeta has likewise its own particular Usages and Statutes. Amalfi, and its Duchy had their own particular Usages, which were collected by Giovanni Agostaricci, who died in Amalfi in the Year 1282, where, in the old Cloyster of S. Andrew, his Tomb and Inscription are to be seen³. Catanzaro has likewise its own Usages explained by Giovan Francesco Paparo born in the said City. And so of the other Cities of the Kingdom, of which it is to no purpose here to make a longer and more troublesome Catalogue.

KING Charles II. having raised the City and Kingdom of Naples to so great Grandeur, at last in the sixty first Year of his Age, being seized with a burning Fever, in the twenty fifth Year of his Reign, on the fifth of May 1309, died in the Palace called Casanova without the Capuan Gate, which he had built two hundred Paces distant from Naples, where he used to live in the Summer time, for the Benefit of the Waters of Sebeto, which enter the City there, and go through it; which Place being now become a very large Village, still retains the same Name, though there be not the least Remains of the ancient Palace.

COSTANZO writes, that there was no Record that the Death of any Prince had been so much lamented as that of this King, both for his Liberality, his Clemency, and the other Virtues wherewith he was adorned. For his Liberality he was compared to Alexander the Great; and as he was very little skilled in military Affairs, so he was eminent in those of Peace and civil Government. His Body was buried with Royal Pomp in the Dominican Church, and soon after was transported to Provence, and placed in the Monastery of the Nuns of the Order of Preachers of S. Mary of Nazareth, built by him in *Arles*¹; but his Heart, by order of his Son Robert, was preserved in an Ivory Urn, and deposited in that same Church in Naples, where it is to this Day very religiously and respectfully kept by those Monks in Memory of his having enriched that Convent.

CIVIL HISTORY
Of the KINGDOM of
N A P L E S.

B O O K XXII.

PON the Death of King Charles II. immediately arose that famous Debate between the Uncle and Nephew about the Succession of the Kingdom; for on the one side the young King of Hungary sent Ambassadors to Pope Clement to demand the Investiture, not as Nephew, as Tiraquello ¹ mistakes it, but as the Son of Charles Martel the eldest Son of King Charles II. On the other side Robert Duke of Calabria, who was then with the Pope in Avignon, said, That the Investiture was his Right as Son, and nearest of Kin to the deceased King. The Point was strongly debated before the College of Cardinals; in which the Pleadings of Bartolommeo di Capua were of very great Service to the Duke of Calabria; for Bartolommeo was a most excellent Lawyer, and a Man, who for many Years had held the first Place in King Charles's Council, and by long Experience was most skilled in Affairs of State. He exerted himself with much Boldness in the Duke's Defence, and amongst the Works of Luca di Penna, and Matteo d'Afflitto ² we read the Arguments which he offered in this Cause. Niccolò Ruffulo an able Doctor of those Times likewise wrote in Robert's Favour, whose Arguments are printed with the Works of Luca di Penna. And Gio. Vincenzo Ciarlanti ¹ obliged Robert also to take with him to Avignon Andrea d'Iernia another famous Lawyer, that he, together with Bartolommeo, might defend his Cause. But we have no Record of any that defended Carobert's Cause; and if we may credit what Baldo Perugino wrote concerning this Debate ², his Case was not argued so much to the purpose before the Pope, as so difficult and intricate a Dispute required.

BUT what above all things made Pope Clement V.'s Decision in Robert's Favour just and prudent in the Opinion of the World, and of Writers, was, that Bartolommeo di Capua did not manage this Cause purely as a Lawyer; but he demonstrated to the Pope and Cardinals, that besides the Right which the Duke of Calabria had by Law, it was necessary for the common Good of Italy and of Christendom, to give the Kingdom to Robert, a prudent Prince, and most expert both in Peace and War, and who was reputed another Solomon of his Age, and not to the young King, who was altogether ignorant of the Affairs of Italy, born and brought up in Hungary, where the Manners of the People were quite different from those of the Italians, and who would be obliged to govern the Kingdom by the Means of his Ministers and Hungarian Barons, the result of which would be a civil War; and it was both impossible and inconvenient, that the Duke of Calabria, the Prince of Taranto, and the Prince of Achaia the young King's Uncles should be ruled by Hungarian Barons ³; whereupon, after mature Deliberation, it was decided in favour of Robert; and on the first of August in the Year 1309 in the publick Consistory he was declared King of Sicily, and Heir of the other Dominions of King Charles his Father; and on the twenty sixth of the said Month, Robert from the Hands of the Pope took the Oath of Fealty and Homage, and receiv'd the Investiture from him ⁴, not only of this Kingdom of Puglia, but likewise of that of Sicily ⁵; for the Popes, looking upon the Kings of Aragon who possessed Sicily without having sought Investiture of them, as Usurpers, in order to keep up their Right, invested the Kings of the Family of Aragon with both the Kingdoms, according to the ancient Use and Form. This Investiture is not only inserted by Chioccarelli in the first Tome of the M. S. Giurisdizionali, but we likewise find it amongst the Writs of the Royal Archives ⁶, wherein, amongst the usual Conditions and Agreements, Robert obliges himself to pay yearly to the Holy See, on the Feast of S. Peter, eight thousand Ounces of Gold as a Quit-Rent, in Acknowledgment of the Fief; repeating also what had been establish'd in the former Investitures, that the City of Benevento should continue to be excluded, and as no part of the Kingdom for ever to belong Dominio utili, & directo Ecclesie Romanæ. So on the eighth of September Robert was crowned King in Avignon with all the usual Ceremonies, great Pomp and Solemnity ⁷; and the Pope in Token of his Affection for Robert, by an authentick Bull subscribed by all the College, made him a Present of a great Sum of Money, which was thought to exceed three hundred thousand Ounces of Gold, which King Charles his Father, and his Grandfather owed the Church of Rome for the Charges which Pope Boniface VIII. and his Predecessors had been at in the War of Sicily ⁸.

ALL these things having been transacted in Avignon in the Pontificate of Clement V. it is very strange how our Professors came to believe, that Pope Boniface VIII. pronounced this Sentence in favour of Robert, when that Pope many Years before had been made Prisoner in Anagni by the Colonna, and died of Grief in Rome. In which the Blunder of Tiraquello and of some others ⁹ is not pardonable, who, contrary to what we read in all grave Historians ¹⁰, have written, that it was Boniface who pronounced Sentence in favour of Robert; perhaps they have been led into this Mistake by Baldo's Commentaries ¹¹, which are very erroneous in the vulgar Edition.

THIS Sentence was highly commended by Bartolus ¹, and what is more by Gino da Pistoja ², that most severe Rebuker of the Popes and Court of Rome; and tho' Baldo ³ once disapprov'd of it, by saying, That the Pope fuit magis partialis, quam talis qualis esse debuerat; yet elsewhere ⁴ examining the Matter, and finding it full of Difficulty, and not so easy to be decided, insomuch that he was forced to say, Solvat Apollo; and adds, That the Apostolick See having thus determined, esset ridiculum, & quasi hæreticum disputare, quia injuriam facit judicio Reverendissimæ Synodus, which Words our Matteo d' Afflitto likewise made use of.

THIS Sentence, according to Bzovius ⁵, was afterwards confirm'd by Benedict XII. who by his Legates having received the Oath of Fealty and Homage from Robert, confirmed him in the Kingdom, and invested him with it, upon the same Conditions contained in the Investiture of King Charles I. his Grandfather ⁶. There are not wanting very grave Lawyers, who have supported it both with Reason and Examples, such as Cujacius ⁷, Hotomannus ⁸, Moriscus, Mariana ⁹, Arniseus ¹⁰, and many more. Whence it was, that Robert, in order to shew, that as being elder, and nearer of kin than Carobert, he ought to enjoy the Primogeniture preferable to him, intituled himself, Robertus Primogenitus, &c. as Gio. Antonio de Nigris ¹¹ very much to the purpose observes in his Commentaries.

ROBERT therefore lying under so many Obligations to Pope Clement left Provence, and returned to Italy; and there to shew his Gratitude to the Pope, he made a Progress through all the Cities, where he encouraged the Guelfs, and declared, That he would be an Enemy to all those that should offer to disturb the Ecclesiastical State, or its Friends.

AT last he arrived at Naples, where he was receiv'd with universal Joy, and royal Pomp; for not only each Province of the Kingdom, but all the Cities and Towns sent their Syndicks to compliment him, and pay Obedience to him; and he to shew himself worthy of the Pope's Decision, and of the Good-will of the People, made a Progress over all the Kingdom, and examining into the Conduct of the Barons and Officers towards the Subjects, he commended those that had behaved well; and on the contrary reprimanded the unjust and tyrannical, ordering them to observe the Laws and Statutes of the Kingdom, which his Grandfather and Father had establish'd. Then he returned to Naples, and created Charles his only Son Duke of Calabria, and honoured many great Barons with the Title of Count; and in Imitation of his Forefathers he began to embellish and render the City more magnificent, not having as yet any War upon his Hands. This Year 1310 he began to build the Monastery of S. Clara, and to make it fit for entertaining a great Number of Nuns of that Order, with a separate Convent for a good many Friars Conventuals; and he was pleased to declare that magnificent Church his Chapel Royal ¹². He built it so stately and sumptuous, that it vied with any modern Edifice in Italy; and it is said, that from the first Day of his Reign he assigned three thousand Ducats a Month to be employed while he lived, first in building the Church, and the Convents, and then in buying Lands, the Rents of which were to be applied for the Subsistence of the Nuns and Friars. And there are some who have written ¹³, that it was as a Propitiation for his having had a Hand in the Death of his Brother Charles Martel, in order to make Way for his Succession in the Kingdom, that Robert was so profuse in these pious Works, as if that Edifice had been sufficient to blot out so great a Wickedness, if he was really guilty of it; and as if the building of Churches and Monasteries, and enriching them with large Revenues and Possessions were sufficient Atonements for clearing Men from their Crimes. Scipione Ammirato ¹⁴ says, That it had been handed down by Tradition in Naples, that Robert having put the last Hand to the Fabrick of this Church, ask'd his Son the Duke of Calabria what he thought of it; to whom the Duke, not out of Disrespect, but having no mind to flatter his Father, answered him freely, that in his Opinion it resembled a Stable. And he said so, because the Church having no Wings, the little Chapels, which in an irregular Manner are placed about it, not reaching to the Roof, looked like Mangers. But the King, as it is natural for Men to take it ill to hear their Works discommended, or moved by a Spirit of Prophecy, said to him, God grant, my Son, that you be not the first that will eat in this Stable; and it is very certain, that Duke Charles was the first of the Royal Family that was buried in S. Clara.

C H A P. I.

The Emperor Henry VII. in Confederacy with the King of Sicily, makes War upon King Robert, and reviving the ancient Rights of the Empire, by his own Sentence deprives him of the Kingdom; but Henry dying, the Undertaking dropt, and the War was renewed in Sicily.

KING Robert spent the first three Years of his Reign in the Arts of Peace; and at the same time favoured the Guelf Faction thro' all Italy to the utmost of his Power; but the Death of the Emperor Albert of Austria, which had happened some Years before, interrupted those Exercises of Peace; for Henry VII. King of the Romans, the first Emperor of the illustrious House of Luxembourg, being chosen in his Place, and crowned in Aix la Chapelle, all the Ghibellins of Italy sent to invite him to come and be crowned in Rome; and seeing his own Dominions in Germany were but inconsiderable, and that the Riches of Italy would be necessary for supporting the Imperial Dignity, a Diet was called, to which all the Princes of Germany came; and wherein it was concluded, that the German Nation should maintain an Army for convoying Henry to Italy in order to be crowned in Rome. Upon the News of which, Clement afraid, that by his Residence in Avignon, Henry would possess himself of all the Ecclesiastical State, and fix the Imperial Seat in Rome, created King Robert Count of Romagna, and Vicar-General of all the State of the Church, in order to oppose him. Therefore Robert, upon hearing that Henry was resolved to come into Italy, in the Year 1312 sent D. Luni di Reana with a hundred Horse to assist the Florentines, and likewise sent John Prince of Abruzz his Brother with six hundred Catalan and Neapolitan Horse to oppose the Emperor's Coronation¹.

ON the other hand Frederick King of Sicily, who had been highly displeas'd that the Kingdom had fallen to Robert's Share, and not to the King of Hungary's, from whom at that Distance he would have had little to fear, and who had resolved upon all Occasions to pull down Robert's Power, had promised himself a fair Opportunity upon the Emperor's coming, though at first he did not discover himself. But being offended with Robert, for having put in close Prison (where he died) one of his Ministers, whom he had sent to Naples to visit Ferdinand the Son of the King of Morocco, made Prisoner in Greece by the Prince of Taranto; Frederick could no longer conceal his Intentions, and upon the Emperor's Arrival in Italy, he sent Manfred de Carimont to compliment him, and enter into a League with him against King Robert. The Emperor finding his Account in this Embassy, concluded the Alliance, and declar'd Frederick Admiral of the Empire, and sent to beg of him, that with his Fleet he would infest the maritime Places of the Kingdom, and that he himself would quickly attack it by Land.

THE Genoese, now finding that the Emperor was become more powerful by this Alliance, receiv'd him as their Lord; insomuch that he began to be formidable to all Italy; and upon his Arrival at Rome on the first Day of August 1312, he was with great Solemnity crown'd in the Church of *S. John Lateran*¹; then he went to Pisa, and caused Robert to be summoned, as a Vassal of the Empire, to make his Appearance before him.

THE Emperors of the West, as we have seen in the preceding Books of this History, pretended to have Sovereignty over these Kingdoms, and their Investitures, as we have before observed, are more ancient than those of the Popes; whence S. Bernard, taking occasion to flatter the Emperor Lothaire, said, that omnis, qui in Sicilia Regem se facit, contradicit Cæsari: for which cause, whenever the Emperors gather Strength in Italy, they never fail to keep up their Pretension. Henry cites Robert, and he not appearing, declares him contumacious, and on the twenty-fifth of April 1313, he pronounces Sentence against him², whereby he banishes him the Kingdom, deprives him of it, and of all his Dominions, and as a Rebel to the Empire condemns him to be beheaded. We read this Sentence in the first Tome of the M. S. Giurisdizionali collected by Chioccarelli; and it is likewise recorded by Albericus in his Commentaries³.
